DUFFY'S IRISH CATHOLIC MAGAZINE.

A Catholic Literature for Ireland.

THE very highest aspiration we can make for our infant PERIODICAL is, that it may be the forerunner of a Catholic literature in Ireland. If its humble labours can in any degree conduce to that great end, then, whatever be in other respects its failure or success, its mission will be more than amply fulfilled. For such a literature does seem to us, almost beyond any other thing, the essential want of this country. Civil freedom and national prosperity may, and we trust shall be won before this generation of Irishmen has passed away—but we have only to cast our eyes abroad to see that even freedom and prosperity may come on terms far too dear. If here, as elsewhere, the day that looks on the active development of our energies should also behold the intellect of the nation hopelessly divorced from the only spirit that can guide or purify; should see our Youth wasting mind and golden years in the uneasy chase of half truths, of which the end is but error and evil; should see a People hungering and thirsting after knowledge, and finding no fruit to satisfy them save what is deadly to their spiritual life; and should thus see sown, even in the midst of apparent blessings, the certain seeds of future crime and anarchy; would we not—even in this terrible year of famine—revolt at the exchange?

These apprehensions, we trust, will be belied; but who, looking to the condition of mankind, will say they are imaginary? Of late ages, the Church has had to do battle with the spirit of the world, embodied in a mightier and subtler form than in all previous time. From the corruption of nature, from human passions, and the persecution of kings and emperors, she has always suffered, and always must. But in former centuries there was, at least, no distracting dissonance between the secular learning that informed, and the Divine authority which claimed to direct the mind. There breathed throughout even secular works a spirit of religious reverence which harmonized with, and fortified the belief of the people. Pitfalls there were for pride and wilfulness, but at least, no galaxy of false lights for the deception of the earnest and sincere. But now, for a century and more, the learning of the world, the basis of systems of philosophy and polity, all that has been crowned with the high names of Genius and Intelligence, has been (why should we conceal it?) in by far the greater measure, hostile to, or estranged from Catholicity. The wisdom of man has been but too manifestly at variance with the wisdom of God. There has been a literature of Protestantism which obtained its chief development in England, and whose day is now almost gone by: a literature of French philosophy, and lastly, a literature of German philosophy, which again acted on France and England, and which is now the most progressive principle opposed to Catholicism in the world. There has been, indeed, of late years, a strong Catholic reaction, as numbers of profound works produced on the Continent, and the Anglo-Catholic movement in England, may testify; but still, the surface of the current continues to run in the other direction.

The condition of a young mind in France or Germany, in our days, is unhappy and perilous in the extreme. It is girt by a circle of infidelity, from which it is wonderful if it escape. In every branch of knowledge which the craving intellect turns to, from history and political science down to the lightest works of fiction, the poison of scepticism prevails. The student drinks it in from the authoritative lips of teachers and professors. In society as in books, he finds it the reigning spirit. Between such a philosophy so, taught and sanctioned, clothed with all that dazzles and captivates the natural man, appealing both to the passionate desire of novelty, and the passionate admiration of favourite authors which are so characteristic of youth, between this and the submissive belief and exacting practice of the Church, how unequal a conflict. Who can wonder that the faith, even of those who from association and religious instinct cling to it the longest, is at length sapped and displaced.

In Ireland, we have been educated for the most part, by the Protestant literature of England—a literature, anti-Catholic, no doubt, but not to be named either for power or malice, in comparison with the modern literature of the Continent. As to the ignorant sneers and violence against Catholicity with which it abounds, it is one of our earliest lessons to learn to steel ourselves against them, so that after a time they cease to wound us. And there is in the body of English literature, if not a religious spirit, yet a full recognition of the truths of revelation; and so far as the influence of Christianity on our social and secular ideas is concerned, there is so much in common between Catholics and Protestants, that the citadel of our faith has not been much injured by it. Still it has been mischievous in more ways than one. The very fact of our being obliged, as we said, to become hardened to insults and mockeries against the peculiar doctrines of Catholicity, is itself an evil—so much of religion depends upon awe and reverence for things unseen, that it is no light mischief to be familiarized with contempt for sacred mysteries. We become callous where we should be most sensitive, and swallow as matter of course what should instinctively revolt us as blasphemy against the Holy of Holies.* But besides

* What a striking example of this are Peter Plymley's Letters?—a book written in favour of the political rights of Catholics, and whose advocacy was hailed by them with delight, yet stuffed with the most insolent and unseemly ribaldry against their religion. One passage, from the very beginning of the book, we thought of quoting, but forbore from positive disgust.

this, the Protestant tone of our literature has undoubtedly had a tendency, if not to undermine the citadel, yet to shatter some of the outworks of Catholic belief. If it has not had much effect in making Catholics infidels, or Protestants, yet it has in a great measure stripped us of whatever is striking and peculiar in the tone of Catholicity. It diminishes reverence for Catholic rites and ceremonies, chills the love of Catholic institutions and usages, and generates a contempt for pious traditions, not absolutely of faith, and an indolent unenquiring scepticism as to everything miraculous in church history; and if the bent of thought which it produces does not absolutely refuse to coexist with Catholic belief, yet it tends to deprive the latter of the pervading and overarching influence which it ought to exercise upon all our ideas and habits, to drive it, as it were, into a corner of our mind. In brief, its effect is to make Catholics intrench themselves within the minimum of Catholic faith, believing just what they must believe on pain of heresy, and no more; and priding themselves upon having their Catholicity as little unlike Protestantism as possible.

All these results are sad enough, and of themselves loudly call for counteraction. But the literatures of religious Protestantism—Protestantism itself, as a religious system, are in their decline. The right of private judgment has given birth to younger and more daring progeny. The English sceptical writers, though the earliest, did not produce their deepest effect in their own country, but transmitted their influence to France, where there sprang up an organized and aggressive army of unbelief. Their mode of attack was conducted with consummate art. They did not, like the English freethinkers, confine themselves to heavy philosophical treatises scarce opened by the multitude; but through tale, and essay, and epigram—in dictionaries and encyclopædias, with the keenness of a matchless wit, and all the graces of style, they sought but too successfully to taint the very atmosphere of letters with their principles. So artfully, too, did they blend their covert assaults against religion with attacks on real abuses in church and state, that they at length succeeded in confounding these two things; and one party came to hate the church the more, as the antagonist of freedom, the other to dread liberty as the handmaid of irreligion. Nor was on it the Christian dispensation alone that they made war—they ridiculed and scoffed at any sense of dignity or mystery in the nature and life of man. No solemn social bond, no depth of awe or reverence, no obedience or holy fear was recognised by them; everything was mean, superficial, and intelligible. How far this fatal philosophy extended, and what have been its results on the world are manifest to all. But other doctrines have since gained ground, doctrines which had their root in Germany, and which agree with the French in rejecting revelation, but in almost nothing else. These Germans were revolted at the mean and false portrait of human nature drawn by the school of Voltaire. They felt that there were heights and depths in man which no plummet of French philosophism had sounded. They acknowledged the mysteriousness of life, the greatness of enthusiasm and devotion, the majesty of duty, the sacredness of law. They are full of lofty and unworldly speculation; of Christianity they speak respectfully, reverentially even, as being one, and hitherto the best, of the transitory forms in which great truths took shape: Mahometanism being another of those forms. But what belief they propose to substitute for old Christianity—what resting place their doctrines yield for the wearied spirit—what curb for the rebellious passions, let no man ask, for no man we are sure will be able to answer. They cheat us with an array of imposing words—faith, and truth,* and reverence, and annihilation of self—ideas which, in the heart of a Christian, have a relation and significance, but which with them present no tangible conception, but at best are a poetic exaltation of the brain—with some a half belief, with others an utter cant. Thus the German philosophy though better, because less earthy and sensual, and because it at least excites the desire of celestial truth which it cannot gratify, is yet less consistent than the French. The one lays plainly before you a barren desert as the sum of man's hopes here and hereafter, the other deludes you with the fugitive semblance of the living waters. We will be pardoned these considerations for the sake of the sad fact, that these doctrines—a blank materialism or a shadowy, unmeaning spiritualism—are diffused through every vein of the present mind of Europe.

As to the results of all this. No one will ask us, at this day, to prove the effects of literature upon the ideas and actions of mankind, or to show to how large a degree men in this age are what books make them. We would not refer to so trite a theme as the French Revolution, were it not for the sort of opinion that has grown current of late, that that portent, with all its diabolic crimes, was the natural and necessary consequence of the previous oppression of the government and aristocracy; that it is a lesson to kings and rulers, and to no others. That there was gross oppression, and scandalous neglect on the part of both civil and ecclesiastical authorities, no one can deny; and further, we may admit, that the ferocities of an excited mob are things incident to every violent change. But it should never be lost sight of that the extreme wickedness of the French revolution—the wholesale judicial murders—the establishment of Atheism by law—the destruction of all holy ties, were the work not of the multitude, but of the middle classes who rose to power. And it seems to us the grossest absurdity to conceive that such things would have been done or tolerated, if every spark of religious principle, or restraint, had not been long extinguished in the minds of those classes by the influence of Voltaire and his confederates.—And further, if any one ask for the effects of this literature, we tell them to look abroad over Europe at this day. What principles and rules of action are predominant in the cabinets and councils of kings and statesmen? Principles of justice, of deference to the Church, and a horror of intrenching upon its privileges or province? No: but incessant schemes to have the Church gagged, and bound at their feet, subservient to their worldly policy, and winking at their wickedness. Utilitarianism, Benthamism, modern enlightenment—call it what you will, the seed was sown by Hume and Voltaire. Again, we say, cast your eyes over Europe. In France, Prussia, Spain, England, even Austria, the endeavour is to make the Church the creature and slave of the civil power. Religion has to battle for its clearest and most sacred rights. Surveying these things, let us acknowledge the influence which the sceptical philosophy has exercised upon the modern world.

The modern literature of England, by which we mean the productions of the last twenty years or so, is next to worthless—with few exceptions, most trashy and emasculate. Still such as it is, it reflects and helps to shape its time, and to those who look a little below the surface, who watch indications rather than expressions, and regard colour as well as matter, it is manifest that here too, whatever vital principle there is, is not fixed faith of any kind, but the floating uncertainties of Germanism.

But Ireland, how is she to be made proof against all these influences? This problem, the most momentous of the many that surround us, is one that must be solved under worse penalties than any political disaster. The heart of the country, thank God, is sound; no people in Europe more deeply religious. But in our gratitude and just pride for this, let us not lose sight of the auxiliary causes that contributed to it, nor presume too much on the grace that has been bestowed us. Let us remember that it was one consequence of the Penal Laws, to burn into the heart of the Irish Catholic an intense devotion to his persecuted religion—that the forbidden education which the gentleman received abroad and the peasant at home, made religion a vital part of knowledge. The latter looked up to his priest as the fountain of all information, sacred or profane, that man could need. The hedge-schoolmasters, with all their pedantry and absurdity—even with all their vices—never ceased to inculcate a love of their own religion, blended, perhaps, with too fierce a hatred of its oppressors. Let us remember that, during the long struggle against religious tyranny, the idea of Catholicity became knit with that of liberty; that theological controversy was almost a part of that battle, and that it was necessary for politicians to become familiar with and explain the doctrines of the Church, in order to answer the aspersions of their antagonists.

Nearly all this has changed, or is changing. No longer bound by the bond of persecution—no longer in the heat of a semi-religious struggle—no longer unaffected by the current of opinion elsewhere, and with an irrepressible tendency towards education of all kinds, the intellectual and spiritual future of Ireland is a theme of the deepest anxiety and moment. Her condition may be likened to that of an individual mind, naturally vigorous and inquisitive, but, long cramped and restrained, possessing deep instincts and affections, but no regulated structure of opinion, and which, when released from bondage and springing forth to seize the fruit of knowledge, is open to influences from every quarter of Heaven. How this plastic mind shall be moulded; whether the soul of thought that is about to enter into Ireland shall be the harmonious counterpart of that soul of faith which has guided and upheld her through the furnace of the past; whether her mature reason shall be pregnant with the conviction now living unspoken in the heart of her millions—that in true religion is found the cycle of all duty and all moral truth—whether the wise among her sons shall be wise enough to know that whatsoever is not subordinate to this is foolishness; whether the character of Ireland among the nations shall be one of lofty Christian zeal, as well as lofty nationality—these considerations may well have an interest for us. But to expect that these great results will come spontaneously; that the mind of Ireland, with no pains taken to guide it aright, and buffeted by all the winds of temptation, will tread securely and directly in the true path, seems to us a confidence against reason and nature.

Such a Catholic literature as we long for, and could shape an ideal of—a literature religious to the core, which should reflect the majesty and eternal truth of our Faith, and its beauty and poetry as well; Irish, too, to the core—thrilling with our Celtic nature, and coloured by our wonderful history; such a literature, and its glorious associate, a high Catholic and national art, may be of slow formation, and wait long for their maturity. And, indeed, they demand something beyond the ordinary labours of genius. Still, a beginning may be made. A beginning has been made in the works of our dear Gerald Griffin; the tone and spirit of which, whatever be his theme, leave nothing to be desired. And we scarce know how much a little effort in the right direction may effect. For when the heart and sympathies of a people are with you, it is easy to influence their minds. Let what has been done of late, in infusing a spirit of nationality into our literature, be a lesson to us. Formerly, that spirit was as rare in current books as a tone of Catholic religion is now. But once a few zealous men set themselves to preach the principles of national feeling, what a bound was made by the popular mind in that direction. How eagerly did they imbibe everything that was said and sung of the wrongs and hopes of Ireland, and of her forgotten heroes. Because these things were but the expression of what they themselves had dumbly felt—but the touching of a chord with which their own pulses beat in unison.

And of this national literature, a word may be said in relation to our own design. Of the deep sincerity as well as ability of the men whose work it is, and of the good they have achieved in arousing our sense of national dignity and affection, no one can say too much. Still we think they committed a mistake in not basing their labours more on the religious feelings of the mass of the people whom they addressed. The reason of this was, no doubt, the desire to find a way to the hearts of Irishmen of all religions. Yet it was, in a great degree, an error, and one which, we believe, they will come more and more to recognise. At all events, it has left one-half, and the more necessary half, of the teaching required by the majority of our countrymen to be yet laboured at.

If there were but a few zealous sowers, how quickly would a little seed produce a harvest in such a soil. And what materials for the undertaking—what a well is our history from whence to draw the beneficent waters that we seek. Those distant ages to which Alfred and Bede have borne testimony, when our doctors instructed and our saints converted Europe, and the hymns of an Irishman were adopted as the chants of the whole Western Church—that proud time is not a fiction, or the hyperbole of national vanity—it rests upon evidence as sound as any fact in history. To reproduce this age, and the acts and words of its holy men and women, for the Irish people at this day—to give them therein a genuine and high source of national pride, from that alone what fruits might not spring? Have we not—but this work has been already commenced, and we trust will be carried out by the same zealous hand—have we not to become familiar with the men of the seventeenth century, with their Spanish fervour and loftiness, and intensity of Catholic nationality? And from our worst days of suffering, what lessons may be drawn? Is not our history for ages one martyrdom? There is a halo of true glory resting on our sad annals if we had but eyes to read them right—a truer glory than is found in our protracted resistance on the field, or the occasional victories that flash through the long night of disaster. Of these, the bitter result after all is, that we were conquered; but there was another, and a far higher field of battle, in which the victory was wholly ours, and the ignominy our conqueror's. Lord of land and life, and not sparing either, he sought to be lord of conscience too, and was uniformly and utterly baffled. A race, taunted with their fickleness, and too often divided, too often in other things unstable as water, were in this, in the struggle for an unseen good, the very type of resolute tenacity, of unity and unconquerable will. We know not if a time will ever come when men will recognise, in Christian fortitude and fidelity, a higher thing than the bravest fighting—if they do this country will assuredly stand high. But, at least, we should impress this truth upon ourselves. We long to see a sense of these things entering deeply into the minds of our educated young men; to see their character and opinions formed by that part of our history too; to see our future politicians and statesmen distinguished for Christian wisdom as well as for a noble courage, that when the liberty of this land is won, she may be a light to modern as she was to ancient nations, not the imitator of their madness and injustice. And if, as a fond imagination might at times believe, that independence which she has ever longed for with more than Hebrew longing, be delayed till she can embrace it and use it in this spirit, can we feel otherwise than deeply thankful to that Providence which "shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will."

To descend from these high hopes to this Periodical of ours, which presumes to be the pioneer of so great a work. There are many difficulties in our path, but we cannot conceal from ourselves that the greatest lies in our own deficiencies. Would that our qualifications for the task bore any proportion to our conviction of its necessity. Still, as we said, a beginning may be made, in the hope that as we proceed we shall acquire both clearer views as to our path, and more assured strength to tread it.

St. Liguori's History of the Heresies.

THE HISTORY OF HERESIES AND THEIR REFUTATION; OR, THE TRIUMPH OF THE CHURCH. Translated from the Italian of St. Alphonsus M. Liguori. By the Rev. JOHN T. MULLOCK, O.S.F. 2 Vols. 8vo. Dublin: James Duffy, 10, Wellington-quay.

FOR many years, the name of Blessed Liguori has been a familiar one throughout the Catholic world. Although this great and good man was celebrated for a long life, resplendent with every virtue, and devoted to the instruction of those within his own immediate sphere, as well as those within the influence of his numerous writings, yet several years had elapsed from his death, in 1787, to his beatification, in 1816. The peaceful occupations of the Roman Pontiff, and his venerable Senate, had been rudely interrupted by the great scourge of Europe, Napoleon Buonaparte; Pius VII. was seized and carried into captivity in July, 1809, almost at the moment when everything had been duly prepared for the beatification of Liguori; and seven years thus passed away before it actually took place. During that time, it is scarcely too much to say, that all Italy, by its veneration for his memory, had anticipated the deliberate and slowly-formed award of the Roman court—for seldom, indeed, had there been less doubt, and greater unanimity of opinion about the exalted qualities that shed a lustre on his life, and crowned, with accumulated glories, his protracted career: seldom did the long and searching process of inquiry into the life, the habits, and the alleged miracles of those deemed worthy of beatification, bring forth clearer or more irresistible testimony than in his case, proving him to have been one of those who are the most valuable of all lights wherewith God, in his mercy, guides our erring steps in the way of example; a light, burning for its own salvation's sake, and, at the same time, shining for the comfort and edification of others.—Lucet et Ardet.

It is surely unnecessary to say, that speaking thus, we cannot be supposed to undervalue the contemplative life which has been adopted by so many devout persons of either sex. They formed neither a fanciful nor an exaggerated notion of the perils that beset all who live amidst the cares and seductions of the world. They knew that of the many imitators of Martha's "solicitude about many things,"* there are but few indeed who do not fall short of her enduring fidelity and ultimate perseverance; and that there are fewer still who do not find that Mary's choice, of giving precedence over all else to the only thing truly necessary, is the safest and most peaceful in the end. There is, however, this special advantage derived from the example of an active life, such as Liguori's, that it is a living and convincing refutation of an excuse put forward in various shapes, and made use of for many unworthy purposes, by those who are toiling in servitude to the world, namely—that an active employment amongst, and for society, is incompatible, or nearly so, with true sanctity of life. The fallacy would not be so pernicious, were it in reality the honest plea of a cowardly, yet conscientious soul, afraid of the obstacles in its way to perfection; but it is not so: it is almost invariably used, not so much as a pretext for not aiming at holiness, as a thin disguise thrown over an indulgence in the frivolities, nay, the vices of society, and a systematic conformity with the tyrannous exactions and the unprincipled maxims that are imposed and rendered current by the world and its varying fashions. "In the life of St. Alphonsus Liguori," says the translator of the "Heresies," "we have a proof that sanctity is peculiar to no age; that a saint is not, as we almost pictured to ourselves, a romantic personage, clad in sack-cloth and dwelling in the solitude of the desert or the retirement of the cloister. Here we have a man, I may say, of our own times, living within the influence of the ideas that rule our own age, mixed up with all the occurrences that check our daily existence. His days were spent in discharging the same duties as millions of his cotemporaries; and he was a Saint only because in the discharge of those duties, he sought above all, the glory of God and the salvation of souls."—Preface to the Life of St. Alphonsus M. Liguori, by the Rev. J. T. MULLOCK.

It would undoubtedly appear more german to our purpose, when noticing an historical production of our Saint, to have attended ere this to his character as a scholar and an author; here again is realised the truth of the translator's observation, that "there are few saints, the study of whose lives would be productive of more utility to us than that of St. Alphonsus;" here again does his example overthrow many a convenient theory reared up in the imagination of the idler and sensualist. St. Alphonsus was deeply engaged, we might say, immersed in the administration of a large and populous diocese—large as compared with neighbouring sees—and compared, even with those of our own country, claiming especial vigilance, on account of the far greater number of churches and ecclesiastics scattered over the fair Catholic soil of Italy. Affordable to the poorest, and exhaustless in zeal, we may well imagine how much of each day he devoted to the business essentially connected with his office. He was almost incessantly preaching, and although advanced in life when consecrated bishop, he frequently traversed his diocese, making himself conversant with the details of its spiritual necessities, its wants, and its resources, and dispensing charity and consolation as he went along. In the midst of all these labours and anxieties, he contrived to compose and publish works of instruction for the whole Christian world, and among the rest, the valuable one to which, in this paper, we propose briefly to call the attention of our readers.

This work, it would appear, was published originally in three volumes, but the translator, or rather the publisher, in deference we suppose to the economising spirit of our age, has compressed them into two; whereof all the first, and a portion of the second are devoted to the History, the remainder to the Refutation of the Heresies. In a history such as this, no one will be looking for graces of style. A methodical statement, in unvarnished phrase, of what is most necessary to be known concerning the origin of each heresy, its progress, and ultimate fate—including, of course, the character, position in life, and general career of the heresiarch himself; this is what we have to expect from such a work. To be succinct and intelligible where there are so many intricacies about general and provincial councils, Catholic and heretical, disputed and recognised; to draw for the narrative upon sources truly impartial, if such can be procured, and to be candid in exposing violence and indiscretion, no matter by whom committed; to do all this amid so much that is conflicting, and so much misrepresented, would be, indeed, to achieve a great deal. If our holy author—writing from a truly Catholic point of view, and in a truly Catholic spirit—professing to give, not a series of minute and critical enquiries, but a well-digested abstract of such approved but ponderous histories as those of Baronius, and Natalis Alexander; if he has not come up to all this, it was because in part it was impracticable on account of the limits he had prescribed to himself, and in part it was unnecessary in such a work to record what would amaze without edifying, and shock the feelings without improving the heart. And, even as it is, what a sad monument of human weakness does this work present! what a humiliating picture of the aberrations of that inner light, vouchsafed to us as a spark from the great supernal sun of Divine intelligence! In its pages are to be found, grouped within one century, Arius blaspheming the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity, and Macedonius assailing the Divinity of the Holy Spirit; in another, we have Nestorius dissatisfied with the accepted faith of his contemporaries, and insisting that there were two persons in Christ, as well as two natures. See him immediately followed by Eutyches, who rushes to the other extreme, and will have but one nature as well as one person. Then come the Monothelites, endeavouring still further to simplify the received notions about the hypostatic union by confounding and amalgamating the wills of the Redeemer.

In the transition from a wide-spread belief (if belief

it may be called,) in a plurality of Deities, to a belief in the unity of God, and a belief in the assumption of human nature on the part of God, by means of the closest possible union—it would naturally be expected that the errors of the human intellect, in the early stages of such transition, would be mostly about these two great all-important dogmas. It would not be until the minds of men had settled down upon these fundamental questions, that we could expect them to take any lively interest in, or be swayed by the passions incidental to poor human nature to doubt of or pervert, other articles of faith, which may be termed, without disparagement, the details of orthodox belief. No matter what may have been the cause, in point of fact, such has been the case, generally speaking; so that it was only in after times that licentiousness of opinion began to assail, for instance, the respect due to holy images—as with the Iconoclasts, the necessity or utility of ecclesiastical orders—as Wickliffe, the doctrine of the real presence—as Berengarius, &c. Thus, in all ages is verified the sad prophecy of the Saviour, "For it must needs be that scandals come."—Matt. xviii. 7.

There is another fact, too, that will strike those who may peruse these annals of the pride and waywardness of humanity; it is, that with few exceptions, the originators of these mischievous opinions were men who wore, over the gloomy and troubled speculations that inwardly perplexed them, a mask of piety, nay of austerity; to name Montanus Jovinian, Pelagius, Peter Waldo, Wickliffe, amongst many others, is quite enough to confirm the truth of this observation; whilst the obstinacy or the courage of a Huss, or Jerome of Prague, in sight even of the pile that was to consume them, is enough to make one weep at such perversion of the noblest qualities, and bow down in trembling before the inscrutable dispensations of Almighty wisdom. 'Tis in such a spirit that our pious author, alluding to the awful spread of the Eutychian heresy, at the close of the fifth century, owing to the shameful apathy of Acacius, Bishop of Constantinople, thus speaks—"Whilst I write I tremble. A bishop myself, and considering how many on account of being exalted to that dignity, have prevaricated and lost their souls: many I say, who, if they had remained in a private condition, would be more easily saved."—History, p. 173.

This very remarkable work displays much research on the part of the venerable author: as its multifarious contents, embracing a vast portion of the religious history of the world—and spread over two large volumes—would defy any attempt on our part to verify or question its statements, at least methodically, by examining its authorities—we must acknowledge ourselves incompetent to do so. We take the word of the learned and laborious translator, who assures us that "this book may be safely quoted as a work of reference; the author constantly quotes his authorities, and the student of ecclesiastical history can at once compare his statements with the sources from which he draws."—Preface, p. 6.

The history of the gigantic heresies originated by Arius, Pelagius, Nestorius, Eutyches, is given with a clearness, yet minuteness of detail that leaves but little to be desired by the general reader. In the account of the heresies of John Huss, in the fifteenth century, we observe there is but a passing allusion to that decree of the Council of Constance, which has been so much relied on, as proving that the Catholic Church sanctions the violation of faith with heretics ; probably the author, although a contemporary of the redoubtable John Wesley for nearly a century, had not heard of his famous syllogism, by which he would charitably prove that Catholics, by reason of the language of this Council, should not be tolerated by any government whatever. "Answer me, who can?" said this modest writer. In an evil hour for the founder of Methodism and love-feasts—the celebrated Father Arthur O'Leary accepted the vaunting challenge; we may just say of his triumphant reply, that while deploring the barbarity of an age, which burned old women as witches, and sent heretics, for the good of their souls, "through the fires of this world to the fires of another"—he dwells at length, and with great force, on the peculiar character of the doctrines of Huss, as totally subversive of all order, and all government civil and ecclesiastical.

We have but space to say a word or two of that portion of this history which may naturally be supposed to possess the greatest interest for us, that is, the rise and progress of the Anglican schism and heresy. We find the leading features of this great event delineated in a bold, brief, yet comprehensive manner; yet we could have wished, that the translator had adhered a little more stringently to the promise which he made, we are certain, in all sincerity, that is, to collate the author's history in this portion of it with Hume and Lingard, and in case of apparent discrepancy between them, to prefer the authority of our own writers—"who must naturally be supposed to be better acquainted with our history than the foreign authorities quoted by the Saint."—Preface of Translator, page 6. We were positively startled at reading in vol. II. p. 7, how, "after much persuasion, Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, consented to recognise the King (Henry VIII.) to be supreme head of the Church in spirituals, just as the Pope had been previously acknowledged; that he added, however, the condition, inasmuch as it was not opposed to the Divine Word;" and St. Liguori emphatically remarks, "when this pillar of the Church fell it was not difficult to induce the others to take the oath." Now Fisher's name is not mentioned in this transaction by either Hume or Lingard. In any case, there was no falling whatever in the transaction, nor is there the slightest authority that we can find, even in Burnet, for saying that the example of Fisher influenced the others; for as Lingard truly observes, the paragraph being thus worded—"of our church and clergy we acknowledge his majesty to be the chief protector, the only and supreme lord, and—as far as the law of Christ will allow—the supreme head"—the introduction of this saving clause obviously invalidates the whole recognition. It proves too how very irresolute was Henry, at that time, about proceeding to extreme measures with the clergy. The simple truth is, that Fisher, so far from having compromised an iota on the subject of the King's supremacy, as both Hume and Lingard declare, it was for his persevering denial of it, that he was ultimately put to death.*

Unfortunate Wolsey, too, condemned by all parties for his "over-leaping" and most unscrupulous ambition—accused even by Burnet and his copyists with meanness and cowardice when in disgrace; yet he scarcely deserves the additional infamy of having been the first to suggest the idea of the divorce to the monster Henry. Our author, quoting Gotti, says that he did. Cardinal Pole, however, who is quoted with approbation by Lingard, attributes the suggestion to another quarter.†

Wolsey, after all, was not without his redeeming qualities. Whatever restraint upon his turbulent passions, or respect for public decency was exhibited by Henry, it was only during Wolsey's lifetime, and was notoriously attributable to his influence; and our author, who is very severe on him, admits his anxiety to avert the many evils that would arise from sanctioning a divorce between Henry and Catherine. The lessons of adversity do not seem to have been lost on him—

His overthrow heaped happiness upon him,
For then, and not till then, he felt himself,
And found the blessedness of being little:
And to add greater honours to his age,
Than man could give him, he died—fearing God!

SHAKESPEARE.

Our author has some other matters of lesser moment, such as the conjecture that Anne Boleyn was Henry's own daughter, the impropriety of her conduct when in France, &c., which are either altogether omitted, or expressly rejected by Lingard and Hume.

These things, however, with the exception, perhaps, of the first mentioned, are but of trifling consequence. We have not space to make any observation on that part of the work, entitled the Refutation of the Heresies—whose History had been previously given: we are the less anxious on that point, with the glorious illustrations before us so recently published to the whole world—of the soundness of the doctrines, the inestimable value of the writings, as well as the spotless purity of the life of the holy author. With regard to the translation, to say that it is faithful, would be its least eulogy; we believe it is exactly in that style which the holy author would have adopted, had he been a native of our own country—there being in it a transfusion of the simplicity, force, and clearness of the original, so necessary for a narrative of multitudinous events—a statement of essential doctrines, and subtle errors—and above all, a triumphant vindication of the one, and a refutation of the other. Mr. Mullock has served religion by translating this work of St. Liguori into English. He has likewise contributed a most interesting supplementary chapter, in which are concisely reviewed the various modifications of heresy that have appeared from time to time since the death of the Saint, bringing us, in fact, so far down as the delusions of Mormonism in America, and the impieties of Ronge in Germany. We can, indeed, with confidence assert, that the Catholic Priest could scarcely give to his library a more valuable addition than these volumes; for even if well supplied with books already, he will find them an excellent manual for immediate reference, upon a large and most important section of Church History. The work is not, of course, a Church History; as for instance, the tenth century is altogether omitted, having produced no heresy worth record or refutation. For a somewhat similar reason, the name of Ireland—faithful, suffering Ireland—claims honourable exemption from these pages, and we believe is not once mentioned. Our land has been singularly blessed in never producing such as those who figure most prominently in the History of Heresies. Long may it continue so.

* Burnet, in his Supplementary Volume, says, that More and Fisher were put to death, to show "that there was to be no mercy for any one who denied the king's supremacy."

THE HYMN

"Te Deum Laudamus,"

RENDERED INTO ENGLISH.

ST. AUGUSTINE AND ST. AMBROSE

PRAISE THE LORD.

THEE, O Great God, we praise !

Thee, mighty Lord, we bless,

Thee, and Thy marvellous and mysterious ways !

Thee, O, Omnipotent Lord,

All the rolling orbèd worlds confess !

To Thee the Archangels and high-thronèd Powers,

The Cherubim,

And Seraphim,

Chant aloud, with one accord,

Evermore,

Through Eternity's resplendent hours,

In prostration lowly,

"Holy,

Holy,

Holy is the God whom we adore !

Holy is the Lord whose praise we sing."

Heaven and Earth, O Everlasting King,

Are luminous with thy glory !

Thee the Patriarchs of olden story,

Thee the Saints who have gone before us,

Thee the Apostles and the Prophet-band,

Magnify in one perennial chorus !

And the white-robed Martyr-train who stand,

Day and night, before Thy throne,

Hymn their Alleluiahs to Thee !

Nor all those alone—

Thy Church—still militant on Earth beneath,

And yet uncrown'd with Victory's golden wreath,—

Ever loveth to upraise

Her voice to Thee in canticles of praise

Ever bends before Thy shrines the knee,

Glorified be Thou, then endlessly,

And Thy coëternal Son,

And the Holy Spirit, Three in One !

Glorified be Thou, Son of the Living Father,

Who, to save Man's rebel race from Doom,

Had'st no care to spare Thyself, but rather Sought with joy Thy humble Handmaid's womb !

Thou—the Conqueror of the Tomb,

Thou—the victor of Hell's legions,

Thou art now the Lord of the Celestial Regions.

Seated at the right-hand of the One, Great, Good,

And Eternal Potentate—thy Sire,

Lord ! who hast redeemed us by Thy costly blood,

Kindle in our souls Thy heavenly fire !

O ! help Thy saints, Thy servants, and Thine heirs,

That nought, in Life or Death, may seek to sever

Thy glory and Thy blessedness from theirs,

Who hope to reign with Thee in Heaven for ever !

CONNEXION

The Primitive Irish Church

WITH THE SEE OF ROME.

Si Prova contro alcuni Recenti scrittori Protestanti, quanto sia falso che la Chiesa d'Irlanda sia stata Indipendente dalla Chiesa Romana fino al XII secolo. Ragionamento letto nell' Accademia di Religione Cattolica, da Mgr. Paolo Cullen, Rettore del Collegio Ibernese, &c., &c., 8vo. Roma, 1846.

[A Refutation of the Assertion of Certain Recent Protestant Writers, that, until the Twelfth Century, the Irish Church was independent of the See of Rome. Being a Dissertation read in the ACADEMY OF THE CATHOLIC RELIGION, by Mgr. Paul Cullen, &c., Rome, 1846.]

AMONGST the many claims upon Irish gratitude, associated with the illustrious name of Father Wadding, there is none which we cherish more affectionately than the memory of his services in establishing the Irish College in Rome. Of old the refuge and sanctuary of our Church, when, in the hour of her tribulation and abasement, like all other "orphans of the heart," she turned for shelter to this true "city of the soul," the Irish College still subsists, in the days of our prosperity—at once an evidence and a bond of that sacred union which it is our national boast to have maintained unshaken in the worst and most afflicting times—filling up, along with the other National Colleges with which Rome abounds, that living argument of her Catholicity which strikes even the coldest and least reflecting visitor with wonder and admiration.

Well, therefore, and gracefully, does this defence of the unbroken connexion of our Church with the Holy See proceed from the Rector of the Irish College in Rome, an institution which has long represented Ireland in the Eternal City. It is the natural outpouring of national gratitude to the benefactress from whom we have received so many benefits—the affectionate cry, as it were, of a child refusing to be parted from the tender "mother, who looked on her childhood." And, as though for the purpose of maintaining this character, the tone and tenor of the dissertation are in perfect keeping with such a feeling—gentle, yet firm and unyielding, mild and temperate, but animated, earnest, and energetic. Indeed the nature of the literary exercises of which it forms a part, and the character of the audience before which it was delivered, would almost be in themselves a guarantee that it could not be otherwise. The "Academy of the Catholic Religion" is a literary society of long standing in Rome, and comprises, among its members, the elite of the literati, not only of the city and the Roman states, but of all the leading cities of Italy. They meet at stated intervals for the purpose of hearing a dissertation on some topic of religious interest read by a member appointed by the acting council of the body. The dissertations thus read are occasionally published; sometimes in a separate form, sometimes in the well-known journal, entitled Annali delle Scienze Religiose; and we have often desired to see a selection of the most interesting papers published in a collected form. Such a collection would embrace most of the topics of interest which have arisen in the Church during the last ten years; and the exceeding value of these dissertations may be estimated, both from the high names of the authors, and from the opportunities of acquiring information on ecclesiastical topics enjoyed by parties resident in the capital of Catholic Christendom.

The dissertation now before us, was read upon the second of July in the past year, by Dr. Cullen, Rector of the Irish College, and one of the earliest and most distinguished members of the Accademia della Religione Cattolica, and has been printed at the request of the members of the Academy. It is a clear and masterly resumé of this controversy, so often agitated since the days of Usher; and although the author could not have had an opportunity of seeing (and therefore has not expressly addressed himself to) the most recent publications on the question—those of Messrs. Monck, Mason, and Todd—yet the line of general argumentation which he pursues, may, in many particulars, be regarded as an anticipated refutation of the strongest points of the new case (if such it can be called,) which they have endeavoured to establish.* Indeed we cannot help attaching to this interesting essay an importance entirely distinct from its own literary value. A dissertation on a purely Irish subject, addressed to a foreign auditory, written in a foreign language, and printed at the desire of a foreign literary society, is an evidence of the growing interest with which our history is beginning to be regarded, too significant and too encouraging to be passed over in silence. We must be permitted to regard its coincidence with the first publication of our “IRISH CATHOLIC MAGAZINE” as an omen of no auspicious import; the more so, perhaps, as Dr. Cullen’s Essay is too important to be overlooked under any circumstances.

To attempt anything like a complete analysis of a dissertation, which is itself professedly a condensation of the chief points of this ancient controversy, would be to inflict upon the reader a meagre and uninteresting summary of facts and authorities. We shall consult with both for our own judgment, and for the advancement of the great object to which, next after the diffusion of religious truth, this Journal is mainly devoted—the creation or maintenance of a proper feeling of the importance of our national history—by confining ourselves to one single argument (among the many which are advanced), which, though it be not new, is yet put with singular clearness, strength, and condensation. We mean the historical argument for the connexion of Ireland with Rome, derived from the fact that the Irish Church, from the fifth to the twelfth century, maintained the closest and most active correspondence with all the churches of Western Christendom;—that to the labours of Irish missionaries most of the Western kingdoms are indebted, either for the introduction, or the revival of Christianity;—and that among the writers who distinguished themselves in the controversies of those times, (as the Paschal Controversy, that upon “the Three Chapters,” on the Iconoclast heresy, the disputes regarding the Eucharist, &c.) the Irish ecclesiastics were eminently distinguished, and were regarded by all as the exponents of orthodoxy, and the accredited representatives of the general interests and feelings of the Western Church.

We shall translate the most important portion of this extremely interesting argument—doubly interesting for the mass of history which it compresses into a brief compass:—

“When literature and science were driven from the continent of Europe, by the wars which attended the fall of the Roman Empire, the continual invasions of the Barbarians, and the other tempests which at that period laid the world desolate, they found a secure asylum in that distant island [Ireland], far removed from those scenes of turbulence, and protected from their influence by its insular position. Thus, a number of eminent schools arose in Ireland—Armagh, Bangor, Lismore, Durrow, &c., which were frequented by innumerable scholars, not alone from every part of Ireland, but also from England, and from the Continent of Europe.

* * * * *
* * * The monuments of this period, which have come down to our times, are a sufficient evidence of the assiduity with which the learned languages, poetry, philosophy, history, and theology were cultivated in these schools. Many of these treasures, which, for centuries had lain hidden beneath the dust of the libraries, are now in process of publication, through the agency of various literary societies; and several of them have already appeared in the two most valuable Collections of Ancient Authors, published by Cardinal Mai, whose literary labours reflect a lustre, not alone upon the author, but upon the Roman Purple itself.” —pp. 18–19.

After alluding to the apostolic spirit inculcated in these schools, and displayed by the heroic missionaries who were sent forth from them, the author proceeds:

“Suffice it to name a few of these eminent benefactors of religion, in order to judge whether they ever dreamed of declaring themselves independent of the chair of Peter, as our adversaries maintain. If, then, these men unreservedly taught the doctrine of the supremacy of Peter; if the churches founded by them were uniformly subject to the jurisdiction of the Pope; it follows of necessity, that these were the doctrines which they had themselves learned in their native country. Contenting ourselves, therefore, with a glance at the labours of the Irish missionaries, let us remember that Columba, Ædan, Colman, Finian and others enumerated by Bede, were the apostles of Northumbria and other provinces of Great Britain, and laboured in that country with such abundant success, that *Palmer does not hesitate to attribute the conversion of the kingdom mainly to their holy labours. I pass over Columbanus (whom Baronius compares to another Elias), Gallus, Eustatius, and his other companions, who enlightened France, Switzerland, and Italy by the sanctity of their lives. Who would venture to affirm that these distinguished men did not admit the supremacy of the Pope, whereas it was uniformly professed in the countries where they preached, and in the monasteries which they founded? There is hardly a province in France which does not venerate the memory of some Irish Saint of the fifth, seventh, and eighth centuries, during which period the Holy See, as is notorious, exercised the most extensive powers with that vast empire. In Picardy is celebrated the memory of two holy priests, Cardoc and Fricor, who preached there in the seventh century, and founded the monastery of Centula, at Ponthieu. In the time of Charlemagne, Agilbert, then abbot of the monastery, restored their shrine, and placed upon it an inscription in letters of gold, which commenced:

Scotia quem genuit, Gallica terra tegit.*”

In Meaux, the memory of SS. Kilian and Fiacre is still freshly cherished; and before the Revolution, their shrine was an object of pious reverence to pilgrims from every part of France. In Besançon is venerated St. Deicola, who founded the neighbouring monastery of Luthra, and died about 625. About the same period, St. Furseus, who had become eminent for his sanctity in Ireland, having visited the court of Sigbert, king of East Anglia, and thence set out on a pilgrimage to the tombs of the Apostles, was detained on his passage through France by Clovis II. and his chamberlain, Erchinoald; and founded the celebrated monastery of Lagny, near Paris, where he died, according to Mabillon, in 644. At the same time, his two brothers, Foilan and Ultan, on the invitation of St. Gertrude, daughter of Pepin of Landen, repaired to Nivelles, in Brabant, for the purpose of teaching psalmody and the ceremonies of the public service to a religious community founded by this holy woman; and soon afterwards founded the monastery of Fosse, near Nivelles. The Bollandists (May 8th) make mention of St. Wiro, who is venerated in Belgium. The ancient author of his life writes, that he was consecrated bishop in Rome; and adds, that "it was a custom with the inhabitants of this island (Ireland), first to elect a pastor among themselves, and then to send him to Rome to be consecrated by apostolic hands." * * * * *

Nor are France and Belgium the only countries which stand indebted to Ireland for the blessings of the Gospel. St. Willebrord, (who, though a Saxon by birth, yet, according to Alcuin, was educated in Ireland,) was the bearer of the faith to Friesland. He was accompanied by eleven other priests, chosen from the Irish monasteries by St. Egbert, who was the first to propose and urge forward that mission, afterwards so fruitful in martyrs. Venerable Bede mentions two other Irish missionaries, named Ewald, who suffered martyrdom in Saxony about the same time. Nay, even to countries still more remote they found their way.* St. Killian and his companions preached and suffered martyrdom in Franconia. About the same time, in Carinthia and the adjacent provinces, the Gospel was announced by Virgilius and his Irish companions. He founded the Church of Salzburg, and extended his labours to the confines of Hungary. And while these holy men were thus extending the limits of Christ's kingdom others of their countrymen were entrusted with the government of churches which had already received the faith. Thus we find Frigidian among the bishops of Lucca, Cathaldus in Taranto, and Donatus in Fiesole.† The epitaph of the latter is given by Ughelli. It commences thus:—

"Hic ego Donatus, Scotorum sanguine cretus Solus in hoc tumulo pulvere, verme, voror."

* * * * *

Contemporary with Donatus, was the learned monk, Dungal, author of several works, the most celebrated of which is that which he wrote against Claudius, bishop of Turin, who attempted to introduce the Iconoclast errors into Italy. This work displays most varied and profound erudition, and is described by Muratori, (by whom it was edited) as, "Liber ille Dungalii hominem eruditum, sacrisque etiam literis eruditum prodit, et simul in grammaticali foro et in Prisciani deliciis eruditum." It was this learned monk who presented to the monastery of Bobbio the collection of books brought from Ireland, which were afterwards transferred, by

* Lanigan proves that even Iceland was visited by Irish missionaries, who preached there in the eighth or ninth century.

Cardinal Federico Borromeo, to the Ambrosian library at Milan. A brief account of the services rendered by the Irish literati in Italy and in France will be found in Muratori's Annali d' Italia (Anno. 781). He relates a fact which is recorded by an ancient monk of St. Gall, that two Irish monks, Clement and Albinus, were employed by Charlemagne, one in France, the other in Pavia, to teach polite literature, and to revive the liberal studies which had then fallen into decay.

Consulting for my brief limits, I am compelled to pass over many other facts which would serve at once to show the obligations which literature and religion owe to Ireland, and to demonstrate, even to evidence, the closeness of the relations which subsisted between that Church and all the other Churches of the Continent.

With what justice, therefore, have I designated the pretensions of our adversaries absurd! Where is there a trace of that isolation and independence which they have imagined? The sketch of the history just presented to you, shows how far different is the reality. How many monks have we beheld, how many priests, founding monasteries or preaching the faith in various countries, and all how closely united with the Holy See! Will it be said that the religious establishments founded or maintained by Columbanus, by Gallus, by Furseus, by Virgil, taught doctrines different from those of the rest of Europe? that the countries converted by the Irish missionaries held themselves independent of the Chair of Peter? that, in the schools established by these missionaries and their disciples, this fancied independence was taught?

Could the antagonists of Roman connexion discern the slightest trace of such teaching, with what triumph would it be produced! And since they have failed to discern it, it follows of necessity that the doctrines of the Irish Church were identical with those of the other Churches of Europe, and that as a clear consequence, the Irish Church professed the supremacy of the Pope, which not even the most zealous Protestant will deny to have been admitted in the Churches of France, Belgium, Germany, and the other countries which were the theatre of the labours of Irish missionaries."—pp. 21-4

For the length of this extract we shall not think of offering any apology. Gladly would we follow the author through the history of the period which immediately preceded the English invasion. But we have already more than exceeded the limits at our disposal, and we are compelled, reluctantly, to draw to a close.

We cannot conclude, however, without expressing a hope that the author will be induced to translate (if the phrase be allowable in such a case) his dissertation into its native English, and permit its circulation in this country. For the public whom it addresses in its present garb, it has nothing beyond the interest which attaches to any literary performance of more than ordinary ability, no matter what its subject—but in Ireland, its interest will be real, practical, and present; and we cannot but anticipate much good from it at a time like the present, when men's minds are directed, with higher views than those of mere historical curiosity, to all those great religious questions which, like that forming the subject of this dissertation, are involved in the study of our national antiquities.

A Catholic History of England.

By WILLIAM B. MAC CABE. Newby, London.

THE many and distracting duties which have occupied us prior to issuing the first number of THE CATHOLIC MAGAZINE, will plead our apology for not making a longer notice of this learned and really curious work. The public need not be told that we are very like those who have barely completed the building of a house, and have not had ample time to look after the various details of embellishing and decorating it. Thanks to William Bernard Mac Cabe, we have not far to go in order to procure many a splendid portrait of these great Irishmen, who, leaving their own shores—fired with holy zeal, preached Christianity in England, reclaimed the barren waste, and raised some of those monastic institutions which, even in their grey ruins, reflect honor on their singleness of purpose and devotion to the religion of Christ. We had scarce conceived the notion of endeavouring to supply a deficiency so painfully felt in this land of ours, when the "Catholic History of England" was published, and on running hastily over its pages, we said to ourselves, here are all the materials for a long and splendid picture gallery, from which we can adorn our pages as often as opportunity presents itself. Sixty years before the incarnation of our blessed Lord, the Roman soldier who planted the grand ensign of "the Senate and Roman people" on the other side of the Channel, had little notion of the mighty events which were at hand; the conquerors of the world little dreamed that the mighty Empire which sent its cohorts to colonize a distant settlement, was rapidly hastening to ruin, overwhelmed by its vices and corruption—not to speak of that glorious system which the Redeemer was to propound, to the confusion of its sages, priests, and idols.

Little, then, could they imagine that the barbarous Britons, who were exhibited to the wondering gaze of the Roman people in the forum, would one day cede to another race, who, upon the soil of Roman conquest, would build up an empire which should lord it over the world—when proud Imperial Rome was laid in ashes, her institutions overthrown, her legions destroyed, and her very name a by-word. Even so is it with all human foundations—that which to-day wears all the semblance of stability and perpetuity, must perish in due time, and heaven alone can forecast the doom which, sooner or later, may lower over an empire which now seems builded up against all powers of aggression from without, or anarchical movements from within.

Yet, turning over these pages, we are not so much inclined to pry into the secrets of futurity, as to contrast the present with the past, in this never ceasing din about the question of religion. If it be ascertained beyond all question that the first herald of Catholicity in England was commissioned from the Vatican to raise its standard, then how is it that myriads of our fellow-subjects will close their eyes against truth, or still persevere in pursuit of these wild phantoms, which are not the result of cool thinking and calm meditation? And if this important position be demonstrated to a certainty, how is it that foolish theories have taken so fast a hold on the minds and convictions of men, that they seem resolved to continue in their blindness, obstinately shutting out the light?—Tis hard, indeed, to answer the question satisfactorily. Throughout the pages before us, there is ample evidence that the religion of Rome, and of the world, was that which was first preached on the shores of England. These splendid monuments of earlier ages, wherein the saints of old thought, prayed, wrote, and were buried, still stand hoary records of this important fact; and Mr. Mac Cabe has made us conversant with the lives and habits of those men, who shed enlightenment around them, and sooth, to say, are still looked up to as the stars which light "long nights of shame." The very name of monk and friar has become a term of reproach in England. Those who had an interest in aspersing the memories of the illustrious dead, were early imbued with these false notions and unholy prejudices. The controversies regarding dogmas, have long agitated the minds of the English people; and if we err not, the return to Catholicity has been more remarkable in the higher and more educated classes, than among the humbler and less informed. Indeed there may have been reason for this—the ponderous and expensive works which from time to time have come from the English press, vindicating Catholicity, and putting it in the proper light, were inaccessible to the great bulk of the inquiring public, and we now bless God that this objection no longer exists.

Here is the record of the preaching of the first missionaries who landed on their shores—here is the rule of life of its monks and holy writers—here they may sit with Meidulf, Albinus, and Alcuin, and listen to their teaching, hearken to the vesper bell, or witness the exit from this world of one of England's greatest boasts—the Venerable Bede. And of these grand old ruins, what will they learn? That their doors were thrown open to the sick of heart and weary of foot—that the incense of ages blackened their rafters, and that the pealing hymns of praise and jubilation echoed through those sacred shrines, which are now frequented as a resource against the ennui that springs from pleasure's wearying round. We cannot sufficiently praise the author for all the labour, study, and research which this work has cost him; from our hearts we would wish that his time and abilities had been given to illustrate the land of his nativity, as he has done that of England; and praying God to endow him with all the energy and health he must require to prosecute the coming volumes, we reluctantly close this meagre notice, with a determination to return to it in many a succeeding number of the IRISH CATHOLIC MAGAZINE.

Druidism.

MYTHOLOGY OF THE IRISH.

BEFORE giving an account of the introduction of Christianity, and the lives of Palladius and St. Patrick, it will be necessary to furnish a sketch of the religious system, of the Pagan Irish, for otherwise there are many circumstances connected with the first preaching of the Gospel, and the life of our national Apostle, which could not be elucidated. When the faith was first preached to our Pagan ancestors, Druidism, the religious system of the Celtic nations, prevailed; and the ancient Irish, a great branch of the Celts, worshipped gods and idols similar to those of their Celtic brethren in Gaul and Britain. Authentic and interesting accounts of Druidism amongst the Gauls and Britons are given in Cæsar's Commentaries; Pliny and Tacitus also give outlines of Druidism in Gaul and Britain. Camden, Davies's Celtic Researches, and the work of Godfrey Higgins, furnish copious accounts of the British Druids. On Druidism in Ireland, Keating, O'Flaherty, Ware, Vallancey, Toland, Charles O'Connor, and Doctor O'Connor, in the Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores, are the best authorities. In the following article these have been consulted, and other writers, particularly on the Mythology of the Eastern nations; as Selden on the Syrian gods; Bishop Cumberland on the origin of Ancient Nations; Moor's Hindoo Pantheon; Rollin; Mallett's Northern Antiquities, &c.

The term Druid, in Irish, Draoi or Druadh, is considered to be derived from Dair, an oak, as that tree was sacred to the Druids, and they celebrated their rites chiefly in the oak woods; some have derived the word from the Greek Drus, an oak, but it is much more probable that the Greek word Drus was derived from the Celtic, which is an older language. According to Pliny the word Druid in the language of Celtic Gaul was Deru; in the British or Welsh, the name was Drudh in the singular, and Druidion in the plural. Cæsar and other Roman writers rendered the term Druides and Druide; by later writers, the word Druids has been Latinised Magi, signifying magicians or wise men, the same as the Magi or ancient priests of the Medes and Persians. The Druids, as a powerful Pagan priesthood, were held in great veneration by the people, and admitted to the highest honours and confidence by the chiefs and kings. In Ireland the Druids, like the Bards and Brehons, held a rank next to the princes and kings, being permitted to wear six colours in their sagums or cassocks, the kings alone having the privilege of wearing seven colours in their costume. The Druids wore a crescent ornament on their heads, and their hair was cut short, but they cherished a long beard; when performing their rites, they put on long white garments; they wore oval-shaped amulets incased in gold, and other gold and silver ornaments, chains, &c., on the neck and breast; they held in their hand a white rod or sacred wand. They worshipped chiefly in oak woods, and the mistletoe of the oak was regarded as sacred, and much used in their mysteries; it was considered a charm against diseases, and sought for with great care on the sixth day of the moon; when found, it was hailed with rapturous joy, and two white bulls were sacrificed, fastened to the oak from which it was obtained. The Druids practised divination and augury, drawing omens from the victims offered as sacrifices; and they had their oracles like those of Delphos and Dodona in Greece. The high priest, or arch-druid was named Ard-Druadh by the Irish. The prince Divitiacus, the Eduan, the friend of Cæsar, was arch-druid of Gaul. The Gauls, Britons, and Irish had an order of Druidesses, like the Pagan priestesses of other nations. In Ireland, the term Bean-Draoi, signifying a woman Druid, was the name applied to a Druidess; the Druidesses wore white dresses, assisted at the rites, and preserved the sacred fire, like the vestal virgins among the Romans. The Nymphs or Goddesses, called Dryades amongst the Romans, were similar to the Druidesses. The Druids were a powerful and learned body in those early ages. Cæsar says, the Druids of Gaul did not commit their doctrines to writing in the language of the country, lest they should become known to the people, but that their books were written in Greek characters. The books of the Irish Druids, as hereafter mentioned, are said to have been burned in the time of St. Patrick.

Druidism was in many respects a simple and sublime

worship. The Druids cultivated the arts and sciences, particularly astronomy, and believed in the immortality of the soul. It appears from Cæsar, that those of Gaul and Britain had a belief in the transmigration of souls, like the followers of Pythagoras and Brahma. The Druids of Gaul worshipped a great number of gods, like those of Greece and Rome. It appears from our old historians, that Druidism was the religious system of the various colonies that peopled Ireland, in the earliest ages, as the Partholarians, Nemedians, Fomorian, Fir-Bolg or Belgians, Danans, and Milesians. Midhe, the chief Druid of Nemedians, is said to have lighted the first sacred fire at Uisneagh. The colony called by the Irish writers Tuatha De Danan, is much connected with our Mythology. The Danans are said to have come originally from Greece, or some bordering country of the east, to Scandinavia or Denmark, and thence to North Britain and to Ireland, more than a thousand years before the Christian era. They are represented as magicians and necromancers, and it appears they were a civilized people, highly skilled in the arts; hence they are supposed by some antiquaries to have erected the round towers. The Danan kings ruled over Ireland 197 years, until conquered by the Milesians, a colony from Spain. Vallancey considers the Danans were Dedanites from Chaldea; the term Tuatha, in the Irish, means people, therefore, Tuatha-Dedan, or Dedanan, would signify people of the land of Dedan. Other antiquaries consider the Danans were the same as the Dodanim or Dodoneans, of Epirus, who were Pelasgians, a people celebrated in the early ages, in arts and Mythology, and who founded the oracle of Dodona, long famous in Greece. The deities of the Danans were numerous, and the following account of them has been collected from Keating, O'Flaherty, and Vallancey. Daghda, one of their kings, was worshipped as a god, and is supposed by Vallancey to be the same as Dagon of the Canaanites. Budh-Dearg, or Budh the Red, one of their chiefs, was deified and worshipped with fire—he was probably a type of the Indian deity, Budha. Midhir, another chief, a great enchanter, was worshipped, and is considered by Vallancey to be the same as Mithra of the Persians, the god of fire or the sun. Neide, another of their famous chiefs, who built the fortress of Aileach Neide, in Donegal, was their god of war, like Mars of the Romans; and Ben-Neide, that is the wife of Neide, was sometimes called their goddess of war. Orbsen, or Mannanan, one of their chiefs, a great navigator, was their god of the sea, the same as Neptune of the Greeks and Romans. Ogma and Ollamh were their gods of learning and eloquence; and Goban Saor their god of architecture. Dannana or Morriogna, one of their queens, was worshipped as goddess of war, like Pallas and Bellona amongst the Greeks and Romans. Brighde was their goddess of poetry and music; and Etana presided over medicine. Eire, Fodhla, and Banba, three of their queens, were worshipped, and they gave these three names to Ireland. Three of the Danan kings were named from their peculiar deities; one was called Mac Coill, that is, the son of the wood, as he worshipped the woods; another, Mac Ceacht, or the son of the plough, his god being that chief implement of husbandry; and the third, Mac Greine, as Grian, or the sun, was the great object of his adoration.

"In ancient times the sacred plough employed,
The kings and awful fathers of mankind."

Fairyism appears to have been derived chiefly from the Danans. The fairy queens of the Irish were Meibh, or Meive, Cliona, and Seiva; and Donn was the fairy king; from Meibh has been derived the queen Mab, of the old English writers. Many places in Ireland have been named from the gods and goddesses of the Danans; as Moy-lurg of Daghda, a plain in Roscommon, Knock-Budh, or the hill of Budh, near Elphin, in Roscommon, another hill of Budh in Tyravley, in Mayo, and a third near Strabane, in Tyrone, on the borders of Donegal; also Loch Budh Dearg, or the lake of Budh the Red, now called Lough Boderig, an expansion of the Shannon, between Roscommon and Leitrim; Aileach Neide, and Ard-Midhir, near Lough Swilly in Donegal; Lough Orbsen, or Corrib, in Galway; and the paps of Dannana, two hills so called, in Kerry. Amongst the traditions connected with the Danans, it is stated that they brought with them to Ireland a sacred stone, called Lia-Fail, or the stone of destiny, from which Ireland got the name Inis-fail, signifying the island of destiny. On this stone the Irish kings were inaugurated for many centuries at Tara, but according to our old historians, it was sent over to Scotland in remote times, for the coronation of the Scottish kings of Irish race; it was kept at the Abbey of Scone, from whence it was carried off to England by King Edward I., and placed in the coronation chair in Westminster Abbey, where it still remains; but it is to be observed, that in Petrie's learned work, on the Antiquities of Tara, it is stated that the large stone standing on one of the mounds there, is the stone of destiny.

The chief deity of the Irish Druids, was Crom, said by some to represent Fate, or according to other accounts, the sun or fire, and was probably the same as Cronus or Saturn of the Greeks and Romans. This god or idol was called Crom-Cruach, probably from the term Cruach, signifying a heap, as great stones were erected for his worship; or Cruach might mean bloody, as Cru is the Irish of blood; and he was sometimes called Crom-Dubh, or Black Crom, from the colour of the idol made of dark stone. The officiating Druid was designated Cromtheach, signifying a priest of Crom, and the altar was termed Crom-Leac, or the stone of Crom. These Crom-Leacs, which are to be described hereafter, were used for purposes of sacrifice and sepulture. On these stone altars, the Druids offered up human victims to Crom, as the Phœnicians, Cananites, and Carthaginians did to Baal, Moloch, and Dagon; the Greeks and Romans, to Saturn, and Mars; and the Scandinavians and Saxons, to Odin or Woden, and to Thor. Great numbers of men, women, and children were annually slain as sacrifices to their gods by the Gauls, Britons, and Irish. Cæsar says, that the Druids in Gaul had an image of one of their gods, of immense size made of wicker-work, which was filled with living men, and fire set to it until they were all consumed in the flames.

Such sanguinary superstition was not, however, peculiar to the Celts, but prevailed amongst all the Pagan nations of antiquity, and is to be found even in modern times in India, where, according to the practice called Suttee, widows are burned on a funeral pile in honour of their husbands, and hundreds of human victims are sacrificed to the idol Juggernaut. The Pagan Irish worshipped the sun and its symbol fire, under the name of Baal, Beal, or Bel, like the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Carthaginians; and Bel or Belus, the sun, was likewise the chief god and idol of the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Chaldeans. The sun was adored by the Guebres or Persian fire-worshippers, and by the Magi under the name of Mithra; by the Greeks and Romans as Apollo, and by the Gauls, as Belen. The worship of Baal or the sun, was evidently derived by the Irish from the eastern nations. The sacred fire of Beal was lighted on the evening before the first day of summer or May-eve, at the temple of the Druids, on the hill of Usneagh, situated within a few miles of Mullingar, in Westmeath, and also at Tara. This festival was named Beal-tinne, that is the fire of Beal, and May-day is to the present time called in Irish, La-Beal-tinne, namely, the day of Beal's fire; and the custom of kindling bonfires on May-eve has been continued from the days of Druidism to the present time. The Druids held another great festival on the eve of the first day of winter, it is said in honour of the moon, at Tlachtga, another chief seat of Druidism, in Meath, now known as the hill of Ward, between Athboy and Trim. This festival was called Samhain, and to the present time, the first of November is named in Irish, La-Samhna, or Samhain's day. The word Samhain is considered to be the same as the Phœnician Samen, which signifies heaven; hence, the God Baal, according to Sanchoniathon and Eusebius, was worshipped by the Phœnicians under the name Baal-Samen, that is, the lord of heaven. It is stated by our historians, that no fires were permitted to be lighted in Ireland but from that obtained from the Druids at May and November every year, at which time they delivered it to the people with great ceremonies and incantations, receiving in payment one Screapal of silver, equivalent to three pence of modern money, and was levied on every house or head of a family. Vallancey considers that the Syrian god Moloch was worshipped in Ireland under the name of Mole, which word in the Irish language signifies fire. The following passage in the tract called St. Patrick's Confession, shows that the Irish worshipped the sun. "Nam sol iste quem videmus, Deo jubente, propter nos quotidie oritur, sed nunquam regnabit, neque permanebit splendor ejus, sed et omnes qui adorant eum in pœnam miseri male devenient. Nos autem credimus et adoramus solem verum Christum." "That sun which we behold rises daily for our benefit by the command of God, but it shall never reign, nor shall its splendour endure for ever; and all those who adore it will be miserable and come to punishment. But we believe in and adore the true Sun, which is Christ."

The Pagan Irish also worshipped the sun under the name Grian, and the moon under the names Luan, and Re; the wind or Gaoth, and Toran or Taran the thunder, the same as Tarannis of the Gauls, and Thor of the Scandinavians and Saxons, and as Jupiter the god of thunder was worshipped by the Greeks and Romans. The elements have been objects of adoration amongst various rude nations in a state of nature, reminding us of the beautiful lines of Pope—

"Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind,
Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind;
His soul proud science never taught to stray,
Far as the solar walk or milky way;
Yet, simple Nature to his hope hath given,
Beyond the cloud-topped hill an humbler Heaven."

Thus, the sun and winds, the moon and stars; the hills, woods, and waters; the lakes, rivers, fountains, and sacred wells, were all objects of adoration amongst the Pagan Irish. As before observed, solar, lunar, and sidereal worship prevailed amongst various nations of antiquity; the Arabians, Sabeans, and Chaldeans worshipped the stars, and the Egyptians the sun and planets, under different symbols.

"Like the Chaldean he could watch the stars
'Till he had peopled them with beings bright
As their own beams."

The three great Hindoo deities, Brahma, Siva, and Vishnu, amongst other attributes, represent the sun, or fire, and the moon; and the god Krishna, also represents the sun. Amongst the Hindoo deities, SURYA is the god of the sun, and that of the moon is called Chandra and Soma. The Assyrians, Phœnicians, &c., as before-mentioned, adored the sun, as Baal or Bel; the Persians as Mithra; and the Greeks and Romans as Appollo, Phœbus, and Sol, while they worshipped the moon as Diana, Luna, and Artemis. The Winds were also worshipped by the Greeks and Romans, and temples were erected to them at Athens and Rome. Of Æolus, god of the winds, we have a magnificent description in Virgil. Parvana is worshipped as the Hindoo god of the winds. The ancient Egyptians worshipped the Nile, and the Hindoos adore the Ganges. Of the worship of wells and sacred springs, which was so prevalent amongst the Pagan Irish, we have a type in the fountain of the nymph Egeria near Rome.

The sun, moon, and stars, were natural objects of adoration amongst people to whom the light of revelation did not penetrate, and were worshipped by most of the nations of antiquity. The sun was particularly worshipped by the Eastern nations, in whose land the great luminary had his birthplace, and has been sung by the poets since the time of Homer.

"'Tis the clime of the East, 'tis the land of the sun,
Can he smile on such deeds, as his children have done!"

Homer says in the 3rd book of the Odyssey,

"The sacred sun above the waters raised,
Through Heaven's eternal brazen portals blazed,
And wide o'er earth diffused his cheering ray,
To Gods and men to give the golden day."

Ovid's magnificent description of the palace of Phœbus, is known to every reader of the classics,

"Regia Solis erat Sublimibus alta columnis, Clara micante auro, flammasque imitante pyropo."
"The Sun's bright palace on high columns raised,
With burnished gold, and flaming jewels blazed."

Satan's address to the Sun, in Milton, is well known.

"O, thou that with surpassing glory crown'd,
Look'st from thy sole dominion like the God
Of this new world—at whose sight all the stars
Hide their diminished heads!"

Thompson says—

"But yonder, comes the powerful king of day, Rejoicing in the East!"

The Moon, "the pale Star upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands," was like the Sun an object of worship amongst various nations. A beautiful picture of the "empress of the silent night," is presented by Horace,

"Nox erat et cælo fulgebat Luna sereno Inter minora Sidera."

Thus divine honours were paid to the Sun and Moon in ancient days, by the simple Celts, as well as the more refined Egyptians, Phœnicians, Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans. Many magnificent temples were erected for the worship of those deities, in Europe, Asia, and Africa; of which the following may be mentioned:—The temple of Belus, or the Sun, at Babylon; the temples of the Sun, at Baalbec and Palmyra; the temples of Apollo, or the Sun, at Delos, Delphi, and other places in Greece, and many in Italy;

there was a temple of Apollo, where Westminster Abbey now stands. The temple dedicated to Diana, as goddess of the Moon, at Ephesus, in Asia Minor, was one of the most famous of antiquity, and there were many more raised to her in Greece and Italy; there was a temple of Diana, at Nismes, in Gaul, the ruins of which still remain. The temples of Denderah, Thebes, and Edfu, in Egypt, are considered to have been connected with planetary worship. The Chaldeans and Sabæans were celebrated for sidereal worship and astronomy. An interesting account of Sabeism, or star-worship, is given in the "Sabæan Researches" of John Landseer. The Irish, as before stated, worshipped the winds. King Laogaire, who reigned in the time of St. Patrick, swore by the sun and wind that he would not levy tributes on the people of Leinster; but having violated his oath, he was struck dead by those offended deities, the sun and wind, say the old historians. The winds, whose "ruffian blasts" and destructive storms were dreaded on land and sea, were naturally worshipped through fear. Thompson apostrophises them in this spirit:

"Ye too, ye winds, that now begin to blow
With boisterous sweep! I raise my voice to you—
Where are your stores, ye powerful beings, say,
Where your aerial magazines reserved
To swell the brooding terrors of the storm!"

Buddhism is considered to have been introduced into Ireland in remote ages, probably by the colony called Danans, one of whose kings, as before mentioned, was called Budh Dearg, or Budh the Red; and several hills in Ireland were called the hills of Budh. Some curious information on this subject is given in the "Annals of the Four Masters;"* but whether the doctrines of Buddha which prevail so extensively in Asia, ever made their way to Ireland, is perhaps now impossible to determine, and all that can be offered on matters regarding such remote ages is but conjecture. The words Budh and Bot, in the Irish language, signify life, wisdom, and the world—and sometimes fire or the sun; and Buddha, Budh, Boota, or Bot, the great Indian deity, means, in the Sanscrit, a sage, wisdom, power, and the universe; hence, there is a great similarity in the meaning of these words in the Irish and Asiatic languages. Vallancey was of opinion that Buddhism prevailed in this country, and in his "Essay on the Primitive Inhabitants of Ireland," says: "It is certain that the religion of Budh was established with the Pagan Irish, and that the names of a great many of the Brahminical deities are to be found in the mythology of the Irish." It may be mentioned that Uisneach, a hill in Westmeath, and a celebrated seat of Druidism, bears a great similarity to Vishnu or Uishnu, the name of one of the chief deities of the Hindoos, and Seiva, one of the fairy queens in the Irish mythology, shows a close resemblance to Siva, one of the great Hindoo deities. O'Brien, in his theory on the Round Towers, maintains that they were temples erected for the worship of Buddha, and for astronomical observations; and that the Danans who were a colony of Iranians from ancient Persia, or the land of Iran; built those towers, and brought Buddhism into Ireland; but though O'Brien's book contains much valuable antiquarian lore, it is injudiciously interlarded with many absurdities and irrelevant matters, which have detracted much from its merits.

The Celts, the first inhabitants of Europe after the deluge, descendants of Gomer the son of Japhet, practised in the earliest ages as their religious system, a pure Theism, believing in one supreme God, and the immortality of the soul, like their antediluvian ancestors, the Patriarchs, Abraham, Enoch, Noah, &c.; but it appears that at an early period, Polytheism and Idolatry were introduced from Egypt, Syria, and other eastern countries—amongst the European nations, Gauls, Etrurians, Celtiberians, Britons, and Irish. According to our ancient annalists, the first who established Idolatry in Ireland, was Tigernmas, a king of the Milesian or Spanish race, whose reign is placed about nine centuries before the Christian era. In the "Annals of the Four Masters," the fact is recorded as follows: "Tigernmas was struck dead, together with three-fourths of the men of Erin, in an assembly held at Magh-Sleacht, in Brefney, on the night of Samhain precisely, for the adoration of Crom-Cruach, the chief idol of Ireland; and from the slaughter of the men of Erin there, with Tigernmas, that plain derived its name." All our old historians mention this circumstance of King Tigernmas, with a vast number of people, having been suddenly struck dead—while celebrating the feast of Samhain, on the eve of the first day of winter, and offering human sacrifices to their idol Crom-Cruach—as a punishment from Heaven for having introduced idolatry; an awful event, like that recorded in the Scriptures of the destroying angel having, in one night, slain one hundred and eighty-five thousand men of the army of Sennacherib, King of Assyria, in his camp. The place where Tigernmas and his people were struck dead was called Magh-Sleacht, signifying the plain of slaughter. In after times, it got the name of Fiodhnach, which signifies a wild or woody district, and is in modern times well known as Fenagh, in the county of Leitrim. An account of the destruction of the idol Crom-Cruach, at Moy Sleacht, by St. Patrick, will be given in the article on his life.

It appears that one of the ancient names of Ireland, in the Pagan period, was Insula Sacra, or the Sacred Isle, from its being a celebrated seat of Druidism, as in the Christian times, it acquired the designation, Insula Sanctorum, or the Island of Saints. It was called Insula Sacra by several Roman writers, amongst others by Rufus Festus Avienus, a Roman poet and geographer, in the fourth century, who extracted an account of various countries from the Periplus of Hanno, in the Annals of Carthage. Hanno and Himilco, celebrated Carthaginian commanders, made voyages to many parts of Europe about six or seven centuries before the Christian era, and the record of their travels, termed Periplus, was deposited by Hanno in the temple of Cronus at Carthage: from the annals of Carthage in the Punic language, this work was translated into Greek and Latin; and from it Festus Avienus extracted an account of various countries; amongst others, of Britain and Ireland, in which is the following passage:—

"Ast hinc duobus, in sacram sic insulam
Dixere prisci, solibus cursus rati est,
Hæc inter undas multam cespitum jacit
Eamque late gens Hibernorum colit,
Propinqua rursus insula Albionum patet."

Avienus speaks here of those islands now called the Scilly Islands, off the coast of Cornwall, and by the island of the Albiones he means Albion or England. The above passage is thus translated, "But from this place to the island which the ancients called Sacred, is a distance of two days sail; it spreads its soil widely amidst the waters, and the nation of Hibernians extensively inhabit it; near it lies the island of the Albiones."

HYMN OF ST. BRIDGET.

"The bright lamp that shone in Kildare's holy fane."—Moore.

THE midnight wind roar'd thro' the oaks of Kildare,
And a clang from the round tow'r at intervals came,
While St. Bride, at the altar, was kneeling in pray'r,
And her sisters attended the mystical flame;
Her whole spirit wrapt in unspeakable love,
Immersed and consum'd, as in billows of fire,
She seems a young Seraph adoring above,
Transfigur'd in flames of ecstatic desire.
As the levin-flash fuses the steel in its blaze,
As Ocean drinks up all the torrents that be,
Dissolve thus my heart in thy Charity's rays,
And absorb, in thy vastness, my errors and me.
Oh! let not the numberless sins that I bear,
Debar me from drinking thy blood as it flows,
If the thrones of thy kingdom the just only share,
Thou need'st not have died to take on thee our woes;
But to ransom the lost ones, Thou camest from bliss,
'Twas sinners, like me, brought thee down from the spheres,
And thy wounds do not shrink from the penitent's kiss,
But the smiles of thy Godhead illumine his tears.
Thrice holy! oh Manna, from heaven's high hall,
Sweet banquet! the soul of the weary that cheers,
Our Father, Friend, Lover, and God—thou art all
Our Hope, Strength, and Life in this valley of tears.
Ah! who would not mingle his life-blood with thine,
And perish in torture to love thee an hour,
To die at thy feet, in these ardours divine,
As in noon's fervid splendour expireth a flow'r.
Yet, retire in thy glory, my bosom's ador'd,
Or unfetter my soul from its prison of clay,
For thy full-flowing brightness, ineffable Lord,
Consumes me too fiercely in raptures away.
Spring of Contrition! a penitent cries,
Oh! sprinkle our souls with the sorrowful dews
That burst from thy brow and that stream'd from thine eyes,
When they crown'd thee, on Calvary, "King of the Jews."
When the ruin shall come, that mine eyes may not see,
Upon cloister and shrine, where thy name was ador'd,
And the temples and thrones of our island shall be
The spoil of a barbarous foreigner's sword;
As thou guided our fathers triumphant away,
From the host of a tyrant, thro' ocean of yore,
Heart of the crucified! shield them that day,
And roll round their march the Red Sea of thy gore!
Tho' they madden the vanquish'd with famine and flame,
And pour forth the blood of our nation like wine,
Oh God! may no trial of torture or shame
Crush out from their bosoms thy spirit divine.
May the hope and the love thou hast boundlessly given
To the heart of this people, grow stronger in tears,
Till from spirit and frame ev'ry fetter be riven,
And Liberty's bow thro' the tempest appears;
And the Faith thou hast planted, at length a fair tree,
So long richly nourish'd with patriot gore,
Shall soar from the mountains, umbrageous, to thee,
And a nation of Saints in its shadow adore!

King Simnel and the Palesmen.

A STORY OF IRELAND IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAP. I.—THE GERALDINES AND THE BUTLERS.

THE English "Wars of the Roses," which may be said to have commenced in the year of grace 1400, had lasted now more than eighty years. Henry VII., who had succeeded to the throne, united the contending parties by a marriage more politic in purpose than propitious in issue; and the English people, wearied of revolutions, humbly bent their knees before his throne.

These wars in England exercised, during their time, an important influence on the English colony established in Ireland. Its great nobles, left to their own discretion, exercised their privileges irrespective of law or judge—the lower orders adopted Irish habits and manners, while they attempted, at the same time, to sneer at those they imitated—the clergy pursued their missions peacefully and successfully. Parties corresponding to those in England at particular eras were called to action under the rival banners of the Geraldines and the Butlers, but their exertions were fitful and unsustained; and they usually appear, in the annals of the times, as it were but to disappear immediately. But the "Pale" (as the colony was now called) meantime shrunk farther and farther from its first limits, until at length a few plough-lands on either side of the valley of the Liffey, the strong city at that river's mouth, and one or two southern seaports, comprised all who could be said really to acknowledge allegiance to the kings of England. The great lords of Anglican extraction retained property and influence in the interior mainly by virtue of their intermarriages and fraternizations with the older stock of Irishmen.

The year, so it happened, that the story which follows really commenced, was the year of our Redemption 1486, and the month of the year April, towards the latter end. At that time Gerald, Earl of Kildare, the ninth of the name, was Lord Deputy, and Jenico Marks, a good man, untimely slain afterwards (in a street riot), was mayor of the City of Dublin. It was the eve of the Feast of Saint George, a day of special observance among the people of the "Pale" and the burghers of its capital.

The young Knight, Piers Barnwall, of Drimnagh, towards evening of the day, having first received the blessings of a widowed mother and the embraces of two sisters, children in years and grace, summoned his warders, with whom he left some brief commands, his squire, who slowly prepared to follow him, and mounting his horse, a bay, young and fiery, rode eastwards, at a slow pace, for Dublin. Sir Piers was a very handsome, dark man, large of limb and noble in appearance, with a countenance of greater gravity than seemed quite natural to his years. His armour was plain and light, being simply a breast-piece, back-piece, and greaves. His helmet was without a crest, which, however, was depicted on a small oval-shaped shield at his saddle horn. The device was a plume of fine ostrich feathers, each one representing a chief colour in heraldry—or, gules, azure, vert, and argent, with a falcon rising from their midst. Beneath this was enscribed the chivalric motto—"Malo mori quam fœdari"—Death rather than dishonour. His sword was long and straight—his squire bore behind him a tallevas, or larger shield, and three spears.

This squire, a middle-aged and middle-sized fellow, of a very jovial exterior, seemed to have formed his habits under a different master from him he now followed. Half hanging from his saddle, he trolled snatches from ballads in French and English, with more of music than morality in them, while his small, grey eyes twinkled, and his long ears were stretched at every sound that was audible on their way, though it was only the rushing of a field gully, or the whir of a startled bird.

At first the route of the Knight and his squire led over hills and along devious hollows, and across pleasant levels of luxurious pasture land, upon which were scattered herds of black cattle and flocks of sheep, with numerous keepers. As they approached the right bank of the Liffey the way became more beaten and defined, though it still wanted the regularity of a well-ordered highway; misformed elms stretched their bare arms across it in many parts, and briars threw their thorny tendrils right under the feet of the horses. Winding through the trees of Inchicore, those grand survivors of the earlier time, the way passed the border of the plantation of the Priory of Kilmainham (which lay from that house towards the river), and led directly on to the Ormond gate. Here the Knight being summoned by the keeper, gave his name and passed on into Coke-street, followed at a shorter distance than before by his squire.

Just then the bells of all the Convents and Churches tolled for evening song. From either side of the river their sweet, solemn voices pealed, and the entire population seemed instantaneously to issue into the streets, while friars in their habits and men at arms in their armour mingled with them as they proceeded hither and thither to their several altars. Some as they passed Sir Piers and his Squire cast hasty glances, and paused to deliver their comments upon the relative points of master and man.

"St. Werburgha!" said an ostler-looking lad to a companion of his own age and appearance, "what a noble horse!"

"The Prior himself shows not such harness," said a tanner from St. Michael's-hill, as they rode into the street of the Wine Taverns.

"Behold the slashing of the Squire's doublet!" exclaimed a mercer.

"And the sheen of the knight's beaver clasps," exclaimed a lapidary.

"Lo! you father," said a young damsel, whom a starched man of advanced age held tightly by the hand, much against her inclination, "lo! you, what a handsome, dark cavalier!"

"Peace, Maud, peace—remember where and on what errand you are bent, and heed not the vanities of the great people of this world," replied the elder.

"Industry," said a lazy loon of the mechanical class, who was leaning against an angle of the street, as if especially born for its support, "industry may be a very good thing, but God send me an office and a temper like yon easy-riding squire."

While this latter observation was passing through the lips of its hopeful author, Sir Piers and his squire drew rein in the midst of that street, one vista of which was closed by the masts of the carracks and cogs upon the river, while the other was almost shut up by St. Michael's and Christ's Churches, and entered into conversation:

"Master Hugh," quoth the Knight, "I have been resolving, on the way, with whom we are to pass the night, and I have resolved not to trouble either the Lord Deputy or the Earl. You ought to have some knowledge of the taverns in this quarter, and therefore do you lead the way."

"Sir Knight," answered Hugh, whose surname was Herrick, "it is true I am reputed to have the knowledge you attribute unto me, which, howbeit, I acquired under your honoured father of happy memory, whose example, I thank God to see, has, in this at least, made an impression upon his heir."

The Knight muttered something which escaped even the strained ears of the Squire, whose sense of hearing was almost as perfect as that of the servant of Fortunatus, in the Fairy Tale.

"Your honoured father, Sir Piers, held, and to me often asserted, that a gentleman on his travels should always lodge at an inn, and never quarter himself on one of his own order. An inn, he maintained (God rest his soul), to be the greatest school of life—the temple of wisdom—the citadel of comfort—the bower of enjoyment—"

"I pray you, Hugh, reserve this for another time, and let us now find some place where we can alight, and be refreshed.

"St. Joseph bless us!" muttered the Squire beneath his breath; "we have lived to an unnatural age when a son will not hear counsel from the lips of his own father." Then in an audible voice, he added:

"Follow me, Sir Piers—here is an hostlerie, famous throughout the four shires."

They rode beneath a high arch into a narrow, walled passage, which led to a wide yard or court. In an angle of the court stood an ample stone house, flanked with sheds and stables, where, over the open door, a huge white horse, painted by some Dublin Landseer of that day, hung in a gaudy frame of scarlet and gold. A short passage led from the outer door to another, that gave entrance into the kitchen, the chief apartment of the house. From this ample room, furnished with an immense chimney, its either angle lined with stone benches, its floor occupied by rows of massive oaken tables, at which were placed antique "bee-hive" chairs of the same durable material, several smaller apartments were accessible, the doors of which were painted with different devices, one, having for its emblem a crescent of very waning aspect, while two others, placed at extreme ends, bore the hostile arms of the rival nobles, Kildare and Ormond. The Knight of Drimnagh (after giving his horse in charge to his squire, and ordering a refection for himself) retired to the crescent to pursue those reflections which, during his ride, had occupied his mind so intensely, and still seemed greatly to embarrass him.

He had shortly before returned from Oxford, where, in common with most of the sons of eminent families in "the Pale," he had been sent for his education. His father had died during his absence, leaving him the head of a house, noble by blood, alliance, and intermarriage, but sadly reduced both from former confiscations and the mismanagement of its late head. A part of its original possessions had been granted by Richard Duke of York, when Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, to the Earl of Kildare; but these Sir Piers himself, by a well-timed visit to Henry VII., soon after his accession in the previous year, succeeded in having restored. The Lord Deputy in this matter had yielded to the King's orders, though it was surmised by those who knew him well that, had the lands been broader, he would not have ceded them so easily; and though his manner in so doing was apparently an act of cheerful restitution, yet Sir Piers feared, from all fame bruited of Kildare's ambitious, and at times vindictive character, that he had not forgotten the slight put on his authority by appealing directly to the King, nor the bitterness of the concession, however trifling the importance of those lands might have been to one otherwise so rich. The young knight's feelings, moreover, as well as his hereditary prejudices, attached him to the house of Lancaster and the Ormond leadership in Ireland; but the prospect of further incensing the Lord Deputy, who now reigned like an actual sovereign in "the Pale," deterred him, since his return home, from taking any decided steps which might finally identify him with that party. When, therefore, he found himself in the city where the rival leaders lived, from which he durst not depart without seeing both, and most likely joining himself to one side or other, his anxieties for his lands and his defenceless family, of which he was the sole living guardian, greatly increased, and filled his mind with thoughts one would have looked for rather in a statesman of three score, than in a cavalier of three-and-twenty.

While these reflections were occupying his mind, loud voices debating angrily in the kitchen of the inn attracted his attention.

"I tell you, host, I must speak with the Knight of Drimnagh without delay," said a shrill, cracked, authoritative voice, that had evidently seen much service.

"Say to Sir Piers Barnwall that I desire to see him at once," demanded another voice as husky as that of a veteran warder.

"I came, I tell you, from the Earl of Ormond," screamed out the first speaker.

"And I from the Lord Deputy," growled the second.

"I am the Earl's Major Domo," shrieked the shrill voice.

"I am the Captain of his lordship's guard," thundered the hoarse voice.

"Give me way, Sir," piped the voice that had first spoken, "my office is more honourable than yours."

"What!" shouted the other, "a Major Domo before a Captain of the guard! give you way to the buttery, you chief of cooks and turnspits—you——"

"Peace, gentlemen, peace," interrupted the asthmatic voice of the host, whose tones, alternately squeeling and growling, seemed to have caught notes from both parties, "the good young Knight, I am certain, is at his devotions; he is a grave, God-fearing gentleman as ever came under my roof; disturb him not, I beseech you, while I go and announce your presence."

Sir Piers now presented himself at the door of his apartment, when the Major Domo, an old, bent man, of care-worn appearance, as one burthened with many weighty duties, hobbled towards him, but was shoved rudely aside with an unceremonious hand, by a tall, lank, carrotty-haired, herring-shouldered swordsman, who seemed resolved to assert his own claim to attention.

"Sir Knight," cried the Major Domo, "I come from the Earl of Ormond to wait upon you, and my name is Bolter. I have the honour to fill the office——"

"Peace!" shouted the Captain of the Guard. "Noble Sir, my name is Kenelbreck, Captain of the Guard to his Excellency, the ——"

"—— office of Major Domo to his Lordship, who is your admiring friend," interlocated the elder emissary.

"You perceive, noble Knight, that I cannot deliver my high message for this chattering old chough——"

"Sir Piers Barnwall," shrieked the insulted steward, "I call you to witness——"

"Gentlemen, gentlemen," said the Knight, "is it thus ye represent the honour of your noble masters. Captain Kenelbreck, the Major Domo is your senior, and for his venerable years I shall confer with him first. I pray your patience for a few moments."

He then led Ormond's ancient messenger into the crescent parlour, who delivered a ring and a loving message, from his master who, he said, was urgent that the Knight would take up his abode with him while in the city. The latter the Knight declined, saying that, as he would remain but one day or two, he would not intrude on the hospitality of the Earl, whom, however, he was most desirous to see and speak with as soon thereafter as might be. He dismissed Master Bolter with a piece of gold and many kind words. The Major Domo, in passing out through the kitchen, did not fail to throw a triumphant glance upon his rival, who entered the door of the Knight's chamber as the other passed into the court-yard.

The message from the Deputy was similar to that sent from Ormond, with this exception, that it was accompanied by no gift or token of friendship. Barnwall received it with equal courtesy, declined with as many thanks the invitation to remove to Thomas Court, and dismissed the Captain of the Guard with all suitable messages.

By this time the twilight had given way to the deeper darkness of a moonless sky, and the Knight, having ordered his chamber to be prepared, partook in silence of a hearty supper—a meal which might be said to answer in those days to the modern dinner—and followed an attendant to the sleeping apartment, but not to sleep. Alone here, he gazed alternately on the furniture of the apartment, and the burning billets on the hearth. The room was small, and, but for the huge fire, would have been as cheerless as a Lapland snow-house. The grey stones were visible above the low wainscot, which only lined two of its sides. The couch was rude and low, its frame almost resting on the ground, while the tapestry that overhung it seemed heavy with the dust of ages. The roof also was so low that a man of full height could not stand quite erect under it. It had but one vent for air or light, a sort of window in the corner nearest to the chimney, which was glazed with horn instead of glass, and could easily be removed altogether. On taking it away and looking out, Sir Piers obtained a dim view of the city by starlight. At a little distance beneath him, the Liffey, swollen by April rains, flowed rapidly through the piers of the "New bridge," and swept the facings of Wood-quay. Its course was most irregular, now spreading into mimic lakes a furlong wide, and then rushing on in deep confined currents. From its opposite side, the front of the Black Abbey and the tower of Saint Michan's looked dubiously towards him, while Fyan's and Newman's towers, farther down on the same bank were scarcely more visible. It was altogether a scene calculated to increase rather than to diminish the serious thoughts which pressed upon the Knight's mind. For a long time he continued to gaze and to think, until at length, turning away, he closed the lattice, uttered a hasty orison, trimmed his falling fire, and lay down to sleep; still, even in his dreams, pursuing the thoughts he had started while awake—like an eager huntsman, who does not abandon the chase even when darkness has fallen upon the way.

CHAPTER II.—THE CAPTAIN OF THE GUARD AND THE MAYOR OF THE BULL-RING.

WHILE yet the Knight was ruminating on his prospects of life—ruminations by which all young men's minds at some periods are visited—his squire, Hugh Herrick, sat in the crescent parlour of the White Horse, enjoying the contents of an overgrown can of sack, which he lessened rapidly by replenishing from it his own and his companion's goblet. This companion was Captain Kenelbreck, the commandant of the Lord Deputy's guard.

"I suppose," said the Captain, who seemed more intent on talking than debauch, "I suppose your measures are not so deep in your hen-house castle of Drimnagh."

"Of late, not," answered the squire. "Yet, noble Captain, 'time was,' as the brazen head of the necromancer said—and 'time shall be.'"

"But the time that is, Master Hugh, must be anything but agreeable to a person of your revelling tendencies."

"Why, to confess it, noble Captain, I have had more than once, since this young springald—I mean since my young lord's return—I have had more than once to stop a madrigal, in the very middle, for the drought. There is no more use in essaying to carry out a ballad, Captain, without wetting your lips, than in seeking to make a horse feed without drink. Your dry summer always kills your best crops. 'Tis a foul plague."

"True; but Sir Piers' venison must be savory, and his ale abounding?"

The squire shook his head. "There is venison enough for the taking, on the hills, and the ale is brewed every full of the moon; but times are not, at Drimnagh, as they were in the late lord's time. I remember me, jolly Captain," continued the Squire, warming with the subject, and perhaps with the sack also, "I remember me of nights, when the way from the cellar to the dais in the hall was lined with menials, who never ceased passing the flagons to and fro, the full ones up and the empty ones down, noble Captain. Alack! those jolly nights will come for me no more on this side of the grave. I am a tree that hath passed my prime, Captain; an old stag—and I never will see again the sport I have witnessed in my youth. Wo is me, such nights of jollity. It would have done your heart good, Captain, to see the old Knight at the head of his own table, and to hear him swear so lustily. He gave it up at last, suddenly, and I knew then that something was going to happen him. I said so—and he died in a week after. And he has not left his like, I assure ye. Not in all the four shires of "the Pale" could ye find me another Sir Hugh like him that's gone. Not but this Piers is a good lad enough, a very good lad, and a dutiful to the dame, his mother, but fitter to be a monk than a soldier, I wot—yet a good lad."

At these words the epicurean squire, who had just emptied his goblet for the sixth time, heaved a deep sigh, and the Captain, while his friend re-filled, took up the discourse.

"Master Hugh, the advantage of serving a great lord over a small one is, to me, in no way clearer than in this. In a great house your menial has his own place, and all who follow the profession of the sword their places. A scullion is a scullion, a soldier a soldier, and a squire a squire. If the Lord Deputy's butcher or baker should ask my assistance in his work, by the shield of Mars I would cleave him with my sword like a block for the burning. Now, if you, Master Hugh—for devotion to the dignity of arms I reverence—were in our service”—

“Hark,” hiccupped the Squire, “some one is at the door.”

“Did you call, noble Sirs,” exclaimed the asthmatic voice of the host.

“The cursed old cat has been eavesdropping,” cried Herrick, jumping towards the voice.

“No,” said Kenelbreck, interrupting him, “he would not dare do that. We can finish our discourse, Master Hugh, some other time. I will care for your fortunes; that I will—depend on’t. Will you see me on my way towards the court?”

“Freely, freely,” responded the Squire, who seemed quite unconscious of the drift of the Captain’s discourse up to this point.

Both passed into the kitchen. The Captain of the Guard advanced to the host, and placed some small coins in his hand.

“Is the Knight asleep?” he enquired in a low voice.

“He is.”

“He hath been visited by none since I saw you?”

“Not one.”

“Well—all’s well. Good night.”

“Good night, noble Captain, good night—look to your swords, sirs, the city is full of strangers from Tredagh and Tryme, Finglass and Bray, and all the country round.”

“There’s little danger to us, I opine,” said the Guardsman, leering with his fishy eyes at his companion.

“Not much,” replied the other, tucking his rapier closely under his arm. “Take care of yourself, worthy host, take care,” he exclaimed, staggering into the court.

In their surmise they seemed to be right. They passed unmolested through the darkened streets until they reached St. Owen’s church. Here Kenelbreck pointed to the New Gate, and announced that they should part. He then took the Squire’s hand, and said,

“If you would choose, Master Hugh, to think of our service in preference to that of a Barnwall, I promise you my influence with my Lord Deputy.”

“Eh?” stammered Herrick.

The Guardsman repeated his words.

“What!” exclaimed the Squire, whose dulled brain the cold night air had reached, and roused, though it had not adjusted its lost balance. “What! tempt you me to desert my natural master, you heartless hound. Go, run, vanish through that gate-way as quickly as your bull-rush legs can carry you, or I’ll slice you like an onion. Begone, you brock, begone.”

“Did you not complain to me like a leper to an almoner, thou saucy sot,” retorted the guardsman.

“Begone, I say,” repeated the Squire, drawing his rapier, “begone, or I will cleave you like a new cheese I’ll teach you how to tempt a man of honour—ill-fared anatomy that you are.”

The Guardsman, who was no coward, and was much more sober than his indignant friend (who, indeed, it was clear enough to see, he did desire to suborn in some degree from his duty), drew also, and taking the advantage ground of the street, which was higher than the foot-way, pressed sorely on the Squire. A heavy dew, natural to nights at that season, had fallen, and the ground was, besides, uneven and treacherous. The Squire was soon beaten to the wall. After placing his back against a door, he renewed the combat. Every moment he grew more sober, and more guarded in his tactics, and gained ground on his enemy. The Guardsman perceiving this, by a succession of skilful thrusts, drove him back once more against the door, which he struck with such violence that suddenly it gave way behind him, and he was prostrated into what he conceived to be the bottomless pit itself, in the moment of reflection which intervened between the crash and his loss of consciousness.

The fall rendered him insensible, and he lay like one quite dead, his sword still clutched in his right hand. The moment the door had opened the Guardsman fled through the New Gate, and proceeded on his way, leaving him to his fate. This, indeed, might have been a final one, but that the house into which he had been so unexpectedly precipitated, though old and in part ruined, chanced to be not entirely uninhabited.

In its third and topmost story, by the dull light of expiring embers, two heaps of human cloths, in opposite corners, indicated the presence of earthly inhabitants. As the sound of the fall rang through the crazy house, a gigantic head, with matted black hair, beard unshorn, and eyes fearfully wild in their expression, was raised from the one, and a weird, misshapen face, with unequal eyes, and long, grey, elfin locks started from the other.

“Bat! what sound was that?” said the giant, whose limbs corresponded with the dimensions of his face and head.

A skinny finger, belonging to the wizard face, was raised and shaken in reply.

A groan, followed by another fainter than the first, was next heard.

The giant leaped to his feet, with his scanty undress alone upon him, lighted a lath of logwood which lay at hand, and rushed down stairs. He was followed by the half-made creature, his attendant. As they reached the hall, five or six young and athletic men, in yeoman trim (seemingly attracted by the sudden light), with clubs in their hands, appeared at the open door.

“Here has been foul work,” said their leader, who was distinguished from the rest by a horn at his side and a bugle at his belt, and a gem shining like a star in his deer-skin cap; “Sir Patrick, know you how this man came here?”

“Aye!” said the giant, “by putting his trust in a false friend.”

“How—read me your riddle?”

“Read it for yourself.”

“I cannot.”

“He leant against my door, and it gave way with him.”

“Broils—broils—broils,” muttered the leader of the club-men, “I think I must even marry, or resign my authority. Do any of you know the man?”

“Methinks,” said a voice which we have before mentioned in this history as that of a tanner from St. Michael’s Hill—“methinks he must be the same I saw riding last eve, behind a noble knight, into the courtyard of the White Horse.”

“It is the same!” added a denizen of Coke-street; “let us carry him to the inn.”

“No, no, the ring before the inn; no respect of persons shall prejudice our court,” said he of the shining star.

Four of the men now formed a sort of bier with their clubs, upon which the other two, with the assistance of the giant, placed the senseless Squire, and, leaving the good natured monster to return to his rest, they bore him along at a slow pace, their captain walking at their head with as grave an air as if he was a clergyman leading a procession to the church-yard. When they reached Christ Church Cathedral, they turned into a narrow passage at its western side, and entering a low, oblong wicker-work house, which contained but a single hall, with sleeping stalls ranged on either side, this strange brotherhood deposited their burthen, and, setting two of their number to act as sentinels before the entrance, the other four, laying themselves on their beds, in a twinkling were all fast asleep.

The first glimpses of the morning sun awoke them again. Rising, they made ample ablutions in a huge urn that stood in a corner of their hall, which was supplied with water from a spring close by, and could be emptied into a sewer that ran from the Cathedral to the river, by withdrawing a plug introduced for the purpose. From a pair of high, heavy, oaken chests quaintly carved, that flanked the wide fire-place, they took their gala dresses, which, in honour of Saint George, they now put on. These consisted of green coats, and buff sur-coats and nether garments, shoes with bunches of white ribbon on the instep, and flat velvet caps with bouquets of April flowers instead of plumes; the Captain being distinguished, as before, by his sword, bugle, and star. The two sentinels being relieved by two others at daybreak, these four proceeded to wake up our luckless Squire, and to lead him forth to his punishment. When they succeeded in rousing him, and had ascertained that his fall had stunned rather than hurt, they led him into the air. Poor Herrick opened his eyes in astonishment to see himself so gaily attended, thought himself a prince—a bridegroom, or bewitched; and would have rubbed his eyes, but that his hands were tied behind his back.

"Sir," said the before-named tanner, who was called by his fellows, for a propensity he had, "the Gossiping Tanner," "this gentleman," pointing to the tall and handsome leader of the group, "is the Captain of the bachelors of this burgh or city; his name is Myrtle, Sir, and his office one of the ancientest now among us."

The Squire, thus introduced, made a very low obeisance, so that his chin rested on his broad chest. Then looking at his soiled doublet, open hose, and empty scabbard (his sword he perceived was in the Captain's keeping), he cast an imploring look towards that personage, and was about to commence a parley. But he might as well have appealed to Cato against the censorship.

"We will hear you at the ring," said Captain Myrtle; and the quicker you move thither, Sir, the fewer eyes will be abroad as witnesses of your plight."

Sighing mournfully, the Squire moved on somewhat troubled in mind, but much more afflicted in body. Near the Tholsel an iron ring was fastened in the wall, from which a strong cord depended, with a wide noose at the end; this noose one of the bachelors flung upon his shoulders, so that his hands being fettered, he could not stir a foot except at the risk of strangulation.

The Captain motioned back his men, and entered into conversation with the culprit.

"Whom do you serve; speak truly?"

"The Knight of Drimnagh."

"Sir Hugh Barnwall?"

"No; he is dead since midsummer last. I now serve Sir Piers."

"Oh! I had forgotten the old Knight's death: how came you where I last night found you?"

The Squire—among whose virtues candour might always be found, save when it had walked away with its ally, sobriety—narrated the whole story of the night honestly, as it had happened.

"I am sorry I had not known this," said Captain Myrtle. "I have ancient reasons for wishing well to the family of Drimnagh. The good folk are gathering to see whom we have brought this morning to the 'Bull-ring.' None are led here to be lectured but culprits and young bridegrooms; and, in sooth, you look but little like the latter—though I have seen some wedded faces not much gayer of aspect. As mayor of the Bull-ring, I now set you free; and I mainly regret that you have risked the colours of the Knight you serve."

"I thank you for the sermon you have preached, my Squire," said a grave voice close to them; and the culprit and the censor turning quickly round, beheld, to their almost equal astonishment, Sir Piers Barnwall himself, who, after spending a restless night, had issued forth thus early in quest of the missing Herrick. "May I beg to know, Sir, your name and office, for I am as yet a stranger in your city?"

"My name, Sir Knight of Drimnagh, is Myrtle—Joseph Myrtle, at your service; in my civic station I am known as mayor of the bull-ring, and in my military office as Captain of the Bachelors. It is my duty, until released by death or matrimony, to overlook the morals of this good city, and to punish all offenders against them."

"In discharge of which you have, I would augur, no easy task."

"In truth, Sir Piers, at times my hands are full enough; but Dublin has not, withal, grown to be so bad as Babylon or the cities of the Plain."

"You are informed of my name, I perceive."

"The late Knight, your honoured father, was a patron of our house; and he sometimes condescended so far as to be its guest."

"Yes, I have heard the name," said the Knight, remembering, with internal pain and a passing blush, that a vintner so-called was one of the chief creditors of his house. "There remain some bonds in your hands, I think, Master Myrtle?"

"I pray you, worthy Knight," said the young merchant, "mention them not. I have asked and have learned what manner of man is your father's heir; nor shall I trouble you at any time for that my abundance can well spare. I leave the cancelling of those bonds to you, albeit, it should be in the next century, if it please God both of us live until then."

"You confer," said the Knight, "a new obligation upon me. I will not be in Dublin over the octave at the outermost; yet I trust, courteous Captain, we may see you in the summer days at Drimnagh."

"You honour me over much, Sir Knight," said the vintner, "but, peradventure, when exercising my band of Bachelors, I may summon up boldness enough to pay my duty to your Knightship, and show you some of our town sports, such as they be."

"I will look for you anxiously, indeed very anxiously," said the young cavalier; and, shaking his new acquaintance warmly by the hand, he turned to depart.

"One word would I say ere you go," said the merchant: "beware of the Lord Deputy, let not your squire comroque with that fox, Kenelbreck; and, Sir Knight, stay no longer in the city than you can well avoid; storms impend."

The Knight, again expressing his thanks, departed.

Hugh Herrick, it may be added during this dialogue, took occasion to escape; which he did comparatively unnoticed, as the spectators were now chiefly occupied with observing the friendly dialogue between the knight and the merchant—a sight not seen in the streets on every day of that ceremonious age.

CHAPTER III.—THE FEAST OF ST. GEORGE.

THE April day spread its horizon brighter and farther round Dubh-gall and Fin-gall, and the city that stood, fair as morning, between both. From all the neighbouring villages troops of laughing hinds and kerne, with sometimes a half dozen horsemen, having a highborn dame, or two or three fair girls of their company, crowded the approaches to the gates of Dublin. Galleys, too, from Howth and Dalkey, and the shores of that magnificent bay (which the artist never sees without admiring, or the patriot without loving his island more), floated on the early tide into the Liffey, exchanging jests and inquiries as they passed each other on its waters. The broad banner of Saint George flew from the “high tower” of the Castle, whilst other banners of various devices, national and genealogical, floated from the lesser towers and along the walls. On every altar the mystic sacrifice was offered—from every turret of church and convent the bells spoke out joyfully the advent of the day sanctified as the feast of a great saint.

The scene of the mysteries to be enacted was Hoggin Green, where Henry Fitz-Empress, in his cage-work house, spent his first winter in the land he imagined he had subdued, and where Richard of Bordeaux, the ill-fated heir of a brave line, lamented, two hundred years later, his failure in those great expeditions which at last sent him homeward, already conquered, and a captive, to the feet of the ambitious Bolingbroke. The stage, erected over against St. Andrew's Church, within less than a bowshot of the Convent of All-Hallows, was shaped in the form of a crescent, facing towards the church, the right horn of which was to be occupied by the municipal dignitaries and their guests, while the left was set apart for the Lord Deputy and his guests. A great crowd of people of motley character—traders and mechanics of the city—mariners and fishermen of the bay—archers, yeomen, and husbandmen of the neighbouring plains, with their wives, daughters, and sweethearts, of all degrees of beauty and of age, were ranked confusedly round the green. The stage and a circle of a couple of acres, enclosed by a paling in the midst of the green, were kept accessible by two squads of the municipal train bands, headed by the junior and senior wardens, who paraded their men back and forward, to the great edification of the strangers, themselves, and their wives.

The first party that arrived was the Mayor's—himself a small, weakly-looking man, in a huge chain, and glowing crimson and white habiliments; he was preceded by his sword-bearer, and followed by the bailiffs, sheriffs, and aldermen of the city—the captain of the bachelors and his lieutenant the tanner, and the municipal guests, among whom were many ladies, dressed in very stiff stomachers, tight sleeves, long shoes, and horned head-dresses. Besides his civic garments, the worshipful Mayor also wore the insignia of the Fraternity of St. George; for by virtue of his office he was one of the thirty knights to which that order of “Pale” chivalry was limited. Great cheering hailed the presence of these officials, the representatives of the power of the people, whom they really aspired to serve and to protect.

A solitary knight next approached the platform, and moved to the vacant side. Murmurs of surprise at his ignorance of the arrangements burst from the crowd. Taking off his casque, he bowed respectfully to the Mayor, the ladies, the municipal officers, and the captain of the bachelors (who returned his salute with profound courtesy), and disregarding the common cry he quietly seated himself. This oversight of etiquette might, perhaps, have occasioned a tumult, but that all eyes were now turned towards Dame's-Gate, from under which Kildare, at the head of a splendid cavalcade of about two score lords and ladies, and an hundred men of his own guard, rode into Hoggin Green.

“The Deputy! the Deputy!” “The Earl! the Earl!” “Kildare! Kildare!” were shouted all about, and then every throat in the vast concourse poured out an unanimous acclamation which rung over all the roofs of the city, and might have been heard reverberating for a league in every direction around the Castle; even Piers—so electric is the first touch of a great man's popularity to a young intellect—rose and joined in the general applause.

“Who is the youth on the stage?” said the Earl, after bowing repeatedly to the crowd, as he turned to Captain Kenelbreck, who rode by his rein.

“The young Knight of Drimnagh.”

“Ha! a noble, indeed; 'tis well he should meet us here.”

“Avoid, Sir Knight, avoid the Lord Deputy's seat,” shouted the senior warden in command of the train bands.

“Avoid the Earl's seat, ye churl,” shouted some from the crowd.

“Nay, nay, Sir Piers Barnwall, stir not from your place, except ye fear to join our company,” exclaimed the gratified deputy, as he reached the foot of the stage.

The young knight bowed, and remained standing while all the earl's guests were being seated. With hurried glances he turned from one to the other, endeavouring to scan their characters in their features. Kildare, himself, first attracted his attention; he was a hale, short man, of a full habit of body and fair complexion, apparently nearing two score and ten. A magnificent purple tunic, clasped at the throat with the George of the fraternity, an undress of black velvet, trimmed and pointed with lace of gold, and adorned with divers stars, pointed shoes, clasped with burning diamonds, and a plain helmet encircled with a sparkling coronet, completed his attire. He leaped lightly up the stairs of the stage, bowed as humbly as the poorest burgess to the Mayor and the municipal officers, who stood up to receive him, and then turned towards the Green to assist the ladies to the stage. Being a widower, this gallantry was natural enough, even in his high office, though it was rumoured that there was one among his fair guests who had no small share in influencing him to such observances.

The first female of the party who reached the stage was the aged Baroness of Howth, and she was followed by the Viscountess of Trimbleston and two matrons of the Preston and Plunkett families. The dresses of these ladies were nearly uniform, consisting of robes, tight fitting round the waist and bosom, brodered with Flemish lace, and ending in long, perplexing trains; pointed shoes, within the prohibited length; and head-dresses, towering like pyramids, from which long veils descended on their shoulders.

Following these, supported on the arm of Roland Fitz-Eustace, the venerable Lord Portlester (who was father to Kildare's late Countess), came the loveliest girl that the eyes of Sir Piers had ever seen. Tall and elegantly formed, the expressiveness of her countenance, and the singularity of her dress, engrossed all. Above, eyes blacker than the night lit by a single star, and hair beside which the raven's ebon wing would look but grey, a snowy turban was wreathed, and seemed rather to repose upon than to bind her head. With the folds of this turban a string of small pure coral beads was entwined, and a solitary ivy flower, its white chalice swinging at every motion, was fastened by an aigrette in the band on the left side. A loose white veil, reaching from the throat to the feet, gathered to the waist, and there confined with a green girdle; a long blue mantle, armlets of pearl, and shoes of the daintiest deer-skin, completed her costume. Her veteran attendant held upon his arm a mantle of the rarest furs, which some thoughtful friend had thrown upon her jennet in case the weather came to its worst. The hum of admiration that greeted the ascent of this lady was like the simultaneous sound which is produced by the uprising together of a vast congregation in the grand aisle of some old cathedral. It seemed to the eyes of the "Pale" people as if a Paynim princess left her far home in the Orient, Sheeba-like, to pay homage to their Solomon and deputy; and this impression was not lessened when they saw Kildare himself lead her to a seat near his own, where she was immediately joined by his two maiden daughters. These ladies might have answered severally to the ages of twenty and sixteen. Alice, the eldest, was tall and fair, of that soft nature that all the months which embraced the harsh letter "r" ought to have been stricken from her calendar. She seemed born to live beneath the mild orb of night, rather than under the garish lamp of day; and, had she not been bred an earl's child, would have lived and died a saint in a cloister. Eustachia, the younger, was of a nature the opposite to this. Of small size and slender frame, her activity was her characteristic. Ever enquiring into the hidden things of life, she knew botany better than a surgeon, and, for heraldry, might have been king-at-arms. Her great cotemporary, Sir Thomas More, would have been vastly delighted with her as a correspondent; and Erasmus himself, had he known her worth, and not been too lazy, would have specially visited Ireland to form her acquaintance. But besides knowing so much, Eustachia knew more—she knew, for the poets told her, and the fathers preached it to her, that woman's worth lies more in the riches of the affections than in the possession of bookish lore, and that her natural path leads to the altar, the nursery, and the couch of sickness, not to the pulpit, the laboratory, or the tribune. And Eustachia sought to make herself beloved, and was beloved by all—even by those she little thought of inspiring with the feeling.

The Earl's daughters were attended by their relatives, the Lord Thomas and Maurice Fitzgerald (two noblemen in the prime of life and power), by Sir Gibbon Fitzgerald, the Knight of the Valley, the fop of his family, and by a guest of the Lord Deputy's, Sir Morogh M'David More, of Wexford, a nobleman, who, for his wandering habits and adoption of foreign usages, was known among his own people as Morogh na Gall, or "the stranger." He was a man scarcely beyond the age of adolescence, yet he looked older. An expression of satiety sat on his lips and brow, as if he was always about to declare the folly of man and the fleetingness of life. Yet such was not the character of his conversation—he narrated anecdotes of his travels, and made as much entertainment as a seanachie. And it was even said that he did good by an hundred hidden ways, inventing an infinite variety of stratagems to conceal his virtues. After Sir Morogh, came a very imposing figure, being that of the Prior of the Knights Hospitalers of Kilmainham, Sir James Keating. The undress of this personage was entirely of plated armour, having an immense cross upon the breast. Above this he wore a long, loose cloak, fastened at the neck with a cumbrous brooch, and bearing another cross on the left shoulder. His cap was low and tight-fitting, and his hair and beard long and dark. He was one of the most daring and remarkable men that ever appeared in Irish history; constable of the Castle, he had shut and held it against the Lord Deputy Grey, sent over in 1482 to assume the government; a prior of St. John, he defied the Grand Master of Rhodes, arrested and imprisoned his appointee commissioned to supersede him, and trampled on his decrees. For nearly thirty years he had maintained himself in "the Pale" an independent and formidable chief, as much feared by his enemies for his energy as he was courted by his friends for his power. With Sir James came the O'Connor Faily, an Irish chief, the gossip and ally of Kildare, dressed in a conical braid, ample vest, close trowse, and buskins of undressed deer-skin; a man aged, and venerable for piety and his love of peace. Behind these came the abbots of St. Mary's and St. Thomas', and All-Hallows', in the respective habits of their orders, and a score of other guests, all of whom were seated around the deputy.

Barnwall, who stood by all this time, was struck with wonder at the variety and rich apparel of the guests—the like of which he had not seen equalled, even in the court of Henry. His glance flitted from row to row in the amphitheatre, and at last settled on the form of that radiant maiden who so captivated his fancy at the first sight. Sir Morogh na Gall and the O'Connor were sitting behind her seat, and Kildare was leaning back from his own to join them and her in discourse. As the earl turned he perceived the Knight of Drimnagh still standing. He beckoned to him, and pointed to a vacant place on the same bench with his own daughters. The knight hesitated to accept.

"Sit down, sit down, Sir Piers," cried the earl, "the O'Connor need not fear to trust you on the same form with his daughter, nor do I to set you by mine."

The young knight bowed, blushed, hesitated, and sat down. For a moment he fancied himself in a trance, during which the stage and the spectators had vanished. Lady Alison Fitzgerald only sat between him and the lady who so filled his mind. In his first unconsciousness he stooped his head to the gentle Geraldine, and asked in a whisper—

"I pray you, lady, what is your fair friend called who sitteth at your other hand?"

The lady turned round, gazed into his face, paused, smiled, and added in the same tone.

"Her name is Fionuala, a name which my sister Eustace says, signifies 'fair-shouldered.' We call her Nuala only. Her father is the old chief, our gossip, who sits nearly behind her."

"Thanks, lovely lady, myriads of thanks," said the enchanted noble, as he leant back in his seat, and sunk into a reverie.

At this moment the sound of trumpets and the voice of the junior warden proclaimed the coming of the performers' procession, and an entrance being made in the paling, they began to form within it.

First came two personages, arrayed as emperor and empress, with crowns on their heads, and costly robes studded with stars and other devices. The train of the empress was borne by two maidens, who were followed by two knights also attached to her service. Two doctors, very gravely dressed and visaged, waited on the emperor.

Saint George, himself, preceded by four trumpeters, and followed by four horsemen, armed cap-a-pied and superbly mounted, came next. The two foremost horsemen bore his sword and the emperor's, the other two his standard and pole-axe.

Next came a maiden on foot, very splendidly attired, leading by a golden line the dragon, whose prodigious tongue, fiery eyes, emerald scales, and floundering gait, caused great merriment among the dauntless, and no little trembling in the timid.

The procession closed with the King and Queen of Dele, each attended by two maidens and two knights, all dressed in sables.

The emperor and empress with their attendants ranged themselves on one side of the enclosed space or lists, and the king and queen with their attendants on the other. Then the four trumpeters, taking their places in pairs at opposite sides of the inclosure, prepared to make proclamation, while in the centre, the knight still mounted, sat with wonderful patience, and the lady held the dragon with her golden cord, as though not a whit alarmed for the issue of the contest.

Among the spectators, in the offing of the crowd, intermixed with the squire and grooms of the nobles, were two, who by the singularity of their appearance, attracted nearly as much attention from their neighbours as the performers in the mystery. These were a man of gigantic size and faded habiliments, who had lifted upon a vacant pedestal a crooked and dwarfish creature, the horrible malformations of whose countenance were strangely exhibited by the variety of expressions that passed over it, and the determined cunning rooted in the sunken cups of his eyes.

"Bat!" said the colossus, "do you see her now?"

"Aye!" answered the cripple, "they are all three talking together. Jeminy, how the strange knight listens, and bows, and smiles."

"Is he talking to her, Bat?" said his master, in a desponding tone.

"No, its to the middle one, in the turban, that looks so like the princess in the picture."

Kildare just then gave the signal to the actors. The four trumpeters hereat blew on their trumpets, with all their might, peals so loud and long, that they stunned all the spectators, caused the horse of Saint George to plunge violently, and the lady spectators to clap their hands to their ears.

When this fearful challenge had ceased, Saint George, dismounting from his charger, girt on his sword, and giving his horse in keeping to one of his attendants, prepared for the combat on foot. The dragon, feeling the hour of trial at hand, bristled up fearfully, stood erect on his nether limbs, flapped his heavy wings, and roared like a very beast. The lady could no longer restrain his fury; his red eyes rolled like circles of fire, and from the root of his long, forked tongue, he sent forth repeated hisses. The children, who were held up on the shoulders of the spectators, shrieked with terror, the ladies screamed, though less it was suspected through fear than fashion, and the iron warriors themselves began to feel interested. At a signal from the Lord Deputy, the maiden slipped the golden cord, and the monster sprang forward with a roar. Saint George started aside, and, turning swiftly, lopped with a blow one of the wings from its body. Now the blood began to flow, and the wrath of the dragon waxed mightier. Beating down the knight's sword-arm by a powerful stroke of the remaining wing, it grappled him, shook him from his balance, and both rolled together on the ground. A cry of surprise burst from the assemblage—but immediately they were reassured, for Saint George, springing to his feet, though all blood-stained and bruised, renewed the combat as bravely as at first. Bootless were it to tell what tough encounters and strange reverses followed. At last the knight succeeded in beheading the monster, and then the shapeless trunk was placed on a bier and carted from the spot, while the champion himself, amid the cheers of all present, departed from the ring, supported between the two doctors of the emperor.

A mystery was then enacted representing the Crucifixion, at the order of the three Abbots, and in the taste of the time, after which the noble company rose to depart.

"Sir Knight of Drimnagh," said the Deputy, "you will come with us to Thomas Court, and partake of our George's dinner: say me not nay, I beg you, for I never ask a guest thrice."

Sir Piers bowed a willing acquiescence.

The Earl led the way from the stage, followed by the prior, the O'Connor, and the three Abbots. Lady Alison was about giving her hand to Barnwall, when a frown on the face of her cousin, Sir Gibbon, induced her to withdraw it. Fionuala perceiving this, gave the discarded youth her hand, to the darkening of many brows about, and the sore discomfiture of the veteran Portlester. Eustachia was led away by Sir Morogh na Gall, and each gallant, having seated his lady on her palfrey, rode himself at her rein. Before and behind were long cavalcades, and, wherever the streets admitted them, crowds on foot ran cheering along, throwing up their caps, and gathering the gold flung among them by the earl, the prior, and the other nobles. The cavalcade passing through the New Gate, rode on quickly through Saint Thomas'-street, and, leaving Saint Catherine's Church to the left hand, they entered the grand gateway of Thomas'-court.

Hugh Herrick, who had led his master's horse to the Green, and had arrived here along with him to bring it again to the hostlery, no sooner saw that favoured knight leading the lady of the turban into the hall of the earl's mansion, than he shook his head, turned his rein, and rode home, sorrowfully sighing all the way. When he reached "the White Horse," he closetted himself with a full can of sack in the crescent parlour, and in the intervals of his libations kept muttering to himself: "Ormond's ally, Kildare's friend, and taken with a damosel of the mere Irish! misfortunes, they say, never come alone. Saint Joseph look down on the poor youth, or he is lost."

As if to banish these mournful reflections, the worthy retainer sallied out at twilight, bending his steps towards Saint George's Chapel in George's-lane, where the civic fathers were completing the observances of the day, according to the ancient custom of their ancestors, in feasting, music, and dancing.

Poetæ Catholici.No. I.—CALDERON.

THE name of Calderon, the greatest of the Spanish Dramatists, is not very familiar even to the readers of foreign literature in this country. He is known, perhaps, a little better in England; but he has never been very popular there, owing probably to the circumstance of his having been a Catholic and a Priest, and of his having devoted to the service of religion the zeal and piety of his profession, and the genius with which he was so largely endowed. The splendour of his poetry, however, has been properly appreciated in Germany, where, along with being studied as a classic, he has been raised almost to a level with Shakspeare himself. It shall be our pleasing task, both here and elsewhere, to introduce him to such of our Irish friends as desire his acquaintance, in an English dress, as nearly resembling his own, both in character and beauty, as possible. At present we shall confine ourselves to a few general remarks on the nature and tendency of his writings, to some of the causes which have led to his temporary neglect, and to the reaction in his favour which commenced with the present century. That one of his plays, which, in a religious and national point of view, must be of peculiar interest to us, from its connexion with our history, namely, "The Purgatory of St. Patrick," shall be translated entire in these pages, illustrated with such notes as the merits of the play and the interest of the subject require.

In the spring of 1808, and in the city of Vienna, Augustus William Schlegel delivered a course of Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature, which from their brilliancy, enthusiasm, and generous, if not always exact criticism, attained at once an European celebrity, and influenced, perhaps more than any other book, the poetry and criticism of Europe. That influence has by no means declined; it is rather widening and extending itself every day, while much that has been written to counteract it is now utterly forgotten.

It is not to be wondered that Germany hailed with gratitude and rapture the labours and discoveries of Schlegel; for not only was her own character elevated and ennobled by the genius of the critic, but her literature was enriched almost beyond expression, by the introduction and naturalization into it of the two greatest dramatic poets of modern times—Shakspeare and Calderon. The beautiful passage in which Schiller describes the training of the poet, would be also applicable to the critic, if criticism were generally conducted in the discriminating, yet all embracing spirit of Augustus Schlegel. "The poet," says Schiller, "it is true, is the son of his time; but pity for him if he is its pupil, or even its favourite! Let some beneficent deity snatch him when a suckling from the breast of his mother, and nurse him with the milk of a better time, that he may ripen to his full stature beneath a distant Grecian sky. And having grown to manhood, let him return a foreign shape, into his century: not, however to delight it by his presence, but dreadful, like the son of Agamemnon, to purify it." This sublime description, except in the last sentence, is not inapplicable to Schlegel—his writings, as all writings consecrated to truth, faith, and beauty, have ever done, not only purified his century, but delighted it also—in other respects the description is complete: snatched early from the narrowing effects of contemporary influences, and fed upon the milk of a better time—the early literature of Greece, of England, and of Spain—he grew to manhood beneath the distant Grecian sky of true poetry, and, not only returned himself a foreign shape into his century and his country, but led with him, from that glorious region where his mind was reared, other foreign shapes also, to dwell in it, and delight it for ever. A certain amount of vague, inexact knowledge on the subject of Shakspeare existed in Germany before Schlegel wrote. Several, if not all, of the plays had been translated, and one or two had been made the subject of profound criticism, such as that of Goethe in the "Wilhelm Meister;" but to Schlegel is principally due the merit of naturalizing him in that country, both by the spirit and fidelity of his version, and by the truth and depth of his criticism. With Calderon, however, it was very different. For more than a century his name had scarcely been mentioned out of Spain. His works, as well as those of his great predecessor, Lope, to be sure, were well known to the professed play-wrights of England, France, and Italy, and were with much liberality appropriated to their own uses, by these very industrious, and not very scrupulous gentlemen. But, except as an exhaustless mine of invention, imagery, plot, and intrigue, he was scarcely remembered, and as such was guarded in safe obscurity by the parties interested, like an hidden treasure. Perhaps an Eastern story or apologue, will best illustrate the uses to which Calderon and the Spanish dramatists generally have been put by their theatrical brethren all over Europe. In the Persian Tales there is mention made of a young merchant of Basrah, named Aboulcasem, who lived in such princely magnificence, and displayed such boundless wealth, as even to awaken the astonishment and curiosity of the Caliph Haroun Alraschid himself. Haroun determined on visiting Aboulcasem, for the purpose of ascertaining from him, if possible, the source of his amazing riches. Disguising himself, therefore, as a merchant, he proceeded to Basrah, and was received by the young man with his usual magnificence and hospitality; to whom he eventually explained the cause of his visit. Aboulcasem, who was surnamed the Generous, and who could never refuse a guest anything that he could by possibility grant him, promised to gratify his curiosity, and led him that very night with his eyes bandaged to a subterranean hall, where his treasures were collected. "When they came into the middle of this hall," says the story, "the young man took the bandage from the eyes of the Caliph, who was struck with astonishment at what he saw. A basin of white marble, which was fifty feet in circumference, and thirty deep, stood in the middle: it was full of great pieces of gold, and round about it rose twelve pillars of the same metal, upon which stood twelve statues of precious stones, exquisitely wrought. Aboulcasem led the prince up to the basin, and said to him: "this basin is thirty feet deep; behold this quantity of gold! It has not yet sunk above two inches." The reader may be sure, in the same manner, that if any modern dramatist, who has exhibited much prodigality of invention in his plays, were candid enough to imitate the generous Aboulcasem, and show to any curious reader the sources of his intellectual wealth, the latter would be sure to find in some obscure corner of the dramatist's study the twenty-five volumes of Lope, with the twelve goodly quartos of Calderon, standing like the golden pillars of the story, around them. The living or the future dramatist need not fear that all will be exhausted; there is no likelihood of the marble basin being emptied. For two centuries have his predecessors been drawing from that golden treasury, "and yet it has not sunk above two inches." It is calculated that in England there is coal enough for the next five thousand years. And if dwarfs and horses allow the drama to exist so long, the playwright who lacks invention and imagination, may be sure of being supplied from Spain with both out of the unused treasures which it still contains. The fine prophetic line of Johnson, upon Shakspeare, that "he was born not for an age, but for all time," is equally true with regard to Lope and to Calderon; but in a much less gratifying sense, and with this difference, that he is preserved to be admired and read, while they are preserved to be abused and robbed. The Spaniards themselves have shamefully neglected these great poets, and are mainly answerable for the general neglect into which, until the beginning of the present century, they had fallen. In Spain, the plays of Calderon (for with those of Lope we are quite unacquainted), still remain as they were originally published in 1685, by his friend Don Juan De Vera Tasis, without any correction of the innumerable grammatical and typical errors in which they abound; or any explanation of the difficulties and obscurities both of construction and allusion, under which the sense of the author is often wholly lost, and which, of course, are increasing every year. A recent writer, who seems to have made Calderon a particular study, thus alludes to this subject, in speaking of the corrupted and mutilated text of the plays: "The text is occasionally unintelligible, all of them are left without the slightest commentary, and nothing exists except the internal evidence of style, or allusion to passing events, or the date of representation, to mark the date of the composition of any particular play. All of them are left without the slightest commentary, to explain the many difficulties arising, sometimes from a real obscurity in the ideas themselves, sometimes from a form of expression now antiquated; sometimes from plays on words which escape the notice of a foreign reader, and still more frequently from the perpetual allusions to incidents of the day, or to passages in contemporary authors or plays, which are made the subject of satire or praise—to prevailing fashions, absurdities, proverbial expressions, or popular ballads of the time, many of which would now baffle the research of the best Spanish scholar and antiquary.* A short time before this was written, however, to the credit of Germany be it said, that justice had at length been begun to be done to Calderon in that country. Not only by the translation and criticisms to which we have alluded, but by the compact and elegant edition of the "Comedias," published at Leipsic, in 4 volumes, (1827—1830).† To desire that any thing would be done for Calderon at all comparable to what the Italians have done for Dante, the English for Shakspeare, and the Germans for both, would be extravagant and unnecessary; but, it is certainly not too much to ask and expect from Spain, that it will give to the world such an edition of her greatest dramatist as will be creditable to herself, as well as to him, and which will not deter foreign readers from entering on the study of his works.

Don Pedro Calderon de la Barca was born in Madrid, at the beginning of the year 1600, and was baptized on the 14th of February, in that city. It may not be uninteresting to recollect, for a moment, a few of the illustrious and celebrated men who were then living; or who had just died. Spencer had died the preceding year (1599); Tasso, four years earlier (1595). But Shakspeare and Cervantes, Lord Bacon, and Lope de Vega, were all living;‡ and along with these, Corneille, Moliere, Racine, Fletcher, and Massinger, were his cotemporaries for many years, so that most of the really great dramatists, who have appeared in the world since the days of Sophocles, were all living at the one time, and, with one or two exceptions, could have met together in one room.§ Of the four men first mentioned, the latest of whom, Calderon, survived more than half a century; of whom the fewest minute particulars are known (with the exception of Shakspeare,) is Calderon. Why this is so is unaccountable.—Born of a noble family, and living for more than fifty years (from 1628 to 1681, when he died,) at the court of Madrid—the favourite of Phillip IV., and of his successor, Charles II.,—the pride and admiration of the Spanish nation, and, even in his life time, possessed of an European celebrity: one would imagine that almost every circumstance connected with him would be fully and accurately known, and yet, the facts of his life are almost as meagre as those of Shakspeare's. We know the place and time of his birth—of his serving in the army in Italy and Flanders—of his long residence at the Spanish court—of his pouring out, in such brilliant profusion, his comedies and tragedies until 1652, when he entered into holy orders,|| after which time he only wrote his Autos Sacramentales,¶ and more religious plays—and of his dying at the patriarchal age of 81 years, honoured and lamented by all Spain. But what sort of a man he was, his disposition, his studies, his amusements, his conversation, his friends, the strength and weakness of his character, the point of view in which he regarded the events of his own, or the history of past times; of these, except what we can guess at from his own writings, we are as ignorant as if he had never been born.

From the very few plays of Calderon which the present writer has been yet able to read, he feels that he is not in a position to speak with the slightest degree of authority on the subject, or indeed to come to any decision that is tolerably satisfactory to himself; yet his present opinion is, that if our notions of dramatic art be correct, and our admiration of Shakspeare well founded, Schlegel's estimate of Calderon, as a dramatist, is much too high. In that respect, and even as a profound thinker, it appears to him that he must be placed far, very far indeed, below Shakspeare. In fact, though the dramas of Spain and England have been often compared, and are said to resemble each other, nothing can be more different. In wildness of imagination and splendour of poetry, in the change of place, and total disregard of all the "unities," there is much in common, but here the resemblance ends. In the English theatre, the characters are always the representatives of individuals; in the Spanish of classes: the man is everything on the English stage—on the Spanish, he is nothing. In the former, we look on the actors in the drama as beings of a kindred nature with our own; in the latter, as merely personifications of the virtues or vices to be represented. In Shakspeare the characters are flesh and blood; where none are so monstrously wicked as not to be relieved by an occasional ray of a better nature; and none so sterling as not to exhibit a little of the common alloy of humanity. In Calderon, they are cast in an inflexible mould of virtue or of vice, and preserve their golden or iron rigidity to the last. Shakspeare's figures have the warmth and colouring of the canvass; Calderon's, the fixed and colder outline of the marble. In the one, we have the incalculable vicissitudes of life; in the other, the inevitable certainty of fate. In Calderon it is ever the constant sunshine or the unbroken gloom of his climate; in Shakspeare, the dark and bright—the smiles and tears of our own. In fact, both are admirable of their kind, but both formed on totally different principles of dramatic propriety, and we

* Blackwood's Magazine, Dec. 1839. In the 17th, 18th, 20th, and 47th vols. of Blackwood the following plays of Calderon are analysed and partly translated with considerable spirit:—"Agradecer y no Amar," (Courtesy and not Love) vol. 17. "La Devocion de la Cruz," (The Devotion of the Cross) vol. 18. "El Maestro De Danzar," (The Dancing Master) vol. 20. "La Dama Duende," (The Goblin Lady) vol. 47. In addition to these, the only other play of which we have seen any English translation is "El Magico Prodigioso," (The Wonderful Magician). Shelley translated some scenes from it with great power and beauty; they are given in his works. Some other scenes from the same play have also been translated by another writer. In the Monthly Chronicle, vol. 6. In the 96th vol. of the Monthly Magazine "La Vida es Sueno" (Life is a Dream) has been translated by Mr. Oxenford. It is praised in one of Knight's Monthly Volumes (The Spanish Drama, by G. H. Lewes), but we have not seen it. The only French translation of Calderon of which we have heard, is that by M. Damas Hinard, (Paris, 1844). In Germany there are several translations, of which the best are by Schlegel, Gries, and Malsburg. In Italy, we have not heard of any, but we have made no inquiries or searches on the subject.

† It is from this edition that the present writer has translated "The Purgatory." The editor (Keil) only undertook to give a more correct text than is to be met with in the Spanish editions. This, we believe, he has done; but except in this particular (a very important one no doubt), and in a clearer type, this edition is equally, if not more unsatisfactory than the original, if the latter has, as it would appear by the writer in Blackwood to have, the date of the representation of each play. In the Leipsic edition this is not given in a single instance, and there is not a note from beginning to end. The editor Keil, in his preface to the fourth volume, promised to give a fifth, which would contain one of the missing plays, copious notes, and various readings, as well as an account of the sources whence Calderon drew the materials of such of his plots as he did not invent. This volume we have never seen, nor do we know even if it has been yet published.

‡ Shakspeare and Cervantes died in 1616, not on the one day, as is generally supposed, the former surviving the latter twelveways. Bacon died in 1626, and Lope de Vega in 1635. So that Calderon survived Shakspeare and Cervantes 71 years, Bacon 61 years, and Lope de Vega 52 years; he himself having died in 1681, in his 81st year. Fletcher died in 1625, Massinger, 1640; Moliere, 1673; Corneille, 1684, and Racine, 1699.

§ Neither Moliere nor Racine could have met either Shakspeare or Cervantes, nor Racine Lord Bacon; but Calderon could have met and conversed with all.

|| Lope de Vega was also a soldier and a priest. He became a brother of the order of St. Francis; as a soldier he served both in Portugal and Spain. Cervantes, as is well known, was likewise a soldier, and lost his left hand at the battle of Lepanto.

¶ Short allegorical plays on religious subjects, generally in one act; they are not included in the Leipsic edition. In the Madrid edition of Calderon, the plays, or "Comedias," fill eleven or twelve Spanish quarto volumes, and the Autos six additional volumes of the same size.

 There is a fine portrait of Calderon in the Leipsic edition it is copied from the original engraving to be met with in most of the old copies. In the modern print the face is greatly improved, and spiritualized; but in both, the forehead is wonderfully high, nearly as much so as that of Shakspeare in the Chandos and other pictures.

can relish and admire the one without considering the other totally worthless. Shakspeare possessed higher qualities, and was, unquestionably, the greater man; Calderon possessed qualities in which the other was deficient, and was, perhaps, not an inferior poet. In the worship of external nature, the Englishman is cold compared with the Spaniard; in the revelations of her mysteries and the inward workings of her soul, the latter is but a child compared to the former. Shakspeare invented characters, but no plot; Calderon invented plots, but no character. The one was fertile in delineation, the other in invention. In a word, we should never end if we were to describe all in which they excelled, and all in which they differed from each other; and we shall conclude this comparison by warmly recommending the lesser known poet to the attention of the reader. The other needeth no recommendation from us.

Frederick Schlegel has, however, based the superiority of Calderon on a surer and higher basis than his brother—namely, on the religious tendency and more obvious and safer morality of his writings. “Shakspeare,” he says, “has the fault of too often placing before our eyes, in all its mystery and perplexity, the riddle of life, without giving us any hint of the solution;” while in Calderon, “the enigma of life is not barely expressed, but solved;” that he uniformly “makes spiritual purification the result of external sorrow;” that in him “everything is conceived in this spirit of Christian love and purification,—everything seen in its light and clothed in the splendour of its heavenly colouring.”* This is the highest praise; and if, in addition to this, we recollect that in the whole of Calderon (and, indeed, in the entire Spanish drama) there is scarcely one loose or improper allusion, and certainly not one scene which the strictest censor would exclude for immorality, we will perceive how immeasurably superior, on these points, he is even to the purest of the old English dramatists. There is a high and healthy morality in Shakspeare, but it is rather inferential or consequential, than apparent or intentional, and is that morality which the contemplation of the world teaches to the thinking and observant mind. With him, it is the wisdom of experience—with Calderon, the wisdom of the gospel. In the one, the business of the plot seems to be the business of life—in the other, the real end and object of our existence are never forgotten, but shine out clearly and steadily, like a star, through the passions and perplexities of the plot. Shakspeare does not seem to give himself much concern, but lets the play be played out, and the world wag as it will; Calderon never omits an opportunity of making it and the “players” better, by inculcating the duties of morality and religion, thinking, no doubt, with worthy George Herbert, that

Both dramatists are philosophers, but one is of the porch and the other of the pulpit.

In our next number we shall commence our translation of the “Purgatorio de San Patricio.” In the present, we shall take leave of Calderon in the following beautiful and celebrated passage from Augustus William Schlegel:—

“The mind of Calderon, however, is most distinctly expressed in the pieces on religious subjects. Love he paints merely in its most general features; he but speaks her technical poetical language. Religion is his peculiar love—the heart of his heart. For religion alone he excites the most overpowering emotions, which penetrate into the inmost recesses of the soul. He did not wish, it would seem, to do the same for mere worldly events. However turbid they may appear in themselves, to him, such is the religious medium through which he views them, they are all cleared up perfectly bright. Blessed man! he had escaped from the wild labyrinths of doubt into the strongholds of belief; from whence, with undisturbed tranquillity of soul, he beheld and pour-trayed the storms of the world: to him human life was no longer a dark riddle. Even his tears reflect the image of heaven, like dew-drops on a flower in the sun. His poetry, whatever its apparent object, is a never-ending hymn of joy on the majesty of the creation: he celebrates the productions of nature and human art with an astonishment always joyful and always new—as if he saw them, for the first time, in an unworn festal splendour. It is the first awakening of Adam, and an eloquence withal, a skill of expression, and a thorough insight into the most mysterious affinities of nature, such as high mental culture and mature contemplation can alone bestow. When he compares the most remote objects, the greatest and the smallest stars and flowers, the sense of all his metaphors is the mutual attraction subsisting between created things by virtue of their common origin—and this delightful harmony and unity of the world again is merely a refulgence of the eternal all-embracing love.”†

A SHORT

History of the Irish Franciscans.*

By FATHER HUGH WARD, originator of the ANNALS of the FOUR MASTERS.—(From an original MS.)

THE MS. of which this translation is now presented to the reader, exists in the archives of the College of the Irish Franciscans (St. Isidore) in Rome, among a number of other most valuable materials for

* The order of the Friars Minors, or Franciscans, was established by St. Francis of Assisi, in the 13th century. The holy founder seeing the deplorable state of the church in that age, attacked by enemies without, and betrayed by her unfaithful children, conceived the extraordinary design of founding an order of men, whose duty it would be to go forth through the entire world, preaching the doctrine of Christ by word and example, and exhibiting in their own persons the poverty and humility of the Gospel. He wrote a rule admirably adapted for the purpose, which was confirmed by Pope Honorius III., in 1223. It is entirely founded on the Gospel, and the spirit of it is the most ardent charity, the most profound humility, the most evangelical poverty. This was the great event of the age. Thousands flocked from all nations to embrace the humble state of the Franciscans. The church of God, which typified by the Lateran basilic, the Pope in a dream thought he saw faulting, recovered new strength as it were—and in gratitude for the services rendered by St. Francis and his children, the third collect said at the Mass on the consecration of the Pope, is that in honour of the saint. In a few years, every country where Christianity had penetrated, was covered with Franciscan Convents. When America was discovered, the Franciscans accompanied the first conquerors; and from Newfoundland to Cape Horn, and round to California, the capes and rivers, and bays of the New World, bear the name of the humble St. Francis, “the Seraphic Patriarch” of the middle ages. Like all human institutions, however, the order lost its first splendour, and a spirit of secular aggrandizement obscured the humility of the poor Friars Minors—hence arose the distinction between Conventuals and Observantines. The most zealous and numerous portion of the order selected convents apart, when the rule was observed in all its purity: the other convents by degrees adopted the strict observance, likewise renounced their property, and threw themselves on the charity of the people they served; hence the reader will so frequently see that such a convent was reformed in such a year. Leo X. divided the order into two great branches, the Conventuals, who profess the rule modified, and the Observantines, who follow it as far as circumstances will allow, to the letter. The province of Ireland finally adopted the reformation, and its title has been since “Provincia Hiberniæ Strictioris Observantiæ.” The Franciscans then were usually called in these countries Grey Friars, from the ancient colours of their habits—and minors, or friars of the observance. They correspond to the Recollects in France and the low countries.

the ecclesiastical and civil history of Ireland. It was written about the year 1630, certainly not later than 1633, and was transferred from the College of St. Anthony of Padua, in Louvain, to Rome, with many other remarkable documents collected in that house by the Irish Franciscans of the seventeenth century. The author was Father Francis Ward; and I believe that there is little doubt that he is the famous Hugh Ward, the guardian of St. Anthony's, at whose instigation Michael O'Clery, one of his Community, commenced the compilation of the "Annals of the Four Masters." All acquainted with the peculiarities of conventual life can easily account for the variation of the name. It is a general custom among Religious to assume a name at their profession, by which they are known in the convent, and which they sign to all conventual acts, though among their friends in general they are still called by their baptismal name. It is also usual to assume the name of some saint of their order, if not of their founder; and nothing was more natural than for Hugh Ward to become Father Francis Ward, and to sign his name to the manuscript as Fr. Franciscus Wardeus. What makes this more probable is, that John Peter M'Cormac, who arranged and noted the collegiate manuscripts in 1752, says, "Superiora illa verba Fr. Franciscus Wardeus, P. Hugonis Vardei aliquando Collegii Guardiani ibidemque egregii antiquarii characterem omnino referunt uti patebit conferenti cum ipsius, scriptura in multiplicibus schedulis scriptis ab eodem guardiano in archivo remanentibus." The identity of the handwriting is, I imagine, a proof almost amounting to a certainty that Father Hugh Ward is the compiler of the manuscript. It is only a brief outline of a greater work projected by him, had not death snatched him away in 1635, and which is now for the first time translated and published. He was a most indefatigable antiquary: he collected most valuable materials for Irish history in the libraries of France; and he not only published several learned works in Louvain, but left a large mass of materials which the learned Colgan, a member of the same house and order, afterwards turned to good account when writing his great work, the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," the Lives of the Irish Saints. Any fragment from such a man must be valuable; and even though it may not have been compiled by himself, still, as at all events it was written in St. Anthony's, under his direction, and while he was guardian of the convent, we may depend on its authenticity. There are few portions of Irish History more interesting than these relating to the Franciscan Order, especially during the seventeenth century; and we often regretted that the task of writing it had not been taken up by some competent person. The children of St. Francis were then as remarkable for their learning abroad, as for their zeal in the service of religion at home. The poor friars of the convent of St. Anthony in Louvain, alone straitened as they were for means, have done more for the preservation and publication of Irish records, secular and ecclesiastical, than many academies cheered by all the sunshine of royal patronage. The Lives of the Irish Saints by Colgan, and the Annals of the Four Masters by the O'Clerys, would be sufficient to entitle the body to the gratitude of every Irishman who venerates his country. A few explanatory notes are added to the translation, which will be of use to those unacquainted with monastic peculiarities, and which we consider necessary for the elucidation of the text.

A SUCCINCT SYNOPSIS OF THE PROVINCE OF IRELAND, OF THE FRIARS MINORS, OF THE REGULAR OBSERVANCE.*

Of the number and foundations of the Convents.

In order properly to understand the state of the province, it is necessary to know that the kingdom is divided into different provinces or regions, to wit: Leinster, Ulster, the Munsters, and Meath, and that those provinces are subdivided into thirty-six Episcopal Sees, four of which are Archbishoprics, and thirty-two Bishoprics (though in ancient times there were many more), and this is the order they are placed in:

I. The Archbishopric of Armagh in Ulster: the Archbishop is Primate of all Ireland, and has ten suffragans—1, Down; 2, Connor, united Sees; 3, Derry; 4, Clogher; 5, Ardagh; 6, Raphoe; 7, Kilmore; 8, Dromore; 9, Meath; 10, Cluan or Clonmacnois.

II. The Archbishop of Dublin, in Leinster, has five suffragans—1, Glendalough, united to the Metropolitan See; 2, Ossory; 3, Kildare; 4, Ferns; 5, Leighlin.

III. The Archbishop of Cashel, in Munster, has ten suffragans—1, Waterford; 2, Lismore; 3, Cork; 4, Cloyne; 5, Limerick; 6, Killaloe; 7, Ross; 8, Ardfer; 9, Emly; 10, Kilfenora.

IV. The Archbishop of Tuam, in Connaught, has seven suffragans—1, Enaghdown, united to the Metropolitan See; 2, Mayo; 3, Elphin; 4, Cluanfert; 5, Killala; 6, Achonry; 7, Kilmacduagh.

Though it is supposed by some, that the Friars Minors first arrived in Ireland in the year 1232, still those who record that event to have taken place in 1214 are nearer the truth. Father Anthony Daça, in the first part of his Chronicles, is of this opinion, and the constant tradition, and the subsequent foundation of several convents bear him out. Father Francis Gonzaga, in his description of this province says, that one of the companions of St. Francis came from the city of Compostella in Spain, to Ireland, and laid the foundation of this province by establishing some convents; and that this took place in the same year as the foundation of the convent of Compostella, which was in 1214, as

* As the order of St. Francis was extended over the whole world, it was necessary for its government to make certain divisions into families, nations, provinces, and custodies. The whole order is governed by a general, who is elected every six years. It was next divided into two great families, the Cismontain and Ultramontain; these were subdivided into nations, and then again into provinces and custodies. The Cismontain family contained three nations—the Lombardic, the Sicilian and the Ultramarine. It embraced all the countries of the Levant, Turkey, Greece, Syria, &c., as well as Italy. The Ultramontain family was likewise divided into three nations, the Gallic, the Spanish, and the Germano-Belgic. It comprised all north of the Alps, and consisted of more than eighty-seven provinces, of which Ireland was the sixteenth, and which were scattered from Cochin China to Chili, from Norway to California. The families were governed by vicars-general, and the nations by commissary generals, and there was a commissary general for the Indias (America) likewise. The provinces were governed by provincials, and the convents by guardians. The province of Ireland belonged to the Germano-Belgic family, but it was frequently attached to the Spanish for a time. Even in the present reduced state of the Franciscan order, there are several thousand convents, it is supposed, scattered over the world. Custodies were small provinces, such as is the Custody of the Holy Land at the present day; but the division of provinces into custodies exists no longer. One custos is elected for each province, whose duty it is to attend the general chapter of the order, and vote at the election of a general.

the Annals of the Order, AN. 1214 (n. 6 and 11), and AN. 1260 (n. 19), certify. The province soon increased so rapidly that, in the year 1260, in a general chapter held in Narbonne, at which St. Bonaventure presided, it was divided into five Custodies: first, Dublin; second, Cashel; third, Cork; fourth, Drogheda; fifth Nenagh. Pisanus and other ancient writers distribute the convents then founded, to the different Custodies, in the following order—the Custody of Dublin, in Leinster, had seven convents—Dublin, Kildare, Cluan, Castle Dermot, Wicklow, and Wexford.

The Custody of Cashel in Munster, had six convents. Cashel, Kilkenny, Youghal, Ross, Waterford, and Clonmel.

The Custody of Cork, in Munster, had five convents—Cork, Ardfert, Buttevant, Limerick, and Timoleague.

The Custody of Drogheda, in Ulster, had six convents—Drogheda, Trim, Dundalk, Multifarnam, Down, Carrickfergus.

The Custody of Nenagh had eight convents—Nenagh, Clare (Galway), Galway, Anaghdown, Armagh, Athlone,* Kinalcophin, or as ancient writers called it, Loughlin.

Besides these thirty-two convents, more were built in the course of time, till the number amounted to fifty-nine; and there were also three colleges beyond the seas.† We will state what we know regarding their foundation, and the little we could glean from what has escaped destruction by heresy and persecution.

I. YOUGHAL.—The convent of Youghal which was called the Mother of the Province, was built in the maritime town of Youghal, in the diocese of Cloyne in Munster, in the year 1224, and was formerly placed in the custody of Cashel; it was transferred to the Reformed Observants in the year 1460, which is said to be the year in which the Reformation itself was established in this province. In the year 1583, it was destroyed and depopulated, some of the friars having been taken and put to death by the English Protestants. It remained desolate till the year 1627, when a residence was built in the town, under the provincialate of Father Francis Matthew;‡ and Father Francis Mede, a theologian and preacher, was appointed superior. The first founder of the convent was Maurice Fitzgerald (from whom sprung the Earls of Kildare and Desmond, the Barons of Lixnaw, and several other most noble families). He was for many years Lord Justiciary of Ireland, and headed an army against the Scots, in aid of the king of England. The war being victoriously concluded, he returned home, distributed his possessions to his children, and became a Francis-

* A Vatican manuscript gives Athlone, though other ancient manuscripts omit it.

† A fourth College, that of Boulais in France, was subsequently founded, and was suppressed at the French revolution. I find by the subsequent chapter bills, that the number was 65.

‡ “A.D. 1625. Father Francis Matthew, professed in the College of St. Anthony of Louvain, was, while guardian of Cork, elected vicar provincial on the death of Nicholas Shea. After governing the province a year and a-half, a chapter being summoned in 1625, he was elected provincial; and his three years of office being finished, he was, in 1629 in the chapter of Limerick, appointed guardian of St. Anthony's, of Louvain, having laudably governed the province four years and a-half.”—MS. St. Isidori. This F. Matthew was born in Cork, and was an eminent canonist; he wrote some works under the name of Edmundus Ursulanus. He was put to death for the faith, in Cork, in the year 1644. The MS. from which the above notice was taken, gives no account of his death as it concludes in 1632. It was to oppose his Examen Juridicum that Paul Harris wrote the work Arktomatrix, a whip for the bear, (Ursulanus).

can friar. He lived till the year 1257, distinguished for profound humility and holiness of life, and died and was buried in the convent. There are, from ancient times, the tombs of the Earls of Desmond, the Lords of Desies, and several other nobles of the same family and country; as also of several citizens of Youghal. At the right-hand side of the altar in the convent, a certain friar is buried, whose tomb is illustrated by miracles; and also another friar, put to death by the heretics, lies buried in the same place. Provincial chapters were held here in 1300 and 1313.

II. CORK.—The convent of Cork, called also the Monastery of the Blessed Virgin Mary, of Shandon, was founded in the episcopal city of Cork, in Munster, in the year 1214, and built in the year 1229. Father Wadding says that this was on account of the strict observance of regular life, and the piety of the brethren, formerly called the “Mirror of all Ireland.” It was erected into a Custody in the year 1260, in the general chapter of Narbonne. It passed to the friars of the Reformed Observance previous to the year 1500, and remained in their possession till the year 1540, when heresy and persecution began to rage, and it was the first convent in all Ireland that was suppressed by the heretics. It remained desolate till the year 1609, when, under the provincialate of Father Maurice Ultan,§ a residence was erected in that city, and Father William Farris was appointed guardian; and from that to this the friars labour with great fruit for the salvation of the faithful and the conversion of the heretics. The first founder of the convent was Dermot M'Carthy More, called Dondraynean, king of the people of Munster; and some provincial kings of his kindred were buried there, in the habit of the Friars Minors. The most powerful family of the M'Carthy's also established a sepulchre for themselves in that convent, until becoming divided into several noble families, each built convents for themselves. Besides the tombs of the M'Carthy's, and of fourteen knights of Mora, the families of the Barrys, and the chief nobles and citizens of that country, are buried there. Philip Prendergast, the treasurer of King John of England, who was one of the greatest benefactors to this house, is also buried there.¶ I find that a chapter was held there in 1244, 1288, 1521, 1533.¶

III. ATHLONE.—The Convent of Athlone, in the diocese of Meath, was built on the bank of the Shannon, in Meath, in the year 1224, and its church was consecrated in 1241, by the Primate of Ireland, a native of Germany. It was formerly placed in the Custody of Nenagh, and was transferred to the Observants, under the provincialate of Father Walter M'Wadh, in the year 1518.†† It was destroyed by the English Protestants in the tenth year of Queen Elizabeth, and remained uninhabited till the year 1626, when Father

§ A.D. 1609 Father Maurice Ultan was elected provincial in a provincial chapter, held this year in a wood near Roscrea, on account of the dread of persecution. He worthily governed the province for three years, and was subsequently visitator of the province in 1626.—MS. St. Isidori.

¶ By many he is supposed to have been the founder. A curious charter of his to the convent will be found in Wadding.

¶ A Franciscan convent known as “Broad Lane Convent,” exists in Cork to the present day.

 Now in the diocese of Ardagh.

†† This must have taken place in 1567, for the provincial in 1518 was William O'Machrain. “A.D. 1567, Father Walter Mac Waid, a most eloquent preacher, and man of most religious life, and profoundly versed in Canon Law, was made provincial for three years. MS. St. Isidori.”

Francis Matthew being provincial, a residence was erected in the vicinity, and John Anthony Geoghegan, a theologian and preacher, was appointed superior. The first founder of this convent was Charles O'Connor of the Red Hand, King of Connaught.* During his life time, the house was enlarged by the most noble family of the Dillons, which is now divided into the Earl of Roscommon, Viscount Dillon, and other families. O'Connor by some is said to be buried in this convent.†

IV. CARRICKFERGUS.—The Convent of Carrickfergus was founded in the maritime city of that name, in the diocese of Connor, in Ulster, about the time of St. Francis, and was formerly placed in the Custody of Drogheda. It was reformed in the year 1457, at the instance of Neale M'Ardle O'Neill.‡ It was suppressed in the year 1560, the friars having been driven off and dispersed by the heretics, and some of them killed. It was at last totally destroyed by Arthur Chichester, Viceroy of Ireland, and remained vacant till the year 1626, when Father Francis Matthew, being provincial, a residence was erected in the district, and F. Edmond Cana, a theologian and preacher, was appointed superior. The first founder of that convent was Hugh De Lacy, junior, Earl of Ulster, who died in the habit of the Friars Minors, in the year 1253, and was buried there. O'Neill was also buried there as well as many other noblemen of both families of that district.

V. KILKENNY.—The Convent of Kilkenny, in the diocese of Ossory, in Leinster, is built on the bank of the river Nore; but it is doubtful who the founder was. It was built, however, previous to the year 1234, for the annals of the Friars Minors (n. 19) show that Richard Mareschal, Earl of Pembroke, was buried there in that year. About the year 1550, in the reign of Edward VI., the friars were expelled from the convent at the violent instigation of John Bale, the Protestant bishop of Ossory, and the convent was forsaken. They returned to it again in the reign of Mary, in 1553, but were again expelled in 1559, in the reign of Elizabeth. It remained desolate till the year 1612, when a residence was built, and the friars again took up their habitation there, to the great benefit of the Catholics, and of the heretics likewise, many of whom were converted by them. They were placed under the government of Father William O'Kelly, formerly Custos of the province of St. Mary Magdalene in France, and Commissary Visitor of the province of Ireland, who, loaded with years and virtue, slept in the Lord in the year 1627, and was buried in the convent, together with Father Nicholas O'Shea, Provincial of the province. § Chapters were held in this convent in 1626, &c.

* The monastery of St. Francis, at Athlone, was founded by Cathal Croidéarg O'Connor, King of Connaught, in the diocese of Clonmacnois, on the east bank of the Shannon.—Annals of the Four Masters, A.D. 1224.

† The founder was not buried here, but in the Cistercian monastery of Kockmoy. A Franciscan convent still exists in Athlone.

‡ The monastery of the friars at Carrickfergus was founded by consent from Rome, at the request of Niall, the son of Con, son of Hugh Brian O'Neill, for the use of the friars minors observants; and sixteen friars of the community of Donegal took possession of it on the vigil of the festival of first Lady Day in harvest.—Annals of the Four Masters, A.D. 1497.

§ A.D. 1621. Father Nicholas Shea, professed in Spain, was a man of most holy life and conversation, and a preacher. He was made provincial in the chapter of Cashel; and when he had piously governed the province three years, Father Hugh de Burgo, expert of theology, and guardian of St. Anthony's, of Louvain, arriving as Apostolic Visitor, the chapter on account of the delay of the general one, was deferred until the next year. As on ac-

VI. WATERFORD.—The Convent of Waterford was built in the maritime and episcopal city of Waterford, in Munster, on the banks of the river Suir, in the year 1240. It was formerly placed in the custody of Cashel. It passed into the hands of the Observants, in the provincialate of Father David Hurlihy.* Finally, in the reign of Henry VIII., the friars were banished, and it was converted into a poor house. It remained vacant till the year 1612 (though some friars of the order always lived in the city), when a residence was erected, and Father Thomas Wadlog, formerly visitor of the province, was appointed superior; under whose government and that of others, the friars, by continual labour and preaching, assiduously attended to the salvation of the faithful and the conversion of the heretics. Many learned and holy men flourished in this place, among them are to be numbered Brother Nicholas and Brother John of Waterford (de Wainfordia), who Pisanus says were remarkable for miracles. The first founder of this convent was Hugh Purcell, a knight, citizen, and Baron of Carrickmore, whose tomb is there. The tombs of many other noblemen of that city and vicinity are in this monastery likewise. I find that chapters were held there in 1469 and 1615.†

VII. DUBLIN.—The convent of Dublin was built in the archiepiscopal and metropolitan city of Leinster, but it is uncertain who is the founder. It is thought to have been founded about the year 1260, in which it was made the chief convent of the first Custody, by the general chapter of Narbonne. It passed into the hands of the reformed friars about the year 1521, under the provincialate of Father Daniel O'Hurlihy. It was suppressed by order of Henry VIII. in 1543, and sold for secular purposes. It was then pulled down, and very few portions of the building remained, until the year 1615, when Father Daniel Mooney‡ being provincial, a residence was erected in the city, and Father John Preston, a theologian and most excellent preacher, formerly Commissary, Visitor, and Definitor of the province, was appointed superior. Under his government and that of the superiors who followed him, the faith received extraordinary increase in the city and neighbouring country, by the preaching of the friars. Chapters were held there in 1284, 1309.§

count of his infirmity, he could not attend the general chapter, he sent Father Thomas Strange, a lector of theology, and a most celebrated preacher in his place, but he was taken by the Turks on the way. This provincial, wasted away by a tedious sickness, rested in the Lord in the year 1625, having governed the province four years and some months.—MS. St. Isidor.

* A.D. 1521. Father David O'Hiarlaghagh, a great preacher, governed the province with praise, discharging the office of provincial for three years.—MS. St. Isidor.

† A Franciscan convent exists in Waterford, still, in "Lady lane."

‡ Father Donagh Mooney was received to his profession in 1601 by the provincial, Father John Gray, then in prison; he was afterwards driven into exile. He was a man of great genius and learning; and after having taught philosophy and theology in Ireland, he was appointed the first guardian of the College of St. Anthony of Louvain, and afterwards of Drogheda in Ireland. He was an excellent preacher, and a strenuous labourer for the conversion of heretics and the salvation of the faithful. In the year 1615, he was made provincial in Wexford chapter, and governed the province with praise for three years.—MS. St. Isidor.

§ The Catholic Church of St. Nicholas, Francis Street, is now built on the site of the convent. The present Franciscan establishment in Dublin is St. Francis' Merchant's-quay, usually called Adam and Eve, from a sign placed at the entrance of the alley leading from Cook Street, where the chapel was built after the friars were obliged to fly from their convent in Francis-street.

Passages in the Life of Sixtus Quintus.

IN the year of our Lord 1531, Italy witnessed one of the grandest ceremonies recorded on the annals of her history; it was the coronation of Charles V., who received the crown from the hands of Pope Clement VII., in the City of Bologna, on the 24th of February. On that very day, a reverend Father of St. Francis's

Order, who had acquired a provincial reputation for piety and eloquence, rode slowly towards the town of Ascoli, whither he had been sent to preach during the holy time of Lent. His thoughts were occupied with the momentous subjects which were to impress the minds of his auditors, and to contrast the magnificence of heaven, and its never ending glories, with that evanescent pomp and gilded pageant to which the grandees of Spain and Italy had long been hastening. On awaking from a reverie, which had made him indifferent to the scenery through which he passed, the good Father begun to learn that he had ridden in a wrong direction; and on looking about for some one to inform him of the nearest way to the high-road, found himself face to face with a poorly-clad youth, who was in charge of a herd of swine. "Knowest thou the road to Ascoli, young swine-herd?" asked the friar. "Yes, Father, and I will willingly be your guide," was the reply. "Lead on, then, and we will talk as we go." Taking the bridle in his hand, the youth looked wistfully at the Franciscan, as though he envied him the coarse habit which he wore; and the former having conversed for a while with his guide, thought it high time to dismiss him on reaching the high-way. "Thanks, good youth, for thy kindness, return to thy charge, and receive all that I can offer,—my poor blessing." "Nay, Father," said the lad, "the swine will go home at sun-set, and I will follow thee. I rarely meet those with whom I care to converse, and I will not now lose an opportunity so happily given. I would, moreover, unburden my heart to thee, for tis full of strange imaginings." "Speak on, good youth," said the friar, "and bear me company as long as thou wiltest." The good father fixed his eyes on the boy, and being somewhat skilled in physiognomy, thought he saw something remarkable in the features of the rude inhabitant of La Marca. There was a flashing in his quick glance, and a precision in his remarks, which struck him as belonging to a superior intelligence. "Father," continued the swine-herd, "I often weep in secret, and if thou wouldst know the reason, 'tis because I have not the means of acquiring knowledge, while my soul is filled with projects which would not unbecome a king. My parents are poor tillers of the soil; my present occupation suits me not—wilt thou give me books, and inform my young mind? If so, I will ever follow thee, and my life's task will be to evince my gratitude." "Ha! thou lovest books, and wouldst learn," said the astonished friar; "what then, if I provided thee a place in our convent, wouldst thou put on this poor habit, coarser than thine own, conform to our rule, and consecrate thy days to God in sackcloth and virtue?" "Ah! Father," gasped the elated boy, "for blessings such as these I would endure the torments of purgatory." "Come then, my child, henceforth I will be thy patron and thy friend, and before the sun sets thou shalt dwell with the brethren of my order." The Franciscan father was Michael Angelo Selleri, and his guide, Felix Peretti, who was born in the territory of Montalto, in the last days of the Pontificate of Leo X.

Little, then, did the good father think that he was opening life's page for one who was destined to leave the impress of his genius on the monuments of Sesostris and the Cæsars; he could not have imagined that the classic tastes of Leo X. would have been surpassed—for were not Bembo, Raphael, Michael Angelo, and Vida his courtiers? Nor did he dream that within the heart of the rude boy whom he now adopted, were germs of thought and grand conceptions, which, in due time, should astonish the world, and link his name with the great ones of the second Augustan age; but he kept his word, the swine-herd put on the habit of a novice, applied himself to study, and outshone his compeers in every department of knowledge. The young novices who were envious of his superior talents, did not scruple to trifle with the feelings of the quondam swine-herd; many a biting epigram called forth their laughter, while Peretti sought revenge in the evidences of an intellect, which even in his young years won from his masters the most glowing eulogies. The time of his noviciate was the age of great events, nor were the thoughts and meditations of Peretti bounded by the horizon of his convent. Charles V. was thundering against the walls of Tunis, and Henry VIII. of England was flinging off the Pope's supremacy. Clement VII. ordered solemn thanksgiving to be made in all the churches, when he heard that the cross was raised where the crescent had been; and the novice, who was supposed to take little heed of political events, sarcastically observed, that he saw no great good in celebrating the downfall of a kingdom, where the Pope was not respected, and only wondered that his Holiness did not show some real regret for the loss of England, where he had long held potential sway.

Throughout his noviciate he was noted for his proficiency in all the studies which are prescribed for the probationary term, nor was his punctilious discharge of all the duties it involved less conspicuous. The dullard he occasionally slighted, for he hated stupidity; and the influence of the professors was often put in requisition to restrain the ardent impetuosity of a temper, which brooked not an insipid, though well-meant observation. At length, when the time of probation had drawn to its close, Peretti was vested with the habit of a professed, and on this, to him most important day, there came the news of Pope Clement's decease. Events of such importance were ever sure to elicit from him some remark worth recording, and he had scarce risen from the altar where he made his solemn vows, when a friend observed to him, "Brother Felix, thou art born to religion on the same day that the Pope died to the world." "See you, Reverend Father," rejoined the professed, "I am so proud of this habit, that I already fancy myself Pope of Rome." On which the guardian of the convent remarked—"tis out of such heath the best besoms are made."

To those unacquainted with the system adopted in conventual life, tis necessary to observe, that the student does not enter on the theological course till after the noviciate. During the probationary term, brother Felix had to discharge some minor offices, such as sacristan to the Church; but now, that the cowl was on his head, he resolved to apply himself sedulously, to pursuits of a higher, though, perhaps, not holier, order. The Latin tongue was as familiar, to him as the rude idiom of La Marca—the dialectics of Aristotle he knew by heart, and Tully and Demosthenes had schooled him in a rethoric, which, however it might charm his classic tastes, did not possess for him such an abundant store of pathos, invective and imagery as the inspired writings of the apostles and prophets. Canon law, speculative theology, and the books which treat of the duties of the moralist, opened a new field to him; the rapidity with which he acquired a deep knowledge of the abstruse and practical points so necessary for a controvertist, preacher, and confessor, challenged the admiration of his teachers, and raised him far above the level of his fellow-students.

He well knew the great importance of making himself thoroughly acquainted with the controversies which then agitated the world, and have since left their scathing marks on those grand old edifices, which Zuingle and Œcolampadius had been undermining while he was yet an infant. Every moment he could snatch from the duties of the Church and choir was devoted to reading the works of the Fathers and the scholastic productions of St. Thomas Aquinas, and other great men of the middle ages. Disputations were then frequent amongst students, and the youthful Peretti successfully contested the palm with the aspirants of his own and St. Dominick's order. Envy him as his rivals might, he was pronounced, by the auditors and professors who attended the public theses, as gifted with a master mind, far surpassing, in quickness of reply, strength of argument, and witty retort, every antagonist in the learned lists. Nor did he altogether abandon himself to the study of the rigid doctrines of the schoolmen, for, we have reason to believe, from the metrical fragments which his biographers present to us, that he occasionally sported with the muse—but it was the muse of Ther-sites. Removed from one convent to another, he succeeded in commanding the respect of his superiors, and establishing for himself a character of austere morality and punctilious observance of conventual life. In his time, it was customary to exercise the aspirants to the order of priesthood, in preaching before their respective communities, and the fame which Peretti won for himself, as a theologian, was, in every respect, equalled by his fluency and grace as a pulpit orator. The vices of his age furnished ample subject for his invectives; and, from the very first moment that he addressed his brethren, ex-Cathedra, he gave manifest proof of his anxiety to keep alive that sacred fire which Luther laboured to extinguish in the world. At length, the consummation of all his wishes was to be realized, and the young Peretti received his priestly ordination, in the city of Urbino, in the year of our Lord, 1545. The name which he now assumed was that of the territory in which he was born, and, with something like a foresight of the celebrity which, in after years, he was destined to attain, "Montalto" sounded most pleasing to his ears—as being associated with recollections and occupations which, viewing them from this point of time, contrast strangely with the career and reputation of so remarkable a man. The selection was a wise one, and fraught with meaning, for who could address Father Montalto without reminding him of the inscrutable ways of God, "who raises up the needy from the earth, and lifts up the poor out of the dung-hill?"

In the year following that of Montalto's ordination, Luther died, and the evil spirits he had evoked were, everywhere, striking at the foundations of the Church. Ambition was born in the heart of the quondam swine-herd, and tis likely enough that he dreamed of triumphing over the enemies of the Holy See: if he failed, however, in prostrating the machinations of the reformers, there was still open to him a great field for splendid enterprise—and the history of his transactions convinces us, that in the silence of the cloister he meditated those great designs, which have won for him such a glorious name. The emperor, Charles V., was then as much hated in Italy as the Austrian is at the present hour;—the people groaning under the weight of an alien dominion, longed to fling off the yoke, and only waited for some leader to march them against their oppressors; but the time had not come, and their energies were hoarded to stand between the Papal throne and the fanatical masses who threatened to cross the Alps and trample the Vatican and Tiara in the ruins of Rome. The Pope supplied Charles with a contingent, and appointed Octavian Farnese to command the Italian troops who were to fight the Lutherans on their own soil. Montalto sought a chaplaincy to this force—he was disappointed, and his unsuccessful application gave another direction to his thoughts. For many years after his ordination we read of him only as a preacher who went about, from town to town, denouncing the iniquities of people and princes, and occasionally courting popular applause by many a spirit-stirring allusion to the evils which the Spaniards were inflicting on Italy. The vices of the reformers were his constant theme, and he did not hesitate to denounce the rebellion of Henry of England, when Pope Julius ordered public prayers to be offered invoking God's arm to stay the torrent of infidelity which swept over the soil of England. In the year 1552, Montalto was appointed to preach against the innovations of Luther and Henry VIII. Father Ghislieri, afterwards Pius V., and some cardinals went to hear him, and, much as they might have expected from one of his reputation, they were more than surprised at the depth of his reasoning—the fire of his invective, and the impassioned eloquence with which he vindicated the doctrines of the Holy See. The text which he took, on this occasion, was the verse of the Psalm which speaks of the vain efforts of persecutors to overthrow Christ and his Church: "The kings of the earth stood up, and the princes met together, against the Lord and against his Christ." The vehement discourse of the friar unmasked the hypocrisy of Henry—nor did he spare Charles of Spain, to whose apathy he attributed many of the evils which had resulted from the teaching of the reformers. His cutting remarks procured him the anger of the Spanish ambassador, and the preacher had to yield to stern necessity when apologising for the warmth with which he inveighed against the emperor. The sermon, however, made him a name, and thenceforth the road from the pulpit led to the throne of the Papacy. Ghislieri became his friend and patron, and, when raised to the dignity of cardinal by Paul IV., in the year 1557, left nothing untried to convince Montalto of his esteem and regard. Every office which Ghislieri could command was now within reach of the far-famed Franciscan. The following year he was appointed inquisitor of Venice. The history of his transactions, during his residence in the city of St. Mark, readily teaches us, that he employed every interval in storing his mind with a knowledge of the great political events of the period. The princes of the republic seemed not to relish the peremptory mandates of the friar, and his imputed arrogance gave cause for apprehending serious differences between the Doge and the Holy See. Montalto, however, was not to be driven from his course, and, in reply to some severe observations reflecting on his conduct, boldly pronounced, that he cared little for the enmity of a hundred crowned heads. Recalled from Venice to Rome, he gladly left the scene of his first appointment, and blessed the day that saw him, a simple friar, amid the ruins of the city of the Cæsars. From this moment, hope, like a fixed star, shone steadily before him. His prudence, piety, and austerity, made him a great name among the religious orders; and the pope and cardinals held him in the highest esteem. Promoted to the dignity of regent of his order, he proceeded to Naples, where he preached during the lent, and won the applause of all who heard him. Returning to Rome, he found letters from a friend, who was interested in the concerns of his family, advertising him that his sister, Camilla, was about to be married to "Master Andrea," who exercised the trade of a carpenter in his native hamlet. Nothing can exceed the tenderness which characterised his reply:—"I am poor, and in labours ever since my youth," wrote he; "silver and gold I have not, but what I have I give—my blessing. For my own part, I must ever be mindful of my former condition, for has not God raised me up from the mud to minister on the golden throne of his altar? Nevertheless, dear friend, the cardinal protector has given me some alms, which I now forward to you for the benefit of my family. Of the seventy dollars which I send, give ten to my mother to provide for the festivity of the espousals, and the remaining sixty you will bestow on Camilla as her marriage portion. Who knows but heaven will, one day, enable me to do more?"

About this time, Mary was endeavouring to restore Catholicity in England, and Pope Julius was moved to send Montalto, in the capacity of Theologian, to Cardinal Pole, who was named Legate a latere to the English court. A prince of the Colonna family had influence enough to set aside the arrangement, for he wished to retain Montalto as his private tutor; the duties of preceptor were learnedly discharged, and much to the satisfaction of the young ecclesiastic. Soon afterwards Montalto proceeded on various missions through the Papal territories, and had the consolation of sitting down beneath the humble roof of his parents, which he sportively described as really "illustrious;" "for," quoth he, "the sun of heaven shone brightly through its ill-tiled roof and chinky walls." On the death of Pius IV., Ghislieri succeeded to the chair of St. Peter, and was proclaimed in the conclave on the 7th of January, 1566. The new Pope took the title of Pius V. The news of his elevation came agreeably to Montalto, who now began to think that the papacy might be one day within his reach. Pius, by whom he was loved and admired, immediately raised him to the dignity of general of the order; and about the end of the year 1568, consecrated him bishop of St. Agatha. Eight days after his inauguration, news was brought him that his aged father had passed out of this world. The newly-consecrated bishop wept bitterly, and then remarked: "My parent died a natural death; but, verily, had he lived to witness this, the joy of seeing a mitre on my head, must have caused his sudden dissolution." At this time Elizabeth was inflicting, on the Catholics of this country, that terrible persecution which, thanks to our modern Irish literature, is well known to those who make a study of our history; and Philip of Spain laboured to impress on Pius V., the necessity of stigmatizing the English Queen, by some mark which would render her odious in the eyes of the Catholic potentates of Europe. The Pontiff yielding to his importunities, resolved on excommunicating the arch enemy of his spiritual children. The king of Spain wrote to congratulate Montalto on his elevation—and the Pope charged him to draw the formal excommunication which was fulminated against Elizabeth, on the 25th of February, 1569. The Pope had now made up his mind to retain Monsignore Montalto near his person, and a vicar was appointed to administer the affairs of the diocese. The mitre had not been many hours on the head of Montalto, when he gave intimation to his clergy of his resolve to correct abuses, and enforce the rigid observance of discipline in the secular and regular orders. The pastoral which he published, gave all to understand that he would not deal lightly with those who contravened his will. The tolerance of his predecessor he named negligence, and his forbearance lack of zeal. The want of the proper acquirements in those who aspired to the priesthood, furnished him with powerful invectives against the illiterate idlers of his diocese; and he gave all whom it might concern to know, that he preferred a few priests, well read, to a legion who had not given their hearts and souls to study. Many shook their heads when this document was perused, and could have wished that Montalto had not been raised to the hierarchy; but there were others who rejoiced at the advancement of one who, with a strong hand, determined to pluck up the weeds without injuring the goodly seed that was destined to multiply a hundred fold.

Nor was the episcopal dignity the only one which Pius resolved to confer on Montalto: he only sought some grand occasion for bestowing the purple on his protegee. He had not long to wait, for the year 1570 saw Cosmo de Medici proclaimed Grand Duke of Tuscany, and there also came news that the spiritual Empire of the Pope was adding to its conquests in India. It was enough to console the heart of the Pontiff, and cause him in some measure to forget the losses of the church in the west, while its territories were being extended in the far off East. Amongst the many selected for the honors of the cardinalate, there was none more esteemed by his Holiness than the Franciscan bishop, and Montalto was accordingly promoted to the Sacred College. Henceforth he became the unwearied assistant of Pope Pius, in the many and important concerns which then engaged the Christian world. Ecclesiastical immunities occupied the attention of his Holiness, and the celebrated bull "Cœna Domini" was drawn up by Cardinal Montalto, and approved by the consistory. Philip II. was then engaged in offensive and defensive wars: the Turks had a fleet upon the seas, and Don John of Austria, and the republic of Venice, had leagued to crush their power. The Holy See, anxious for the overthrow of those whom she so much dreaded, took an anxious concern in a war which threatened to ruin the civilization of the west: in all these matters, no opinion was deemed of greater moment than Montalto's, and if great projects were not realized, the failure is attributable to other causes than the apathy or inactivity of the Pope and his advisers. Pius V. died in the year 1572, and was succeeded by Gregory XIII. Cardinal Montalto did not enjoy the confidence of the new Pontiff to the same extent as that of his predecessor, and retired from the cares of the court to the seclusion of his study, where he employed himself in producing a new edition of the Scriptures, and the ponderous works of St. Ambrose. Devoting himself to literature, he had resolved to hide himself from the world, and thus contradict the rumours which industriously circulated that he dreamed of one day becoming Pope. However specious such a refutation might appear, it is nevertheless certain that he cherished the hope of succeeding to the Tiara; and it is probable, that in the silence of his retirement, he made himself conversant with the great political movements of Europe, and the minor details of that State which he was destined to reform.

Gregory had not been well on the throne, when news came of the massacres of St. Bartholomew, and no matter how bitterly the Pontiff might mourn over the atrocities of the political fanatics of France, he had as good reason to lament the anarchy and bloodshed which prevailed in his own dominions, by reason of a fatal, though well-meant clemency. A heart of iron was needed, and Gregory XIII. was the last man in the world who could lay the axe to the root of such crying evils. In a brief biography like this, it would be impossible to speak, at any length, of the great results of his pontificate. Some of the grandest institutions which, in our day, adorn the Holy City, are his creations. The calendar, which bears his name, is alone sufficient to immortalize him; but of all his works, none can be so dear to the recollections of an Irish ecclesiastic as the Roman College, which owes its origin to this illustrious Pontiff. The year 1585 was that of his death, and he did not close his eyes on this world till he witnessed the grand benefits resulting from the Jesuit mission in Japan. Such, indeed, was their progress in that distant world, that Protestant writers, in our times, bear willing testimony to their labours; and one of the last acts of Gregory XIII. was, to receive a deputation of several of the natives who came to Rome to bow, in homage, before the Vicar of Christ. In all the literary concerns of Pope Gregory's pontificate Montalto took an active part, and laboured with incredible diligence to amend the canonical Scriptures, the completion of which great work was reserved for Clement VIII. The obsequies of the deceased Pontiff terminated on the 13th of April, and the Cardinals proceeded to elect his successor. The conclave lasted but a few days, and, to the astonishment of Rome, Montalto was proclaimed Pope, with the title of Sixtus Quintus, on the 24th of the same month. Muratori, quoting Cicarelli, Panvinus, and other historians, states, that Montalto, on entering the conclave, affected the greatest infirmity, which made the votes incline in his favour: tottering on his staff, he was heard to say, that if elected to the Pontificate, he could not bear such a weighty load, unaided by active and energetic coadjutors. But scarcely was the scrutiny over which placed the Tiara on his head, when he flung away his staff, and sportively told the cardinals, that while bent to earth, he was looking for the keys of heaven, and that having found them, he had now only to look to the portal.

A few days after the election of Sixtus, all Rome put on her festival apparel—gay banners floated from the balconies of her palaces, and a hundred bells pealed joyfully from the towers of her churches—'twas the eve of his coronation. A crowd collected round the grand entrance of the Quirinal, to see the gorgeous procession, which was to escort the Pope, issuing from its gate. At length a mule, richly caparisoned, was led out, and many an eye was strained to see the infirm Pope raised to the saddle. "He is weak" said one, "and cannot mount without aid;" "aye, he is now over sixty years," chimed in another, "and must be stiff of limb—but see, he is at the door, and—miracle of miracles! in the saddle without aid of groom or equerry!" Trifling as the incident may appear, it had a strange effect; the populace begun to learn that they were to be ruled by a man of energy, and the cardinals, that he who was about to receive the tiara "could not be led by the nose.*" On went the procession 'mid the acclamations of thousands, till it reached the square of St. Peter's when the choirs of the seven Basilicas, blending in one grand chorus, called down the benediction of Heaven on the great priest "who kept the law of the Most High, and was in covenant with Him."

An ancient usage had long been observed in Rome, on the occasion of the Pope's coronation. Bandits and malefactors who had contrived to escape the arm of justice, were wont to surrender themselves, on the accession of each new Pope, and thus obtain the general pardon, which was conceded at such an auspicious moment. Now, according to Muratori, the mistaken leniency of Pope Gregory had been productive of the greatest evils—bandits and assassins infested every highway leading to the Flaminian and Latern gates—the merchant who came to sell his wares, or the pilgrim who sought the threshold of the apostles, had no security against murder or robbery, and the licentiousness of the nobility had ground down the peasantry into a state of serfdom, and robbed the artisan of his toil. The unprotected girl had no guarantee against their violence, and who-soever has read the "Promessi Sposi" of Manzoni may form an adequate notion of the ruffianism which, at a period anterior to his romance, characterized the noblesse of Italy. He who was now raised to the papacy, had no aristocratic relatives to screen from condign punishment—a plebeian by birth, what cared he for titles? In his youth-time, and in ripening manhood, he had been the spectator of crime which he could not repress—but he was now Pope of Rome, and could trample on the coronet of a Colonna, or any other magnate who would outrage law, and seek shelter in imaginary immunities. Seated in regal state, on the eve of his coronation, the Japanese envoys were presented to him, while he listened with pleasure to the interpreter who informed him of the peculiarities of their clime and manners. A host of officials crowded the ante-chamber, anxiously waiting an audience, and many and various were the forecastings which occupied the minds of those who came to seek favours or pay their respects; the speculator felt his heart sink within him, and the mailed baron was pondering the most obsequious address. At length the governor of Rome was announced—he had a communication of importance, and was ushered into the presence. “Holy father,” said the functionary, “it has been usual with your predecessors, on the eve of their coronation, to throw open the gates of the prisons, and enlarge delinquents—we now beseech your clemency in behalf of the many who crowd the jails of Rome.” “Clemency!—enlarge delinquents!—throw open the prison gates!” exclaimed Sixtus. “Hark ye, my Lord Governor, the criminal judges of these states have had a long vacation during our predecessor’s lifetime—tis our intention that they be now employed, and we will open the prison doors only for those who are to proceed to the gallows, in order to make room for others. Now to your orders—tomorrow we will be crowned, and that all may know how rigorously we will exact justice, set up gibbets at the four most conspicuous points of the city, and hang out of them the most noted of these assassins who have incautiously presumed on our clemency by making a voluntary surrender of themselves.”

Amongst these were some of the aristocracy who had long trampled on all social order, even to the shedding of blood; their astounded friends and relatives appealed to his Holiness, and had their suit backed by the interposition of the Japanese,—but all in vain. The Pope was inexorable, and they who saw him, on the next day, receiving the Tiara, had to traverse but a few streets to behold the lifeless bodies of the culprits dangling from the gallows. Such vigorous measures were necessary at the time; nor did the pontiff pause till he saw his dominions as free from crime and outrage as they were noted, in years anterior to his accession, for wickedness of every description. The injured matron or insulted maiden had only to appeal to him, and justice pursued, and overtook the offenders; the zealous and learned ecclesiastic was sure of his reward, while the simoniacal and dissolute were pushed out of the pale of the sanctuary. The assassin flung away his weapon, and the very name of Sisto Quinto struck terror to the heart of the lordling. While he was thus employed in tearing up iniquity by the roots, he did not neglect the political and social condition of his people. A new code of laws—numerous schools—granaries, wherein corn and provisions were stored in anticipation of the famine which desolated Lombardy and threatened to invade the Papal territories, were the work of the first year of his pontificate. His whole life was a warfare against the vices and corruptions of his age; and, although the name of Sixtus Quintus was used by mothers when they would frighten children, nevertheless, wise men pronounced it with respect, and looked back upon his career as a happy illustration of a truth, which teaches that zeal, integrity, and ability sooner or later must find their reward. What intelligent man can now visit Rome without finding his heart full of such a conviction? From the Flaminian gate to the summit of the Janiculum a hundred monuments record the glories and the greatness of him who, in his youth, was nothing more than a swine-herd. The marble bridge spanning the Tiber, and the hospital hard-by, both bearing the name of “Sisto,” were, of themselves, enough to convince us of the grandeur of the man. But even these are only a fraction of what he did for Rome: the obelisks, cast down by earthquake or the fury of barbarians, owe their re-erection to him; the aqueducts, which convey limpid streams over hill and dale into the eternal city, and which he found shattered and neglected were repaired by him; and these noble fountains, which arrest the eye of every visitor, may be said to be the work of his hands. Antoninus and Trajan, cast down from their columns, he replaced by “apostolic statues”—the glories of Phidias and Praxitiles he raised up from the dust, while galleries of sculptures, disinterred from the ruins of the city and the villas of the Campagna, even now attest the artistic tastes of the man, who seemed to labour as though he would rebuild the marble city of Augustus. And all this, and much more, was accomplished at a time when the war of the Hugonots filled Europe with terror, and threatened the ruin of the capital of the Christian world. God gave him a great soul; he knew not the word “difficulty,” and never faltered in the contemplation of the most gigantic designs.

Nor is this brief sketch of Sixtus Quintus without its moral. View it as we will, we may easily infer, that no matter how lowly a man’s lot may be cast, he is nevertheless gifted by the Almighty dispenser with as much of mind and energy as may be useful to his fellow men, if both be properly directed. Recalling the events which won for the poor swine-herd a European celebrity, who is there that must not be convinced of the wisdom of the Catholic Church in awarding her highest honours to the most deserving, without regard to birth? If we needed proof of this, do we not find it in the person of him whose biography we have so lightly touched? Of the many Popes who have sat on the Chair of Peter, it would be found that with few exceptions, they were all taken from the lowly and humble. Even in the college of cardinals at the present moment, some of its brightest ornaments are of humble origin, an evidence in itself of the greatness of an institution which makes little account of aristocracy of birth when compared with the aristocracy of mind. If our limits allowed, we might easily show that a single Pope in a short time, with poor resources, and surrounded by difficulties, did more for art and science than a dozen kings with millions at their command. But it is not necessary to insist on this, when we call to mind even a few of these grand events which have eternalized the name of SIXTUS QUINTUS.

Portrait

HIS GRACE MOST REV. DR. MURRAY.

To us it is a most pleasing task to trace, as far as these brief limits will admit, the character of one of the most distinguished men of his day. As a Bishop, his Grace Dr. Murray has few equals throughout Christendom. In his own country he stands unrivalled. Some men have faculties lofty, yet rugged and uneven, like the towering Alps. They have passions which, when evoked, put us in mind of the ocean lashed by a tempest. They are bright suns that on close examination display many spots. They are like diamonds with the front polished—the sides dim.

Far different, though not less remarkable, is the character of Archbishop Murray. He possesses pre-eminence with perfect evenness of mind. He has determination of soul equal to the greatest occasions. He is a bright sun standing the test of the closest scrutiny, and advancing with increased splendour! Born eighty years ago, amidst the beautiful scenery of the County of Wicklow, he may now look back on a long life marked by many a grand event. The Irish College of Salamanca was his Alma Mater, whither he was obliged to travel, to acquire that lore with which his mind is enriched, and which his own crushed country unwillingly denied him. He was, for some time, curate in his native county, but from the disturbed and dangerous state of the times, was obliged to fly to Dublin. Here he was kindly received by Archbishop Troy, and appointed one of his curates. As a pulpit orator, he ranked, if not the first, certainly amongst the most distinguished. Few years had elapsed in his capacity of curate, when he was appointed coadjutor bishop of Dublin, at the request of Archbishop Troy, without any previous consultation.

Those who at that time were the best judges of a cultivated mind, of sound sense, and clerical decorum, were the first to express their satisfaction at his promotion; and strange to say, there was not even one clergyman known to remark, that any other priest in the diocese was more fitted for the high dignity than Daniel Murray. He had not long borne the mitre on his stainless brow, when his fine intellect and great determination were called into action. The question of the Veto filled the Catholic mind from north to south, from east to west; and English intrigue was doing its utmost at Rome to destroy the independence of the Episcopacy of Ireland. Doctor Murray proceeded to the Holy See to counteract, by his reasonings and entreaties, the blighting efforts of alien influence. On his return from Rome, he preached a Passion Sermon, in which he eloquently denounced all those who endeavoured to render that measure successful. We copy his own words from a letter addressed by him to the Dublin Chronicle, dated April 15, 1816:

"SIR—As considerable misstatements have gone abroad, relative to a passage of my sermon on last Friday, to which allusion was made in your publication of that day, I beg you will have the kindness, with a view to obviate any further misconception on this head, to give insertion to the passage, such as it was really delivered. Having arrived at that part of our divine Redeemer's passion, where he is represented as bound to a pillar, I said: 'To this bound and suffering victim I would now implore the attention of those misguided Catholics, who seem willing to impose new and disgraceful bands, not indeed on his sacred person, but on his mystical body, that is his Church, which was ever more dear to him than even his life.' Does not St. Paul assure us, that for this mystical body he delivered himself up, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, but that it should be holy and without blemish? And could we suppose that it would be more painful to him, to submit his sacred hands to the ignominious cords, than to see his Church bound and fettered by restrictions, which would render it less capable of fulfilling the object for which it was formed—the object for which he poured out his most precious life? I know that our mistaken brethren would not consent to yield up any point which they deem essential, and that they look not beyond what they consider safe and honourable conciliation. But unhappily it is now too well known, that the conciliation which is expected, is such as would imply the degradation and enslavement of the sacred ministry. And what virtuous Catholic would consent to purchase the chance of temporal advantages, at the price of such a real spiritual calamity? Oh! if the stroke must come, let it come from those who have so long sought the extinction of our religion; but, in the name of God, let no Catholic press forward to share in the inglorious work. Let no one among us be found to say of his Church, as the treacherous disciple said of its founder: What will you give me and I will deliver [it] unto you?"

As may be imagined, this energetic appeal had an electric effect; and his Grace had the happiness to witness the failure of the project he so strenuously opposed. Amongst the many who were summoned before the House of Lords, to be examined as to the tenets of the Catholic faith, preparatory to the passing of the Emancipation Act, Dr. Murray shines conspicuous. His answers to questions put were so clear—so comprehensive—so convincing, that his examination had, at once, the effect of winning the esteem of his adversaries, and exciting the admiration of his friends. Of the host of ecclesiastical talent put to the test on that occasion, the evidence of Dr. Murray seems to us, on calm reflection, to be the brightest and the best. Under his benignant rule, the archdiocese of Dublin has calmly and steadily progressed in religious zeal and fervour. New churches have risen in almost every parish; and those abodes of angelic peace and piety—convents of holy women, opened their portals to those who abandoned the world, or sought the blessings of religious training. There was one great want which he, with every other zealous ecclesiastic, deeply felt and deplored: it was the education of the poor of Ireland; to accomplish which, there were not adequate funds to supply teachers or schools. The attention of the English government was called to the necessity of National Education, and His Grace Dr. Murray, was one of the first to hail, with delight, mingled with caution, a measure which would call forth a new soul and a new mind in the people of Ireland. A board was established, and His Grace was appointed one of its Commissioners. Some fears were entertained by zealous ecclesiastics, that the religion of the growing generation would be tainted through the medium of this new system. But Dr. Murray was convinced, that, from the watchful care of the priesthood—from his own influence and experience on the Commission, that the system would shed enlightenment free from even one ray of perverting influence. The result has proved how far he was right, since we find an unexampled spread of education through the country elevating her in the scale of nations. Whosoever shall write the history of the times in which this illustrious dignitary has lived, must make him a great part of that history, linked as his name is to the progressive improvements of the times, and identified with the great Catholic movement in this country.

The beautiful portrait, painted by Stephenson, and engraved by Porter, gave occasion to this brief sketch of the illustrious prelate. We confess, that we rather like the engraving. The forehead is lofty and intellectual: the expression of the countenance, that of anxiety, well befitting an octogenarian archbishop in eventful, if not appalling times. He is represented sitting in his canon's robes, with that ease and dignity of bearing for which he is so distinguished. The likeness is very striking, and we think it surpasses any work of the kind lately published; we only regret that its price places it beyond the reach of the vast majority of Dr. Murray's admirers. In taking our leave of this short notice, we ardently hope that His Grace may long continue in that activity of mind and body so rare and so truly surprising at his great age. And, we trust in God, that his great labours and great anxieties may not shorten a life so precious, we would almost venture to say, so necessary to the flourishing state of the archdiocese of Dublin.

Kyrie Eleison! Christe Eleison!

I.

LIFE and death are in thy hand,
 Lord, have mercy!
 The blight came down at thy command.
 Christ, have mercy!
 The famine pang and fever pain
 Tear the nation's heart in twain—
 Human aid is sought in vain.
 Parce nobis Domine!

II.

Loud, more loud their footsteps fall,
 Lord, have mercy!
 Heaven is one vast funeral pall.
 Christ, have mercy!
 Twin destroyers, hand in hand
 They stalk along the blasted land—
 Who before their frown shall stand?
 Parce nobis Domine!

III.

Without a grave, like weeds to lie,
 Lord, have mercy!
 Despairing thousands wait to die.
 Christ, have mercy!
 The famished infant vainly cries,
 Its mother dead beside it lies—
 Let our anguish pierce the skies.
 Parce nobis Domine!

IV.

Outcast of the Nations, long,
 Lord, have mercy!
 We bear a foreign tyrant's wrong.
 Christ, have mercy!
 Black our fearful crime must be
 With triple scourges lashed by Thee,
 Famine, Plague, and Slavery.
 Parce nobis Domine!

V.

Oh! if torture might atone
 Lord, have mercy!
 With tears of blood before thy throne,
 Christ, have mercy!
 Six hundred years we toil in chains—
 We sow, but aliens reap our plains—
 The life is frozen in our veins.
 Parce nobis Domine!

VI.

Disarmed and bleeding, here apart,
 Lord, have mercy!
 A vulture preys upon our heart.
 Christ, have mercy!
 Oh! bitter is our Helot doom—
 In life no joy, in death no tomb—
 Despair and vengeance rule the gloom.
 Parce nobis Domine!

VII.

Without a prayer or passing bell,
 Lord, have mercy!
 The shroudless armies hourly swell.
 Christ, have mercy!
 The dying, ghastlier than the dead,
 With blanched lips have vainly said,
 "Give us this day our daily bread."
 Parce nobis Domine!

VIII.

Wo! wo! to feel the life blood freeze,
 Lord, have mercy!
 Fruitlessly, by slow degress;
 Christ, have mercy!
 Oh! had we fallen on the plain
 In rapid battle swiftly slain,
 We had not perished thus in vain.
 Parce nobis Domine!

IX.

The grave shall wider, deeper grow,
 Lord, have mercy!
 My soul forebodes a darker wo;
 Christ, have mercy!
 No food on earth—no health in air—
 The sword were mercy to despair.
 Avenger! when thine arm is bare.
 Parce nobis Domine!

X.

Their God is wroth, our foemen say:
 Lord, have mercy!
 Our Father! turn thine ire away.
 Christ, have mercy!
 Bid thine angel cease to slay—
 Have mercy heaven on feeble clay—
 Hear thy stricken people pray
 Parce nobis Domine!

XI.

Before the Isle is all a grave,
 Lord have mercy!
 Arise! mysterious God, and save;
 Christ, have mercy!
 But if the pestilential sun
 Must see us wither, one by one,
 Thy hand hath made—thy will be done.
 Parce nobis Domine!

St. Vincent of Paul,

AND THE MISSIONS OF LIMERICK, A.D. 1646-52.

THE following records contain memorials of one of the most eventful and deeply interesting periods of our history. They bring before our view the unsuccessful struggle of the Irish Catholics, the butcheries of Cromwell, and the history of that terrible plague which marched in the van of Ireton's battalions, and smote those who escaped the sword when Limerick surrendered in 1651.

Ingratitude is no part of the Irish character. The names of our benefactors, and the memory of their kind deeds, should and shall be ever

"Embalmed in the innermost shrine of our hearts."

Among all those who sympathised with our bleeding country, few laboured more ably and effectually, for her relief than St. Vincent of Paul. "The sole detail," says M. Collet, "of all he did, or procured to be done, in favour of the ecclesiastics banished from Ireland by Cromwell, would exceed my limits, and wear out the patience of my readers."

Having been informed of the deplorable condition of a large number of Catholics, who, for fear of losing their faith in Ireland, had thrown themselves into the jaws of famine in Paris: "What can we do for them?" said the Saint to one of his own congregation, a native of Ireland, "Is there no means of assembling them together in order to console and instruct them?" They do not understand our language, and I see them almost totally abandoned and lost; this goes to my heart, and inspires me with a great feeling of compassion for them." The priest having answered that he would do his best: "God bless you," replied the charitable Vincent, "see, here are six pistoles, go, in the name of God, and give them all the consolation you can." This was nothing, continues Collet, in comparison with the other services which the Saint rendered to a nation, no less celebrated for its attachment to the ancient faith, than for the long and cruel tyranny which it has endured for that fidelity. The recollection of so many benevolent deeds subsisted in this unfortunate country long after the death of St. Vincent. The Bishop of Waterford, who had been an eye-witness, gave an account to Clement XI. of the ornaments, and the vast sums of money which the holy priest had sent into Ireland, almost after the same manner as the faithful had once shewed the prince of the apostles the garments for which they were indebted to the charity of Dorcas. The prelate went farther: he made bold to assert, that God had raised up Vincent, as he had formerly raised up the Patricks, the Columbas, the Galls, the Malachies, and all those men of blessed memory, who were in their days the honour of their country and the glory of religion.

Thus we see that few have a stronger title to the affectionate gratitude of Irishmen than St. Vincent of Paul. Within the last ten years the Congregation of the Mission has been permanently established in Ireland. Of its members, some devote themselves to the literary and religious education of youth, especially ecclesiastics; the rest are devoted to the service of the poor in the country parishes. Still, more recently, another institution of charity, under the patronage of St. Vincent, the father of the poor, and bearing his venerable name, to wit, "the Brotherhood of St. Vincent of Paul," has sprung up, and already extended its branches through Ireland, most providentially, at a time, when the wants of the poor, both corporal and spiritual, call so loudly for aid.

The following memoirs of the Missions of Limerick are drawn from the admirable "Life of the Venerable Vincent of Paul," written shortly after his death by Lewis Abelly, Bishop of Rodez.

Abelly was the bosom friend of St. Vincent: towards the close of his life he resigned his see, and retired to close his days at St. Lazarus, the parent house of the congregation. In his works we have the testimony of a cotemporary writer, whose informants were eye-witnesses to the acts of the blessed servant of God, and a shadow of doubt cannot fall on the veracity and accuracy of such a biographer, equally celebrated for his piety and learning.

THE MISSIONS OF LIMERICK.

In the year 1646, Pope Innocent X. desired St. Vincent to send into Ireland some priests of his congregation, to apply some remedy to the evils which threatened ruin to the people and their religion. For this purpose he chose eight missionaries, five of whom were Irishmen. At their departure, he said to them—"Be united, and God will bless you; but let your bond of union be the charity of Christ; for all other union, which is not cemented by the blood of this Divine Saviour, cannot last. It is then in Christ, through Christ, and for Christ, that you ought to be united, one to another. The spirit of Christ is the spirit of union and peace. How can you draw souls to Christ if you are not united to one another, and to Himself? Go then, as having, in Him, but one heart and one intention; and by this means you will reap some fruit."

Arriving in Ireland, some went into the diocese of Cashel to labour there, and the rest devoted themselves to Limerick. They began with the catechism: then they added exhortations, simple, clear, and moving; calling on the people to live according to their faith, to renounce and destroy sin by penance, and to practise the virtues proper to their states of life. This manner of instruction and preaching drew the people from all sides, and was much approved of by the prelates and the Pope's Nuncio, who, congratulated the missionaries, and exhorted them to persevere in this grand work.

It is impossible to describe with what devotion the Catholics came from all the neighbouring places, and even from the remotest districts, to assist at the exercises and make their general confessions. The clergy of the places where the missions were made, were ordinarily the first to set the example, and inform themselves of the method of catechising and preaching, which they afterwards employed to preserve and maintain the good which the missions had produced in their parishes.

The persecution increasing, some of the missionaries returned to France, and the Bishop of Limerick sent the following letter to their spiritual father:

"It is just, Sir, that I return you thanks from the bottom of my heart for the blessings we have received at the hands of your priests, and that I declare to you the great need we have of them in this country. I can assure you, with all confidence, that their labours have produced more fruit, and that they have converted more souls than all the other ecclesiastics. And, furthermore, that by their example and their edifying conduct, the greater part of the nobility of both sexes have become models of virtue and devotion—which was not the case before the arrival of your priests in these quarters. It is true that the troubles and the wars of this kingdom have been a great obstacle to their functions; nevertheless the truths of faith have been so engrained by their means upon the minds of the inhabitants of the cities, as well as the people of the country, that they bless God in their adversities equally as in prosperity. I hope for my own salvation by their aid."

The violence of the persecution increased every day; yet the three missionaries who remained, continued to labour with great success, notwithstanding the difficulties and perils which they had to encounter. They plainly saw that two or three need only assemble together in the name of the Lord to feel the help of the Divine presence; for, having undertaken for Him a work above their strength, they nevertheless, happily succeeded by the special assistance of His bounty. Thus was the mission in the city of Limerick, undertaken at the request of the bishop, because the country round about was in the hands of the Parliamentarians, and because the Catholic inhabitants of the villages had taken refuge in the city. What particularly encouraged the missionaries was, that the good bishop himself chose to share in their labours. There were at that time 20,000 communicants in Limerick; in fact, all the city was put into a state of penance, in order to draw down the succour and the graces of the Divine bounty. To this the magistrates contributed much on their part; for, besides the good example which they gave by their assiduous attendance at the exercises of the mission, they employed their authority to outroot vice, and to banish scandals and public disorders. Amongst other things, they established laws, and ordained certain punishments against cursing and swearing, so that these detestable vices were entirely banished from the city and the neighbourhood. Almighty God himself seemed to authorise these wise proceedings, by the most manifest chastisements which came on the transgressors of such holy ordinances.

The following letter, from O'Dwyer, bishop of Limerick, speaks well of the labours of the missionaries anterior to the siege:

"I have often in my letters to your reverence, given you an account of your missionaries in this kingdom: to speak the truth, never, in the memory of man, was so great progress in the Catholic religion heard of, as we have witnessed within the few last years, owing to their piety and assiduity. In the beginning of the present year, we opened the mission in this city, where there are not less than 20,000 communicants; but, thanks be to God, I doubt not now that many have been rescued from the jaws of Satan so that drunkenness, cursing, swearing, and other disorders have been totally abolished, so that the whole city seems to have changed its face, being compelled to have recourse to penance, by the war, the famine the pestilence, and the dangers which surround us on all sides, and which we receive as manifest signs of the anger of God. Nevertheless the Divine Goodness has been pleased to do us this favour, although we are but useless servants; and God has been pleased to make use of the weak things of this world to confound the mighty. Even the people of the highest quality in the city attend so assiduously at the sermons, the catechetical instructions, and all the other exercises of the mission, that the cathedral is scarcely large enough to contain all. We know of no better way to appease the anger of God, than by destroying the sins which are the root and cause of all evils. And verily, it is all over with us if God do not stretch out to us a helping hand. To Him it belongs to have mercy and to pardon. My good father, I declare to you, that to your children I am indebted for the salvation of my soul. Write to them some words of consolation. I know not, under Heaven, a mission more useful than this of Ireland; for, although we had a hundred missionaries, the harvest of souls would be still exceedingly great, and the labourers too few."

To the letter of this worthy prelate we subjoin one which St. Vincent wrote in the April of 1650 to the superior of the missionaries who remained in Limerick, in order to support them in the great trials they were likely to meet:

"We have been greatly edified," says he, "by your letter, seeing in it two excellent effects of the grace of God. By the one you have given yourselves to God, to hold on firmly in the country, where you are in the midst of perils, choosing rather to expose yourselves to death than to be found wanting in charity to your neighbour; and by the other, you have directed your cares to the preservation of your confreres, by sending them back to France, in order to remove them from danger. The spirit of the martyr has inspired you to the first, and the virtue of prudence has made you do the second, and both the one and the other were drawn from the example of our Saviour, who, at the point of going to suffer the torments of death for the salvation of men, wished to secure and preserve his disciples, saying: 'let these go their way, and touch them not.' It is thus you have acted as a true child of this most adorable Father, to whom I return infinite thanks for having produced in you that sovereign charity, which is the height of all virtues. I pray Him to fill you with it, to the end, that exercising it in all cases and everywhere, you may pour it forth into the breasts of those who want it. Seeing that your companions are in the same disposition of remaining, whatever may be the danger from war or pestilence, we are of opinion that they should be allowed to stay. How do we know what God intends in their regard? Certainly He does not bestow on them so holy a resolution in vain. My God, how inscrutable are thy judgments! Behold at the close of one of the most fruitful missions we have ever seen, and perhaps the most necessary, thou dost stop, as it were, the course of thy mercies upon this penitent city, and dost lay thy hand still more heavily upon her, adding to the misfortune of war, the scourge of pestilence. But all this is done to gather in the harvest of the elect, and to collect the good grain into thy eternal granary. We adore thy ways, O Lord!"

With good reason did the saint speak thus, as though the future were before his vision. In the city of Limerick alone, 8,000 persons died of the plague, amongst whom was the good brother of the bishop, who chose to expose his life, in company with the missionaries, going to visit the sick, consoling them, and providing for their wants. It was wonderful to behold the poor people support this plague not only with patience, but even with peace and tranquillity, declaring that they died happy, because they had been delivered from the grievous burden of their sins, at the tribunal of penance. Others said, that they lamented not their death since it had pleased God to send them the holy fathers (so they called the missionaries) to purify their souls. There were some who, during their sickness, asked nothing more than a share in the prayers of their confessors, to which they believed themselves indebted for the recovery of their health. The good bishop hearing, and beholding all this, could not refrain from crying out frequently: "Alas! although Mr. Vincent never did anything else for the glory of God than the good he has done for these poor people, he ought to esteem himself a happy man." To crown their trials and afflictions, after a siege of four or five months, the city was taken by the army under the command of Ireton. They cruelly put to death many of the inhabitants who professed the Catholic faith, and, among the rest, four of the principal men of the city, who showed on this occasion how much they had profited, by the instructions and exhortations of the missionaries of St. Vincent de Paul. The first among them was Mr. Thomas Strich, who was elected mayor of the city. When the keys of the city were delivered to him, he made a most Christian address to the inhabitants, exhorting them to an inviolable fidelity to God, the church, and their king—offering to lay down his own life in a cause so just. When the city was taken, God bestowed on him the honour of martyrdom, with three others, who, having been his companions in piety and fidelity, were made partakers of his crown. They all four presented themselves not only with firmness, but even with joy, and went to death as heroes march to victory. Before execution, they severally addressed the bystanders, declaring to heaven and earth that they laid down their lives for the confession and defence of the Catholic religion. Their heroic example greatly encouraged the other Catholics to preserve their faith, and to suffer all extremities of persecution rather than be wanting in the fidelity which they owed to God.

One of the three priests of the congregation of the mission who had remained in Ireland, terminated his life in a glorious manner, in the duties of his calling; the other two, Mr. Breen or O'Brien, and Mr. Barry, escaped out of the city in disguise, after it had been taken. In the year 1652, they were obliged to return to France after having laboured unceasingly in the missions of Ireland for six years. During those missions, more than 80,000 general confessions had been heard, and other good works without number effected. The superior, on his return, having asked the superior-general, whether it would be pleasing to him that a narrative of the whole should be written, was told "that Almighty God knows all, and that the humility of our Saviour requires that the little congregation of the mission, should be hidden in God with Jesus Christ, to honour His hidden life." He added, "that the blood of these martyrs would not be forgotten before God, and that sooner or later it would produce a new harvest of Catholicity."

The Lay Missioner.

I.

Had I a wish—'twere this, that Heaven would make
My heart as strong to imitate as love,
That half its weakness it could leave, and take
Some spirit's strength, by which to soar above—
A lordly eagle mated with a dove—
Strong-will and warm affection—these be mine;
Without the one no dreams has fancy wove,
Without the other soon these dreams decline—
Weak children of the heart which fade away and pine!—

II.

Strong have I been in love, if not in will;
Affections crowd and people all the past,
And now, even now, they come and haunt me still,
Even from the graves where once my hopes were cast.
But not with spectral features—all aghast—
Come they to fright me; no—with smiles and tears,
And winding arms, and breasts that beat as fast
As once they beat in boyhood's opening years,
Come the departed shades, whose steps my rapt soul hears.

III.

Youth has passed by—its first warm flush is o'er—
And now 'tis nearly noon! yet unsubdued
My heart still kneels and worships, as of yore,
Those twin-fair shapes, the beautiful and good!
Valley and mountain, sky and stream, and wood,
And that fair miracle, the human face;
And human nature in its sunniest mood,
Freed from the shade of all things low and base,
These in my heart still hold their old accustom'd place.

IV.

'Tis not with pride, but gratitude, I tell
How beats my heart with all its youthful glow,
How one kind act doth make my bosom swell,
And down my cheeks the sweet warm glad tears flow.
Enough of self—enough of me you know,
Kind reader, but if thou wouldst further wend,
With me, this wilderness of weak words thro',
Let me depict, before the journey end,
One whom methinks thou'lt love—my brother and my friend:

V.

Ah! wondrous is the lot of him who stands
A Christian Priest, within a Christian fane,
And binds with pure and consecrated hands,
Round earth and heaven, a festal, flowery chain,
Even as between the blue arch and the main,
A circling Western ring of golden light
Weds the two worlds! or, as the sunny rain
Of April makes the cloud and clay unite,
Thus links the Priest of God the dark world and the bright.

VI.

All are not priests, yet priestly duties may,
And should be all men's—as a common sight
We view the brightness of a summer's day,
And think 'tis but its duty to be bright;
But should a genial beam of warming light
Suddenly break from out a wintery sky,
With gratitude we own a new delight,
Quick beats the heart and brighter beams the eye,
And, as a boon, we hail the splendour from on high.

VII.

'Tis so with men, with those of them at least
Whose hearts by icy doubts are chill'd and torn,
They think the virtues of a Christian Priest
Something professional, put on and worn,
Even as the vestments of a Sabbath morn;
But should a friend, or act or teach as he,
Then is the mind of all its doubtings shorn—
The unexpected goodness that they see
Takes root and bears its fruit, as uncoerced and free!

VIII.

One I have known, and haply yet I know,
 A youth by baser passions undefiled,
 Lit by the light of genius and the glow
 Which real feeling leaves where once it smiled;
 Firm as a man—yet tender as a child,
 Armed at all points by fantasy and thought,
 To face the true or soar amid the wild,
 By love and labour as a good man ought,
 Ready to pay the price by which dear Truth is bought!

IX.

'Tis not with cold advice or stern rebuke,
 With formal precept, or with face demure,
 But with the unconscious eloquence of look,
 Where shines the heart so loving and so pure,
 'Tis these, with constant goodness, that allure
 All hearts to love and imitate his worth,
 Beside him weaker natures feel secure,
 Even as the flower beside the oak peeps forth
 Safe, though the rain descends and blows the biting North!

X.

Such is my friend, and such I fain would be,
 Mild, thoughtful, modest, faithful, loving, gay,
 Correct not cold, nor uncontroll'd though free,
 But proof to all the lures that round us play—
 Even as the sun that 'on his azure way,
 Moveth with steady pace and lofty mien
 (Though blushing clouds, like syrens, woo his stay)
 Higher and higher through the pure serene,
 Till comes the calm of eve and wraps him from the scene.

Ecclesiastical Architecture.

PART I.

AMONGST the various gratifying signs of our age, as indicative of a return to the Faith and practices of ancient times, the present movement on the Continent and in England in favour of the revival of the Ecclesiastical Architecture of the middle ages, is most conspicuous. In the mind of the mere antiquary or virtuoso, who is accustomed to examine works of art by ideas of abstract beauty, and to whom the portico of Eretheium is as interesting as the west front of Wells Cathedral, or the Dome of Cologne, this aspect of affairs can produce feelings little comparable to those by which the Catholic churchman is affected. The latter looks upon mediæval art as the offspring and production of the Christian church, inseparably connected, so far as the genuine existence of the arts themselves is concerned, with the rites and institutions of religion, and illustrative of, while it is glorified by their influence; and he consequently hails all just appreciation of the beauties of Christian art in its true light, as an indication of a return to the principles by which they were produced. The former endeavours to analyze it by some indefinite and unsatisfactory notions of abstract beauty, to the utter exclusion of the divine idea whence it emanated. For a century or more, the influence of this artistic dilettantism had prevailed, with results by no means commensurate with the labours and energy expended on the pursuit. And so it would have been till our own time, had not a portion of the spirit of the olden times been brought back to aid the enquiry. Men of learning and industry had expended much time and immense labour in the examination of the remains of art of the middle ages, and in giving to the world the result of their exertions. Historical accounts, dates and correct delineations were abundant, but no hope was ever expressed of the possibility of a revival of the works that had formed the subject of their studies. They were esteemed as monuments of the past, precious in the illustration of the history and social progress of mankind, but the idea of their revival would be considered a Utopian project. A wonderful change has come over the spirit of the times, and, within the short space of a dozen years, an almost total revolution of opinion has been wrought. To imitate, and even rival those glorious works of olden times, is now deemed no impossibility or vain speculation. The true use of many things, formerly mistaken for the reverse of what they really were, has been pointed out; and old churches and other ecclesiastical edifices are now examined with a direct and practical view towards their own preservation, or their imitation in new structures of a similar nature. Already has this glorious spirit sprung into full life and energy on the Continent. England has caught the flame, but Ireland as yet looks on with comparative indifference. By the exertions of one man,* the spirit of restoration of mediæval art has been nearly completely established amongst the Catholics of England, and churches have been built, or are in progress of erection, which, if not equal in magnitude to ancient works, yet in true Catholic feeling and treatment are worthy of the ages of faith. Nor is the enthusiasm confined to Catholics alone. The most learned and pious members of the Protestant church, anxious to establish their claims to true descent from the ancient glorious church of England, and influenced by a portion of Catholic spirit, seem determined upon rivaling the Catholics themselves in this respect. Many of their new churches, and the restoration of old ones, attest the sincerity of their feelings, and the great success of their earnest labours, notwithstanding the many difficulties they have to contend against. When will this spirit warm the hearts of Irishmen? Looking at the present state of things, we are tempted to entertain some misgivings on the subject; but when we reflect on the genius and liberality of our countrymen, we receive high hope that a return to ancient customs and usages will yet be hailed with enthusiastic delight. An example, in confirmation of this opinion, is happily within our reach. The new church of St. John, at the Blackrock, is the first effort towards a revival of a church of the ancient type, within the boundaries of Dublin or its vicinity; and, although miserably defective in numerous important particulars, which we may take occasion to point out at some future time, we are well aware that the beauties which it does possess are duly appreciated.

To aid in disseminating a taste for the revival of Christian art in Ireland, to point out its beauties and perfections, and to afford instructions and advice to those about to raise temples in honour of the Living God, would be a task most grateful to our feelings, and most suitable to the pages of a Magazine devoted to the interests of the Catholic Church, and of Irishmen. The spirit of Catholicity is nowhere more active than in this country, and we are unwilling to see the externals of our religion neglected, while the means of improvement are easily attainable. On the present occasion, we mean to take a general and suggestive view of the subject, which in itself is one of great magnitude, and involves many details and accessories. In future numbers we shall continue our observations, though at present we propose no definite plan of arrangement. We shall review books, bearing immediately or collaterally upon the subject, notice new churches and other ecclesiastical edifices, and works of art in connexion with them, and labour to show their merits or defects. In all cases our observations shall be guided by Catholic principles, and the examples of antiquity; and while censuring defects, we hope to exercise a Christian charitableness—our design being rather to suggest the means of improvement than to exercise a severe criticism. In cases where pictorial illustrations of ecclesiastical edifices, ancient or modern, worthy of being held up as examples for imitation, are attainable, they shall be freely furnished. By these, and other exertions conducted in the same spirit, we hope to materially aid in removing from Ireland the shameful reproach, "That there is no country in Europe in which the externals of religion are more neglected."

In all ages and nations, the highest efforts of architecture, as of other arts, were devoted to the service of the national religions, and becoming as it were instinct with the feelings and principles of the respective systems, were symbols of their doctrines and disciplines, as clear and intelligible to the initiated as the writings and traditions which contained the dogmas of their creeds. Influences of climate and of custom were also visible in these works, so that each country possessed a species of art peculiarly its own; reflecting the religious belief, political institutions, and popular usages of its inhabitants. The architecture of the Egyptians was totally unlike that of the Greeks; and the art of Greece, although the source whence the Romans drew their inspiration, was so modified in the transition, to suit it to the requirements of the great Empire, as to become a distinct style. Then, under the influence of Christianity, and of the political institutions which succeeded the breaking up of the Roman Empire, was gradually developed a style of art unlike all its predecessors, and breathing more strongly than even the rich and fantastic poetry of the times—the truly Christian, romantic, and we might add, chivalrous spirit of its age. This was Christian art.

There have been three great eras in the history of Christian art. The first, extending from the cessation of the persecutions of the early Christians by the Roman Emperors to the twelfth century; the second, from that period to the sixteenth century; and the third, thence to our own times. These subdivisions, of course, comprehend many varieties which are beyond our province to discuss in this place. The first was characterized by the adaptations of the forms of classic art, to the requirements and spirit of the church, still forming in itself a production both unique and original, whose "prototype was undeniably Pagan, though its development, as far as it went, was essentially Christian." The earliest churches, after the conversion of Constantine the Great, were the basilicæ or courts of justice which the Emperor placed at the disposal of the Christians. They also formed the type of the new churches, but with such alterations as rendered them more appropriate to their use, and more expressive in their decorations. "The form of these basilicæ," says Bishop Milner, "being oblong, and surrounded by porticos or aisles raised upon columns, with galleries very frequently over them, was found very suitable both to the majesty and the uses of religion. Little more was necessary, for the latter purpose, than to shut up the porticos exteriorly with walls and doors, to cover in the open area in the middle with a roof, where wanting, and to place an altar near the upper end, opposite to the bishop's throne, and an ambo or pulpit somewhere about the middle of the nave." Hence, the churches of that period retained the name of basilicæ, by which appellation some of the churches in Rome are known to this day. Under the various names of Byzantine, Romanesque, Saxon, Norman, &c., this style and its several varieties extended over the entire of Christendom. In every country it developed itself differently, but preserved its general and important features, showing the source whence it sprung, and the Catholic unity and brotherhood of Christian art.

It cannot be supposed, that in the early ages of Christianity, while the Irish Church was carrying, through the exertions of her indefatigable missionaries, the light of the Gospel to European nations, at home the affairs of religion were neglected, and that temples suitable to the pure faith and practices of those simple times, did not arise. Did such a supposition now exist in any sceptical mind, there are remains of churches in many parts of our Island, bearing internal evidence of so remote a date as the sixth or seventh century, while documentary evidences, in confirmation of the fact, have been accumulated sufficient to remove or confute the erroneous impression. The churches at Clonmacnoise, Glendalough, and Fore, are amongst the number. We hope our nationality will not carry us beyond the boundaries of strict truth; and we therefore do not claim for our country that which manifestly she never possessed, those grand developments of ecclesiastical art, which have been the pride and the shame of other countries. Their pride in that spirit, pure and unworldly, which raised them to glorify religion, and their shame in that insanity and sensualism which in latter times dilapidated them, or still worse, disgraced them by the presence of works of anti-Christian art. Yet we must confess our belief, that the remains of ecclesiastical art in Ireland are most interesting and instructive to the architectural student, and demonstrate that in this respect our ancestors were not insufficient to the demands of their age. St. Cormac's Chapel, at Cashel, completed in the commencement of the twelfth century, will, as far as ecclesiastical propriety and artistic treatment are involved, bear a comparison with any similar building in Europe of the same extent, of that era. The check which the development of architecture in Ireland received in the latter part of the twelfth century, preventing its progression with art in the remainder of Europe, is too easily traced to its true cause, and is a subject too painful to dwell upon here. Notwithstanding the interruption, Churches and Monasteries were erected throughout the land, in the prevailing styles of the times; and many of their ruins to this day are examples worthy of imitation; and, even in their desolate condition, demonstrate how superior they must have been to corresponding structures of our times.

We may here mention, that the great feature of the first epoch was the semicircular arch, as distinguishing it from that of the succeeding styles, for which reason some writers have suggested the appellation of circular style to the former, and pointed to the latter, which has been opprobriously designated Gothic.

The second epoch is marked by a development of art which, doubtlessly, grew out of its predecessor, "properly called the POINTED STYLE; being one of the greatest efforts of human genius that has been witnessed in the course of ages,"* and which contains the finest examples of Christian art which have yet been obtained. It was characteristic of its glorious times, when ecclesiastical institutions were, of necessity, for the social relations of mankind, and the preservation of their political liberties, so intimately connected with all state establishments, that the philosophic historian is sometimes puzzled in discriminating their respective spheres. It was fated merely to touch upon perfection, and then, as if withered by some untimely blight, to rapidly decline to the third era, when the enthusiasm for the revival of the Pagan arts and literature, joined with the influence of the Reformation's devastating principles, caused its total neglect, but fortunately, not its destruction. For happily, after a lapse of three woful centuries, the spirit of ancient times is reappearing, and we need only refer to the completion of Cologne Cathedral, and the zeal with which it is carried forward, as a proof that Christian art was not dead during that long space of time, but in a slumber, from which, perhaps, in our generation, it may completely arise, and adapting itself, with that plasticity peculiarly its genius, to the necessities of the age, exhibit more glorious developments than the world has yet seen.

"The wisest reform," says Lord Bacon, "is renewal," and those who hope to advance, must travel backwards 'till they reach the true starting point for future development, which is none other than that at which art began to decline. We must arrive at a knowledge, not only of the principles which guided, but of the motives which influenced the artists of the middle ages. And having obtained this much knowledge, the inferiority of modern works will be no marvel to us. Information of this kind is only attainable by a careful study, not only of the works of the middle ages, but by a loving obedience to the spirit which dictated them. This spirit is the genius of the Catholic Church, beyond whose influence all experience teaches us that it is impossible to produce works of highest art. Examinations of the works themselves cannot suffice, for they will only show us the surface of things. To penetrate to the moving spirit, we must study the lives of the great and good men who produced those glorious works of old, and labour to imitate their example in more respects than in their arts. We will, by this means, learn that it was not for worldly emolument or individual glory these men laboured, but for the honour of God's sanctuary, and the propagation of his religion. They did not even esteem their works so much as beautiful productions of highest art—as vehicles of instruction on the sublimest points of Christian revelation. "Everything in the Church," says Durandus, bishop of Mende, in the twelfth century, "is full of divine signification and mystery. Everything in it abounds with celestial sweets, when one knows how to look at it—when one knows how to draw honey from the hardest stone, and the oil from the hardest flint." The great poet of the middle ages, Dante, says:—

— from things sensible alone ye learn
That which, digested rightly, after turns
To intellectual."

A modern poet has called pointed architecture "the petrification of the Christian religion." Did our space permit, we might multiply quotations from the fathers and schoolmen, as well as from the more recent divines of the Catholic Church, all tending to the same effect—the demonstration that Christian art was a symbolical language, expressive of the doctrines and discipline of the Christian Church. In our own times, a learned ecclesiastic, unhappily not in communion with the Catholic Church, but who, in his writings, exhibits many traits of true Catholic spirit, speaks as follows—"I proceed, then, to show that ecclesiastical architecture is a language; that it has always, so long as it deserved its name, aimed at expression, and not at mere accommodation without splendour; or even at splendour without a spirit and a meaning. That from the first it was rational: that it had a soul and a sense which it laboured to embody and convey to the beholder. And while we are thus proving that ecclesiastical architecture was a language which expressed something, we shall also find that, from the very first, the things which it expressed were appropriate, that it was characteristic in its intellectual expressions; that its character was theological, doctrinal, Catholic, exclusive; aiming not only at accomodating a congregation, but at elevating their devotions and informing their minds; attaching them to the Spiritual Church, of which the earthly building is the symbol, and leading them onwards to that heavenly Jerusalem of which the material fabric is, as it were, the vestibule. Hence, a Christian Church always embodied some of the mysteries of the Christian religion, as the mystery of the Trinity;—always shadowed forth some part of the ecclesiastical polity, as the division of the church into clergy and laity;—always conveyed some instruction on religion and morals, as for instance, in the texts of Holy Scripture, or certain moral lessons written on the walls;—and always pre-supposed a Catholic worship, that is, a worship separate from error, and from the perversions of all sectaries."

Symbolism appears, then, to be the great principle and object of mediæval art, and all those elements of beauty, which have been ascribed by modern writers on art, as the characteristics of pointed architecture, have been produced by it. Symbolism, fitness, and, we may add, expression, as arising from both, are the true causes of all artistic effect in architecture; and inasmuch as works of art deviate from these principles, in the same proportion do they depart from excellence; and inasmuch as we are ignorant of them, in the same ratio are we incapable of understanding or of appreciating the works which are based on them.

Some Catholics, whose idea of a Church is limited to the semi-Protestant opinion, of its being merely a place set apart in which the faithful are to pray and receive instruction, will be surprised at the notion of the material fabric being an exposition of the spiritual Church, and will scarcely understand that "A Gothic Cathedral does, as it were, and scarce by a metaphor, praise God. It is not merely a place wherein, but with which the Church worships the Almighty. Its vast and complex unity, its simple melody, so to speak, and its full and intricate harmony, is as a noble hymn of praise, continually ascending to the Most High, and carrying up with it the chorus of accordant hearts." And indeed we must confess, that we are not astonished at this sort of incredulity, for it is impossible that churches of modern erection, could convey any symbolical expression, when they were designed and erected without any regard to such significance. But, we regret that the error has extended itself so widely, and sunk so deeply into the minds even of many well educated persons, that they consider material symbolism, rather in the light of an exercise for the mind of the curious enquirer or antiquary, than as a language at any time capable of being popularly intelligible. How fallacious this opinion is, may be easily understood by a reference to those remains of Catholic symbolism which are yet preserved. Who does not know the spiritual meaning of every article of the priest's vestments, or of the altar stone and its five crosses, or of the lights used during the office of Tenebræ in Holy week, or, in fact, of the numerous ceremonies (which are symbols) in the administration of the sacraments, and in all the offices of the Catholic Church? "It should be observed, moreover," says a learned and pious writer,* "that the spirit of the middle ages was peculiarly favourable to this method, so that the symbols adopted in the ritual of the Church, must have then possessed extraordinary charms in the estimation of all ranks of society. No object, or occasion, seemed too trifling to furnish matter for the exercise of their disposition to view things in the light of symbols. Ives of Chartres, receiving a comb as a present from his dear friend, Gerard, in reply to him, interprets it as an emblem which can teach him the duties of his episcopal office. The laity evince the same inclination; men that were not all tongue, but deeds and truth, would thus in the common intercourse of life, in dumb significance proclaim their thoughts, and, as Shakspeare witnesseth in the Temple Garden, give, in the plucking of a red rose, or a white, an answer to the summons of Plantagenet. Dom Claude de Vert, a learned Benedictine, in his work upon the ceremonies of the Church, offered a simple and natural explanation of most of them. Languet, Archbishop of Sens, published a reply, and assigned to them a wholly symbolical origin. Both of these views, no doubt, were just. As Duns Scotus remarks of the sacred Scriptures, the divine offices of the Catholic Church, have a literal, and a spiritual or mystic sense; which last in three-fold division, was either allegorical, tropological, or anagogical, referring either to what was to be believed, performed, or hoped, and sometimes one sign or word, like that of the cross, or the name of Jerusalem comprised all—a literal sense, signifying an event, or a city; a tropological, denoting trust and sanctity; an allegorical, denoting the Church militant; and an anagogical, signifying the triumphant Church. No one who loves to study the doctrine of perception, in reference to the beauties of poetry and art, can be insensible to the care evinced by the Church, to press into her service, everything which can bring unity into a visible form; and, indeed, the great charm and might of poetry over human life, is never more fully felt, than when it employs consecrated figures and symbols to express the mystery of our existence in the world of wishes, and the ideas of anticipation which console it. That the symbolic sense was intended in the ceremonies of faith, is proved from the ancient fathers."

"But, it was not in words alone," continues the same author, "that the enigmatical expression of the Church was conveyed. Her ceremonies also were high symbols, demonstrating things of which the mystic sense, and invisible truth, are known by divine illumination to the angelic spirits. Philosophers and poets will find no works more rich in profound and beautiful thoughts, than those which are designed to develope, and explain the ecclesiastical symbols, written during the middle ages, by such men as Hugo, and Richard of St. Victor, Durandus, Durante, Remy of Auxene, Horore St. Autun, St. Bruno of Aste, Martene, and many others.

David Lamenteth Saul and Jonathan.

"And David made this kind of lamentation over Saul and over Jonathan his son, and he said: Consider, O Israel, for them that are dead, wounded on thy high places. The illustrious of Israel are slain upon thy mountains: how are the valiant fallen."—11. Kings, 17, 18, 19.

MOURN, mourn, oh! hapless Israël,
Mourn, for thy mighty Slain,
Whose bones bestrew the mountain and the plain!
Mourn for the fallen Brave,
The great, heroic ones, who dwell
Now in the shadowy chambers of the grave.

How are the Valiant overthrown!
Oh, tell it not in Geth!
Oh, breathe not there the sad tale of their death!
And let there be no voice
To publish it in Ascalón,
Lest the Uncircumcised thereof rejoice!

On you, ye mountains of Gilbó,
No more may rain-showers fall,
For on your heights was lost the shield of Saul!
On your unhallowed soil
That noble monarch was laid low—
He, the Anointed King, the Sanctified with oil!

From quaffing blood, from hewing flesh,
The sword of Saul ne'er shrank!
How often Jonathan's sharp arrows drank
The life-stream of his foes!
How oft came down their blades afresh
With weighty and exterminating blows!

Daughters of Israel, weep and mourn!
Weep for the True and Bold,
Who gave you glittering ornaments of gold,
And clad you in rich array!
How has the land been left forlorn,
Since Jonathan and Saul have passed away!

Lovely were Jonathan and Saul,
Comely, and brave, and fair,
And Death could not divide this peerless pair.
Swift eagles on their flight,
Fierce and strong lions loosed from thrall,
Were those whose beds are on the hills to-night!

Alas! my soul is trouble-tost!
Dear wert thou unto me,
My brother Jonathan! my love for thee
Passed Woman's love by far!
How is the land left lorn and lost,
For broken lie the weapons of its war!

Note to Calderon's "St. Patrick's Purgatory."

The following lines were inadvertently omitted from their proper place—they should follow the second line of Ludovico Enio's history, page 48, second col.
Great Egerio, king of Ireland, I Am Ludovico Enio—a Christian also—
In this do Patrick and myself agree
And differ, we being Christians both,
And yet as opposite as good from evil.
But for the faith which I sincerely hold.
(So greatly do I estimate its worth)
I would lay down a hundred thousand lives—
Bear witness, thou, all-seeing Lord and God!

THE PURGATORY OF ST. PATRICK.

THERE has been scarcely any play of Calderon more admired in Germany, for its religious character and poetical beauty, than that of Saint Patrick's Purgatory: to us it has the additional attraction of being written upon a period of our history in which we all feel a lively interest, and in connexion with a name which, as long as Christianity exists in this country, must be dear to every Irishman; so many interesting memories crowd around the wild shores of Loch Dearg and its famous islands—so many strange and fascinating legends have centered in this spot—which circulating through Europe, were powerful enough to awaken even the imagination of a Dante, and in this way to contribute no mean portion to the foundation of modern literature—that we shall call the attention of the reader to them in our introduction to the second Act; at present we shall only allude to that version of the old legend which we are satisfied Calderon had before him when he composed his play, and which, from the total absence of all information of this or any other kind in the various editions, we have only been enabled to discover, after much investigation and with considerable difficulty.

In the year 1627, Juan Perez De Montalvan, a Spanish writer of considerable repute, published at Madrid a small octavo volume, on the life and purgatory of Saint Patrick (Vida y Purgatorio de S. Patricio), which must have been well received, as it was republished in the same city, in 1655. Before this second edition appeared, it had been translated into French under the following title, “Histoire de la vie et du Purgatoire de S. Patrice, Archesveque et Primat d'Hybernie Mise en Francois par le R. P. Francois Bouillon, de l'ordre de S. Francois, et Bachelier en Theologie.” This translation was published at Troyes, but the title-page bears no date. As, however, at the end of the “Avis au Lecteur” there is the usual “Approbation” of two Doctors in Theology, certifying that they had read the work, and that it contained nothing contrary to faith and good morals, which was given at Paris on the 7th December, 1642; the life, in all probability, was published at the beginning of the following year.* It was translated into the Portuguese language by the Rev. Father Manuel Caldeira, and the Lisbon edition of 1738, which we have seen, agrees substantially with the French version of Bouillon.

In 1627, when Montalvan first published his life and Purgatory of Saint Patrick, Calderon was in his 27th year, and was probably serving in Italy with the army; and in 1655, when the second edition appeared, he was already in the third year of his priesthood. As, after his entrance into holy orders, he confined his dramatic labours exclusively to religious subjects, it is extremely probable that his drama on the Purgatory of Saint Patrick was written about this period. It will be very interesting, as we proceed in our translation, to see how Calderon uses his materials, and in what respect his work differs from or excels the simple legend on which it is founded: it would be more satisfactory to use Montalvan's own work for this purpose, but as we have been unable to procure a copy, we must rest satisfied with the French and Portuguese versions, above alluded to. By this means we shall be able to form some opinion of the manner in which he constructed his plays, and, perhaps, of the system which enabled him to write so rapidly and so much; we shall see that, like Shakspeare, he availed himself largely of what had been written on the subjects of his dramas, but which, it must be confessed, he appears to have used with considerably less skill.†

ACT I.

KING EGERTIO enters, clad in skins, raging violently, LAOGHAIRE, POLONIA, LESBIA, and the CAPTAIN holding him.

King. Let me cast my life away!

Laogh. My lord, detain thee!

Capt.

Listen!

Lesb.

Look!

Polon.

O stay!

King. Let me from this point that shines afar,

Upraised in Heaven, with one brightest star,

Its rugged brow is crowning.

Down, where the rocks above the waves are frowning,

There mid the wild salt billows let me lie,

And as I raging live, so raging die.

Lesb. To the sea—what madness press'd thee?

Polon. In thy sleep, my lord, what fear possess'd thee?

King. Every torment that doth dwell

For ever, with the thirsty fiends of hell,

Children of that monstrous mother,

Which, from out seven scaly necks, doth smother

The fourth sphere of death,

Clouding it o'er with pestilential breath;

All its horror, all its wild unrest,

Were locked within my breast—

So that against myself I wage unnatural strife,

For terror is the master of my life,

And such the torment of its dread alarms,

I lie a living corse in slumber's arms,

And all the dreams that round me wait,

Are but the palid messengers of fate:—

† Upon the subject of the Versification used by Calderon and the other Spanish Dramatists, the following passage expresses almost all that I have to say on the subject: “The ordinary versification of Spanish plays was until imitated of late years, by some of the living German tragic authors, unlike that of any known theatre; their Dramas are commonly written in lines of eight syllables in Trochaic metre, and with what are called asonante terminations: that is to say, that the two last syllables of the alternate lines consist of the same vowels, without paying regard to the consonants, thus the words ‘rapid,’ ‘maxim,’ ‘artist,’ ‘hardship,’ ‘establish,’ ‘having,’ ‘magic,’ ‘Cardiff,’ and a ‘sad kiss,’ would be said to asonar; this would bear no resemblance to rhyme in English, and we have, therefore, substituted blank verse instead.”—Blackwood, June 1825, vol. 17. In this, so far as the asonante lines are concerned, I have followed the example of this writer, but in the other equally frequent metre, in the consonantes or complete rhythms where the first line rhymes with the fourth and the second with the third, I have generally imitated the original as nearly as I could: I agree with a later writer (Blackwood: January, 1840) that unrhymed trochaics are generally a better substitute, in English, for the asonante lines, than blank verse. They are often, however, much too light and lyrical for the grave sentiments they would have to express, and would be quite unsuited, for instance, to the solemn discourses of Patrick, or the dark and tragic history of Enio, in this act; I have therefore, in these and similar circumstances adhered to the more stately cadence of the ten syllable blank-verse. In addition to the Metres already mentioned, Calderon occasionally uses almost every other mode of versification known on the continent, including the sonnet form and the Ottava Rima of the Italians; in this translation of the “Purgatory,” the irregular lines of the opening scene are in imitation of the original.

* Mr. Wright, in his curious but very prejudiced and occasionally offensive “Essay on St. Patrick's Purgatory” (London: 1844), is in error in supposing that Bouillon's “Vie de S. Patrice” was not published until 1701, the copy alluded to above is in the Library of the Royal Dublin Society, and bears the date (1642) which I have mentioned. To prevent unnecessary references and repetitions it may be as well to state that all the notes to this translation are by the translator.

Polon. What so much provoked thee in thy dream?

King. Ah! my daughters, listen, there did seem
From out the lips of a most lovely youth
(And though a miserable slave in sooth,
My hand against his life I durst not raise,
Being then compelled to spare, as now to praise,)
Well, from the lips of this poor slave there came
A gentle flame,
Which with a mild and lambent lustre blew,
And when it touched you two,
Within the living fire I saw you burned,
But, though I was between you, me it spurned;
And when to stay its rage I sought,
The fire would touch or wound me not, methought,
So that from that dream's abyss,
From that paroxysm,
From that lethargy of death I broke,
And in blind despair awoke.
And my terror still is such,
That flying, at each step I seem to touch
Once more that dreadful fire,
But now I also burn, as ye expire!*
Lesb. These are phantoms light and vain,
Mere chimeras of the brain,
Coming through the gate of dreams,
When the body lieth numb—

[A trumpet sounds.]

But what trumpet's this?

Capt. It seems,
Vessels to our port have come.
Polon. Let me go, my Lord, since thou
Knowest how my heart doth leap and bound
When I hear a trumpet's sound,
And a flush comes deepening o'er my brow,
And my whole frame doth rejoice,
As at a siren's voice;
Since inclined to arms and warlike deeds,
Music's martial clangour stirs my soul,
So that I cannot controul
My emotion; may the fame
Soon be mine, that ever valour breeds,
When my wafted name shall run
To the ever-glorious sun,
Sailing on a thousand waves of flame;
Or, on swift wings o'er the azure air,
Rivalling the goddess Pallas there!
'Twas but to know, I this excuse contrived,
If this is Phillip's ship that has arrived.

[Aside.
Exit.]

Laogh. Come, my lord, descend with me
To the white fringe of the rolling sea,
Which doth humbly bow its curled head
To this mountain, lone and dread;
Which, because it proudly braves
The sea and storm, must ever dwell
In a lone and sandy cell,
Guarded round by crystal waves.

Capt. Come, and all your cares forget,
At this snowy monster's sight—
Like a sapphire mirror set
In a rich frame, silver white.

King. Nothing now can bring relief,
Nothing now can wean me from my grief,
Or expel that ever-torturing guest,
From out the burning Etna of my breast.

Lesb. Is there any earthly sight more fair—
Can the world this miracle surpass—
Than to see a vessel softly gliding,
Like a plough the azure field dividing,
Or go breaking through the crystal glass.

With the light breeze for its willing slave,
Like a bird upon the rippling wave,
Or a fish within the yielding air?
Favourite of sea and sky,
It through the winds doth swim, and o'er the waves doth fly
But that sight were dreadful now,
Full of terror and affright,
For the sea is altered quite;
And the mountain billows roar,
And the ocean's lordly brow,
Is all deeply wrinkled o'er!—
Neptune from his rest awaking,
And his dreadful trident shaking,
And his angry visage baring,
Trieth now the sailors' daring.
Now the storm begins to rise,
Howling round the starry dome,
All is altered in a trice,
Pyramids of shining ice,
Snowy palaces of foam,
All are dashed against the skies.

Polonia enters.

Polon. Alas! alas!

King. Polonia, speak—
Polon. This fickle Babylon that tries
In its thirsty rage to seek
Even the dark and distant skies,
Hides in its remorseless womb
Myriads who for ever rest,
Each within his coral tomb,
Deep below the troubled wave,
In a shining silver cave:
Now the god, by rage possess'd,
Has loosed the winds and let them fly,
Raging over sea and sky;
Rushing o'er the waters dark,
They have struck the wretched bark—
She whose trumpet late did sound
Like a swan's funereal note—
I, who then a pathway found
Up that steep stupendous cliff,
Which upon the shore remote,
First receives the orient ray,
There I saw a mighty ship
Tossing like a summer skiff
On the waters cast away,
As the masts did rise and dip,
Saw I Phillip's banners wave
O'er the sinking vessel's grave;
Then I added more and more,
To the waves and tempest's roar,
By the gushing tears and sighs
Bursting from my lips and eyes!—

King. Mighty Powers! who rule on high,
Why so much my patience try
With such threatened ills as these?
Do you wish that I should seize
On the sceptre and the crown
Of thy conquered kingdom? Lo!
Thither shall I surely rise,
And with vengeful hand tear down
The azure palace of the skies!
Being a second Nimrod. So
That the world by me, perchance,
May escape its threatened doom.
Vainly may the billows roll,
Vainly may the thunders boom,
Vainly may the lightning's glance,
They shall never shake my soul!—

PATRICK, within.

Patr. Ah! me.

Laogh. Some mournful voice;
King. Who can it be?

Capt. Struggling through the cruel sea,
One strong swimmer seeks to save
His life from out the stormy wave,
Lesb. And his arms I see him stretch
To another sinking wretch,
Even in the jaws of death.

Polon. Stranger, whoso'er thou art,
Whom the furious tempest's breath,
Or a cruel fate, hath sent
To this lone and distant part,

* Egerio's Dream, as given by Calderon, agrees substantially with Jocelin's description, and differs only in one slight particular (the number of the flames) from that in Bouillon's Vie de S. Patrice. In the latter, the name of the Irish prince to whom Patrick was sold is not given; in Jocelin he is called Milcho: Calderon was either ignorant of this, and gave the king a name that was purely imaginary, or, considering it less musical than he would wish, gave him the more harmonious one of Egerio. The following is Jocelin's version: "And Milcho beheld a vision in the night: and behold Patrick entered his palace as all on fire, and the flames, issuing from his mouth, and from his nose, and from his eyes, and from his ears, seemed to burn him; but Milcho repelled from himself the flaming hair of the boy, nor did it prevail to touch him any nearer; but the flame, being spread, turned aside to the right, and catching on his two little daughters, who were lying in one bed, burned them even to ashes: then the South-wind blowing strongly dispersed their ashes over many parts of Ireland."—Pp. 17. 18., Jocelin's Life of St. Patrick, translated by Swift. (Dublin: 1804.)

Hither let thy course be bent,
If thou canst my accents hear,
May they o'er the waters be
A vocal polar-star for thee!

Enter PATRICK and LUDOVICO, dripping with wet, and embracing one another; as they enter, each falls to either side.

Patr. Aid me O God!

Lud. The Devil rather

Aid me.

Lesb. I'm moved to pity, father:

King. That am not I—I know not what it is.

Patr. If misfortunes are a test

Wherewith to try the coldest, flintiest breast;

Say, can there here be found a heart like his,

Who would not down his pitying eyes incline

To such misery as mine?

A wretched, shivering, shipwrecked castaway—

Pity, for God's sake, at thy feet I pray.

Lud. I ask it not, for never more can I

Seek it from man, or hope it from on high.

King. Say who you are, we then shall know

If we can pay the debt we owe—

The common debt of food and care—

But first my name I shall declare,

Lest ignorance of it might lead

Your lips some idle deed to do,

And words perchance be spoken, freed

From the respect that is my due—

I am the King Egerio; Lord

Of this small kingdom's island throne—

'Tis small because 'tis mine—until

The throne of all the world I fill,

I must mistrust my valorous sword!

In savage skins you see me drest,

Not in a monarch's regal vest,

Because without, I wish to wear,

In this wild wolfish robe of hair,

Some emblem of the heart I bear!

The name of God is here unknown,

In prayer we neither kneel nor sigh,

Our only creed is this alone

That we are born, and we must die.

Now that you know my greatness and my name,

Say who you are and why you hither came.

Patr. Attend, O Monarch! Patrick is my name,

My country Ireland, Tox my native village—

A place so poor as to be scarcely known;*

Between the north and west remote it lies

Upon a mountain, which the watchful sea

Girdles around as with a prison wall:

'Tis in the isle, which will be called, O King!

To its eternal praise, the Isle of Saints,

So many there will piously give up

Their lives as holy offerings for the faith—

That truest test of pure and faithful souls—

* The account which Patrick gives of himself is evidently taken from Montalvan, which can be proved in a satisfactory manner even by means of Bouillon's French translation. The historical inaccuracies into which Calderon has fallen in this speech, and indeed throughout the play, are probably to be found in the original, and may be some of those errors which, in the preface to his version, Bouillon states were corrected by him. Two or three occur at the very beginning; namely, the country and village in which St. Patrick was born. As to the first, it appears so glaringly incorrect, even from the subsequent adventures which are detailed a few lines afterwards, that it is not easy to conjecture how Calderon or Montalvan could possibly have fallen into such a mistake. As to the name of the village (Tox), it is an error much more easily committed, but where they found it I have not been able to discover. The reader is aware that on the authority of St. Fiech's Hymn (the most ancient life of St. Patrick in existence), "Holy Tours" in France was the birth-place of the Saint. From the extract which I shall presently give from Bouillon, it will be perceived that Calderon, in placing the village "between the north and west" (entre el septentrion y el occidente) merely followed the description of the entire island in the life; but in addition to this he puts into the mouth of St. Patrick a very curious anachronism which has scarcely been surpassed. Bouillon's life opens thus: "Between the north and west there is an island which is called Hibernia or more commonly Ireland. This country, through respect, was formerly named the isle of saints, because a great number of its inhabitants, being illuminated by supernatural lights, adored the true God and generously exposed their lives in defence of the Catholic faith." &c.—La Vie de S. Patrice, pp. 11, 12. This, which is perfectly correct in a History written long after the circumstances occurred, is put almost verbatim, and in the same tense, into Patrick's mouth long before even he had commenced his mission, and when the country was still Pagan. I have in my translation taken the liberty of changing the tense of the verb lamentaron to the future, and of making his knowledge of the fact prophetic. As to the martyrs, the dramatist has also gone beyond the Historian; the latter only stating that many persons exposed themselves to the danger of martyrdom, not that they absolutely suffered it. It has been the boast and sometimes the reproach of this country that the Christian religion was firmly planted here without the blood of a single martyr being shed.

My father was an Irish cavalier†
My mother, his chaste spouse, a child of Gaul,‡
To them I owe, even in my youngest days,
(More than my life) the nobler gift of faith,
And early entrance to the church of Christ.
The holy rite baptismal gave me these,
That gate of Heaven, and the first sacred boon
The church doth give her children: by my birth,
My pious parents having all fulfilled
The duties that they owed the married state,
They each to separate convents then retired,§
Where in the purest chastity they spent
Their lives, until the fatal hour arrived
Which calls the blessed spirit to the skies,
And gives the body to its kindred earth:
I then became an orphan, and was placed
Beneath a holy matron's watchful care,||
But scarce had I my first brief lustrum filled—
Scarce had the sun five times in splendour sailed
In golden circles through the heavens, illuming
Twelve starry signs and one terrestrial world—
When God was pleased to show in me a sign
Of his omnipotence; for he doth ever choose
Most feeble instruments, that men may give
The glory and the praise to him alone;
Upon a day (and Heaven doth know, I tell
These wonders unto you through no weak pride,
But that God's name be praised) upon a day,
The blind man Gormas came unto my doors,
God sent me here, he cried, and he commands
That you do give me sight. Immediately
Moved at the man's obedience, I did make
The sign of the cross upon his sightless balls,
And with the touch, the blessed sight did come
And chase the darkness from his wondering eyes:
Another time, when thick clouds hid the skies
Which warr'd with snowy arrows 'gainst the earth,
So many on a neighbouring hill had fallen
That when they felt the rigour of the sun,
And melted, such a flood throughout
Our village ran, that all the houses seemed Like ships of brick or stone above the waves,
(Who before this saw ships on rugged hills,
Or sail amid the grassy inland woods?)
Upon the waves I made the holy sign,
And with suspended tongue, in God's great name
Bade them retire, and lo! the land was dry!¶
O mighty Lord! who will not speak thy praise!
Who will not own and worship thee O God!
Much greater wonders I could tell thee: but

† It is scarcely necessary to say that this is another mistake of Calderon, or his authority Montalvan. Calpurnius, the father of St. Patrick, was in all probability a native of France, as was his wife.

‡ Conchessa, sister of the celebrated St. Martin, Bishop of Tours.

|| Patrick, however, who was still of a tender and infantine age, was committed to the tutelage and guardianship of an aunt, already advanced in years.—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 17.

¶ Jocelin mentions the miracle of the blind man Gormas, but says nothing of the inundation, they are both given in Bouillon, and in words which Calderon but slightly altered: "Gormas, born in a little village near to that of the saint, being blind from his birth, incessantly importuned Heaven with his prayers that it would vouchsafe to listen in pity to his entreaties, opening for him his eyes to see and contemplate its beauty, and to enjoy the light of the sun, to the end that he might praise the more the author of all these rare wonders. And, as he was one day in the fervour of his devotion, he heard a voice in the air sound in his ears, commanding him to go and seek Patrick, still a little infant newly baptized, who would thrice make the sign of the holy cross upon his eyes, the sight of which by a natural defect he had been fatally deprived, all of which he experienced to his great content, for, having obeyed the voice which spoke to him, he obtained happily the fruit of all his ardent prayers: God wishing to make known by this miracle the future wonders which he would one day work through the instrumentality of this his servant.

"The same Sovereign Good again renewed this truth by another wonder if not more remarkable, at least more extensive and more public than the first and much more highly praised by the spectators who had seen the prodigy. The miracle was this: The heavens, through the inclemency of the air, having covered with snow all the surface of that country, which beginning to melt or resolve itself into liquid water by means of the rays of the sun, there was formed, as it were, a little deluge which inundated almost all the surrounding country, and winding in its rapid course from village to village went ravaging the entire district, flooding the fields and drowning the houses, so much so that that of Patrick was on the point of being overwhelmed and levelled to its foundations; then the tender youth, who had scarcely reached the age of eleven or twelve years, seeing so strange a disaster, armed with a constant faith, made the sign of the cross upon the furious waves of this little deluge; and immediately in the sight of all the world, the waters retired into the bosom of the sea, and the land remained afterwards as dry as in the most extreme heat of summer."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 13.

Modesty comes and bindeth fast my tongue,
 And chains my voice, and sealeth up my lips :
 I grew in fine, inclining every day
 More to the love of science than of arms ;
 And, above all, gave myself up entire
 To pious reading—to the lives of those Called to be saints by God—a school wherein Religion, Charity, and Faith are taught :*
 Occupied in this pursuit, one day I went,
 With some companions, to the lone sea shore ;
 Thither a ship came, from whose dusky womb
 Leaped armed men, pirates they were, who prowled
 In search of prey about those seas—they made
 All of us prisoners, and to keep the prize,
 Hoisted their sails and stood to the open sea,†
 Phillip de Roqui was this vessel's chief,
 A man who nourished in his heart the pride
 That afterwards would work him direful woe.
 Some days he spent in prowling thus around
 The land and sea of all the Irish coast,
 And blood and treasure followed in his wake :
 Me alone he kept, desiring, as he said,
 To offer me a tribute unto thee,
 Here in thy very presence, as thy slave :
 (How vain and false are all the hopes of man,
 That are not based upon God's blessed will !)
 This very day upon the smiling sea,
 In sight of land, did Phillip speak his wish,
 The air was mild, and gentle was the wave,
 And yet in one brief moment did he see
 His proud presumption shattered : For the wind
 Roared in the hollow bosoms of the waves,
 A cry of pain burst from the angry sea,
 Billows, like mountains upon mountains piled,
 Pass'd thundering by, whose white and foaming tops
 Moisten'd the sun, and quenched his dazzling light !‡
 The lantern on our mast, joined to the skies,
 Seemed like a comet or an exhalation,
 Or like the strange course of a shooting star ;
 Another time, amid the deeps profound
 It touched the sands, when the divided waves
 Showed alabaster monuments around,
 'Mid coral banks and caves of shining pearl :
 I on whom Heaven bestowed (I know not why,
 Being so useless) more of strength and breath
 Than mine own safety needed, was empowered
 To aid this valorous youth, to whom my heart
 Was drawn by some most potent influence,
 Which he with interest will yet repay !
 At length, through favour of kind heaven, we reached
 The shore, and whether fortune good or ill
 Awaits us, we confess ourselves your slaves :
 May our grief move you, may our bitter tears
 Soften your hearts, and may our whole affliction
 Gently compel you to relieve our woe.

King. Cease, miserable Christian, for my soul
 Charmed by thy voice, knows not what subtle power
 Compels it both to venerate and love you,
 Imagining that you the slave must be,
 Whom lately in my fearful dream I saw,
 Breathing out flames and sparks of living fire,
 In whose alluring light, like summer flies,
 I saw my hapless daughters both expire !

Patr. O King, the flame that issued from my mouth
 Is the true doctrine of the Gospel—is the Word
 Which I must preach to you and to your people,
 By means of which your daughters will become Children of Christ.§

King.

Be silent ! close thy lips,

* This description resembles that which is given of St. Patrick's father in Bouillon : "The reading of the beautiful actions of the Saints occupied the best part of his time."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 13.

† This agrees almost word for word with Bouillon's account : "When he was about sixteen years of age, walking one morning in the fresh cool air, by the coast of the sea, and reciting the psalms with some of his companions, he was seized by pirates who were coasting along this island, and was led captive with all who were with him, without any resistance or hope of succour but from Heaven ; for the pirates delighted at having gained so fine a prize, and fearing that they might escape, flung themselves so promptly into their vessels, in order to reach the open sea, that they could not easily save themselves from their hands."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 21.

‡ "The sea, mounting to the welkin's cheek,
 Dashes the fire out."

SHAKESPEARE. Tempest, Act. I. s. 2.

§ The explanation of the dream is given more at length in "La Vie de S. Patrice," p. 23, and in Jocelin, p. 18. The two agree substantially with each other, and with Calderon.

Thou miserable Christian, for thy words
 Affront and wound me.

Lesb. Oh ! be calm, my lord !

Polon. Wilt thou, in pity, speak in his defence?—

Lesb. Yes.

Polon. Nay, rather let him die.

Lesb. It is not just

That by a monarch's hands he perish. Ah !

If truth were told, not that alone doth move

My heart to pity these poor shipwrecked Christians ! [Aside.]

Polon. If this second Joseph to the king,

Like him of old, interprets dreams, do not||

My lord, have any fear of their effects ;

For if that fancied and unreal flame

Portend that I a Christian should become ;

It is a sheer impossibility, as great

As if being dead I should return again

And live and breath a mortal as before—

But to distract your thoughts from fears like these,

Now let us hear the other traveller's tale.

Lud. Listen, most beautiful divinity,

For thus begins the story of my life,¶

No simple tale of piety is mine,

Nor wonders worked by Heaven's permission through

My favoured hands—far different—all crimes,

Theft, murder, treason, sacrilege, betrayal

Of dearest friends, all these I must relate,

For these are all my glory and my pride !

In one of Ireland's many islands I

Was born, and much I do suspect that all

The planets seven, in wild confusion strange,

Assisted at my most unhappy birth,

The fickle moon, gave me inconstancy,

Mercury gave me genius ill employed,

(Far better not to have received the gift !),

Lascivious Venus gave me siren passions,

¶ It is somewhat amusing to find Polonia so well versed in the history of the Old Testament—what suggested the allusion to Joseph was probably the following passage in Bouillon : "Patrick came to land upon the borders of Hibernia, where he was sold, like a second Joseph, to the prince of that island."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 21.

¶ The curious history of Ludovico Enio, on which the principal interest of the play depends, has been alluded to, and given more or less fully by many ancient authors. The name, though slightly altered by the different persons who have mentioned him, can easily be recognised as the same in all, whether as Owen, Oien, Owain, Eogan, Euenius, or Ennius. Perhaps the earliest allusion to him in any printed English work is that contained in "Ranulph Higden's Polychronicon," published at Westminster, by Winkin de Worde, in 1495 : "In this Steven's tyme, a knyght that hyght Owen wente in to the Purgatory of the second Patrick, abbot, and not byshoppe. He came agayne and dwelled in the nedes of the abbaye of Ludene of Whyte Monks in Irland, and tolde of joye and of paynes that he had seen." The history of Enio had, however, existed in MS. for nearly three centuries and a half before the Polychronicon was printed ; it had been written by Henry, the monk of Salterey in Huntingdonshire, from the account which he had received from Gilbert, a Cistercian monk of the Abbey of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Luden, in Lincolnshire (Colgan, Trias Thaumaturge, p. 281. Ware's Annals of Ireland, A. D. 1497). Colgan, after collating this MS. with two others on the same subject which he had seen, printed it nearly in full in his Trias, which was published at Louvain, A. D. 1647, where with the notes it fills from the 273rd to the 281st page. Mathew Paris had, however, before this, in his History of England, under the date 1153, given a full account of the adventures of Oënius in the Purgatory, and in the few places that I have compared his account with that given in Colgan, I find both generally agreeing in substance, though not in words. In the folio edition of Mathew Paris, London, 1604, the history of Oënius begins at the 72nd and ends at the 77th page. In the French life of St. Patrick, which I have so often quoted, the adventures of Ennius (as he is called) are given much more fully than either in Mathew Paris or Colgan. In their versions of the story the early life of Ennius, previous to his undertaking to enter the Purgatory, is passed over with a few general remarks as to its extreme wickedness—while they give in great detail all that he saw and heard therein. Mathew Paris, for instance, opens the story of Ennius in these words : "Miles quidam Oënius nomine, qui multis annis sub Rege Stephano militaverat—licentia a Rege impetrata, profectus est in Hyberniam ad natale solum, ut parentes visitaret. Qui cum aliquandiu in regione illa demoratus fuisset, cepit ad mentem reducere vitam suam adeo flagitiosam : Quod ab ipsis cumulis, incedentis semper vacaverat et rapinis, et quod magis dolebat, se ecclesiarum fuisse violatorem et rerum ecclesiasticarum invasorem preter multa enormia qua intrinsicose latebant peccata." &c.—Mat. Paris, p. 72. In Henry of Salterey's account, as given by Colgan, this portion of Enio's life is despatched even with more succinctness, but in Bouillon's Vie de S. Patrice all his early crimes are detailed nearly in the order and almost in the very words that Calderon has used, as shall presently appear. Sir Walter Scott mentions, in his Border Minstrelsy, that there is a curious MS. Metrical Romance, in the Advocates' Library of Edinburgh, called, "The Legend of Sir Owain," relating his adventures in St. Patrick's Purgatory ; he gives some stanzas from it, descriptive of the knight's passage of "The Brig O'Dread ;" which, in the legend, is placed between Purgatory and Paradise. This poem is supposed to have been written early in the 14th century. There is another English poem on the same subject, of a much later date, in the manuscripts of the British Museum. There are many early French and Italian poems and romances founded on this legend, to which I shall more particularly allude in my introduction to the Second Act.

 "Louis Ennius was born in the island of Hibernia, whence he departed with his parents, while still young, in consequence of a misfortune that happened to them, which compelled them to quit their country so that they came to dwell at Toulouse."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 106. Perpignan is mentioned shortly afterwards as the place where the convent was situated.

And ruddy Mars a hard and cruel mind
 (What will not Mars and Venus jointly give ?)
 The sun conferr'd upon me rank and state—
 Which to support I scrupled not the means,
 Jupiter gave me pride and lofty thought,
 And Saturn blended in my complex nature
 Rage, anger, valour, and a ready mind—
 And fitting fruits have grown from out these seeds—
 My father, being for certain secret reasons
 Banish'd from Ireland, came with me to live
 At Perpignan in Spain—I was a boy
 Of ten years old, and when six more had passed
 He died—may Heaven for ever be his home !—
 An orphan I remained—a willing prey
 To all my fancies—all my wild desires—
 And thus without a rein or curbing check,
 Ran headlong o'er the wide alluring plain—
 The two poles of my life, were love and play,
 On which the rest were balanced, what they were
 As a foundation you can now behold—*
 In long detail my tongue would not suffice
 For all my actions—this is but a sketch :
 To force a tender damsel to my wish
 I slew a noble venerable man
 Her father—nay an honoured cavalier,
 I stabb'd (through frenzied passion for his wife)
 As he lay sleeping calmly by her side—
 Bathing his dearest honour in his blood—
 Making his bed a fatal theatre,
 And mingling there adultery and death—
 Husband and father both gave up their lives
 Martyrs to honour—for it has its martyrs
 Even as Religion—may the atoning Heaven
 For ever guard their souls in endless rest !—
 Flying from punishment I entered France,
 Where long my name and actions shall be known ;
 For flinging myself at once into the war,
 Which between France and England then was waged,
 I found occasion to display my valour,
 And soon obtained even from the king's own hands,†
 A captain's standard—in what way the debt
 I soon repaid I shall not now relate—
 Returning thus in honour to Perpignan,
 And gaming in a guard-house for some trifle,
 I struck a serjeant, killed a captain,
 And in my fury wounded several more—
 Attracted by the noise, the guard approached
 To make me prisoner, when in self-defence,
 I slew a bailiff—much too small amends
 For all the other evils I had done—‡
 May God receive his soul in lasting bliss !
 At length I fled into the fields, and found
 Asylum in a sacred convent's walls,
 Which in that desert far away was built,§
 There I lay retired, with kindest care
 Attended even by one of the religious,
 A lady of my kindred, who for this
 Discharged that duty || Like a basilisk,

* "Louis seeing himself liberated and free from every kind of restraint on the part of his relatives, the now inheritor of great riches which his father left to him at his death, commenced his excesses by the dangerous allurements of love and play."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 106.

† "And, as he was courageous and bold, he performed many brave exploits, and in a short time acquired the reputation of a valiant captain, so much so that the Lieutenant of the company being killed, he succeeded him in his command."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 123. Calderon gives the name of Stephen to the French king, confounding him with the English Stephen, in whose reign, according to the legends, Enio entered the "Purgatory."

‡ This is mentioned somewhat differently in Bouillon. The account he gives is this: that Enio, gaming with a serjeant lost to him all his money, and, with the peevishness of a losing gamester, began to upbraid his successful competitor in the most opprobrious manner. The serjeant, thinking, from the sum he had won, that he could afford to keep his temper, disregarded Enio's abuse, and when the latter demanded back (what appears to have been not unusual) a portion of the other's winnings, he only gave him four crowns. This by no means satisfied Enio, who instantly blew out the candle, fell upon the luckless serjeant, and not only took from him by force all that he had himself lost, but all that the other had brought to play with, and then laughing at him went away. This insult to one of the constituted authorities was too much, even for the indulgent Alguacils of Perpignan, so that our hero was compelled to withdraw himself for a while, and took shelter in the convent to which he presently alludes.—La Vie de S. Patrice, pp. 109, 110, 111.

§ "He took the resolution of withdrawing into a monastery of Religious, which was distant about two leagues from the city of Perpignan, where he remained secretly in the company of their father confessor, who was of his acquaintance."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 111.

|| This lady was his cousin. In the play, Enio afterwards says, that out of respect to her memory he will not mention her name. In "La Vie," however, she is called Theodosia: "But there was in this monastery one of his cousins-german, who had made profession therein, and where she had been for a considerable time, with whom he had been reared and educated from

My bosom turned the honey into poison
 And wildly rushed from liking to desire !
 Desire ! that monster which doth ever feed
 On the impossible—that living fire
 That groweth by resistance—that strange flame
 Which the wind kindles—that dissembling foe
 Which killeth its own master. In a word,
 Desire, unawed by God or sacred things,
 Imagines all that's horrible or vile,
 But to be it ¶—In fine, my lord, I dared :—
 Troubled by the recollection here my voice
 Grows mute—the frightened accent fails,
 My shattered heart in throbbing seems to leap
 From out my breast, as when in dusky shades
 The beard and hair, in terror, stand on end—
 Confused, and doubtful, sad and full of thought,
 I scarcely have the courage now to tell,
 The deed I had the courage then to do,
 So horrible and hateful is my crime,
 So sacrilegious and profane, that I—
 Even I, repent me sometimes of the deed—
 In fine, I dared, one night when starry silence
 Doth build for men brief sepulchres of sleep,
 When heaven doth wear the mournful veil of grief,
 Wherewith the wind doth hang the widow'd skies,
 For the sun's death, whose obsequies are sung
 By nightly birds—when trembling stars fling back
 Their clear reflection to the parent skies
 From sapphire waves. At such a time as this
 I entered by the garden wall, assisted
 By two companions (comrades never fail
 In such adventures), and twixt fear and horror,
 I reached the cell of her I must not name,
 She, horrified at such wicked boldness,
 Fainted upon the ground, from which she passed
 Into my arms, and ere her sense returned
 She was far off beyond the convent wall,††
 Where if heaven could have given her aid
 It did not. Women if once persuaded
 That man's excesses are the fruit of love
 Easily pardon them:‡‡ and thus, delight
 Replacing sorrow, she for a little while Escaped the misery of her wretched state—
 Although to it had every crime contributed
 Which rebel man can dare against his God.
 From out the desert where we first had gone,
 On rapid steeds§§, the children of the wind,
 Towards Valentia||| then we took our way—
 Where, feigning that she was my wife, we lived
 Some time with little happiness or peace.
 My money being exhausted, without friends
 Or hope of succour, I was base enough
 To think of turning to a vile account
 The beauty and the honour of my wife ¶¶
 (Had I not bade a long farewell to shame
 This act alone would make me—for it is
 The lowest depth even of the vilest breast
 To make a public traffic of one's honour
 And put a price upon our dearest joy).
 As soon as I with shameless face proposed
 This foulest project, she appeared content,
 But hid her true resolve within her breast,†††

his earliest years, and who stood very high for virtue and prudence in the estimation of her sisters ; she had on this account, a particular care of him, that he should want for nothing ; and all the others, also, studied who best could divert his thoughts from the contemplation of his disgrace."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 111.

¶ The beginning of this very fine and thoroughly Shaksperian passage, may have been suggested by the concluding sentence of the following extract: "This Louis being of the libertine and abandoned life, which we have described, and having his mind and inclination so naturally carried to evil, that he never saw anything that pleased him of which he did not desire the possession, and did not hope its enjoyment, however impossible it might have appeared."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 112.

 "The resolution being taken, he sought out two of his most intimate friends, to assist him in this pernicious undertaking."—La Vie de S. Patrice p. 115. (Tr.)

†† Calderon omits the pillage of the convent, which it appears by "La Vie" was very successfully executed.

‡‡ This passage, also, would seem to have been suggested by one in "La Vie," p. 115.

¶¶ "He was compelled to have recourse to the beauty of Theodosia."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 118.

 "This was to put publicly his honour to sale."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 120.

††† "Judge, if you can, what were the tears and resentment of Theodosia at receiving the last stroke of her misfortune."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 119.

But scarcely had I turned my back upon her,
 When, flying from me as from one infected,
 Once more she sought asylum and repose
 Within a convent; where, advised by one,
 A holy priest, again she closed the gate
 Of torment and the world—and then she died,
 Leaving to all a wonderful example
 Both of her penitence and crime.—May God
 Receive her, also, to eternal rest !*
 I seeing that the illiberal world
 Took notice of my crimes, that every spot
 Whereon to rest would slip beneath my feet,
 Resolved to go into my native country
 As an asylum from my enemies.†
 Upon the journey I set out and soon
 Reached Ireland, which received me as a son,
 But soon a very step-mother became,
 For scarcely had I reached a sheltered bay,
 Than I was made a prisoner by some pirates
 Who lay therein concealed. Their general
 Was Philip—and he, to show his sense
 Of the most brave resistance that I made,
 Gave me my life. What still remains you know—
 You know how late the angry wind rose up
 And flew with threatening fury round our ship;
 And made such ruin 'mid the seas and mountains,
 That all their usual wildness seemed but tame
 Compared to it. With catapults of crystal
 It struck the firm foundations of the land,
 And neighbouring cities fell within the wave.
 The sea o'er all the coast flung out its store
 Of tinted pearls, which the swift breath of morn
 Engenders from the dew, whose drops are tears
 Of fire and ice.—But not to lose more time
 In vain descriptions, all our crew went down
 To sup with Satan; I, who was also asked,
 Must have gone too, had not good Patrick here (Whose face, I know not why, I always view
 With love and terror mingled with respect),
 Had he not drawn me from the poisonous wave
 Where I was drinking death in every draught.
 This is my history; and now, nor life,
 Nor pity I require—I do not crave
 Even commiseration for my sufferings;
 If thou wilt give me anything, let it be Death only, for a man so bad as I
 Can never hope to reach to any good.

King. Ludovico though you are a Christian,
 Which I abhor with every other truth,
 I so admire your valour, that in you
 And Patrick I will now display,
 Even at the self-same moment, all my power;
 As I can elevate, so can I humble,
 As I can punish, so can I reward,
 And thus while unto you I stretch my arms
 In token of protection—unto you
 I lift them but to fling you to the earth
 Beneath my feet (not balanced are the scales).

[He flings Patrick on the ground and places his foot upon him.]

But that you, Patrick, may perceive how much
 I value all your threats your life I spare—
 Go breathe in fire the Word of God, thou'lt find
 I neither worship his divinity
 Nor fear his wonders. Live then, but in some Obscure and menial state, and as thou art
 Unfit to share the glorious toils of war,
 Here in these vallies must thou spend thy days,
 Tending my flocks and herds, that browse around,
 We soon shall see if thou can'st spread that fire

Of which thou speakest; or if, being my slave,
 Thy God will free thee from captivity.

[Exit.

Leob. The sight of Patrick moves my heart to pity.

[Exit.

Polon. For me I know not pity. If I did,
 I think 'tis Ludovico would awake it.

[Exit.

Patr. When, Ludovico, on the ground I lay,
 And saw you raised at once to Fortune's height,
 'Twas grief, not envy, it awoke within me—
 You are a Christian, oh! be one indeed.

Lud. Patrick, allow me to enjoy the bliss
 That Fortune offers.

Patr. This one boon I ask—

Lud. What is it?

Patr. That, alive or dead, we meet

In this world once again.

Lud. Dost thou demand

So strange a promise?

Patr. Yes.

Lud. 'Tis thine.

Patr. I take it.

[Exeunt.

A STORY OF IRELAND IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER IV.—THOMAS-COURT.

It might have been the fourth hour of the bell, in the evening, when the Lord Deputy and his guests found themselves under the proud roofs of Thomas-court. They had scarcely time to breathe—the ladies to lay aside their mantles, and the gentlemen their swords—when a few quick strokes of a silver-toned house-bell summoned them to dinner in the great hall. It was a chamber of princely dimensions, supported on either hand with rows of light Corinthian columns, swathed with wreaths of laurels, ivy, and other ever-greens; the capitals being bound with garlands of flowers. The floor was newly spread with rushes; mint, thyme, and other aromatic herbs were scattered over it. The walls above the wainscot were tapestried with various banners—the table extended between the pillars, down the entire room. At the extreme end, was the dais, on which the ladies, the deputy, the prior, Lord Portlester, and other noble guests sat. At an intermediate table, between this and the common board, Sir Piers was placed, Sir Gibbon, and the junior guests. Among these he joyfully recognized, nearly opposite to himself, Sir Morogh Na Gall, for whom he already felt that irresistible impulse of friendship which is one of the inexplicable sympathies of our Irish natures. On the table were the flesh of the deer and the wild boar, as well as of black cattle and sheep, cranes, partridges, and water-fowl. Beakers and flagons raised their heads above these in lines of circumvalation, holding the choicest foreign wines, the produce of Burgundy and Spain, usquebaugh tempered with honey and fennel seeds, and home-brewed beer. Behind the Earl's back, "the dresser" (since banished into the kitchen,) with all its blazonry of plate, was exhibited, and at his feet lay his two favourite greyhounds, looking up to him for their accustomed largesses. An ornamental ship, laden with spices that diffused a delicious odour, was placed near his right hand.

Grace having been said, the dinner commenced, and was soon over. Whether or not it was specially in honour of St. George, the entire company regaled themselves with most unanimous heartiness. If an

* Calderon skilfully and properly softens and alters the catastrophe in this place, which in the original is too painful. In "La Vie," it is stated that, after resisting a long time the abominable proposals of Ennius, the unfortunate Theodosia was at length compelled to submit to his wishes, and for ten years lived in the dreadful state to which she had been solicited. At the end of that period conscience again revived within her, and having received the grace of true repentance, she made a full confession of all her sins to a holy personage, who lived in a small village of Andalusia, who obtained for her admission into a convent as a servant. After some time her repentance and virtues again obtained for her the rank of sister; she lived six years in the convent, and at length died, "leaving to all the religious of this monastery the example of the most perfect life that up to that time had been seen amongst them."—La Vie de S. Patrice, pp. 120, 121.

exception could be found, it was, perhaps, in the Knight of Drimnagh, who, several times, ran the danger of slicing the fingers of his left hand with his knife, while his eyes were stealthily returning to the loveliness of the daughter of O'Connor. As she rose, with the other ladies of the household, to leave the room, his heart leaped violently upwards, as if it would have borne her company. He half rose in his seat, and leaned forward: she perceived him; smiled, blushed, and was gone in a moment. None in the presence seemed to have noticed this pantomime.

The attention of the noble company having exhausted itself on the edibles, now turned for relief to the fluids. At first, cautious measures were filled, and men shook their heads when persuaded to fill higher. Lights were brought, and the earl and some of the elder occupants of the dais retired. Then deeper draughts were poured, goblets were clinked in fellowship, the talkers began to have the majority over the listeners, and the whole scene to assume a bacchanalian character. Sir Piers, during the evening, had made rapid strides towards the affection of the strange Knight of Wexford.

"Sir Piers Barnwall," said Sir Morrogh, as the revel began to thicken, "what say you if we steal away from this upurious company. Anon this noise may turn to bickering."

"With all my heart, Sir Morrogh," answered the other, "but first fill me a full goblet to the fairest tenant of this noble house."

"I fill."

"Drink." It was drank.

"I did not ask you to name your fairest tenant," said the Wexford knight, as they emerged into the earl's garden, "because, being little of a wooer myself, I have small right to be curious on those who are. Is she nameless?"

"Not to you, Sir Morrogh, if you are to be my friend."

"Are to be!"

"Certes—I feel that in my breast which tells me I am beside the man who, of all the world, should be my choice for a friend."

"I am right willing to accept your friendship," said the errant knight, "although I had thought the spring-time of my affections had passed. I, too, feel some such voice as you speak of. We are brothers in arms!"

"Yea, brothers!"

"To stand by each other in danger and trial."

"In danger and trial!"

"To have no third brother!"

"None!"

"No secrets except those which honour may compel us to keep."

"None else!"

"Well, we are friends. See! how kindly the heavens look down upon our friendship!"

"Aye," said Barnwall, "it is a glorious evening; how placidly the white moon floats along her heavenly way."

"The moon is yellow," said Sir Morrogh.

"Oh, no, friend and brother, white. White is the hue of nature's loveliest works. The daisy—the ivy flower—the pear—marble, snow."

"And of your radiant lady's raiment. But the green grass, Master Barnwall, the blue sky—the mottled thrush that sings yonder in the bower."

"Sings! all singing is not music. Oh! I have heard those talk whose words were the divinest melody; the warbling of birds, the falling of crystal water in coral caves where sun or storm never enters, the pealing of trumpets, do not approach melody such as I have heard from human voices."

"Why, Sir Piers, brother mine, you are certainly in love. Tell me now, has not this daphne of Offally stolen away your wits?"

"No, no, not quite. Confess me, brother, you who have been far and near, who have feutered your spear and hacked your burganet in every clime in Christendy, have you ever seen on thrones, or in palaces, any maiden so matchless in beauty?"

"Truly I have seen no fairer."

"Nor so fair."

"To my taste, I have seen as fair, though I have not looked on any more so. What think you of the beauty of the earl's lesser daughter, Eustachia?"

"That 'tis childish!"

"It may be," said Sir Morrogh, slowly; "but is not that the caste of purity and bounding thought. Think you not that angels may be speaking through the pure lips of children, when we hear the very young utter truths that astart sages, and that their young souls which are happily darkened unto the world, till they are fit to do battle with it, have another and a luminous side turned towards heaven? Eustachia is a child in face, and almost in years; but, brother mine, there is a soul under that half-blown intelligence, greater than is common to the natures of woman."

"I doubt it not, as you say it is so," said Barnwall.

"You have learned, in the school of adventure, to make living faces your book. I cannot read the marvels of this volume, though you do."

Just then, from an adjacent walk of the garden, the new comrades could hear low, sweet, voices discoursing together. In the stillness of the hour, these words reached them distinctly:

"But what think you of our gallants—of the Knight of Drimnagh?"

"A very seemly, stout, distracted looking cavalier."

"Nay, nay, Nuala, most courteous, I think him."

"It may be, Alison; I noted it not."

"She noted it not!" repeated Sir Piers to his friend, who motioned him to walk aside, but he remained rooted to the spot.

"He is but poor," said Lady Alison, for it was the earl's daughter.

"In lands," replied her friend.

"In lands only," said a fine voice, that sounded silvery and solemn as the ringing of the altar bells, heard in an empty chancel, from within the rood-screen of a sanctuary; "his descent is from the Dukes of Brittany, and his first ancestor here, Sir Hugh Barnwall, had granted him by Prince John, the lands of Drimnagh, Terenure, and—"

"Eustace, sweet Eustace, cease; save us your rights of ferriage and fishing. Methought, Nuala, he looked wondrous amorous, when stooping to me he said—'Fair lady, how is your friend called who sits at your right hand?'"

"That was Eustace,"

"Nay, indeed, it was not."

"And what said you?"

"But that it sits with my humour to tell you, I would punish your patience, I warrant. I told him."

"And then."

"Why, then he ceased his comment; threw his head aback, and closed his eyes, as though he had been dazzled with the prospect of an angel passing between him and the sun."

"He has a noble bearing, withal. But, Alison, his heart, I opine, sits as lightly among its conceits as his own falcon on the many coloured plume of feathers."

"They are very deviceful bearings of the Barnwalls," said Eustace; "the legend of it is——"

"Eustace, Eustace, will you ever foresay this book-stuff? How can you discourse so, who never note the bleeding hearts in human breasts—the doves quartered before your eyes, and how all the myrtles planted in your smile, ever turn up, in the end, sorrowful willows?"

"Well-a-day, dear Alison, when were you in such a merrimake mood before? One would think Sir James Flem——"

"Hush, hush! hark!"

"I will speak to her," said Sir Piers, who, losing the sound of Nuala's voice, could remain in suspense no longer; and so he walked hastily down the pathway on which they had just entered. Morogh followed him. The pathway led into an open circle, the centre of the garden, where a fountain gushed up under the canopy of two broad apple trees, already beginning to be sown with blossoms. Here he perceived the three fair friends—pausing, surprised, but far from displeased at the apparition of his newly enlisted brother-in-arms. All soon joined in conversation.

While these hopeful hearts were beating up and down the avenues of that magnificent garden, conversing at first of the feats of the day—the brightness of the firmament—the advances of the spring season—the trees and flowers around them—themselves—and life, a different debate was held in the Lord Deputy's own chamber, where he was surrounded by his chief friends and allies.

This chamber was of nearly equal size with the dining hall, but its furniture was still more costly. The walls were hung with a gorgeous tapestry, on which was wrought the story of the migration of the Geraldines, in a succession of scenes, the chief of which was the debarkation of Æneas from Troy, and his landing in Italy; the Castle of Windsor, of which William de Windsor, a Geraldine, was constable; the arrival of Maurice Fitzgerald's ship, as precursor to Strongbow, at Baginbun, with many embellishments of the after career of the Geraldines in Desmond, Kerry, and Kildare. Near the hearth, where a pile of bogwood burned on brazen "dogs," the Lord Deputy's guests were seated round a table of black oak, covered with cloth of gold, on which was a beautiful urn full of perfumes, a reliquary, and a missal. Huge chests of polished cedar were laid by the walls, in which the papers and household stuffs of the earl were said to be deposited. At the lower end some pieces of armour, spears, and shields, were hung upon the wall. The whole room was lighted by a silver chandelier, filled with oil-lamps, which cast their dim lustre over the apartment, except where—near the council table—the fire threw a broader and clearer light.

Kildare occupied a central seat: near him sat the Archbishop of Dublin, the Lords Portlester and Malahide, the Prior of Kilmainham, the Baron of Slane, Chief Justice Plunkett, the Mayor of Dublin, several members of the Geraldine family, and Dowdal, Master of the Rolls. Their conversation seemed, from its confidential tone, to be on business of moment to the state.

"My lords," said Kildare, "I have your pledge, and, I doubt not, your devotion. I will read for you, therefore, the missive lately sent us by the Duchess of Burgundy:—'To our most trusted and beloved cousin, Gerald, Earl of Kildare, Lord Deputy of Ireland, greeting. We have heard from those parts, of your lordship's devotion to the succession of the house of York to the throne of England; between which house and your own, many courtesies and services have been, and, God aiding, will long continue to be exchanged.' [The Duchess is pleased to say so.] 'And we have heard, moreover, that many noble lords and puissant gentlemen, with much of the chivalrie of that realm, are of your lordship's mind in this matter,' [the Duchess, I ween, hath had a trusty informant,] 'and do stomach, but poorly, the late crowning of an ill-begotten usurper in England;' [the Duchess hath truly termed him my lords; he is verily an ill-begotten usurper;] 'this is to advertise you and our other faithful friends and allies of Ireland, who, one day, shall be recompensed according to their desert,' [and that will be highly, indeed,] 'that he who ought to wear England's crown, will soon throw himself into their loyal arms, by which aid, God's, and ours, he hopes to be lifted up unto his rightful inheritance.—Margaret of Burgundy.' My lords, the bearer of this message further tells me of that which is alluded to in the close of this letter, that John, Earl Lincoln, whom Richard declared his heir, is at the Burgundian court; that 2,000 men, well armed, under the command of Martin Swart, are prepared to aid, if we say it, in this enterprize. Dear friends, I pray you be not hasty in this weighty business; think what it is to enter into a war with England—but think, also, what it is to abandon the righteous cause, because the usurper is strong. Ye are my allies and brethren, and I would not, for Richmond's crown, imperil your lives and fortunes; but that is not imperilled which is risked in a holy cause, for therein, even to lose fortune, is to gain renown. Our friends are strong in England, Lord Lovell's rising showed that; they are powerful in Burgundy, as this missive we have received proves; and we are not, I opine, inconsiderable here in Ireland. This bastard of the house of Somerset having no foe in England, will turn all his power against us whom he knows to detest falsehood, bastardy, and usurpation; but if you so resolve it, we will be before hand with him. Speak freely all: I will abide by whatever the general voice decrees."

When Kildare had finished his speech, the impetuous Plunkett, the chief justice, said: "Reverend fathers, and noble lords, it appears to me this matter admits of small debate; let us count our strength: if we have hands enough to pluck the crown from Richmond's head, let it be done. If not, why, in God's name, be not disloyal for the satisfaction of having your names sung in a ballad after your bodies have been strung on a gibbet."

"We all here are for Edward VI.," said Kildare.

"All!" was the universal response.

"I can answer for a thousand kerne and five hundred hobblers," said the Lord Deputy.

"And I," said the Baron of Slane, "for seven hundred horse and foot."

"And I," said the Prior of Kilmainham, "for all the retainers of the houses of St. John, in the four shires."

"I am a poor secular," said the Archbishop of Dublin, "but you shall have my benison."

"And mine," said the Bishop of Meath, "with seven score rose nobles."

"The citizens of Dublin will not be laggards," said

the Mayor. "My Lord Deputy, I will pay you sixty marks on Strongbow's tomb to carry on the war, and furnish you with three score archers and twenty men-at-arms towards the hosting, whenever it is proclaimed."

Kildare, who anxiously watched the fermenting of his yeast, rose, much agitated, and said: "I would thank you, dear friends, fathers, lords, and gentlemen, severally and heartily, and on my own account I do so, but for the estates ——" He walked to the further end of the chamber, lifted the tapestry, and, opening a door, cried aloud, "enter."

The door was flung open, and Maurice Fitzgerald, lord chancellor, appeared in his civic robes, with an ecclesiastic, stooped and grey, having between them a youth of about seventeen years of age, of grave, noble, and beautiful countenance, and attired in the height of the current mode.

"My lords and fathers," cried Kildare, "behold this injured prince! Behold, peers of Ireland, the rightful heir to England's crown, who, escaped from the tower, hath fled to your loyal breasts for refuge, accompanied by this good priest, Sir Richard Symon. They, I mean his English nobles, who should have been a shelter to his youth, saw him sent to a base prison. They, I mean the citizens of London, who should have stoned his adversaries with the uprooted foundations of that prison, basely deserted him, talking their loyalty over their heaped tables, while he hungered and thirsted in his fetters! Look upon him, my lords; does not his port proclaim him royal? Sir, you have fled from your kingdom but to return to it circled with unflinching friends. These gentlemen are no weak waverers that take up any cause lightly or lay it down easily. You are not without subjects here, and, lowly on my knees, I claim to do you homage, Edward VI., king of England and France, and lord of Ireland! Long live Edward VI.!"

"Long live Edward VI.," repeated they all, bending on their knees as the earl had done.

"Rise my lords," said the Prince, advancing to them; "it were fitter I, a suitor for your aid, should kneel to you, than you to me. Be seated, I beseech you, and let us take council of your wisdom."

That night a new allegiance was sworn in Thomas-court, but it was not yet to be proclaimed.

CHAPTER V.—THE HAWKING IN FEIN-ISKHE.

SIR Piers Barnwall, after a long slumber, through the woof of which many bright dreams were woven, awoke at a later hour than he was wont, on finding the morning sun streaming full on his face. To his surprise he perceived his squire standing by his couch.

"You have lately learned to be astir betimes," he said, half vexed to be caught slothfully napping beyond the prime.

"Sir Knight, you know that the franklin who misses one of his sheep over night, seldom lets the matin pass without a search after it: I had that on my mind which would not let me sleep."

"Rather say on your stomach, Hugh. I dare be sworn your chief care was your last night's drink, and your greatest anxiety, where to renew it, to-day."

"Of a truth," said the squire, "it is not always I have wherewithal to do so, yet am content with my lot, though hard. But of this anon. Yester night, sir, I went to the Chapel of St. George, where I met with the major-domo of the Earl of Ormond."

"Ah!"

"He told me, as a secret, that his lord will quit Dublin to-morrow, that is, to-day, for there is that in the wind he cannot bear the ordure of. He asked me to inform you of this, as touching your interest, and that you might have yet time to visit the earl."

"I will see him to-day, Hugh," said Sir Piers, "this day, before sun-down."

"I told him," said the self-possessed squire, "that you were somewhat fickle, but sound at the core—a sort of apology of infinite value for ne'er-do-wells, and one that has seen service—that you would amend through time, but that you were firmly attached to the Lancastrian succession."

"A very proper account of your lord, though I doubt not well meant. Go to, and prepare my horse; I must see the earl to-day."

The squire departed. As he made his exit, a servant of the Lord Deputy's came with information that the court was to go on a hawking party, that day, in Fein-iskhe, and requesting, in Kildare's name, his presence. The ladies, he was further informed, were to be of the company. "I can see Ormond before sunset," said the knight to himself; and so he sent back the messenger with word that he would join the party.

It was now near noon. In the court yard of Thomas-court, were an hundred horses, of all races and sizes, from the fiery charger of the cavalier to the gentle jennet of the lady. The broad front of that noble palace—for palacial it was in extent, grandeur, and inhabitants—was of stone, divided into compartments by uprights and beams of wood. Wooden corbels supported the cornices and mouldings over the windows and door-ways. In the angles of the court, the falconers stood by their shagged ponies, with the casts of falcons sitting on frames suspended from their necks, to which frames the birds were attached by jesses or straps of leather fastened to their legs. The sportsmen discoursed professionally together, lamenting that so propitious a day should be so wasted, by those who were about to share the sport.

Apart, equally from the falconers and the spectators, were two persons before mentioned in this story, the tenants of the ruined house near St. Owen's Church. They were engaged in confidential discourse:

"That is her palfrey," said the giant, "I tell you. But I would rather be that dumb beast, and near her, than the Lord Deputy, the grand O'Neil, or the King of England."

"Pish!" said the dwarf, "so would not I, Sir Patrick Darcy. Power and money will command even woman's will; and if you wore a crown instead of that broken bastenet, you'd but have to say the word, and she was yours."

"It may be, it may be," responded Sir Patrick, who seldom dared to differ from the imp that led him—as cunning ever leads manhood—whither he would, "but I will watch her to-day, and strive to gain her presence, if I can."

About noon the fair and puissant company issued into the court. The Lord Deputy and his chosen friends were apparently as free from care as if no design of moment had overnight engaged their thoughts, and the ladies they led forth looked still fairer than they appeared the day before. Among them were Fionuala, Alison, and Eustachia, who were placed in the sage van of the company. The two former restrained their eyes with maidenly modesty, neither looking to the right hand nor the left; but the little heraldress threw her merry glances on all sides, with the privilege of mere girlhood. Even the giant received a look of consideration which pierced his troubled breast as the sunrise the huge mists of the sea. The procession moved at a regular pace towards the Ormond-gate, from thence to the Bridge-gate, across the bridge, and into Oxmantown.

Sir Piers rode in the rear of the cavalcade, with his friend Sir Morogh some distance before him, and Sir Gibbon Fitzgerald by his side. The coxcomb had avoided the press of the crowd, lest it might disarrange his attire; while Piers being clogged with ruminations, unconsciously bore him company. He was dressed out in the extreme of the mode; his doublet opened in front, and laced like a boddice, displayed his fine linen beneath; itself made of velvet, it was spangled with silver, and the aiguillettes were of cloth of silver. His hose were of the same material. His beard was pointed and perfumed; and his cap, a modification of the Celtic baraid, was of the pattern then most highly prized in Britain and "the Pale." His shoes were of Moorish leather, and his gloves made of the fleece of a golden fawn. His horse was attract in corresponding splendour, and two tall, unspotted grey hounds, followed at his heels.

"Perdie," said the coxcomb, "the air is a little cold, and blows from the north, I ween."

"From the west," said Barnwall.

"By 'r lady, I think it is from the north."

"I do not find it so," said the Knight of Drimnagh; "t'is a little sharp, but not too rough for a soldier's cheek to bear."

"Ah! Sir Barnwall, you were reared in the plain of Dhuvall, and are used to the mountain winds, as savage as the O'Briens themselves; but 'tis less to my taste than summer weather." And the fop shrugged his aggrieved shoulders, and shook his head.

These, the only words they had yet exchanged, were spoken as they passed St. Michan's Church, and came in sight of the outskirts of the Park. An aged Dominican friar was crossing to a by-way in haste, as Sir Gibbon ceased. He seemed to have beneath his habit something attractive to the instincts of that knight's dogs, for they no sooner perceived him, than they leaped violently upon him, threw him on the ground, and tugged from his hand a pipkin, from which an odour, as of steamed venison, arose. At this the fop burst into a loud laugh, encouraging the unmannered brutes by several phrases intelligible to their ears. But, Sir Piers jumping from his seat, first raised the old ecclesiastic, hoping him unhurt, and then rescued the pipkin from its captors, having dealt them many energetic kicks in the interim.

"Hold, hold, Knight of Drimnagh, would ye kill my dogs; hold, or I will spear you where you stand."

"Thanks, master Barnwall," said the poor friar; "thanks, and an old man's blessing be with you, for your true genero'ity."

"Generosity!" cried Sir Gibbon, "to belabor my poor dogs like a clown."

"Sir Hugh."

"Sir Piers, holy father."

"Sir Piers, heed him not; 'tis a poor weakling, grown up in stature, but not to manhood. Heed him not—pray you heed him not. He that will not reverence age, his own age shall be unreverenced."

"Father, I will do as you will—farewell!"

Age is ever grateful for kindness. As the knights rode off, still less in love with each other than before, the friar gazed after Barnwall until his dim eyes could see him no more; then he raised the sleeve of his habit to the strained orbs, as if they had been suddenly filled with moisture, and turned away. It was the Infirmarius of St. Mary's, going on a mission of charity among the descendants of the proscribed Danes of Oxmantown.

The sun, with April suddenness, now shone over the woods and leas of Fein-iskhe. It was then in reality a right royal chase. As far as the eye could see, were undulating plains bordered with ancient standing woods, and watered with many clear streams. Far southwards the Dublin highlands lay up to the sun, as if ambitious of his countenance. Beyond the Liffey rose the home of the Knights Hospitallers, from whose demesne the forest of Inchicore stretched its gigantic files into the inland. The hawkers were grouped together in an open area, from which they could survey the whole scene. The grooms and the falconers' assistants were beating up the thickets, and questing about the silent waters of the valleys for game. The Lord of Offally sat on his horse, near to the deputy, and by him was his daughter, who seemed less desirous for the sport than the exercise it gave. As they were thus waiting inactive, Sir Piers summoning up all his courage, advanced to them and tendered his services to wait upon the lady. The O'Connor looked at him, and then at his daughter, and granted his request, coupling it with many grave charges. At the same moment Sir Piers perceived Sir Gibbon in discourse with the Lord Deputy.

"Fair lady," said Kildare, turning about, "I will commend you, if you will, to the care of our cousin Gibbon here, who will not lead you into danger, rest assured."

"I have already enlisted a knight in my service, my Lord," replied Fionuala, "and it would be an injustice to this beavy of beauty to engross another."

The earl was silent. Just then a covey of partridges rose shrieking into the air, and were followed by some pheasants. Above these, rose a solitary heron, startled at his remote fountain, by which, hermit like, he was found pondering on himself. The falconers gave their loosed pupils to the ladies who cast them into the air; that of the lady of Offally, a bright-eyed, strong-winged, sharp-clawed, ambitious bird, mounted in pursuit of the heron, which sailed away gradually westward, towards Castlenoe. "The field" had dispersed in divers directions, and so the lady and the knight rode westward also, keeping in sight the feathered combatants, who now seemed near enough to strike. Away and away flew the heron and the hawk. The latter had stooped, and was assailing his victim from beneath; the heron flapped its broad wings, rose and fell, and wheeled like a warrior hard prest in the lists, but all the time advanced further westward. Suddenly a change came over the heavens—dark clouds seemed to rise up from the four winds, as if to a general tryst; a dead calm in the air succeeded, then a few heavy drops, hot as if from the brow of the elements fell, and the rain began to pour in torrents. Three plummy sycamores stood in the path of Sir Piers and lady Fionuala; under these she rode on her palfrey, while he, dismounting, led his statelier steed to the same shelter.

"Our day's sport, I fear, is done," said the lady.

"Done, and yet I do not fear for it. Lady, perhaps fortune has led us from the chase, and heaven itself driven us to this retreat."

"Visibly heaven has done so."

"And for its ends. You would not hear me talk last night of love. Will you not now?"

"Sir Knight of Drimnagh, I have distrusted ever that love which shows itself so soon. Great passions are like these trees; they grow not suddenly, they bend not quickly, they stand the round of the seasons. The favours of summer do not oppress them, nor the wrath of harsh winter shake them from their ground."

"Truly said, fairest predicant, and when these trees were first visible, had they been unregarded, they would have perished."

"A poor plea; and yet, Sir Piers, I do not say I misbelieved you; but, in this strange court, it behoves me to pause before I speak. If you were of mine own race, the elder race of this land, I would take your word as the Gospel itself. But I do not know the nature of your clans of "the Pale," and, therefore, I must needs take time to learn."

"What you say is wise, lady; it has the cold wisdom of the world. But it seems to lodge in your warm breast, like the canker worm beneath the sun-ripe fruit."

"Sir Piers, Sir Piers, you know not what you say; you are as young in the world as the eyas that this morn first mantled its wings, and would have hawked as fiercely at a scald crow as at the kingly heron himself. I did not say I would not love you."

"Pardon me, lady—friend—Nuala—I will task my soul to change your 'would not' to 'I will.'" And the knight taking her fair hand, which hung unguardedly at her side, kissed it devoutly, raised it, and laid it on her saddle.

The storm had ceased, but the hawk and the heron were no longer in the air. Through the long, wet, grassy avenues, the lovers turned homewards, not doubting that their companions had already left the field. Before they had gone far, they perceived lying dead on the ground, the victim of the chase. But near him lay also the vanquisher. His eye glazed, his proud breast all gory, and his plumage torn. The knight dismounted, tied them together by the hawk's jesses, and flung them over his saddle-horn. Thus both, moralizing on the event, rode on.

As they approached near the confine of the park, towards the city, they heard, advancing, the muffled sound of a troop of horse. Withdrawing from the way, Piers placed his fair charge in safety, and himself in a position of observing the new-comers. The first files consisted of menials, by whose dresses the knight knew they belonged to the Earl of Ormond. In the rear, circled by his guard of kerne and mounted men-at-arms, and accompanied by half a dozen noble youths, his clients, rode the Butler himself, a loose, merry looking soldier, with iron grey hair and beard, armed at all points. The conviction flashed at once on Barnwall's mind that the earl was deserting Dublin. Making a sign to Fionuala to await him, he rode from his concealment and confronted Ormond. For a moment the latter imagined he had fallen into an ambush; but seeing only a single knight, armed with sword and dagger, his fears gave place to surprise.

"Who are you," he exclaimed, "that thus stay our march?"

"Piers Barnwall, of Drimnagh."

"Ho, by Saint Kenny! You are come, Sir Piers, somewhat late, but nathless, you are welcome; fall into our company."

"My Lord, I cannot. I am bound back for Thomas-court."

"Thomas-court! Then, Sir Ingrate, what in God's name do you here? Do you wish to tempt us to forestall the executioner? Begone to that den of traitors, and fatten in the arch-traitor's stall, by and by you will be fed enough for the felling."

"My Lord Ormond, say as you will, I am as good a Lancastrian as any in this presence, not saving him that sits in your own saddle. I have a charge at hand that I cannot abandon, but by abandoning mine honour. And if I now marched with you from what you call a den of traitors, my own heart would turn traitor and stay behind."

"Oh!" cried the earl, half in mockery, half in mirth, "so, so, Grace, Walsh, le Poer, beat up these bushes, till we get a glimpse of this dove that hath trussed up the falcon of Drimnagh in his high flight of youthful promise."

Barnwall drew his sword and placed himself before the thicket where Fionuala was concealed.

"Back, gentlemen," he said, "if you wish to bring your lives to your friends southwards."

The tone of his manner, and the visible prowess of his person changed the earl's mood.

"But what do I say," he muttered, "how wild to waste a moment or a word in this folly. "Knight of Drimnagh," he added aloud, "return into yon dis-leal city. If in ten days from this you appear at our castle of Kilkenny, we will hold you guiltless of the cursed crimes of ingratitude and treason; ourselves the Barons Howth and Bermingham and the leal citizens of Waterford, convoke our strength there. If you fall by the way, your name shall be unstained. But for God's love get from under Kildare's roof as fast as you can; proud and high as it appears to-day, it will yet be powdered and trampled dust, wet with the blood of its rebellious lord. Remember, ten days is given you to be at our gate. Move on, my men, on!"

The knight bowed, and watched them as they vanished in the distance. He then rejoined his fair companion. His eye was lit with fresh fire, and his whole figure dilated with honest self-esteem. She, who had overheard all that passed, also felt a strange sensation of delight and pride in the issue. And as they rode towards Thomas-court, Sir Piers observed with a keen intensity of pleasure, that her eye sought his more frequently than it had done before, and her voice was more eloquently musical than it had been during the day.

While crossing the bridge to Bridge-gate, Fionuala observed an aged friar attentively regarding them. She thought, too, she could hear him muttering a benison as they passed, an impression that deepened her innate satisfaction. When they reached the court they found their companions of the field had already returned before them, and various were the comments passed upon their tardiness.

Round Towers.

A.D. 1020. All Ardmach burnt wholly—the Damliog with its cover of lead, the steeple with the bells.—Translation of Annals of Ulster, British Museum.

THE origin of the "Steeple," or as they have been called by learned men in modern times, "Round Towers" of Ireland, has been so mystified by profound Irish historians, that a writer has an excellent chance of a coronet of black beans, if he venture to assert that the steeples are no mystery at all. It is unbecoming, no doubt, in a neophyte to dogmatise, where Bishop Lynch, Dr. O'Connor, Dr. Lanigan, and Dr. Milner doubted; and, therefore, if any opinion of decided conviction should break out in these remarks, the reader will please to remember the preliminary anathema against precocious dogmatism. Ireland is a land of mystery—the richest soil in Europe, and yet the poorest nation—the elder sister and teacher of England, yet England's hated slave: these things are a puzzle to statesmen at the other side of the channel, and yet the beardless politician is not censured by his countrymen when he protests in the face of the great British nation that they are not mysteries, but things palpable as Nelson's pillar on a bright morning in June. Give then a similar amnesty to a harmless speculator on the origin of the steeples, especially if from being Jack o'the Lanterns to the antiquarians, they may become great lights to a people. To this humble plea are hereby fearlessly subjoined an act of hasty contempt for what our countryman, Burke, calls "the superstition of antiquarians," and an act of cordial faith in another oracle of the same man, "people will not look forward to posterity who never look backward to their ancestors, always acting as if in the presence of our canonized forefathers, the spirit of freedom leading in itself to misrule and excess, is tempered with an awful gravity." Not many years ago, a young Irishman, stocked with an average knowledge of his country's history—which in those days was not very high—was discoursing with a company of intelligent Frenchmen, on the spread of Catholic literature in France during the last twenty years. They spoke with all the enthusiasm of their country, on the established fame of Count de Maistre and Bonald, the rising glory of Montelambert and La Martine, and many other abilities of the literary world whose names have no connection with Irish steeples. They remarked also the decided tendency of the national taste for the preservation of the old monuments of the country, and the erection of churches, many of which have since been completed, and may bear a comparison with the greatest wonders of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. It would be straying too far from Irish steeples, to recount what was said of the pyramids of Egypt, or the creations of the painter and sculptor in various ages. After a long statement of facts, they began to philosophise, and establish, by what they called the inductive method, the existence of a general law in the moral world, whereby genius acted on genius, as deep calleth unto deep, either by a moral force—namely, the force of example and emulation, or a physical force, such as awakes the broken echoes of the myriad windings of Killarney, or clothes by the same genial sunshine, the pear-tree with its surplice, or the apple with its purple. Their laws, their nation, the succession of their effects, intermittent in some countries, perennial at Rome alone, were not very intelligible to the Irishman, partly because the power of attraction or generalization, had been absorbed in his attempt to lay up a store of knowledge, and still more because the laws were directly opposed, as he thought, to well known facts in the history of his own country. He was not preaching in an unknown tongue, when he assured his philosophers, that Ireland was once the luminary of the western world, and that in many of the cities, churches, and schools of France, Irish genius and learning, and in one great instance (at Poitiers) Irish architectural taste had won high fame in the old annals of France. But where are the architectural monuments, on the Irish soil corresponding to this literary glory? Gigantic stone crosses, and diminutive chapels—these are the only monuments, very respectable no doubt for their age, but immeasurably below the standard of cotemporary literature. Their surprise was the greater, as this glory of Ireland was principally religious. Wherever the Catholic church goes, she feels at home, and builds for eternity—she demands the tithes of genius, grapples with the political revolution, or repairs its effects; and can evoke and sanctify the highest flights of intellect and charity, with as much ease as she can suffer and live in caves during three centuries of persecution. Every country on the face of the earth, wherever she has flourished, preserves eloquent traces of her majestic presence. Was Ireland from 530 to 900 an exception to this rule, or were her literary pretensions exaggerated? Thus, in every city and barony in Ireland, you have great churches and monasteries to remind you of the ages of St. Malachy and Duns Scotus; during the short sway of the Catholic confederates the arts, if we can believe Arsdekin, flourished in all the confederate towns, especially at Kilkenny; and in the present age, while the Catholic genius of Ireland is repairing the havoc of three centuries (during which the only religious stone-works in Ireland were ruins) cathedrals, and parish churches, and convents, and all the accessories of Catholic civilization, painting and sculpture are rapidly springing up around us. Could it be maintained that an analogy, good in all other countries, and in Ireland at three different periods, was fallen during these ages when Ireland was an island of sages and saints? Can it be, that those men who raised their country to so proud a position as few countries—save Rome and Judea—ever attained, have left on the Irish soil no great and eternal monument of their fame? Foreigners came over from Rome and Egypt to Ireland, "amandatus est ad Hiberniam" was, according to Camden, a stereotyped passport to fame, in the lives of literary men during several centuries, and Irishmen were the patrons of many churches, the founders of universities, and apostles of many nations, at least in one-half of Europe. If those be historical facts, resting, not on the testimony of Irishmen alone, but on the concurrent assertion of the mediæval literature of Europe, is there not the strongest reason for expecting some great cotemporary architectural monuments in Ireland? But what increases the difficulty still more, is the acquaintance which Irish ecclesiastics must have had with the great churches of other countries, not half so favourably circumstanced as their own, during the convulsions subsequent to the dismemberment of the Roman empire. The Irishman who knelt in the great churches of Rome, and beheld the splendid relics of the Roman empire, returned to his own country, and never dreamed of erecting anything grand on his own Irish soil; nay, he had before his eyes, at home, great monuments built by Pagans; and which, whatever be their other merits, have at least that to which all builders look, the principle of eternity, standing to this day as perfect as when the scaffolding was first taken down. Yet with all his foreign knowledge, and those domestic examples, he was content to build his little church by the side of those Pagan towers, as the Arab pitches his tent beneath the shadow of the Pyramids. Does the history of the world supply such a striking contrast? On the one hand, the very highest place in the literature of the day, both sacred and profane, and such a miracle of art as the gospel of St. Columb—on the other, an ignorance scarcely inferior to that of the savages of New Zealand. The contrast, at all events, was a profound mystery to the young philosopher, and after many ineffectual attempts to explain it, it was unanimously decided, that from some inexplicable idiosyncrasy in the Irish Catholic mind, Ireland's most brilliant age was the only one in the history of the church which had left no great architectural witness to posterity. But to return to the steeples—one of the disputants asked, whether they might not be, perhaps, monuments of those Christian ages; but as the Irishman had never examined them, the answer was a decided negative, because they were not larger than a respectable chimney, which, he asserted, was their real use in the days of the fire-worshippers, and there was no possible Christian object worthy of a reasoning mind for which they could have been originally designed. Thus ended the discussion, leaving the question of ancient Irish civilization the same mystery to the Frenchmen that the present misery of Ireland appears to be to British statesmen. But has not the mystery been expounded yet? has no filial hand rescued Ireland from the exceptional and dishonourable position of being the only Catholic country which does not imprint her faith on some immortal monuments? or, are we to say, that the ancient Irish was like the modern English church, which if this famine and fever were to sweep us all to the tomb, would not leave for future colonists one respectable religious monument of its existence in this land? Surely, in this history-loving age the question deserves serious consideration, and on holier and more natural grounds than "the superstition of antiquarians."

If the excavator in the marble quarries of Rome, light upon the limb of a statue, and find that the material, the artistic skill, and even the veins of the marble are the same as in a mutilated trunk which had long since been dug up in a different part of the city, he needs no profound antiquarian lore to decide that the fragment belonged to that trunk, and if the Irish steeples appear on examination not to be overgrown chimneys, but well adapted for Christian purposes—if their site always near the church, their material and workmanship like the church, all the varieties of their doors, and minutest ornaments, even to the curl of the statues' beard—if all these rays point to a Christian origin—if, moreover, many of the phenomena of our strange history, especially during the very respectable resistance of this land to the Danes, be well explained, by supposing that most of the steeples were built by the Catholic Irish during the Danish invasion, is not the mystery of the young French philosophers solved? Does not Ireland, instead of being an exception, powerfully confirm the great Christian analogy? for, may we not say to France and England, and every country at this side of the Alps and Tuscan sea, show us, if you can, on your own soil, Christian ornaments so numerous, so old, and with all their singularities so respectable. Ireland once held a distinguished place in the literary and religious history of Europe, and spilled as much Danish blood as you, and these steeples are the witnesses of that piety and patriotism. If the Lord of hearts should ever, in His great mercy, unite all her sons before the old altars, and inspire them to enjoy, this fair land which He has given for their use and benefit, they must assemble their young men every year around these steeples on the anniversary of the great day of Clontarf, and administer to them the patriotic oath, to hold Ireland for the Irish, peaceably, of course, legally, and constitutionally. No man would ever pass by one of those stout old antagonists of time, without making an act of faith in the church, and of love for his country. "Always acting, as if in the presence of our canonized forefathers, the spirit of freedom, leading in itself to misrule and excess is tempered with an awful gravity."

The best arguments for the Christian capabilities of the steeples, are a visit to one of them, and a pair of good eyes. In Dr. Lanigan and Dr. Milner's day, the doors invariably pointed to the east, and the windows in the top to the four cardinal points; nor was there any sign of stories or rafters, or any little window to light them. But this is all changed now. You will see that the doors do not always point to the east, nor the windows above to the cardinal points, unless there be five, six, or seven such points; that there are stories always varying in number, from four to eight, distinctly marked by belts of stone, or ledges, or sets off, or holes in the wall for joists; and that each of those stories has its own little window, which happens to be in shape coeval to all the church windows. Then you may find, by measurement, that the eight storied steeple, for instance, could afford accommodation, tight enough no doubt, to the monks and clergy of a moderate-sized establishment; and the bards and brehans (who were too old to tilt with the Dane), with their books and laws, and chalices and vestments, which, with provisions for a short siege, could so safely stand in one of the stories, while the signal fire of distress flamed from the large upper window, and summoned the country to the rescue. Thus, a monastery could live for some weeks in one of the steeples; but military men are best judges on this matter. "The Irish pillar tower," says Colonel Montmorency, "taking into account the period that produced it, may fairly pass for the completest invention that can well be imagined. Impregnable every way, and proof against fire, it could never be taken by assault. Although the Abbey and its dependencies blazed around, the tower disregarded the fury of its flames; its extreme height, its isolated position, and diminutive doorway, elevated so many feet above the ground, placed it beyond the reach of the besiegers." The brave daughter of St. Bridget, without throwing aside even her veil, and with half the nerve of the women of Limerick, could keep a legion of Northmen at bay, by sending down any sort of missile or disposable blocks of granite, from the large window over the door or in the upper story, on the heads of the assailants. The Dane, however, sometimes forced the door, and then the steeple became an awful fire tower. Thus, in the Four Masters, A.D. 948, the "cloitreach" of stone (the steeple) was burned by the Danes, with its reliques and good people, and the crozier of the patron saint, and a bell, the best of bells. And again, A.D. 1097, "The cloitreach of Monasterboice, with many books and treasures was burnt." Still the most convincing proof of the profound wisdom of the steeple architects, is the general success of their invention, for every church and monastic establishment, not excepting Armagh, Derry, Kildare, or Clonmacnoise, was frequently, during the course of two hundred years, burned by the Danes, and yet the Irish church was never reduced so low by these barbarians, as England was in the days of Alfred. He could not find, south of the Humber, a single priest able to read Latin, while Ireland—though her annalists describe the Danes as second only to the tyranny of hell—still sent out her apostles and learned men to France and Germany, and founded some of her noblest establishments in the latter country. The fact is easily explained—the curse of invasion swept over the land, overwhelming the church and convent, and college, but the Pharos stood unmoved; when the storm passed, the priest with his Scriptures and sacred vessels, the brehan with his laws, the bard with his poetry and chronicles, moved once more over the chaos, and reorganized the elements of Christian civilization. When you reflect that the English destroyed many Irish manuscripts on their first arrival in this country; that the same vandal achievement became a regular system under Elizabeth, and still more under Cromwell, that even in the middle of the last century, manuscripts were seized by government, and yet, that there are large piles of unpublished materials in the libraries of Trinity College and the Royal Irish Academy, you may form some estimate of the national treasures once preserved in the steeples, and of the sagacious views of their architects. Had the steeples been larger, besides the great additional expense, they would be less defensible; and moreover, the same Christian aspiration which planned the dome of St. Peter's and the spire of Strasburg, would have prompted the Irish abbot to select such a type of architecture as could raise the cross on the pinnacle to the greatest height. And does it follow, that because the Irish loved a profusion of luxuriant ringlets, and preferred the flowing robe of saffron to the skimpy habiliments of modern times, and allowed several folds of gold and silver lace for the dress of their ladies, to the great annoyance of Henry VIII., the Vulcan of false keys, they must necessarily have indulged the same lavish taste in architecture? Many of the steeples were built in the Derg, the Cluain, or the Innis; places expressly selected by the monks, because of their solitude and desolation; and if the steeple was sufficient for the monastic family, where was the use of a larger keep?

But you will say, that there is not, and never was, a steeple, except in a church-yard; that the door of the steeple has, as fixed, a position relatively to its neighbour church, as the star in the tip of the tail of Ursa Major to the star in his snout; that the cross, the crucifixion, the arches, the angles, the grating, the zigzags, and images of Kildare, and other steeples, are all found in the churches of the eighth and ninth centuries. Even so, may not the Christians have found the steeples ready made, by the fire-worshippers or other idolators, and, after the overthrow of that established religion, built their churches near them, and copied their style in the Christian architecture? This hypothesis may, in some minds, counterbalance the evidence already deduced from the ordinary progress of Christian civilization; but it was only an hypothesis: it has no direct testimony, native or foreign; at best, it is only "a may-be," and of that peculiar kind which strikes with most force on those who can see best in the dark; and yet, though we have very full details, legendary and authentic, of the progress of Christianity—how Pagan idols were broken in the temples, and Druids encountered in their strong-holds—Pagan customs abolished—Pagan books burned, and other natural consequences of a religious revolution, the steeples are most unaccountably consigned to oblivion, though, if they existed at the time, their venerable associations should have made them the "Crom-a-boo," of the priests of Crom, against the white-robed Failgear, whose paschal fire, on the hill of Slane, was to spread over the whole kingdom—supplanting all Druid fires, and burning through all ages in the Sacred Isle. Some learned men, enthusiasts for this old Pagan glory of Ireland, say that the steeples are sepulchral Pagan monuments, but, unfortunately, some of the steeples which have been excavated rested on the solid rock, without the slightest trace of any bones or tomb, and, even where bones were found, there were none of the characteristics of the historical Pagan sepulchres of Ireland. In the ordinary course of human events, the expensive tower would be the culminating point of monastic prosperity, and might, by chance, strike its eternal root over the monks or faithful who had long since gone to rest near the Abbey Church.

If other arguments were necessary to confirm the opinion, that those towers are the representations of the great Catholic age which has been so highly extolled by Digby, and even by Guizot, they could be taken from the very name by which, in the Irish language of the present day, and in all our written authorities, legendary and authentic, they are universally designated. Cloiteach (bell-house) is the only name by which our fathers called them; and, though it may have been sometimes metaphorically applied to defensive secular keeps, its literal signification must, according to all the known laws of language, be in accordance with the universal usage and tradition of the country, and the authority of our manuscripts. They, by oral explanation, unanimously interpret "cloiteach" as a "belfry;" and, if any one ask: Why a defensive keep should have taken its name from the "bell," which was only accessory, let him consult Petrie's Essay on Irish Bells, and the Catholic Ritual, whence he may learn the mystic sublimity which the Church bell held, and ought to hold, in Catholic philosophy.

But where did those obscure Islanders find the type of the eternal towers? We might answer: where have they found the secret of being faithful to Rome amid the sad wreck of all the northern nations, many of which they converted?—but could they not find the altitude of the steeple in their own heavenward aspirations, and, in some cases, in the more earthly motive of a watch-tower? It is not the least among the glories of Brian of Clontarf, that, with true conservative policy, he founded, as Mac Liag informs us, not less than thirty-two church steeples (cloiteachs).

Will the silver bell of St. Bride ever breathe its gentle music from her tower at Kildare, inviting the young students in a great central Lyceum to unite a prayer to "Mary of Erin,"* with the Ave Maria? Will the solemn peal, booming over the placid lakes from the towers of St. Kevin, never again soothe the autumnal eve of great men, who served Erin well during life's long day, and await now the dread summons in the solitudes of Devenish or Glendaloch? Smyth, a Presbyterian minister, in his life of St. Columba, cites an old prophetic hope of the kind, regarding the monastic resurrection of Iona. We may not see it, but we ought to guard the steeples as the apple of our eyes, and never forget where lies the true secret of our strength.

* A common name of St. Bridget with the old Irish bards.

GREGORY XVI.—PIUS IX.

Italy, empire of the sun ! Italy, mistress of the world ! Italy, cradle of literature, how often has the universe been thy subject, tributary to thy arms, thy beauteous arts, and clime !—Madame De Staël.

AYE, and to the end of time such shall be the sentiment of every one who has received the blessing of education. With that fair land of Italy a host of memories is linked, which nor time nor death shall evermore destroy. From the first moment that we begin to be familiar with the great names which are imperishably written on the page of history, has not Italy been the object of our speculations ? Romulus, Numa, and Tarquin, furnish our first notions of the monarchical principle, its rise and ruin. Democracy, and the struggle of the commons against patrician authority, is chronicled on that sacred hill, where the plebeians camped, and raised the standard of Republicanism. Looking down upon Time's onward course, what glorious recollections rise from out the depths wherein they lie, like the ruins of a whelmed world. The great Rome of the emperors, extending its conquests from the Pillars of Hercules to the confines of India, and thence to the fastnesses of the Caledonian mountains—striking down the empire of the Alexanders and carrying arts and science captive in the march of her mighty legions ; does she not seem to us, to have been built for eternity, and garrisoned against the assaults of time and man ? When Tully reposed in the shade of his Tusculan, and the Falernian bard listened to the thundering Anio shaking the foundations of the sybil's temple, mid the olive groves of Tibur—could either of them have thought that this mighty power would one day crumble and be despised ? that these invincible legions, scattered over Gaul, Asia, and Africa, would be destroyed, and those iron ramparts which stretched along the frontiers of the empire be trodden down like mud 'neath the feet of barbaric myriads, pressing to the devastation of the Mistress of the World ? 'Twere hard to suppose that such forecastings could have engaged the mind of the bard, the orator, or the statesman. That glorious city was the centre of greatness, arts and civilization—multitudinous armies sentinelled her frontiers and garrisoned her colonies—her fleets swept the seas, and the sculptured emblems on the rostrum proclaimed them invincible. The immortal gods had special care of this great empire—the reeking victim and the incense of Araby were offered daily on a hundred altars to the fabulous hosts of Heaven—senators pronounced the indestructibility of its institutions, and Virgil sang that its greatness should last for ever. But Time has taught us that they erred. From the shores of the Euxine, and the morasses of the North, there arose a mighty horde who knew not mercy and scorned civilization ; Goth Hun and Vandal armed for Rome's overthrow, and the helots of the empire were made the instruments of its ruin. Even so it may yet be with other nations, but from far different causes and dissimilar agencies ; the great events which were the forerunners of the destruction of pagan Rome shall never fling their giant shadows on this earth again. Christ, the son of the living God, has come into the world and the face of the earth has been renewed ; the portico of Solomon, where he taught, has disappeared—over the foundations of the temple where he prayed the ploughshare has traced its furrow, and of all the dicta of philosophers and statesmen against which he raised his voice, what now remains ?—nothing, save their memories. When he foretold the destruction of the daughter of Sion, the Pharisee and Sadducee laughed his prediction to scorn ; nor was the painful vision of the future, then before the eye of the Eternal, exclusively connected with the Jewish metropolis ; far otherwise—the hum of mighty armies and the marshalling of fierce hosts came upon the ears of Christ, and moved before his all-seeing eye—compassing the strongholds of corruption and idolatry, and reducing the world to a state of chaos and darkness, till informed and enlightened by the teaching of the Gospel. Judea has seen the prophecy realized to the letter—her people, scattered to the four winds, have been reduced to a captivity exceeding in duration and ignominy all her former vicissitudes ; no prophet comes to breathe a hope of return : the Mahommedan has built his mosque where David pitched the ark—the city of Solomon shall never be rebuilt, and more than eighteen hundred years have echoed that terrible voice, pealing louder than the thunders of Sinai : “Christus venit, regnat, imperat.” And Rome, too, has fallen ; her forum is as silent as the lips of Tully and Hortensius ; her “senate and people” no longer sway the destinies of the world—the palatine with its golden house has been abandoned by the Cæsars, and Olympian Jove has no priest to offer the garlanded victim on the capitol. The same sun still shines upon the soil, the same blue Heaven still canopies the seven hills, but high above the yellow Tiber towers a mighty dome, such as had not entered the conceptions of Vitruvius, and half-concealed in the mid-Heaven, springs from its summit the emblem of a spiritual empire, which shall not terminate its career on earth till the son of God comes to judge the human race, “stat crux dum volvitur orbis.” That “vast and wondrous dome” is now the capitol and council-chamber of an empire, whose power and rule are recognized at the uttermost ends of the world ; the indomitable Parthian and the naked Antipodean acknowledge its supremacy and its laws ; eighteen centuries have witnessed the unbroken succession of its high priests, whose commission bears the seal of the Man-God's authority—compared to which the proudest of this world's patents are as the chaff which is scattered before the wind. The genealogy of that priesthood is inscribed in letters of gold on the records of Heaven ; for the grandest struggle which has ever engaged the thoughts of men has led to its enthronement. In that conflict humility triumphed over pride—and liberty, vindicating man's immemorial rights, has utterly destroyed slavery and death. Caligula, Nero, and Domitian exercised a tyranny such as after times have not seen ; thousands, like Cato of Utica, could not find a crag or homestead where liberty had taken refuge in the days of these monsters, and stabbed themselves in despair. In the war which Christ's Gospel waged against such men, a paradox was vanquished—for, freedom of thought and action was proved not to be the right of one or more tyrants, but the birth right of man in every clime, age, and condition. "Confess me before men," said Christ our Lord, "they will stone you and put you to death for the avowal—but no matter, persevere, for the Gospel shall triumph—slavery shall be banished from the world—the weapons of your warfare shall be virtue and sanctity, and the rights of mankind shall be reasserted in your blood." And so they have been; the kingdom of Christ has risen on the ruins of ignorance and prejudices—the strong-hold of force and fraud has tumbled at the clarion sound of truth, and the ensign of the cross has supplanted the eagle of the Cæsars. Were it not for this, where now would be the civilisation and enlightenment of the world? Were it not for this, where would now be all our systems of modern legislation of which that struggle was the basis? Alas! how often, in the enthusiasm of our dreamings, do we forget the fountain-spring while drinking of the stream as it flows; and how greatly do we err, when we do not recognise liberty's first dawning upon the world at the moment when a Pope dwelt in the catacombs, and a Nero blasphemed the name of Christ!

And this fair land of Italy was the scene of these stupendous events; in her colosseum and circuses this grand drama was enacted—the victory which she was to win had long endeared her to the Lord for whom she bled; and, in the fulness of time, it was decreed that she should reap a rich reward. Favoured as was Judea of old, the Eternal God had decreed to give to Italy a more exalted position among the nations. The high priest in the old dispensation had but a narrow sphere; his authority did not extend beyond the mountains which girdled the land of promise, but the Pontiff in the new covenant, was destined to rule, and govern, and influence to the very limits of the creation. Who but the divine architect, whose fiat called earth, and air, and all things that be, could have conceived the notion of such a magnificent empire? Who but the Supreme pastor of souls could have originated that lofty design, which exhibits to us the whole human race with all its peculiarities and contrarieties of climate, manners, and conditions, hearkening to the voice of one shepherd, and taking refuge in one fold? Yea, verily it was the work of the right hand of the Most High, and the further we go back in the history of nations, the more forcibly does the conviction come upon us. The gravestones of those who have slept for ages—the records of these times which chronicle saints and heroes—the bulls of the Popes which are in themselves the epitome of this world's history, prove beyond question the marked and special interposition of God in the creation and maintenance of that hierarchy, which, like the ladder of Jacob, based upon earth lifts its summit into heaven.

And now, turning to the consideration of the temporal power of the Popes, where can we find any other monarchy to which this world stands so deeply indebted? The oldest dynasties on earth exhibit to us their founders clothed in strength, and raised to a state of pre-eminence by force of arms and oppression. Capet and Hapsburgh, not to speak of other princely houses, which compared to the former, are as the creations of yesterday, readily bring to mind that iron time when the jus fortioris was the only acknowledged claim to sovereignty. With these, how strongly is not the Papal power contrasted? The foundations of the Pope's temporal authority were not laid in fraud, violence, or usurpation; whoever would fully investigate its origin, must seek and find it emanating from the Christian idea, which, in order to fraternize mankind, built him a throne and fenced it round with arms of faith and intellect. In the middle ages, when this temporal authority, and the spiritual influences were everywhere recognised, how splendid were the results, and how much does not civilisation owe to the exercise of both? Pope Leo the Great, taming the heart of Attila, was the embodiment of a principle which saved to the world these glorious remains, without which art would be now only in her infancy. Hildebrand, dying in exile, has taught us to admire that unbending spirit of perseverance in right, but for which the world might have retrograded and left to posterity an additional record of havoc and blood. The Papacy is essentially necessary to Rome—and what would Rome be without the sovereignty of its Pontiff? Villani, Muscato, and other historians, have left us a painful picture of the miseries which came on the Christian capital, when Clement V. passed the Alps and took up his abode in Provence. Need we rehearse the evils which resulted to the Pontificate from that unwise act? Suffice it, that Venturino da Bergamo, a celebrated preacher of the fourteenth century, raised his voice, in every pulpit of Tuscany and Lombardy, against the transfer of St. Peter's chair from Rome to Avignon, and that Petrarch* mourned such novel centralization. Dear as Vauluse was to him, he did not fail to urge that the domicile of St. Peter's successor should be nearer the well-spring of the Mamertine prison;† and verily, with good reason, for when Rome fell into the hands of the inconstant populace who sustained the Tribune against the barons in the time of Innocent VI., it was God's interposition that preserved us a wreck of her old glories—the Flavian amphitheatre—the tombs of Cestius and Metella—the triumphal arches and aqueducts were converted into strong-holds by the contending factions; nay, the very statues were broken up to be used as missiles by the belligerents, and the burnt capitol had scarcely begun to smoulder, when the barons parcelled out among them the patrimony of St. Peter. Nor is the temporal sovereignty of the Pope less necessary to Rome in the nineteenth than it was in the fourteenth century. Were the Eternal City consigned to Austria, France, or Russia, its ancient monuments would be soon transferred to adorn the galleries of the Louvre, the Schoenbrunn, or the halls of the Semiramis of the north.

The abominable philosophy of Voltaire was levelled against the spiritual and temporal authority of the Popes; and it is strange that the counsellor of the tyrant who first conceived the notion of partitioning unhappy Poland, should have had such fatal influence on the minds of his own and successive generations. Alas! cold doubt engendered a cursed infidelity, and the world has wept tears of blood for the pernicious teaching of one man. The disciples of Voltaire were taught to believe that the ruin of the Papacy would restore liberty to mankind, and the march of a French army on the capital of Christianity was hailed as the forerunner of the world's emancipation. Alas! for the fatuity of erring man! God's providence did not abandon the chair of Peter, when Pius VI. died in a Hospice of the Alps, surrounded by the satellites of the terrorists. Pius VII., torn from his principality, returned thither in triumph, and lived to learn the overthrow of the greatest mind and the greatest power which ever combined to crush the world. Since then what great events have marked the history of man—more than one throne has tottered from its foundation, and monarchs have sought the refuge which Rome affords to exiles. He to whom God has committed the guidance of his Church in our times, has already won a European reputation—an admiring world recognizes in him the vindicator of man's rights, and the restorer of that sacred freedom, which, from the days of Petrarca down to his own, has burned with fitful flame in the hearts of his countrymen.

He on whom the duty devolves, must chronicle the accession of Pius IX. among the great facts of the nineteenth century; and surely no former period shadowed forth such wondrous events. The gradual return to the centre of unity, the eager grasping of the human mind at every wreck of the ages of faith, which may float it from the sea of doubt and infidelity to the haven of repose, is evidenced by the investigating spirit which characterizes our times. Men are beginning to look with amazement on the worn-out prejudices of former periods, and wonder at the folly of their ancestors—while the last efforts of Russian and Teutonic tyranny are cursed, from the snow-fields of Siberia to the heights of the Caucasus. Austria, leagued with the Emperor of Russia, thus making herself the vanguard of Tartars, shall not stay the onward march of freedom; and God in his own good time will avenge the blood of Poland, and the base outrage practised on Cracovia.

At such a crisis, what wisdom and consummate prudence are required of him who wields the destinies of the Church. Had he nothing to engage his solitudes save the gigantic spread of Catholicity 'twere an awful weight even for the Vicar of Christ; but God has fitted him for the burden, and in the brief space that has elapsed since the elevation of Pius IX., we have had ample room to judge of his great capacities. Succeeding one whose holy and pious life is his highest eulogy, Pius has taken the tiara from a head which ached and throbbed beneath it as though it had been a thorny crown. Happy was that day which chose him to fill the place of Gregory XVI!—conversant with the ways of men, and familiar with the spirit of the age, he was prepared to meet the demand for reform, which fell upon his ears before he crossed the threshold of St. Peter's. A day had not elapsed after his enthronement, when he gave the world to know that he would be in advance of his time, not dragged in the wake of the popular movement—but, as it best befits him, guiding, controlling, and purifying it. The wily policy of Austria, and the revolutionary spirit of France had pained and fretted his predecessor's pontificate: the tri-color on the ramparts of Ancona, and the Austrian eagle on the mouldering battlements of Ferrara, were set up as the rival standards of two factions who in the pursuit of their own aggrandizement cared little for the interests of the papal authority. Gregory XVI., ever dreading a recurrence of these horrors which came on Italy when Napoleon's army crossed the Alps, lived in perpetual apprehension lest the French would sooner or later descend on Civita-Vecchia, and scale the walls of Rome. To be rid of such unhappiness, he threw himself on the protection of Metternich, thus hoping to silence the discontent of his subjects. 'Twas an unwise resolve—and the pontiff found himself cajoled by the great head-piece of the Vienna congress. Austria, ever anxiously lusting for that portion of the Papal dominions north of the Apennines, fomented the greatest unhappiness, and made the Pontiff answerable for their vexatious tyranny. The Emperor of Russia desirous to establish a territorial possession in Italy, made overtures to his Holiness for placing troops at his disposal, in order thus to counteract Austrian interference. The proposal however, was not, entertained; for much as the Pope lamented that his people should be overawed by Austrian bayonets, he recoiled from the contemplation of those demi-savages who had deluged the plains of Poland with the blood of her children. Who can wonder, if, under such circumstances, Gregory XVI. looked back through tears and sorrows to that period of his life when the regulation of his humble cell, and the devotions of the choir, and his studies made his sole concern? Threatened by France—made responsible for the tyranny of Austria—tormented by the effete cabinet of Naples, he had nothing to afford him consolation save the triumphs of the Faith in far off regions.

What a mighty work has fallen to the lot of Pius IX., and at what an auspicious moment has he ascended the throne of St. Peter. The day that saw his predecessor entombed, might have proved ruinous to Italy: a single blow "struck in hate or ire," might have thrown her back a century; but she knew that though patience had been overstrained, yet God, in his own good time, would send her hope and consolation. The first act of Pope Pius was one of clemency and wisdom. The guns that boomed across the Tiber on the day of his coronation announced a new era to his people. The prison-bolts of St. Angelo were unlocked for political offenders, while proclamations recalled the expatriated Italians who had been driven into exile to propitiate the Gaoler of Spielberg. The news spread with the rapidity of lightning, and from Bologna to the Campus Martius arose the shout of a grateful people, invoking blessings on their deliverer. Henceforth German sabres shall not be needed, French intrigue shall not embroil, and the wild horsemen of the Don may betake them to the Cherkesses, and leave their bones to bleach in the valleys and highlands of the Caucasus. Oh! but it was a splendid sight, when a thousand generous youths, restored to their homes and freedom, assembled before the Palace on the Quirinal, and pealed out that hymn which, reverberating in the deep stillness of the night time, called forth half the population of Rome to bless the advent of the anointed Rienzi. That demonstration was the knell of Austrian bondage, nor are we free to regard it as the ebullition of momentary enthusiasm. Since then what triumphs have awaited the papal monarch! wherever he moves his presence is hailed with rapture—festive arches span his road—joyful voices shout his name—the stalwart men of Trastevere, and the sun-burnt hunters of the Campagna make his escort—ready to do and die for him who lives and reigns in the affections of his subjects. And why should they not love and reverence him? The work of reform is already commenced—political offences are forgotten; the laws are to be remodelled; popular rights respected; obsolete immunities cancelled, and municipal privileges reasserted. When the pontiff has placed himself at the head of this great movement, who can doubt that Italy is steadily advancing to nationality? That living light which lately blazed along the Apennine chain troubled the heart of the despot who reigns at Vienna; it had a deep meaning, yet not so mystic as the hand-writing on the wall of the Eastern tyrant; may it prove the mene thecel of oppression in Italy, and all the world over. Cracovia, bleeding Poland, and Lombardy ground down by bearded Croates, have gathered hope from the omen, and Pius IX. may live to see the regeneration of his native land. Have we not a fore-shadowing of this great consummation in his acts? Railroads are to traverse his states from Centumcellis to the Adriatic; commerce is to be increased and facilitated; exports of provisions are to be rigorously interdicted to prevent a visitation which is to be attributed to the sordid avarice of man, and not to that Providence, which, opening its hand, fills every animal with benediction. The representative of Christ on earth, it well becomes him to guard and cherish the liberty of his children; that liberty is not the offspring of revolution and anarchy—'tis the daughter of Christianity and the hand-maid of the Church.

'Mid all our anxieties for the weal of this dear land, why should we not share our sympathies with the people of a sunnier clime? 'Neath the shadow of Rome's crumbling fanes, he who preached tidings of redemption to our fathers, received his apostolic commission. A thousand proofs have we had since then of the benevolence of her pontiffs, in a great measure atoning for the fatal act of one, who, perhaps unwittingly sent us gyves and bondage. Did not Italian swords and Italian aids contribute to win us one of those brilliant victories,

"Whose memories are the stars that light
Long nights of shame?"

Within Rome's walls our banished priests found a welcome and a home, and the greatest of our chieftains awaits the resurrection in the crypts of the janiculum. And now, Oh, sacred Heaven! when this land has been turned into one wide tower of famine, wanting little of the horrors of Ugolino's dungeon, has not the Pontiff acted nobly by us—contributing generously of his own resources, and dispensing of the treasures of the Church to those who take compassion on our miseries? May God forbid that we should ever be unmindful of all this. Grateful memories these for us, but grander are the associations which endear that land to its own sons. Dante, Tasso, Raphael, Columbus, and a thousand others, to whom the universal world shall ever more do homage, sprung from her soil; and, if we err not, time shall yet inscribe the name of Pius IX. on that page which records the benefactors of the human race. Fia sacro. Land of great memories!—empire of the sun!—cradle of arts and literature, may the fondest hopes of thy children soon be realized.

"Parent of our religion! whom the wide
Nations have knelt to for the Keys of Heaven!
Europe, repentant of her parricide,
Shall yet redeem thee, and, all backward driven,
Roll the barbarian tide, and sue to be forgiven.

THE HYMN

"Stabat Mater Dolorosa,"

RENDERED INTO ENGLISH.

I.

LONG she stood, the Mourning Mother,
Long by Calvary's Cross she stood,
Pierced as with a hundred spears;
While the grief she could not smother
Bathed her pale face in a flood
Of exhaustless tears.

II.

Who shall paint her heart's affliction,
Who depict her soul's dismay,
In that ghastliest hour of hours,
The dark hour of Crucifixion,
When Hell triumphed in the sway
Of the Evil Powers?

III.

When she saw her Son, the glorious
God of Mercy, Love and Light,
Tortured by a ruffian horde—
Then, alas! awhile victorious
O'er the world-controlling might
Of that Son and Lord?

IV.

And what pen, what power of painter,
May describe how sharp a sword
Rent her anguished Virgin breast
When, each moment waxing fainter,
Her Beloved, her Son and Lord,
Sank at length to rest?

V.

Oh! thou holiest, fondest, meekest
Mother of the Holiest Son,
Let me weep His woes and thine!
So may I even, though the weakest
Child of Clay, when Life is done,
Soar to realms divine!

Religious Toleration.

Now, that a more cordial and kindly spirit is beginning to preside over the intercourse of Irishmen, and that parties, too long estranged by fierce political and religious dissensions, forgetting their sectarian hostilities, in the pleasing duties of common charity, begin to discover in each other more congenial feelings, more heartfelt sympathies, more of the finer and nobler portions of our nature, than hitherto they deemed each other capable of, it will not, we hope, be judged inopportune, to offer a few thoughts upon Catholic views on religious toleration. When Catholic priest and Protestant parson, ascending peer, and popular agitator are cordially uniting in a holy rivalry of benevolence, it may, we are convinced, contribute to foster and consolidate that happy reunion, to lay before our separated brethren the light in which we, as Catholics, are bound to regard those who differ from us in religion. Such an exposition, however, has other, higher, and more abiding objects in view. We wish from our hearts' core, to see a kindlier feeling spring up between us and all our fellow-subjects and fellow-men; but we wish to see it flourish without compromise of principle, and without sacrificing one iota of that high-toned, deep-felt, all-pervading Catholic spirit which it is the aim and pride of our existence to cultivate. Some there are, no doubt, even among Catholics, who may deem our exposition rather hostile than friendly to such a union of parties. Why, they may ask us, at a time when our separated brethren extend to us the right hand of fellowship, obtrude upon their consideration stern doctrines from which their prejudices must revolt, and at which their feelings must shudder? To such we answer, that we are too thoroughly convinced of the rational soundness and comprehensive charity of this, as well as of every other portion of Catholic doctrine, to apprehend that it will, when clearly understood, make an unfavourable impression upon any rational and benevolent mind.

We may further add, that Protestants seldom correctly understand our real sentiments upon this matter, and that, in nine cases out of ten, their misapprehension is more calculated to beget aversion than to foster a kindly feeling towards us. Moreover, we sincerely hope that this happy result may long survive the melancholy cause that produced it. We wish that this better feeling, which our misfortunes have contributed to propagate, may become an abiding characteristic of Irish society; and hence we wish to see it established upon a clear and solid basis. Catholic principles and sentiments are unchangeable. We have no power to alter them, and as little disposition to cloak them. No good and permanent result can be much furthered by paltering with principle; and no result, however desirable, would, in our minds, sanction the adoption of means so disreputable. Our object, as far as Protestants are contemplated, is to lay before them a full and intelligible exposition of Catholic sentiments, relative to what we regard as errors in faith; that they may fairly canvass them and see whether they will find anything of which, with their boasted spirit of toleration, they can fairly complain. We do not, indeed, pretend to be able to make Catholic doctrine fully palatable to Protestant tastes. There is an unshrinking sternness in our principles upon this head, of which we are neither able nor willing to divest them. We have no disposition to weaken the effect which the conscientious convictions of many hundred millions of Christians, may have in stimulating the just fears of some, or in disturbing what we must regard as the dangerous security of others. But our object now is not polemical. Much as we may wish, we do not expect to make converts. But we do expect to convince Protestants, that, though there is much in our doctrine which they may not admit, yet there is nothing in it that can at all be regarded, either as indicating a want of Christian charity towards them, or as disentitling ourselves to a full participation in their kind and hearty sympathies. We appeal to that proud and boasted right of thinking for themselves, which Protestants so forcibly assert; and in the name of consistency we demand of them, to recognise the same privilege in us. We claim it to its fullest extent. We claim it not only in questions of a confessedly religious nature, but also in deciding what are, and what are not to be regarded as coming under this denomination.

A remarkable instance of what we cannot help designating as intolerant intolerance, occurred in a late number of the University Magazine. Speaking of the part which an illustrious Irishman, lately deceased, took in relation to the Provincial Colleges' question, the writer treats us to the following rather curious exemplification of Protestant liberality of sentiment: "He felt humiliated, as we did, that a nominally free people, whose mouths at the time were full of the conventional watchwords of national independence, should have sought to submit a matter so purely social as the education of their youths, to the decrees of a foreign corporation: manfully opposing the reference of the Irish Colleges' Bill to any other tribunal than a national one, he petitioned the legislature in favour of the measure introduced by the minister."

Now, we have no disposition to quarrel with the writer in the University Magazine for regarding education of youth as a purely social question, totally disconnected from religious sentiments. He may, for all we care, feel that it would be degrading on his part, to submit such a matter to the adjudication of what he calls a foreign corporation. But, with every respect for his judgment, we must assert our equal right to regard the matter in a light very different. There is not a sincere Catholic who does not consider religion as intimately connected with a proper system of education. That father who would be indifferent about the religious sentiments of those who are to mould the growing mind of his child—to foster and develop its good, and correct and suppress its evil inclinations—would be universally regarded as betraying a culpable indifference about the dearest interests of one whom God has intrusted to him. Our Church, as a loving parent, has always watched, with the tenderest solicitude, over the education of her children. She has ever exercised a jealous vigilance over those who were intrusted with this important charge. Nor can this be deemed an idle caution. A Protestant, we know, may be a very learned professor, and a very amiable man. He may possess, in very high degree, many of the noblest qualities, both of head and heart; we feel proud of the acquaintance of many who are ample illustrations of this. Yet, notwithstanding all these recommendatory qualifications, we cannot help believing, that many of their religious sentiments are unsound and dangerous. We know, too, that the religious sentiments of the teacher may, imperceptibly, and even unintentionally, make their way to his instructions, and thereby make an unfelt (and the more dangerous because unfelt) impression upon the plastic minds of his youthful pupils. Besides this, it appears manifest, that by proper care the education of youth may be made the means of fortifying and enriching, as by neglect it may be that of corrupting their religious sentiments. To us it would appear but a poor recommendation for a system of education, that it left the religious sentiments of the pupil totally unheeded. Education is, with us, a question essentially connected with religion. There is no diversity of opinion upon this head. Every sincere Catholic is thoroughly convinced both of the evils and blessings which, in a religious point of view, it is capable of producing. None therefore can, without culpable compromise of principle, be indifferent about the religious bearing of that secular education which our youth are to receive. There is no intolerance in this, as may be clearly illustrated by an example. Let us suppose that there is a member of the medical profession, who has attained a considerable celebrity in some departments of his art; but who, rightly or wrongly, is supposed to have imbibed some serious and dangerous errors in medical science—errors which may lead to practices the most pernicious in his profession. Would he, we ask, be considered a prudent father, who would intrust to such a practitioner the life of a loved son, believing that whilst he cured a fistula he might induce consumption? Yet such a physician might be an amiable man; he might be a talented and learned man. The estimate formed of his professional skill might be erroneous. Still it would be no intolerance, but the exercise of prudence, in those who thought of him as we have supposed, carefully to avoid him in the practice of his profession. If this be true in what concerns the body, how much more so is it in what concerns the soul? Protestants may believe that their sentiments are neither false nor dangerous. They are welcome to think so; but they must be content to allow us to form a different judgment.

There are points, however, connected with education, upon which conscientious Catholics may differ. All may not form the same estimate about the extent of danger in any given system of education. Nor is it necessary that they should agree about the efficacy of such means as may be thought of for counteracting this danger. A defective system may be bad, but good men may think the want of any system worse. As the question of education stands at present, there is ample room for diversity of opinion; but there is no second opinion about the religious character of the question. If toleration is to be anything more than a name, we are not to be sneered at for submitting it to ecclesiastical adjudication, whether at home or abroad, this being, upon our principles, the only proper mode of settling religious questions. We are not to be insultingly asked, how can geometry be taught upon Catholic principles? or, how is algebra to be regulated by the rules of the Council of Trent? To this silly question we have only to answer that geometry and algebra do not constitute education. There is more in the proper training of young intellects and young hearts than can be accomplished by lines and angles, or the ingenious evolutions of X's and Y's. We stand upon our own principles, and insist that we have a right to think and act in conformity with them. We stand upon our numbers and importance in the state, and insist that we have a strict right that whatever system of education is to be extended to the people of this country, be so shaped in our favour, that we may, without any compromise of our own principles, avail ourselves of its benefits. We do not seek to regulate the education of others. Let others speak and act for themselves.

Our object, however, in this paper is rather with the members of our own communion than with Protestants. We are anxious to foster a kindly feeling between us and all our separated brethren; but we are more anxious, we confess, to cultivate a bold rich Catholic spirit among ourselves. We wish to impress upon Catholics the propriety of a straightforward ingenuous conformity with their own principles in their manner of speaking and acting towards Protestants. We would earnestly impress this upon them, as more high-minded, more independent, but above all, as more religious. A spirit of toleration has happily of late become more fashionable than heretofore; but, like most fashionable sentiments, it has often been driven to excess. Many Catholics, and generally not the least educated, feel so anxious to excel in this agreeable qualification for social intercourse, that they care little about compromising their religious sentiments. Some there are, who seem to regard their religious principles as the tradesman does his holiday garments, that are to be carefully hung up during the week that they may be taken down, upon Sundays, uncreased and unsullied by the rough and toilsome labour of his ordinary calling. Some of them, we fear, are not so regular in renewing their acquaintance with their religious principles, as the tradesman is in visiting his wardrobe. They think it liberality, not to allow their distinctive religious sentiments to make any impression upon their mode of acting in the common affairs of life—but they are wrong. Religious truths are not dry abstract principles; they are practical sentiments, that must impress themselves upon the conduct of such as feel them as they ought. What reason is it for suppressing their influence, that a respected friend does not recognize their truth? These persons too often act as if they feared there was something in these principles that would not bear the light of day. They delight in a sort of mawkish liberality, that manifests itself in vague unmeaning expressions, about “common Christianity,” “essential principles,” and “minor differences of opinion”—expressions which have an intelligible meaning in the mouth of a Protestant, but with them either are totally meaningless, or imply a sense highly at variance with Catholic sentiments. They are, indeed, unwilling directly to gainsay any doctrine defined by the Church; but they hesitate not to do the same thing by implication.

In pressing these considerations upon our Catholic brethren, we are not to be understood as encouraging a coarse, offensive bearing towards those who are separated from us in religion. The Catholic spirit is essentially a spirit of conciliation—a spirit of sincere and ardent brotherly love. There are, indeed, we regret to say, Catholics to be found, seldom however among the educated, who, actuated rather by the morbid feeling of the partizan than by the meek and loving spirit of the Christian, seem more desirous to wound the feelings than to edify the souls of their separated brethren: by presenting Catholic sentiments in a garb coarse and forbidding, they excite ill will where they should rather conciliate affection. We are not for gratuitous obtrusion of our sentiments upon reluctant minds; we would, with St. Paul, sincerely wish to see all men as ourselves in this matter; but a coarse obtrusive attempt at proselytism would, we think, neither become ourselves nor serve those whom we would fain convert. We would like to see our religion propagated; but it would be by the earnestness of prayer, by “a manifestation of the spirit” in charity and love, by an exemplification of Catholic orthodoxy in the purity of Catholic morals, and, upon suitable occasion, by calmly but firmly accounting “for the faith that is in us. We are no advocates for acrimonious polemics; they may gratify pride, but they can neither conciliate prejudice, nor cherish those rich and holy qualities of the heart, that are the soul and substance of Christianity.

That in our doctrine, to which we would especially wish to direct the attention of our separated brethren as bearing upon our present subject, is the unbounded charity towards all men, which our Church inculcates. Charity, with us, is not a mere evangelical counsel; it is a Christian duty, and no error, however gross, or crime, however enormous, can place a fellow-man beyond the sphere of its obligation. Charity, to be genuine, we are taught, must be a real internal feeling of benevolence, that wishes well to the neighbour here and hereafter, rejoices at his happiness, sympathizes for his miseries, and is ready to lend assistance to the afflicted, according to its abilities and the circumstances.

of the case. Our doctrine has been repeatedly calumniated as encouraging a cold, unfeeling, and even malevolent disposition towards those who are separated from us in religion. This calumny has been eagerly propagated by those who have an interest in religious and political strife. So incessantly have they urged it, such various changes have they rung upon it, that many well-disposed and kind-hearted Protestants have been caught by the deception. From their earliest years they have been taught to regard us as a cold-hearted, blood-thirsty race, who would make a merit of imbruing our hands in the blood of those whom we regard as heretics. So forcibly have many of them been convinced of this, that when fortune brought them within the acquaintance of high-minded Catholics, whose kind and warm-hearted disposition should disabuse their unlucky misconception, they regarded this rather as the triumph of the natural goodness of the individuals over the corrupting influence of their creed, than as the genuine result of their religious sentiments. Against this pernicious calumny, Catholics have often protested. The fullest answer we can give is by appealing to our doctrine—where any such pestiferous sentiment will be sought for in vain. The doctrine of the Catholic Church is easily appealed to—there are no gnostic mysteries, no esoteric organization, no masonic secrets; all is open—all is before the world. We appeal to our definitions of doctrine, to our canons of discipline, to our accredited books of instruction, to the writings of our approved theologians, and we defy the most malignant scrutiny to discover anything at variance with that unbounded charity towards all men—that deep, practical feeling of good will, which, we assert, our Church inculcates, as one of the holiest and most essential duties of a Christian. Where then is that baneful doctrine, of which we are accused, to be found? Nowhere else than in the heated imaginations of our calumniators.

If members of our Church have displayed a rancorous persecuting spirit, our religion is not to be taxed with it. A blind, earthly zeal, and the rabid feelings of the partizan may mix themselves up with the holiest cause. In becoming Christians or Catholics, we do not cease to be men; nor do the grosser feelings of our nature necessarily lose their influence; besides, religion is often only the pretext, whilst worldly objects are the real motives. It is not from isolated cases that the spirit of Catholicity is to be estimated. Our religion is no more chargeable with these than she is with the hard-heartedness of the oppressor, or the villany of the murderer. From this unjust and unwarranted sentence, we appeal to what our Church openly teaches, and to the conduct of the majority of her people—particularly of those who are most strict in the observance of her commands. In the former, universal benevolence is inculcated; in the latter, it is practised. Oh! the spirit of Catholicity is truly a spirit of charity, of sincere unbounded charity—charity for every creature stamped with the image of the Creator—for every soul purchased by the blood of our common Redeemer. We are bound to regard every man in particular, as ransomed by the blood of the Man-God, and to have a sincere wish that the beneficent intentions of the Saviour be not frustrated in his regard. If then we believe the condition of our separated brethren to be dangerous, and think that they are making void the blood of the Redeemer, it is not because we take complacency in what we regard as their misery. We do not hastily adopt this conviction, as agreeable to our prejudices, but are forced into it as the inevitable result of what we regard as the clear unmistakable principles of revelation. Protestants may consider our premises unsound, but they cannot charge our conclusion with want of charity; they may think our intellects weak, but they cannot regard our hearts as unfeeling. If a kind neighbour be led from his own views of things, to consider my condition as dangerous—have I any right to quarrel with his judgment? If actuated by the goodness of his heart, he feels for what he considers my misfortune—am I not bound to be grateful for his sympathy? I may disregard his judgment, but I must admire his heart.

That we do regard separation from our Church, as pernicious to the soul, we do not deny. If by toleration, we are to understand an admission, that antagonistic creeds may be true or may be harmless, we at once wave all claim to its possession. Our Church does teach, and every consistent Catholic must believe, that she is the only authorised interpreter of the Word of Truth—the only accredited “dispenser of the mysteries of God.” Every doctrine opposed to her doctrines, she regards as erroneous; every altar raised against her altar, she deems an abomination. She exacts of her children an implicit submission of their judgment to everything she teaches; and forces them, under the sanction of anathema, to receive her decisions as infallible. This submission of our judgment to what we regard as an infallible church, is not to be considered as a blind tribute of the will to the authority of a superior. The Church is our superior, commissioned to govern, as well as to teach us. But the authority whereby she commands our obedience, is different from that which serves to fortify our faith. A person may obey a superior, and even may be bound to do so, though he have serious doubts as to the propriety of the command. But no one is bound to believe a doctrine, nor can he believe though he were willing, as long as there remains upon his mind a remnant of rational doubt of its having been revealed. The authority of the Church, we consider as sufficient to dispel every doubt; because we regard the promises of the Redeemer, as guaranteeing her decisions from every taint of error. When, therefore, our Church calls upon us to submit to her directions, she does not, as some would have it, “compel us to put out our eyes that we may grope our way by the light of a distant star;” but she commands us to fix our steady gaze upon what we consider a clear effulgent light that shines upon a mountain—that by its aid, what of ourselves we could not, we may be able to distinguish between genuine and counterfeit revelations. Light is the province of intellect; but it is not necessary that all our judgments rest upon a clear intuitive knowledge of the matter in question. More than half our knowledge depends upon authority human and divine. All our faith rests upon revelation, and the genuineness of revelation is known only from the motives of credibility that accompany it. As a revelation, once given, may become involved in obscurity, the establishment of an organ, commissioned to guard and expound it, is quite in conformity with the economy of God in giving such a revelation. That God has established such an organ, most Christians admit: Catholics believe that he has endowed it with infallibility. Upon this point hangs the whole dispute between us and those who differ from us. This is with us the alpha and omega of religious controversy. All other disputes may resolve themselves into this, and it is resolved into the fact, "did Christ promise to preserve His church inviolate?" None can say that it is beyond His power to do so. Who can deny that it would be worthy of His providence? If we be right upon this point, we are right upon every other. If we be wrong, a wide field, we confess, opens for error. However that be thought of, it must be admitted that, believing, as we do, our church to be infallible, we act most rationally in submitting to its decisions. If, then, we regard all adverse creeds as essentially false, it is because we are convinced that our own is infallibly true. If we regard separation from our church as pernicious, it is because we believe her to be the one, only expositor of divine truth, to whose infallible judgment all are bound to submit—the only "dispenser of the mysteries of God," wherein alone the waters of life, are to be sought and found. There is no intolerance in this. We cannot call that light which we believe to be darkness. We cannot look upon that as innocent which we are convinced to be pernicious.

Where the clear unequivocal decision of the Church does not stamp upon a doctrine what we must regard as the infallible seal of truth, there is full scope left for the exercise of opinion. Protestants sometimes charge us with inconsistency, as considerable diversity of opinion is tolerated within our Church, whilst their dissent is stigmatized as heresy. To understand us upon this point, it is necessary to bear in mind that we make a wide distinction between doctrines and opinions. Everything connected with religion has not been defined by our Church. It appears that it was the will of God, that in this land of imperfection, we should not have absolute certainty upon everything in religion. The leading points of Revelation are placed before us by the Church in bold relief; but out from these the shadings often become so faint, that it is impossible to determine where truth ends and error begins. Here is the legitimate province of opinion—here the Church not only permits a right to differ, but guards it with jealousy. Saint Augustine has well expressed the spirit of the Church in these beautiful words: "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus charitas."

Does it follow, from what we have been saying, that Catholics must regard all those who die out of actual communion with our Church as inevitably lost? We emphatically answer that it does not. In the first place, we are taught that baptism may be validly conferred by a person who is not a member of our church; consequently, we believe that all those are saved, who having received this regenerating sacrament, die without forfeiting, by any act of theirs, the high privilege therein received. As to those who have arrived at the mature use of reason, we know that much of their error may be owing to invincible ignorance. No man is bound to believe any doctrine, without sufficient motives of credibility; nor is any one bound to submit to our church's teaching until her credentials are clearly made known to him. How far invincible ignorance may excuse the errors of our separated brethren, we do not pretend to determine. We do not wish to set limits to the mercies of God. Gladly we would cling to any hope that would go to extend them; but we know also that his justice is severe and searching. We know that upon every man there devolves a fearful responsibility of corresponding with the light that is vouchsafed him. An indolent apathy, or a pertinacious adherence to preconceived opinions, too often, we fear, makes many extinguish the little light that begins to flicker in their souls, and which properly attended to, would bring them to the required knowledge. We know too, that flung upon the world and its distracting cares, with all its incentives to sin, they are deprived of those powerful aids, with which God has enriched his church, to fortify the weakness and subdue the passions of her children. There is no sacrament of penance to wash away the filth contracted by sin; no bread of life to nourish and fortify their tottering souls, no altar, no sacrifice. When we consider all these things, we are obliged to moderate our hopes in invincible ignorance, as a cover for the errors of faith. We willingly admit that salvation is not impossible; but our fears prevent us from saying more. But this we know, and this we must believe, that such as are saved, are saved only because, on the one hand, invincible ignorance rendered separation, even in death, excusable; and on the other, clinging to the light and aid conceded to them, they died in the loving embraces of their God and Saviour.

In these hurried lines we have endeavoured to lay before the reader, as clearly as our abilities enabled us, such of our doctrines as bear upon the question of religious toleration. We have said nothing about the infliction of civil punishments for religious disbelief, because our Church teaches nothing upon the matter. If in past times, such punishments have been resorted to, the civil powers of particular kingdoms alone are accountable. However, before we rashly condemn such conduct, we must bear in mind that the most ardent admirers of religious liberty cannot hold that treasonable principles should be propagated with impunity, under the guise of religious sentiments. Few, we think, will deny that many of the sectarians adduced as punished for their religious opinions, preached doctrines of a treasonable nature. It should also be recollected, that innovations in religion are generally attended with civil commotions; and these, of course fall under the province of civil authority. In further mitigation, it should be borne in mind, that antecedent to these innovations, the ancient religion was universally received in these countries. To stop by force the spread of a new religion, is very different from compelling a people, by force of arms, to abandon an old one. The Catholic church has often restrained the indiscreet zeal of kings, in wishing to further the spread of Christianity by force of arms; but it could not be expected that she would make a stand against civil power, whilst it made use of the means at its disposal, to crush a movement which both must have regarded as pernicious to the souls of the people, and subversive of the peace and security of the constitution.

Protestants who regard these movements, as identified with the spread of the Gospel, will hardly comprehend the justness of our reasoning. But to form a just judgment of the conduct of others, it is necessarily, as Dr. Whately, to his credit, observes, to place one's self in their position. If there be anything real in Protestant toleration, they cannot condemn men for acting in conformity with their own sentiments. These civil authorities had no apprehensions, that in opposing religious innovations, they were setting themselves in opposition to the Gospel. They were fully persuaded that these movements were destructive of both political and religious happiness. There was nothing to restrain them but what should never be lost sight of, a due regard for the weakness of others, and a reluctance to adopt means severe and oppressive. If they have failed in this respect, if they have needlessly resorted to harshness and cruelty, they are justly to be condemned for their conduct; but the Church is not responsible, she has never sanctioned such a spirit. We entreat of our separated brethren not to judge of our religion from such isolated cases; let them look to what is openly taught, let them examine too what is generally practised.

In conclusion, we earnestly exhort all fellow-Catholics, to allow full play to their religious sentiments within their souls. Is there anything, we may ask, in what we have been explaining, from which they should shrink to avow? We have barely stated Catholic doctrine—if they believe it, they should blush to palter with it—if they do not, they are not Catholics. The Catholic church rigidly exacts our obedience; we must believe her doctrine whole and entire. Our belief must be solid and unwavering, or it is not worth the name. Many, we fear there are, who, though they do not positively disbelieve any doctrine; yet, are so little occupied by religious sentiments, that they scarcely feel their impression. Their language often abounds with expressions and allusions, borrowed from the writings of Protestants, and tinged with their peculiar sentiments. Is it honourable, or is it consistent, thus to suppress and compromise their own principles? Is this a fitting tribute of respect to their Protestant friends? Let Protestants speak and act in conformity with their principles; but let Catholics adhere to their own. We would wish to see this dastardly, sneaking spirit scouted from society. Why should Catholics endure it? why should Protestants admire? Men are ready to avow their political principles at all hazards—are religious sentiments of less importance? This defect is attributable to the defective and Protestant character of the higher branches of education amongst us. It is also attributable to a want of practical knowledge of Catholic sentiments in many of our otherwise highly enlightened members. Many, whose exalted qualities fit them to be ornaments to our religion, are rather a curse than a blessing, for not thoroughly imbibing a rich Catholic spirit. We exhort them to cultivate this spirit—we exhort them to study well and understand it. The Catholic spirit is congenial to every exalted quality of head and heart: it fosters every generous sentiment and stimulates every endowment of genius that can enoble the human intellect. Without the chastening control of religion, what gigantic prodigies of fiendish mischief genius may produce, sad experience informs us. Under her guidance, the same powers might have realised effects of equal magnitude, but characterised for sanctity and universal beneficence. Religion opens a wide field for exalted exertion; under her guidance their course will be safe, and the glory thus obtained is extinguished neither in time nor eternity.

Ancient Irish Missions

ON THE CONTINENT.

MANY a lecture has been read to the Irish, both by friends and enemies, on excessive national pride. It generally happens that the foreigners who administer the correction, are themselves the slaves of the vice, and therefore have no right to expect much fruit from their charity; but the admonitions of a friend are always useful, if, admitting that there are some respectable facts in Irish history, he restricts his censure to national vices, thus lopping away the rank luxuriance of a fruitful stock. Prudent men will not rashly tamper with a principle, which in Ireland as in all other countries has, like everything human, produced good and evil, alternately the support and the disgrace, the life and the bane of a nation. Cervantes enriched the Spanish language, and made the world laugh at Spanish chivalry; but it has been questioned whether Spain has not paid too dearly for his wit, whether her grandees did not lose their high principle with their punctilious pride, and were not ever after the most worthless of her sons. Surely some indulgence ought to be given to national pride, until we find one example of national humility; one nation that has formed a true estimate of its virtues and its vices. We may not admire the Irish harper, Rory Dall, who maintained, before James VI., that O'Neil, the uncrowned chieftain of the north, was a higher name than the future monarch of the British isles; but Rory's error was not the worst extreme.

The ancient Irish missions are not produced as subjects of national pride, for though they are the brightest page in Irish Annals, and unique in the history of medieval Europe, selfish insular pride is the last feeling they engender in a Christian mind. Their principle was not of the earth: they brought home, in triumph, no captives, tributes, nor tattered banners. The missionary gave, gratuitously, what he had received gratuitously, and stands before us not so much an Irishman as the Christian priest, the soldier of that kingdom of Christ which has seen, and to the end of the world shall see, the rise and fall of European crowns. It is in the annals of that kingdom that the missionaries' glory is written. The missions, it is true, have a double aspect—a supernatural and an earthly—the Irish foreigner, appearing in Guizot's pages, not only as the priest and preacher, but as enlarging the realms of philosophy, and acting as pioneer to civilization in literature, the arts, agriculture, and even commerce. But these latter fruits, which are the ordinary food of national pride, are, to the missions, what the Jesuit discoveries in geography, botany, and other branches of natural philosophy, were to the spiritual results of preaching of the Jesuit missionaries. The priest, inspired by God to convert souls, abandoning Ireland and friends, casting down the idols in the dark forests of Germany, or on the mountains of Switzerland, is the object that rivets the attention. However, national pride in those Irish missions is not, perhaps, a national sin; as for the one that boasts vainly, one hundred may either not have known or undervalued them. The following sketch is given, as nearly as translation allows, in the words of Dr. John Lynch, Bishop of Killala, one of those great men who, in the worst days of the seventeenth century, saved the wreck of our history. For the truth of his statement, it is sufficient to state, that, with the exception of a few anachronisms, and two or three doubtful names, they have passed the rigid censorship of Dr. Lanigan, who has been to Irish history what the Devil's attorney-general is to the canonization of saints. Should Ireland, after the example of the mother church, ever erect a national pantheon to all her saints, where all the Christian virtues would be enthroned in the persons of saintly men—where the eloquent voluptuary or the fiery zealot, by contemplating the models of Christian virtue, might be changed into a St. Augustine or a St. Paul, few countries in Europe could claim a greater number of saintly sons, whose memories are still honoured on the scene of their labours, binding Ireland to Europe and to Rome by an eternal bond—the interchange of spiritual blessings:—

"All the world knows that the Irish went over, not one by one, but in crowds, to Britain, Gaul, Belgium, and Germany, to convert the inhabitants of those regions to the Christian religion, and bring them under the obedience of the Roman pontiff. A signal testimony to this fact is found in the letter of Eric of Auxerre to Charles the Bald. "Need I mention Ireland, who, despising the dangers of the deep, emigrates to our shores, with almost the entire host of her philosophers; the most eminent amongst them become voluntary exiles, to minister to the wishes of our most wise Solomon." Such, also, is the testimony of St. Bernard, 'From Ireland, as from an overflowing stream, crowds of holy men descended on foreign nations.' Walefridus Strabo says 'that the habit of emigrating had become a second nature to the Scoti,' namely the Irish, as I have already proved; hence the just observation of Osborne, that the habit of emigrating 'had taken the strongest hold of the Irish. For what the piety of other nations has made a habit, they have changed from habit into nature.' Those holy emigrations of the Irish were distinguished by a peculiarity, never, or but very seldom found among other nations. As soon as it became known that any eminent monk had resolved to undertake one of these sacred expeditions, twelve men of the same order placed themselves under his command, and were selected to accompany him; a custom probably introduced by St. Patrick, who had been ably supported by twelve chosen associates in converting the Irish from the darkness of paganism to the light of the true faith. St. Riach, nephew to St. Patrick, and walking in his footsteps was attended in his sacred missions to foreign tribes and regions by twelve colleagues of his own order; and when St. Rupert, who had been baptised by a nephew of St. Patrick, apostle of Ireland, departed to draw down the fertilising dews of true religion on pagan Bavaria, twelve faithful companions shared the perils and labours of his journey and mission. St. Finnian, bishop of Clonard, selected twelve from the thronged college of his disciples, to devote them, in a special manner, to establish and animate the principles of the Christian religion among the Irish, and hence they were styled by posterity the twelve apostles of Ireland. St. Columba was accompanied in his apostolical mission to Albany by twelve monks. Twelve followed St. Finbar in his pilgrimage beyond the seas, and twelve St. Maidoc, bishop of Ferns, in one of his foreign missions. St. Colman Fin was never seen without his college of twelve disciples. When the ceaseless eruptions of foreign enemies, or the negligence of the bishops, had well nigh extinguished the virtue of religion in Gaul, and left nothing but the Christian faith—when the medicine of penance and the love of mortification were found nowhere, or but with a few, 'then,' says Jonas, 'St. Columbanus descended on Gaul, supported by twelve associates, to arouse her from her torpor, and enlighten her sons with the beams of the most exalted piety. Twelve disciples followed St. Eloiuis from Ireland to illumine the Belgians with the rays of faith; twelve accompanied St. Willibrod from Ireland to Germany; the pilgrimage and labours of St. Farannan, in Belgium, were shared by twelve faithful brothers of the cowl; and the same number were fellow-exiles with St. Macallan. Perhaps the reason why the Irish clung with such invincible attachment to this custom, was the number of the apostles chosen by our Saviour, and the same number of disciples appointed by the Apostolic See to accompany Palladius to Ireland.

"But it was not in companies of twelve, alone, that great men went forth from Ireland to plant or revive sound doctrine and discipline in foreign lands. Bodies, far more numerous are also mentioned. St. Albert was accompanied by nineteen disciples. Sixty accompanied St. Brendan in his voyage in search of the land of promise. St. Guignier, son of the king of Ireland, passed over to Britain, with a noble band of 770 associates; and St. Blaithmac, son of the king of Ireland, was followed thither by a good number of monks. St. Donnanus led away from his country fifty-two associates. Twenty-four disciples of St. Ailbe were sent by him to propagate the faith in Ireland. St. Emilius brought to the aid of St. Fursa at Lagny, a large body of their countrymen, and gave him wonderful aid in instilling the grace of God into the souls of man. St. Seizin was accompanied by seventy disciples to Armorica, Britain, and Alsace welcomed St. Florentius, with Arbogastus and Hildulph.

"Irish saints are also found toiling in strange lands, in smaller numbers, and fortifying them abundantly with the dew of their faith and virtues. In Italy there were Donatus of Fiesole, Andrew, and their sister, St. Brigid of Opaca; in Picardy, SS. Caidoc and Fricorius, otherwise Adrian; at Rhemes, SS. Gibrian, Tressan, Hoelan, Abram, German, Veran, Petroan, Promptia, Possenna, and Iruda; at Paris, Claude, Clement, and John; among the Morini (of Boulogne), SS. Vulgan, Kilian and Obod; in the territory of Beauvais, SS. Maura and Brigid, virgins and martyrs, and their brother Hyspad; at Fusciria, SS. Marildis, virgin, and her brother Alexander. In Kleggon, a district in Germany, St. Northberga, with Sista, and nine others of her children. At Ratisbon, SS. Marian, John, Candidus, Clement, Murcherdach, Magnoald, and Isaac. In Austrasia, SS. Kilian, Colonatus, and Totnan; and St. Cadroe and his associates at Walcedore. These devoted their lives to the instruction of the people, and were celebrated for the miraculous favours obtained by their intercession.

"Though it would be too tedious to mention, in detail, the great number of our countrymen who were distinguished on the continent for their marvellous works, and the sanctity of their lives, it would be unpardonable to omit them altogether. Not taking into account those who were canonised in Britain, nor those who went over to the continent in large bodies, we have in Italy, St. Cathaldus, patron of Tarentum, St. Donatus, patron of Fiesole, St. Emilian, patron of Faventum, and St. Frigidian of Lucca. Pavia honours John Albinus as the founder of her university, and St. Cumean is, above all other Irish saints, the favourite patron of Bobio.

"In Gaul, St. Mansuetus is patron of Tulle, St. Finlag, abbot of St. Simphonan, patron of Metz; and St. Præcordius of Corbie, situated between Amiens and Peronne. Amiens honours St. Forcensius, and Poitiers, St. Fridolinus, abbot of the monastery of St. Hilary. St. Elias is patron of Angouleme, St. Anatolius of Besancon, St. Fiacre of Meaux, St. Fursa of Peronne, and St. Laurence of Eu. Liege honours St. Momo, and Strasburg SS. Florentinus and Arbogastus. In Bretagne, SS. Origin, Toava, Tenan, Gildas, Brioc, and many others are revered as patrons. In Rhemes and the surrounding district SS. Gibrian, Heran, German, Veran, Abran, Petran, and three sisters, are held in the highest veneration. 'In Burgundy, the vineyard of the Lord yielded an abundant harvest to the zeal of St. Columbanus, who founded there a great number of monasteries and colleges of monks, restored the true service of God, and left there after him Deicolus, Columbinus, and Anatolius.'—Flodoard Hist. Rhemes.

"In Burgundy, also, St. Maimbode is honoured as a martyr.

"In Belgium, you have in Brabant, SS. Rumold, Fredegand, Himelin, Pypmia, and Gerebernus. In Flanders, SS. Levin, Gutthagon, Columbanus; in Artois, SS. Liugluio, Liuglianus, Kilian, Vulgan, Fursa, and Obodius; in Hainault, SS. Ette, Adalgisus, Abel, Wasnulp, and Mombolus; in Namur, SS. Farenann and Eloquius; in Leige, SS. Ultan, Foillan, and Bertuin; in Gueldress SS. Wiro, Plechelm, and Othger; in Holland, St. Hiero; in Friesland, SS. Suithbert and Acca.

But Germany, especially, was the most flourishing vineyard of our saints. St. Albuin, or Witta, is honoured as apostle in Thuringia; St. Disibode at Treves; St. Erhard, in Alsace and Bavaria; St. Fridolin, in the Grisons of Switzerland; St. Gall, among the Suabians, Swiss, and Rhetians; St. John, in Mecklenberg; St. Virgil, at Saltzburg; St. Kilian, in Franconia; St. Rupert, in part of Bavaria. From these saints these different places received the grace of faith, and the sacred discipline of Christian virtue, and afterwards honoured the memory of their benefactors, as the apostles of their nation. But these are not the only saints to whom the Germans send up their filial prayers; equal honours are paid by them to some others of our countrymen. St. Albert is honoured at Ratisbon, SS. Deicola and Fintan at Constance, and St. Eusebius in Coire. The town and canton of St. Gall, took their name from our countryman, St. Gall. "This monastery," says Munster, "was the school of the noble and the peasant, and the nursery of a great number of learned men; at one period it contained no less than one hundred and fifty students and brothers." Ireland was, therefore, both the atheneum of learning, and the temple of holiness—supplying the world with literati, and heaven with saints. Truly doth she appear the academy of the earth, and the colony of heaven. Was ever panegyric more appropriate than the words of Eric of Auxerre? "Need I mention Ireland, who, despising the dangers of the deep, emigrates to our shores, with almost the whole host of her philosophers; the most eminent among them become voluntary exiles to minister to the tastes of our wisest Solomon?"

The period of these Continental missions extends from the year 500 to the twelfth century; from St. Seizin of Armorica, and St. Gibrian of Rheims, to St. Colman, patron of Austria. It is an error of Dr. Lannigan and Mr. Moore to assign the troubled state of Ireland, especially during the Danish invasion, as one of the great causes of the missions. If the stream had stopped when Ireland was in peace there might be some grounds for the opinion; but as it flowed with greater or less force during six centuries, a man might as well attribute the tide that breaks on the western shores of Europe, to a western wind, as assign Irish missions to Irish political tempests. Christian Ireland was fulfilling her destiny. Placed like an army of reserve on the flank of the pagan barbarians, she co-operated with the Holy See in subduing Europe; and so far from being influenced by a wish for more peaceful climes, her sons selected the most uncivilized and dangerous fields—those which are most remote from the other centres of Catholic civilization. It was the instinct of apostolical charity, for where the body is, thither flock the eagles. Thus it has struck those who are familiar with Irish history—not a little singular—that no Irish missionary is found in Spain, notwithstanding the communication between the two kingdoms. Spain needed no help; her councils of Toledo, during the sixth, seventh, and eight centuries, had given her the start of all European nations, and nerved her for the long fight against the Saracens. No Irish missionary is found in the southern provinces of France, some of which were under Spanish jurisdiction, and all had been more thoroughly Romanized than the proper kingdom of the Franks. The few Irishmen who settled in southern Italy, were detained there, after a pilgrimage to the Holy Land; but the great field of their zeal commences with the Lombards, then over the Alps, in Switzerland, along the banks of the Rhine and Danube, Bavaria, Belgium, the northern provinces of France, the Hebrides, the Orkneys, Iceland, Scotland, and England, except Wales, which gave as much as it received, perhaps more.

The services of the Irish were gratefully remembered in Europe. The rank which England held in the general council of Constance, after being denied to her on her new claims, was granted to her as the representative of Ireland. Stephen White, a Jesuit, a contemporary and correspondent of Usher's, writes, "that preceding 1000 years, there was not one cathedral church from the Grisons to the German Ocean, in which the festival of St. Bridget of Kildare, patroness of Leinster, was not kept on the 1st of February. Her church stood beside the church of St. Martin, in Cologne. All the reformed German calendars, down to White's time, preserved her name, though they expunged many others. When the hand of the persecutor was heavy on Ireland, well might Benedict XIV. remind her of her ancient glory." If we wished to enumerate all those most holy men, Columbanus, Kilian, Virgil, Rumold, Gallus, and many others who introduced the Catholic faith from Ireland into other provinces, or honoured it by the bloody crown of martyrdom, our epistle would exceed all proper limits. Let it suffice to have referred to them briefly, that you may the more easily recall to mind, what was the religion and piety of your ancestors, what and how great was the solicitude of the episcopal order, which made them glorious and happy.—August 15, 1741.

When we review our centenary feuds and criminal discord, grand opportunities lost for ever, and other great national crimes, we must be pharisees indeed if we do not confess that it was the arm of God alone which has preserved us—selecting the weak things of the world to confound the strong, while England, Scotland, and Germany, to whose conversion we contributed, have fallen off from the fold. Conceive the feelings of an Englishman 250 years hence, if the United States of 1779, after being scourged by the million scorpions of democratic anarchy, voluntarily returned to the English crown; then you may guess what the Irish Catholic feels, when, with the sad, but glorious page of his history before him, he reads of twelve scions of royal or princely families, and forty-two of the greatest men in literature, science, and art in Germany, and nearly as many in Presbyterian Switzerland, returning, humbled penitents, to the one fold of Christ, during the present century.

[Note.—Willibrod, Switbert, and a few others, though Saxons, are classed among the Irish missionaries, because it was in Ireland they prepared for the missions. The Latin form of many of the names was common, even for those who never left Ireland; thus: "Mochoemoc," is, in Latin, Pulcherius, and "Blaithmac," Florentius. The celebrated voyage of St. Brendan, was commemorated in the old Irish Calendars as "Egressio familiæ Sti Brendani."]

Lamentation of Jeremias over Jerusalem.

"And it came to pass, after Israel was carried into captivity, and Jerusalem was desolate, that Jeremias the prophet sat weeping, and mourned with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and with a sorrowful mind, sighing and moaning, he said:—"

I.

How doth she sit alone,
The City late so thronged, how doth she sit in wo,
Begirt with solitude and graves!
Oh! how is she that from her Temple-throne
Ruled o'er the Gentiles, now become
A widow in her dreary home!
How have her Princes fallen low,
And dwindled into slaves!

II.

She weepeth all night long,
Forsaken and forgot: her face is dusk with tears;
Her heart is rent with many throes.
Not one of all the once-admiring throng
That sued and wooed her night and morn,
But looketh down on her with scorn!
Her fondest friends of other years
Have now become her foes!

III.

Her dwelling-place is dark;
Her palaces lie waste: she feareth even to pass
Their bass-courts desolate and bare.
She hath become a by-word and a mark
Among the nations: lorn and lone,
She seeketh rest and findeth none.
Her persecuting foes, alas!
Have caught her in their snare!

IV.

Gloom shroudeth Sion's halls,
And trodden in the dust lie silver lamp and bowl.
Her golden gates are turned to clay.
Her priests are now the godless Gentiles' thralls.
Her youths walk wan and sorrow-worn;
Her silent virgins droop and mourn.
In hopeless bitterness of soul
She sigheth all the day!

V.

Behold the sad Bereaven !
 Her enemies have grown to be her pitiless lords,
 And mock her in her sore disgrace !
 Her sins have risen in black array to Heaven ;
 Therefore the Lord Jehovah hath
 Rained on her head His chastening wrath ;
 Therefore her sons go bound with cords
 Before the Oppressor's face !

VI.

How hath her glory fled !
 The beauty is out-blotted as a fallen star
 Of her that whilome looked so fair !
 Her stricken Princes cower for shame and dread
 Like wandering sheep, that seek in vain
 Their pasture-ground o'er hill and plain,
 They stray abroad, they flee afar,
 Guideless, and in despair !

VII.

Oh ! lost Jerusalem !
 She pondereth not the holy times of old.
 What warnings hath she known in vain !
 Dimmed is the lustre of her diadem,
 And now her foes wield four-fold power,
 Because she hath forgot the hour
 When Monarchs deemed it overbold
 To follow in her train !

VIII.

Oh ! lost Jerusalem !
 Because of her transgressions is she left forlorn,
 And hath no more a goal to win !
 Because of those she is despised of them
 Who honoured her in by-gone days,
 But now abhor her loathsome ways.
 She weepeth, but her heart is horn,
 She hath gone back in sin !*

IX.

Oh ! lost Jerusalem !
 Where now be her mad hours of wantonness and wine ?
 Her leprousness is on her hands,
 So lately pranked with pearl and golden gem !
 A captive Queen she sits, cast down
 From Heaven to Earth, without her crown !
 O Lord, my God, what grief is mine
 To see her thus in bands !

X.

She lieth overthrown,
 Smitten of Thee, O Lord ! and shrinking in her fear
 Before the alien Gentile powers,
 Since Thou hast cast away Thy church, Thine own !
 They violate her sanctuary,
 Of whom command was given by Thee,
 That they should ne'er adventure near
 Her Temple and its towers !

XI.

Wo for the fallen Queen !
 Her people groan and die, despairful of relief.
 They famish, and they cry for bread !
 No more her nobles walk in silken sheen ;
 Their gauds and rings, their precious things,
 Are pawned for food ! O God ! it wrings
 My soul to see it ! Through my grief
 I lie as one half dead !

XII.

O ye who travel by !
 All ye who pass this way, stop short awhile, and see
 If Earth have sorrow like to mine !
 Judea's dark iniquities belie
 The faith she vaunteth in her God ;
 And therefore are her people trod
 In dust this day, and men tread me
 As treaders tread the vine !

XIII.

O most mysterious Lord !
 From Thine high place in Heaven Thou sendest fire and flame
 Into my dry and withered bones !
 Thou searchest me as with an angry sword !
 Thou spreadest snares beneath my feet !
 In vain I pray, in vain entreat,
 Thou turnest me away with shame,
 And heedest not my groans !†

XIV.

Thus waileth she aloud,
 The God-forsaken one, in this her day of dole :—
 " My spirit faileth me ; mine eyes
 Are filmed o'er with mist ; my neck is bowed
 Beneath a yoke the live-long day,
 And there doth lie a weight alway,
 An iron hand, on my spent soul,
 That will not let it rise !

XV.

" The mighty warrior host
 That girt me round—my captains, chiefs, and charioteers,
 Where are they ? Where their fathers be !
 The Lord abandoned me, and they were lost !
 He knew the season—He chose well
 The hour against me,‡ and they fell !
 The wine-press of a thousand years
 He trod for mine and me !

XVI.

" Therefore I weep and sigh,
 And tears gush down my cheeks, like rain in winter-time,
 The Comforter forgets my pain ;
 The much-loved of my soul no more is nigh !
 Because my strength in battle failed,
 Because mine enemies prevailed,
 My children, in a far-off clime,
 Must wear the Tyrant's chain !

† It is sometimes extremely difficult to distinguish between those passages in which the Prophets appear to utter their sentiments of and from themselves in their individual characters, and those others in which they unquestionably speak in the name of Jehovah, or of Jerusalem. The lamentation of Jeremias in this chapter is carried on in the first person from v. 12 to v. 22. I believe, however, that most commentators are of opinion that from v. 14 it is really Jerusalem who laments ; and I have accordingly taken the liberty of commencing the verse by stating this.

* " He hath called against me the time, to destroy my chosen men." This is the original. My apprehension is that the allusion here is to the well-known belief so prevalent among the Eastern nations with relation to the necessity of making choice of certain hours and seasons in order to secure the success of any particular enterprise.

* In the original—I mean, of course, the Douay version—the words are: "She sighed, and turned backward." That is, as I understand the passage, she in some degree repented of her sins, but nevertheless relapsed into them continually.

XVII.

"In vain I look for aid,
And raise my shrivelled arms, and spread abroad my hands;
None heed the miseries I endure;
My friends forsake me, and my foes upbraid.
In His indignant ire the Lord
Gave tenfold strength to them that warred
With Jacob and his armed bands
Because I was impure!

XVIII.

"The Lord, the Lord, is just.
His wrath is kindled fierce against me for my ways.
I have provoked the Lord, my God,
Therefore I make my darkling bed in dust.
Pity me, ye who see me, all!
Pity my sons, who pine in thrall!
Their spirit wastes, their strength decays.
Under the Gentile's rod.

XIX.

"I sought my friends, to tell
The story of my woes: alas! they would not hear!
Disease drank up my princes' blood,
For Famine's hand lay black on them as well.
My priests, too, fainted on their feet;
They feebly crawled from street to street,
Seeking all day afar and near,
A morsel of coarse food!

XX.

"Behold, O Lord!—behold!
Behold my wretchedness! For I am overcome
By suffering—almost by despair!
My heart is torn with agonies untold!
The land expires beneath Thy frown;
Abroad the red sword striketh down
Its tens of thousands; and at home
Death reigneth everywhere!

XXI.

"My groanings are not hid.
All they who have hated me regard me with disdain;
They see the darkness of my face,
And mock it, for they know Thou hast forbid
My nearest friends to help me now.
But Thou wilt yet avenge me, Thou!
They shall lie low where I have lain
Who scoff at my disgrace!

XXII.

"Then shall their evil fall
On their own heads—for still 'tis evil in Thy sight—
And they shall mourn as now I mourn,
And Thou, Lord, shalt make vintage of them all,
And tread them down even as they see
Thou, for my sins, hast trodden me,
They who to-day deride and slight
The afflictions I have borne!"

A SHORT

History of the Irish Franciscans.

VIII. CASHEL.—The convent of Cashel was founded in the archiepiscopal city of Cashel, in Munster, by the once illustrious but now extinct family of the Hackets, in the year 1260, in which year it was also made the head of the second Custody of the province, in the general chapter of Narbonne. It passed into possession of the Observants in the year 1538, under the provincialate of Father Terence O'Conachoir;* but soon after, heresy and persecution having arisen, it was suppressed about the year 1550, and remained desolate till the year 1618, when the Rev. Father Eugene Fildea,† being provincial, a residence was erected near the ruined convent in the city, and Father John Mullin, a theologian and most zealous preacher, was appointed superior. In the year 1621, while a provincial chapter was being held, a company of the troops of the President of Munster, made an irruption on the friars, but they escaped. The house, however, in which the chapter was held, was seized, and forfeited to the crown.

IX. DROGHEDA.—The convent of Drogheda, situated in the maritime town of that name, in the diocese of Armagh, in Ulster, is thought to have been founded in 1260, in which year it was established as the head of the fourth Custody of the province, in the general chapter of Narbonne. It was reformed in the same year as the Dublin convent, 1521. It was suppressed in Henry the Eighth's persecution, about the year 1546, and pulled down to the very foundation by that most pestilent heretic, Moses Hill. It was deserted until the year 1610, when a residence for the friars was erected in the town, and Father Donald Mooney, a learned theologian and preacher, was appointed superior; under his government and that of his successors, the friars never ceased to labour for the salvation of the faithful and the conversion of heretics, although they have been several times persecuted, and some of them taken and put in prison. The first founder of this convent was D'Arcy of Platin, whose family, together with many of the nobility and of the principal citizens of Drogheda, have been buried there from the earliest date.‡

X. NENAGH.—The Convent of Nenagh (Conventus Enaghensis) in a town of that name, in the diocese of Killaloe, was founded previous to 1260, when it was made the head of the fifth Custody of the province. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth of England, the friars were expelled, the convent destroyed, and it remains desolate. The first founder of this convent was O'Kennedy, and his tomb, and that of O'Brien of Arra, as well as of many others of the nobility of Ormond, are in this monastery.

XI. THIMOLEAGUE.—The convent of Thimoleague, in the maritime town of that name, the diocese of Ross, in Munster, was founded in the year 1240, on the bank of the river Arigden, and was reformed in the first year of the Reformation, 1460. During the time of the persecution and heresy it always remained entire: it was, indeed, often visited by the

* A.D. 1537. Father Terence O'Knoghovir, a pious and learned man, was provincial minister three years.—MS. St. Isidor.

† A.D. 1618. Father Eugene Fildea, a lector of theology and philosophy, who was professed in Salamanca; was president of the College of St. Anthony of Louvain; a celebrated preacher, and a man of holy life and conversation. He laboured for many years in the conversion of heretics, and the salvation of souls in Ireland; and in the year 1618, being then guardian of the convent of Thimoleague, was appointed provincial in the chapter held in the convent of Roscrea. He governed the province laudably for three years, and having discharged the office of visitator and diffinitor some time, was taken by the heretics, together with Father Philp Hualan, guardian of Lislaghtan, and put into prison. He died on the 23rd of October, 1668, being over 100 years of age.—MS. St. Isidor.

heretics, and everything moveable carried away; and some of the friars were taken and put into prison, and others obliged to fly, but they returned afterwards, and a succession has been constantly kept up in the convent to the present day.* The first founder of this convent was William James Barry, but others assert (and I agree with them) that it was M'Carthy Riagh, Prince of the Carberrys, whose family sepulchre is to be seen in the choir, as is also that of the Lords Barry More, formerly Viscounts, now Earls of Barry. In the same monastery is the tomb of the Baron De Courcy, of O'Machmera of Carberry, and of other eminent noblemen of the adjacent country. Chapters were held here in 1494 and 1650. "Edmund De Courcy, Bishop of Ross, the favourite of Henry VIII., is also buried here.†

XII. LIMERICK.—The convent of Limerick, in the episcopal city of that name, in Munster, is considered to have been founded in the year 1260, since, it is enumerated among the convents of the Custody of Cork, erected in the general chapter of Narbonne, which was held that year. It was reformed under the provincialate of Father Timothy Thomas,‡ at the instance of the magistrates and citizens of Limerick who presented to the Fathers assembled in chapter, in Kilcollan, in 1534, a petition to that effect. It was suppressed by the heretics in the third year of Edward VI., King of England, the year of Christ 1548, all the buildings being converted to profane purposes, and destroyed, with the exception of the choir of the church, which was converted into a court house, for the trial of civil and criminal offences. This place remained vacant from the suppression until the year 1615, when a residence for the friars was erected in the city, and Father James Kent, an eloquent preacher, was appointed superior, under whom and his successors the friars strenuously labour for the salvation of souls. This convent was founded by the illustrious family of De Burgo (Burke), subsequently divided into the families of the Barons of Castle Connell, Brittas, and other illustrious families; and their tombs, as well as those of other noblemen of Clanwilliam, and of many of the chief citizens of Limerick, are there from the times of old. In the year 1318, the most illustrious Earl of Clare was buried there. A chapter was held here in 1629.§

XIII. CLONMEL.—The convent of Clonmel was founded previous to 1260, in the town of Clonmel, in the diocese of Lismore, but the friars were not put into possession of it until the year 1269. It was formerly placed in the Custody of Cashel, and it passed into the hands of the Observants in 1536. When the persecution arose the friars were expelled from the convent, and the buildings fell into ruin, with the exception of the church, which was never destroyed, but preserved, whole and entire, as a burial place for the faithful Catholics. It remained

* The beautiful ruins of this convent are to be seen still, and, with the exception of the roof, are almost in a perfect state. In the reign of Mary, the friars got full possession of it once more, and, in 1603, it was put in perfect repair.

† He built the square tower and the dormitory and library.

‡ A.D. 1527, Father Timothy Thomas, a great preacher, and a man of holy conversation, governed the province for three years. A.D. 1534, Father T. Thomas, a second time provincial, governed the province three years.

§ No remains of this ancient convent exist in Limerick at present, but the district in which it was situated is still called St. Francis' Abbey. The Franciscans never were without some residence during the time of persecution in that city. Their present house is in Henry-street.

deserted, however, from that time till the year 1616, when a residence was erected in the town, and Father Thomas Bray, a theologian and eloquent preacher, was appointed superior. He was most remarkable for reconciling parties in dispute, and, by his own preaching and that of his fellow-labourers, did incalculable service, and brought a great increase to religion. The first founder of this convent is considered to have been the Earl of Desmond, but his foundation was very much augmented by the citizens of Clonmel. The principal persons buried here, and whose tomb is of marble, are the Barons of Cahir, of the family of the Butlers, the Prendergasts, and many other nobles and citizens of Clonmel. A certain priest, who was put to death by the heretics, sleeps also in this convent.*

* The present Franciscan church in Clonmel, is composed of one wing of the old church, and a modern addition. The old tower also remains, but the remainder of the church was taken down, to make the street in which the present convent is situated.

Pompeii.

THE heralds of thy ruin and despair

Thickened and quickened as thy time drew nigh.

What prodigies of sound convulsed the air!

How many a death-flag was unfurled on high!

The sullen sun went down—a globe of blood—

Rayless, and colouring every heart with gloom,

'Till even the dullest felt and understood

The coming of an overwhelming doom—

The presage of a destiny and fall,

A shock, a thundershock, for thee, for them—for all!

The sullen sun went down—a globe of blood—

Rayless, and colouring every soul with gloom;

And men's imaginations, prone to brood

Over the worst, and summon from the womb

Of unborn Time, the Evil and the Dark,

Launched forth in fear upon that shoreless ocean

Whose whirlpool billows but engulf the bark—

Conjectural Dread—and each fresh-felt emotion,

Like spectral figures on a magic mirror,

Seemed wilder than the last, and stronglier strung with terror.

We shrink within ourselves when Night and Storm

Are darkly mustering; for, to every soul

Heaven here foreshows the character and form

Of Nature's death-hour. Doth the thunder roll,

The wild wave boil, the lightning stream or strike,

Flood, Fire, and Earthquake devastate in vain?

Or, is there not a Voice which peals alike

To all from these, conjuring up that train

Of scenes and images that shall be born

In living, naked might upon the Judgment Morn?

If thus we cower to Tempest and to Night

How feltest thou when first the red bolt broke,

That seventeen suffocating centuries might

Enshroud thine ashes in Time's midnight cloak?

Where wert thou in that moment? Was thy power

All a funeral phantom? Thy renown

An echo? Thine the triumph of an hour?

Enough!—I rave: when empires, worlds, go down

Time's wave to dissolution—when they bow

To Fate, let none ask where, but simply—what wert thou?

The desolated cities which of yore

Perished by flooding fire and sulphury rain,

Where sleeps the Dead Sea's immemorial shore,

Lie blasted wrecks below that mortal plain.*

They fell—thou fellest—but, renounced of Earth,

Blotted from being to eternal years,

Their image chills the life-blood—thine gives birth,

Even while we shudder, to some human tears.

Had'st thou less guilt? Who knows! The book of Time

Bears on each leaf alike the broad red stamp of Crime.

* "The soil of this accursed locality is a species of soft clay, which the rains literally convert into mortar."—Wilson's Travels in the Holy Land.

THE PURGATORY OF ST. PATRICK.

[Translated from the Spanish of Calderon.]

— Andò vero l' Irlanda,
E ride Ibernica fabulosa, dove
Il santo vecchierel fece la càva
In che tanta merce par che si trane,
Che l'uom vi purga ogni sua colpa prava.
ARISTO. Orl. Fur. canto x., sts. 91, 92.

" — He next for Ireland shaped his course,
And saw the fabulous Hibernia, where
The goodly, sainted elder made the cave
In which men cleansed from all offences are,
Such mercy there, it seems, is found to save :—"
ROSE.

SCENE—The cottage of Juan Paul, near the sea shore.

Enter PHILIP and LUCY.

Lucy. Forgive me if I have not known
To serve and tend you as I ought—

Phil. A great deal more, I frankly own,
Must I forgive than you have thought—
For even thy face, on which I live,
Awakes not bliss without alloy,
So for the mingled grief and joy
I must be grateful and forgive—
And thus, in curious pleasing strife,
Two feelings in my breast have striven—
Your beauty, and your care have given
The pang of death—the throb of life.

Lucy. Too rude and ignorant am I
For all the ingenious things you've said,
And so I give my arms instead,
Which saves the trouble of reply—
Though silent they will speak to thee
Of all with which my heart is rife.

[PAUL enters and sees them embracing.]

Paul. Oh! Heavens, what sight is this I see!
A man embracing my own wife—
What shall I do? I burn! I burst!
I ought to kill them; yes, 'tis clear
That is my duty—but I fear
That she, perchance, might kill me first—

Phil. Beautiful mountaineer, deny
Not thou to take the ring I wear—
Would it could be, for all thy care,
The fairest star of yonder sky!

Lucy. Pray do not think me one of those Who of their kindness profit make,
But I accept it for thy sake.

Paul. Being her husband, I suppose
My duty is to hold my tongue;
But had she not received the ring
Of course it were another thing.

Lucy. Again, these clasping arms among,
My very soul I give to thee—
I have no other gem or chain.

Phil. And there I ever could remain,
The prison is so sweet to me;
As at the rising of the sun,
Night's shadows fly; so here I know
No more the memory of the woe,
These cruel crystal waves have done.

Paul. Ah! he embraces her again!
Good Sir, think what my soul endures,
This woman is my wife, not yours!

Phil. Your husband's here—I think 'tis plain
He sees us—it is best I go,
And presently return again.
Oh! sweet Polonia could'st thou know
The abject state to which I'm cast,
Thou'dst feel some pity for my pain!—
And thou, O heaven-aspiring main!
Roused raging up by storm and blast,
Where hast thou hid? in what far tomb,
The myriad lives that fill thy womb?

Paul. This silence will do little good,

I'll speak aloud.—My Lucy dear!
My life! methinks it doth appear
I've caught you now!—this piece of wood—
A good stout window-bar it is—
Will do for vengeance.

Lucy. Bless me! say
What new suspicion, spouse, is this?

Paul. Is it then mere suspicion, pray,
Or chance, to see you o'er and o'er
Embraced before my face?

Lucy. Indeed
It is suspicion, nothing more—
It must be so—because, if you
The duties of a husband knew,
You'd only see where'er you went,
One half your wife might do.

Paul. Agreed!

To that condition I consent,
And as I saw you twice embrace
That rascal of a soldier, whom
The sea has flung from out its womb,
I shall not in the present case
Be too exact, but for the nonce,
Think you embraced him only once.
And as I meant to give to you
A hundred blows, 'tis only fair
That I divide the whole by two—
So fifty is your proper share.
And so by sacred Heaven I swear!
Since you yourself the sentence gave,
And since the reckoning is so clear,
Not more than fifty blows you'll have.

Lucy. It is too much—no man should strive,
By any means, to hear or view
More than a fourth his wife may do.

Paul. Well let it be a fourth for it;
The blows you know are twenty-five,
These I will pay.

Lucy. It is not fit
Men know so much.

Paul. Ah! something new!—
How much then pray?

Lucy. Between us two,
Henceforth I think it just and right,
You only see what I allow,
And trust my word and not your sight.
Paul. Dear daughter of the devil! thou
Convinceth me, and so 'tis plain
The stick no longer should remain
With me; so let us change our places,
Here is the stick, 'tis now for thee
To give the hundred blows to me—
And to the other the embraces.

Enter PHILIP.

Phil. I hope the clown has gone away.
Paul. Ah! Senor soldier! you have come
Just in the nick of time—although
The debt of gratitude I owe
To you is such a mighty sum
I never can the debt repay—
For all the honour, you to-day,
Intended for my wife and cot,
How poor were all that I could say?
Yet still a fancy now has got Into my head, that it were best
You went upon your homeward way—
Go! in God's name, without delay—
Since you are strong with food and rest;
As I don't wish to raise my hand
Here in my house in strife 'gainst thee,
Or that (almost a fish at sea)
You should be left dead meat on land!

Phil. This is suspicion, do not doubt it,
Which has no true foundation got—
Paul. Well then, with reason or without it,
Am I a husband, Sir, or not?

Enter LAOGHAIRE, an old countryman, and PATRICK as a slave.

Laogh. My orders are that you should take
This slave, and make him tend the sheep
Out in the fields.

Old man. Leave all to me.
Laogh. But, bless me! am I quite awake,
Or is it but a dream of sleep.

That Philip here I seem to see?
Permit me, mighty lord, to press
Your feet.

- Paul.* Is't "Lord" he calls him?
Lucy. Yes;
Now give the hundred blows, my Paul.
Phil. Come to my arms thou good Laoghaire.
Laogh. You do n e t o much honour there,
But how dost chance you live at all?
Phil. Cast on this shore so wild and bare,
A wretched monument of chance,
I would full soon have surely died,
But for these peasant's friendly care—
I thought it best some time to abide
Their guest, amid these lonesome haunts,
Until I found my strength renewed,
And learned the temper of the king,
Here I have lived 'till time might bring (My royal master's wrath subdued)
Some sorrow to his soften'd breast
For my supposed disastrous fate;
Then I might go with heart elate
And trust forgiveness for the rest.
Laogh. Consider that already gained,
And all his stormy wrath blown o'er,
Thy strange escape will glad him more
Than even thy fancied ruin pained;
Come to the king I'll lead the way,
You'll find how changed doth fortune blow.
Paul. May't please your lordship, ere you go,
Permit me just a word to say—
My name, my lord, is Juan Paul,
Pray let my vile suspicions pass,
In truth I was a very ass,
To talk of such a thing at all,
My heart for pardon humbly craves,
But for the rest of my poor life,
Pray think my cot, myself and wife
Your lordship's very humble slaves.
Phil. For your great kindness and attention,
I hope some future time to pay.
Paul. A word of that pray do not mention,
But, if you wish it there's a way,
By which you can a boon confer
On Lucy and myself—'tis this,
Vouchsafe to take her with you, do,
She will be glad to be with you
And I too happy without her.

[Exeunt PHIL. and LAOGH.]

- Lucy.* Well, was there ever such a miss?
My tender hopes are all o'erthrown—
Gone like the light of morning mist,
Even when born!
Old man. We are alone
Friend Paul, and now I think you ought Sometimes this tender youth assist;
He'll need it.
Patr. Ah! good sir, do not Think of my state or me too much,
God wills that I should be a slave;
As such I'll serve you—and I crave
That you will treat me just as such.
Old man. How modest!
Paul. How humble!
Lucy. And how handsome too!
Paul. His face affects me greatly.
Say,
(And let it be between us two),
Is there a solitary case,
In which a stranger pass'd this way
You did not take a fancy to?
Lucy. Ah! it is plain you're jealous still,
You think that I'm inclined to fall
In love with the whole human race.
Old man. I have a weighty charge, friend Paul,
To trust you with.
Paul. You know my skill;
Say on.
Old man. This slave, that here you view,
I much suspect, is not secure,
I wish to guard him well—be sure
You'll know the cause ere long. To you
I give him now in strictest charge,

- Let him not stray, unwatched, at large,
Or, unattended, roam about. [Exit.
Paul. A very pleasant task no doubt—
It seems I'm placed to watch you here, [To PATR.
The only thing in all my life,
I had to watch (except my wife)—
The duty's troublesome. I fear
I now can neither sleep nor eat;
But should you wish to use your feet,
And go away, the coast is clear.
In truth I'll rather thank you for it,
As care disturbs me night or day;
In fact no mortal doth abhor it
Like Juan Paul—so go away,
Go, in God's name.
Patr. Nay, do not fear,
Though slave, no fugitive am I—
Oh! mighty Lord of earth and sky,*
What boundless joy my heart shall taste
As, rapt in thought, I wander here,
Amid the solitary waste;
Enjoying, even on earth, a glance
Of thy most glorious countenance—
In solitude the sage and saint,
The wonders of thy bright world view.
Paul. Pray will you tell me, if it aint
Offensive, who you're speaking to?
Patr. Thou art of all created things,†
O Lord, the essence and the cause—
The source and centre of all bliss;
What are those veils of woven light,
Where sun and moon and stars unite—
The purple morn, the spangled night—
But curtains which thy mercy draws
Between the heavenly world and this?
The terrors of the sea and land—
When all the elements conspire,
The earth and water, storm and fire—
Are but the sketches of thy hand;
Do they not all in countless ways—
The lightning's flash—the howling storm—
The dread volcano's awful blaze—
Proclaim thy glory and thy praise?
Beneath the sunny summer showers
Thy love assumes a milder form,
And writes its angel name in flowers;
The wind that flies with winged feet
Around the grassy gladdened earth,

* "But as the love of God finds more eloquence in solitude and in places far removed from towns, than among the crowd and affluence of the people who inhabit cities, he occupied the best part of his days, and of his nights, in conversations with God, and in the sweet transports of his holy love."—La Vie de S. Patrice, p. 21.

† So that he availed himself of all created things to honour his creator; and, to publish his adorable wonders, he often erected simple temples and altars to the Divine Majesty, dressing them with the branches of trees, and with boughs clustering and fragrant with flowers."—pp. 21, 22.

‡ The reader cannot fail to be struck with the resemblance between this very beautiful passage of Calderon and the exquisite "Sacred Song" of Moore, "Thou art O God, the Life and Light." It may be interesting to compare the manner in which two great poets treat the same idea, and I therefore give Moore's song in full:

THOU ART O GOD, THE LIFE AND LIGHT.

I.
THOU art O God, the life and light
Of all this wondrous world we see,
Its glow by day, its smile by night,
Are but reflections caught from Thee—
Where'er we turn, thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are Thine.

II.
When Day, with farewell beams delays
Among the opening clouds of Even,
And we can almost think we gaze
Through golden vistas into Heaven—
Those hues that mark the sun's decline
So soft, so radiant, Lord! are Thine.

III.
When Night, with wings of starry gloom,
O'er shadows all the earth and skies,
Like some dark beauteous bird, whose plume
Is sparkling with unnumber'd eyes—
That sacred gloom, those fires divine,
So grand, so countless, Lord! are Thine.

IV.
When youthful Spring around us breathes,
Thy Spirit warms her fragrant sigh,
And every flower the summer wreaths,
Is born beneath that kindling eye—
Where'er we turn, thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are Thine.

Seems but commissioned to repeat
In echo's accents—silvery sweet—
That thou, O Lord, didst give it birth
There is a tongue in every flame—
There is a tongue in every wave—
To these the bounteous Godhead gave
These organs but to praise his name!
O mighty Lord of boundless space,
Here can'st thou be both sought and found—
For here in every thing around,
Thy presence and thy power I trace.
With faith my guide, and my defence,
I burn to serve in love and fear;
If as a slave Oh! leave me here;
If not, O Lord, remove me hence!

*An ANGEL descends, holding in one hand a shield, with a mirror in the centre, and in the other hand a letter.

Angel. Patrick!

Patr. Who calls?

Paul. There's no one by—

Nobody calls. The man's distraught—
Methinks a poet he should be.

[Aside.]

Angel. Patrick!

Patr. Who calls again?

Angel. 'Tis I,

Paul. He speaks and yet I can see nought—

Well let him speak: what's that to me?

I am not placed to guard his tongue.

Patr. Ah! can I trust my wondering eyes,

That Heaven so great a favour sends?—

A glorious cloud from yonder skies

With mingled tints of pearl and rose,

And all its summer bravery hung,

Before my raptur'd sight descends—

And now its glittering gates disclose

The sun within more glorious still;

He comes in purple and in gold—

He comes, as comes the smiling dawn,

In his crimson chariot drawn

By the running rosy hours—

Scattering over vale and hill

Jessamine and all sweet flowers.

Never yet by day or night

Did I such a sight behold!†

Angel. Patrick!

Patr. I'm dazzled with the light—

Who art thou, celestial Lord?

Angel. Patrick, of my own accord

Here my course I have not bent,

I am Victor, hither sent

(Guardian Angel of thy soul),

From the happy realms of bliss,

Even by God, to give thee this.

[Gives him the letter.]

Patr. Oh! sweet messenger divine,

Happy harbinger of joy,

How can I my heart controul?

Seeing thee, who, like the seven

That before God's footstool shine,

All thy eternal hours employ,

'Mid the sweet choirs singing, solely,

"Holy! holy! holy! holy!"

Mighty Lord of Earth and Heaven."

Angel. Read the letter.

Patr. Can it be

That the scroll is sent to me?

Yes to me 'tis sent indeed.

[Reads the superscription, which is addressed: "To PATRICK."]

Angel. Open it.

Patr. Within I read,

"Come, Patrick, come, we wait for thee

To free us from our slavery"

So ends the writing; it is clear

* The foundation of this scene is contained in the following passage of "La Vie," all the early lives agree substantially with it. "As he passed almost entire nights in fervent prayers, it happened to him, upon one occasion, that, being entranced, as it were, in an ecstasy or divine transport, he saw, as in a mirror, or beautifully polished glass, a man of a grave and majestic appearance who presented to him a letter on which was inscribed, 'Here is the voice of all the people of Hibernia:' and when he had opened the letter to see what it contained he read, therein, that all the inhabitants of Ireland, men, women, and children, big and little, called to him, saying, 'Patrick, &c.'"

† The appearance of the Angel Victor is somewhat differently described in the various lives, but Calderon's description far surpasses them all in sublimity and beauty. I scarcely know a finer picture of the descent of a heavenly messenger than this of Calderon.

This means more than doth appear—
Faithful guardian, let me know
Who are those who call me so.
Look within this mirror then.
Heavens!

Angel.

Patr.

Angel.

Patr.

What do you behold?

A mighty crowd of young and old,
Tender children, women, men,
Calling me.

Angel.

And those you see

Are the Irish people. They Stretch their longing arms to thee,
Waiting for the blessed day,
When the darkness pass'd and gone,
Thou wilt bring, like morning light,
Tidings of the Faith—Begone!

Thou, I know, will not be loth

To listen to thy God's command—

Leave thy slavery, and go

Legate and Apostle both,

Of the favour'd Irish land.

First to France† depart and take

There at blessed German's feet

The habit of a monk. To Rome,

Then, a rapid journey make—

Then with letters from the Pope,

Good Celestine, thou wilt come

Hither, full of heavenly hope,

Thou St. Martin, too, wilt see

Bishop of Tours.§ But now with me

Borne upon the mighty wind

Let us leave this land behind.¶

Now that I have let thee know

What thy glorious fate must be,

And the task reserved for thee,

Let us on our journey go.

[Exeunt.]

Ecclesiastical Architecture.

PART II.

"THE symbolic sense of the holy vestments worn by the priests of the Catholic church was seen in the sublime prayers which they repeated, as they clothed themselves to minister at the altar. A long sermon of Ives de Chartres is devoted to explaining, for the edification of manners, the mystic beauty of the priest's vestments, in which every part had a divine meaning. Witness, says Walafrid Strabo, that alb denoting purity, that belt signifying continence, that stole obedience, and that flowing chasuble which is placed over all to denote charity, the greatest of all virtues. The gloves of the bishop, were put on to signify that his good works were sometimes to be in secret, and not before men; and, they were laid aside, to remind him that his light was to shine before men. The mystic sense of the pallium, symbol of unanimity, as Pope Symmachus styles it, writing to a bishop of Austria, in the year 504, and which ancient authors mention as being taken from the body of St. Peter, that is to say, from the altar over his relics, and to which they ascribe the plenitude of the pontifical office, is explained by Isidorus Palustis, in his epistle to Count Herminius. The bishop, he says, wears upon his shoulders a band, not of linen, but of wool, to signify that he is an imitator of Christ, the great Shepherd, who carried on his shoulders the sheep which he had lost and found. Many usages and institutions will be unintelligible, if we do not bear in mind their spiritual interpretation. Why, for example, was a church to be consecrated afresh, if the altar had been moved; but only its walls washed with salt, if the other parts of the building had been repaired, after having fallen? Ives de Chartres explains this by showing, that as the altar signified faith, its removal signified a loss of faith, which could only be repaired by a fresh reception of sacred mysteries; but the rest of the edifice when injured, and repaired, was only to be washed with salt, to show that by tears and penance, other sins were to be purged away. Thus, as he says, whatever was done in the temple made with hands, signified what ought to be done spiritually within us, that by the observance of visible sacraments, we might be led to the knowledge, and love of the invisible building. It may be remarked generally, that the church had nothing for mere ornament, but, like nature, all her rites had regard to use, as well as beauty. She loved symbols that were beautiful, but no unmeaning decorations. It is observable, also, that a vast number of loving harmonies, and sweet incidents, fruitful in sublime, poetical, and religious emotions, were produced by keeping this in mind, and doing things in consequence, simply and naturally; without attending to the part of mere formality or fancied decorum, but just as the bare need of the occasion required."

It is, therefore, not unreasonable to believe, that the Church which "pressed into her service everything that could bring unity into a visible form," did not neglect so important, and accessible a medium of instruction, as her material fabrics—and we know by the testimonies of Catholic writers, that she did not. We are not aware of any satisfactory reason, why that symbolism which it appears was once universally intelligible, should not be again understood. 'Tis true, the materialism of our age militates against it; but we are not always, we hope, to labour under such debasing influence—and when we are removed from its trammels, we shall view the beauties of nature and art with new eyes. Nature and art will not then be looked upon merely to gratify the senses, but they will be books of spiritual meaning. "If thy heart were right, then every creature would be to thee a looking-glass of life, and a book of holy doctrine."

We have seen that, in a general point of view, ecclesiastical art is a symbolical language. It now becomes our duty to point out some examples in which this language is intelligible; and in doing so, it will be easy to show that fitness and expression are intimately connected with symbolism. By fitness, we understand propriety of arrangement, appropriate construction, and due proportion. By expression is understood the characteristic effect produced by the foregoing elements, and the appropriate treatment of detail and decorations, so that the character and destination of the edifice may be unmistakeable. And having made this examination, we shall find that in all these respects the works of the ancients were far superior to those of the moderns; that in the simplest and smallest church the principles of symbolism, fitness, and expression are as perfectly set forth as in the most magnificent cathedral, in proportion to its nature and extent.

From the earliest ages of the Christian church, it was deemed necessary, for the due solemnity of religious worship, that there should be a marked distinction between the place for the celebration of the sacred mysteries, and the place for the congregation of the worshippers. This feeling gradually produced the chancel for the former, which was so called from the cancelli, or railing, which divided it from the nave or place for the laity. Thus the chancel and nave became the two essential parts of a church, without which the idea of a church cannot be maintained. To show the peculiar sanctity of the chancel, and its exclusive appropriation to the solemn services of religion and the ministers of the altar, the following admonitory text, or some other of the same meaning, was frequently written over the chancel arch or upon the cancelli or screen:

"Intra cancellos laicus ne quisque moretur."

In the cathedral and large conventual churches, the chancel received the name of choir, from the circumstance of the chorus cantorum, who sang the divine office, being placed there.

The position of the chancel or choir appears to have been almost invariably towards the east. There are, however, some exceptions to this general rule as a deviation from due east towards the north or south is often observable, which has been attempted to be explained by the supposition, that the chancel was turned towards that part of the east in which the sun rose on the festival of the saint under whose invocation the church was dedicated. The plan of the ancient church of St. Gallus, given in the Ecclesiologist,* shows choirs at both the east and west ends. The most ancient churches in Ireland preserve the distinction of parts and orientation faithfully. Some of our very small churches indeed consist of a simple parallelogram, but they can be considered only as oratories or places of private devotion. That these arrangements of separation and orientation in the ancient churches conveyed symbolical meaning, we have the testimony of many liturgical writers of antiquity, by whom we are informed that the distinction of chancel and nave, besides the self-evident and natural symbolism of the distinction between the sacrifice, priests, and people, was also typical of the two states of the church spiritual—the triumphant and militant; that the chancel arch, with the representation of the Last Judgement over it, commonly called "the doom," typified death, by which the triumphant was entered from the militant state; thus, in the well-regulated Christian mind, disarming "the King of Terrors" of his awful attributes.

The reasons for the orientation of churches, with some remarks upon the beautiful natural effects produced by this position, are thus given by Mr. A. W. Pugin†:—

"A church should be so placed that the faithful face the east while at prayer. Such has been the practice of the church from the earliest period, and very few are the examples of any deviation from this rule. The chancel should consequently be turned towards the east; and all the altars in the church should be so placed, that the celebrant, while officiating, looks towards the same quarter."

Independant of all Christians turning towards the same point, being a beautiful figure of the unity of the church, those learned writers, Durandus, Gavan-

* Vol. 1, New Series, p. 118.

† Present state of Ecclesiastical Architecture, p. 18.

tus, and Cardinal Bona, have adduced the following reasons for this rule:—

1.—That the apostles turned towards the east while at prayer.

2.—That the Holy Spirit descended on them from the east on Pentecost.

3.—That we should all turn towards the holy land where our Lord was born.

4.—That as our Lord was the great light of the world, we should turn towards the brightest quarter of the world, as a figure of his glory.

5.—That as our Lord was crucified looking towards the west, the roods, placed in the same position, face the faithful.

6.—That the star appeared in the east to the three wise men at the birth of our Lord.

7.—To distinguish the faithful from infidels and heretics who, being without faith or unity, turn in any direction.

8.—That, according to the traditional belief of the Church, our Lord will come from the east to judge the living and the dead.

But independent of these mystical and pious reasons, the ancient and canonical position is the most judicious that could have been chosen. How beautifully do the rays of the rising sun, streaming through the brilliant eastern windows of the choir or chancel, darting their warm and cheerful light to the very extremity of the nave, correspond to the hymn appointed to be sung at prime:—

“Jam lucis orto sidere
Deum precemur supplices,
Ut in diurnis actibus,
Nos servet a nocentibus.”

Then, as the day advances, from the whole southern side a flood of light is poured into the building, gradually passing off towards evening, 'till all the glories of a setting sun, immediately opposite the western window, light up the nave with glowing tints, the rich effects being much increased by the partial obscurity of the choir-end at the time.”

“Now,” continues Mr. Pugin, “this beautiful passage of light from sunrise to sunset, with all its striking and sublime effects, is utterly lost in a church placed in any other than an ancient position. In short, there are both mystical and natural reasons for adhering to antiquity in this practice, a departure from which can only be justified under the most urgent necessity.”

In more advanced ages we find the necessity for larger churches producing new efforts in art, guided by the old principles, and harmoniously blending symbolism, fitness, and expression with sublime and beautiful effects. Churches were now built in the cruciform and tripartite arrangement, which were symbolical of the great dogmas of the Christian faith—the redemption of mankind, and the Trinity in unity. “In this case you will find the same great Christian verities, the Trinity and the atonement, expressed in a different, but perfectly consistent manner. The atonement is shadowed forth in the grand form of the church—the cross, which is the foundation of the whole. To signify the Holy Trinity, we have, first of all, the threefold division lengthwise into the nave, transepts, and choir; and then the threefold division breadthwise, of the nave or choir, and two aisles,

“Three solemn parts together twine
In harmony's mysterious line;
Three solemn aisles approach the shrine,
Yet all are one.”

In the exterior elevation, the two western towers, with the central tower, with which they are necessarily associated in the view of the whole building as we approach, it, follow the same ternary arrangement; and in the interior elevation, we have the like in the three stories of the nave and choir, viz.: the first tier of arches, separating the nave and choir, respectively, from the aisles on either side; the triforium, and the clerestory.”*

Descending to the examination of minor details of arrangement, we find the same appropriateness, joined in most cases with the same suggestive symbolism. Thus, for example, the baptismal font was situate near the entrance door, to typify the admission of the newly baptized into the spiritual church, by their entrance to the material edifice. The chancel contained the piscina,† which was a niche in the side wall, with a ground drain, by which the water used by the priest at the ablution of his hands, was conveyed into the earth. The sedilia were seats, in which the priest and deacons sat during such parts of the Mass as were sung by the choir. They were generally raised one a little above the other, to accord with the steps of the altar, and to symbolise the different degrees of the clerical order; the priest sitting in the highest place, and the deacon and sub-deacon in succeeding gradation.

The subject of arrangement is in itself so extensive, that an attempt to examine it in all its features, would far exceed our present limits. Confining ourselves, however, to the few varieties we have mentioned, we think few persons will care to deny that they were strictly symbolical in spirit, and appropriate, in as much as they were apt adaptations of the means to the end required—the reception of the faithful within a material fabric to witness the solemn rites of religion, and the elevation of their souls to spiritual things, by material agencies. Who, even of our cold generation, could enter one of our primitive Irish churches, and not participate in the feelings so eloquently expressed by Mr. Petrie, in reference to their former state: “Yet in their symmetrical simplicity—their dimly lighted nave entered by its central west doorway, and terminated on the other side by its chancel arch, affording to the devout worshipper an unimpeded view of the brighter sanctuary in which were celebrated the Divine mysteries which afforded him consolation in this life, and hope in the next—in the total absence of every thing that could distract his attention—there is an expression of fitness to their purpose, too often wanted in modern temples of higher pretensions; as the artless strains sung to the Creator, which we may believe were daily hymned in these unadorned temples, were calculated, from their simplicity and artlessness, to awaken feelings of deep devotion, which the gorgeous artificial music of the modern cathedral but too rarely excites, even in minds most predisposed to feel its influences, and appreciate its refinement.” Or can any one doubt, on the other hand, that the varied play of light and shade, the multiplied perspectives, the indistinctness of some prospects, the seeming † “Near to the altar, which signifieth Christ, is placed the piscina, or lavacrum, that is, the pity of Christ, in which the priest washeth his hands, thereby denoting that by baptism and penance we are purified from the filth of sin; which is drawn from the Old Testament. For he saith in Exodus, “And Moses made a laver of brass, with his basin, in the which Aaron the Priest and his sons should wash, before they went up to the Altar that they might offer an offering.”—Durandus’ “Rationale Divinorum Officiorum,” Lib. 1.

infinity, and prolongation of some parts in the more magnificent churches, all united and blended together by the rich and subdued light reflected through the stained-glass windows, must be productive of religious emotions. "On entering a Gothic cathedral," says Coleridge, "I am filled with devotion, and with awe! I am lost to the actualities which surround me, and my whole being expands into the infinite; earth, and air, and nature and art, all swell up into eternity, and the only sensible impression left is, that I am nothing."

These effects will, we believe, be found by those who closely examine the subject, to proceed mainly from the cruciform and tripartite arrangements, joined with the principle of verticality of which we shall here take some notice.

"It is not less the beauty, and the perfection of Gothic architecture," says Mr. Poole, quoting Professor Whewell, "that it is vertical, aspiring, indefinite, than it is the beauty and perfection of Grecian architecture, that it is horizontal, reposing, definite." The idea of each is beautiful, though its beauty be of a different character from that of its rival sister, and the very forms in the Gothic style, which Evelyn calls fantastic and licentious, and which Wren sneeringly attributes to the builders "spiring up all they could," are the apt expressions of the distinctively beautiful idea of Gothic art." Now in the churches of the middle era of Christian architecture, which we have said contain the best specimens of ecclesiastical art, we find the principle of vertical tendency to prevail. The arcades of nave and aisles, the arches of doors and windows, the canopies of niches and tabernacle work, in fact, every detail from the floor to the spire-top, "whose silent finger points to heaven," are governed by the aspiring idea of verticality, and its symbolical allusions. The substitution of the pointed for the semicircular Romanesque arch, was the first step taken by the ancient church builders towards the development of the vertical principle. The forms and details of the half pagan Romanesque hung heavily on Christian art, till the introduction of the pointed arch, from which period verticality quickly developed itself; and it was only towards the close of the fifteenth century, when the idea was in a great measure abandoned by the substitution of the low four-centred arch that art began to be debased; so long as verticality in treatment was preserved, pointed architecture was a living and progressive art. How much greater degree of height was obtained with the same features, and a smaller quantity of material, by the use of the pointed arch instead of the semi-circular, is shown by Mr. Pugin, in his excellent "Contrasts."

Another of the peculiarities of detail of Christian, as contra-distinguished from pagan art, is the aggregation of minute parts, and this, experience teaches us, is a characteristic of the beautiful, and is peculiarly appropriate in Christian churches. By the smallness of the several parts, our idea of the vastness of the whole is magnified; thus we find on closely comparing ancient works with modern of the same actual dimensions, the smallness of the stones used in the walls of the former, gives the entire an effect of greater magnitude than is conveyed by modern works, in which it appears to be a fixed principle to use the largest blocks the quarry can produce. The representation of the human figure in ancient works never approached to any thing like life size. We will often find the jambs of a door of moderate dimensions decorated with various groups of figures, as at Lichfield, Wells,

Malmsbury, and several other cathedral and monastic churches in England, Bayeux Cathedral in Normandy, and in some of our humble and less pretending churches in Ireland. At the neglected and almost forgotten church of Clontuskret, in the County of Galway, there remains a west door, the minute sculptures of which are in an excellent state of preservation. The part over the arch, contains representations of bishops and other ecclesiastics; the sides of the jambs contain figures of grotesque character, the meaning of which we have not heard explained. Immediately within the door, on the angle of the inner jamb, there is a small holy water stoup, contained within a niche, which is adorned with two bass reliefs, one of St. Augustine, probably, and the other, undoubtedly, of St. Catherine, as she is represented with her usual symbol, the wheel. Often a story of Sacred Scripture, or ecclesiastical history, was contained within a space which would scarcely contain a fragment of a heathen divinity or of a monstrosity of modern sculpture. Our old Irish crosses contain many beautiful examples of such aggregation of minute parts. On several ancient fonts are figures in bass relief, representing the crucifixion of our Lord, and the seven sacraments.* We do not mean to contend, that in every case the form of these details is correct in delineation, and that in general the moderns are not superior to the ancients in this respect. But the beauty of form is altogether apart from that of aggregation, and affects us in a different way, though, perhaps, towards the same end; and in this particular, we hope for great improvements in future developments of Christian art. Beauty of form and correctness of outline may be given to the details of aggregation, without infringing on the ancient idea. In painting already great triumphs have been achieved by Overbeck, and others of the new German School of Catholic art, who, while preserving the entire spirit of the artists of the middle ages, have corrected their defects in outline, and perspective. Flaxman, who may be considered an impartial, as well as a competent judge, appreciates highly this ancient sculpture. For speaking of the west front of Wells Cathedral, he says, "This work is necessarily ill drawn, and defective in principle, and much of this sculpture is rude and severe; yet, in parts, there is a beautiful simplicity, an irresistible sentiment, and sometimes a grace, excelling more modern productions."

The construction of medieval architecture is so important a feature of its fitness, as to call for our utmost attention, particularly when it is contrasted with contrivances for the support of modern edifices. In no point, perhaps, does the superiority of medieval to modern art appear more strikingly than in this, notwithstanding the much boasted improvements of modern science. If any one will take the trouble of comparing the ground plans and sections of relative buildings, of the pointed and the revived pagan styles, he will find that, in buildings covering the same superficial area, the touching points occupy a much greater extent in the latter than in the former; that is, that of the areas within the walls a greater space of ground is required for the supports of the structure (such as piers and columns) in the pagan than in the Christian styles. He will also find that a greater degree of altitude is arrived at in the Christian styles, with, as we have before mentioned, a smaller quantity of materials. These facts demonstrate the superior practical knowledge of statics and dynamics which must have been possessed by the artists of the middle ages. Construction was then no sham. It was real and not apparent. The ancient artist was not ashamed of his contrivances for the stability of his work. "He built for God, not for man; for the church, not for private interest; for religion, not for fame; for endurance, not by contract; for devotion, not in the spirit of economy; pro salute animæ, non pro crumena."* "He would have disdained to give affected elegance to his bold and low massive walls, his stately roof, and his fearless irregularity of buttress, windows, and gable; much less would he have used cast iron props for piers, that he might have more money to spend in making a fine street elevation."† With him there was no affected mystery, no hypocrisy. All was real, genuine, and natural. Was a roof to be of stone, it was groined, and the lateral pressures of the mass boldly resisted by flying buttresses. Was it to be of wood, there was no plastered ceiling to imitate a better material,

* Vide Paley's Fonts, Britton's Antiquities, &c.

"But naked rafters intricately crossed
Like leafless underboughs; mid some thick grove
All withered by the depth of shade above"

honestly declared their office, and possessed a beauty peculiarly their own, which, as it was real, could not be equalled by any counterfeit whatever.

The old men appear to have had a horror of all æsthetical hypocrisy. We never find in any of the old churches an inferior material treated in such a manner that it might be mistaken for a superior. Each material received a construction and decorative treatment suitable to its own nature. Stone, wood, metal, glass, each had its particular use and application, and one never was adapted so as to imitate the other. The several varieties of the preparation of clays had peculiar, naturally appropriate, and beautiful characteristics, such as ornamental bricks and encaustic tiles; but we never find the introduction of that material which has been a main instrument in the debasement of modern architecture—stucco. The bare surface of the inside of the walls, when they consisted of rubble masonry, was plastered, but no ornament was ever executed in that vile and perishable material. About the works of the middle ages, there was a reality and distinctness in the application of the constructive means to the required end, that was quite visible and unmistakeable. In modern works, the greatest efforts appear to be wasted in the concealment of the real construction, and in constructing showy ornaments for mere effect.

With regard to that element of fitness called proportion, if we admit with Doctor Alison‡ (and we think his demonstration on that head clear and conclusive,) "that the emotion of pleasure which proportion affords has no resemblance to any pleasure of sensation—but that it resembles that feeling of satisfaction which we have in other cases, where means are properly applied to their ends;" and, "that every form which is susceptible of proportion may be considered in either one or other of the following lights:—1st, In the light of its whole or general relation to the end designed, or when it is considered as a whole without any distinction of parts; or 2nd, In the light of its relation to the several parts," we think that the illustrations given of construction and arrangement will show, that, in Dr. Alison's sense of the term proportion, which is only satisfactory definition of the idea we have yet heard, Christian architecture possessed this element of beauty in a high degree. It is absurd to suppose that there is an abstract beauty of proportion, and that that proportion is governed by fixed and definite rules. If such were the case we should find all the examples of the several orders of the classic styles exactly corresponding in the relations of their several parts to each other, whereas the reverse is the fact, and we find no two examples coinciding in all respects. The truth is, the pleasurable emotions with which we are affected by what has been called proportion, is the satisfaction that we feel from the consciousness that the means employed are adequate to their ends.

CHAPTER VI.—MAY DAY.

FIVE days had passed over since the hawking party of the Lord Deputy had been in Fein-iskhe. Every day brought additional guests to Thomas-court, and every day saw some of the earl's adherents set out on pilgrimages to all the shrines in the kingdom. Among the former was Sir James Fleming, heir of the Baron of Slane, the cousin and accepted suitor of Alison Fitzgerald. Barnwall, engrossed in the ardour of his love-chase, was scarcely conscious that one-half the time allotted to him by Ormond had expired. But on May-eve, talking in the twilight with Sir Morogh MacDavid, the sad reality pressed upon him. "Brother!" he said to him, "we are to have no secrets from one another. I am a Lancastrian and an Ormondist. It is thought that the wars of the roses are soon to be renewed. I have been warned to quit this court and city, and in ten days to present myself in Kilkenny. Five of these ten are gone; to-morrow, or the next, I must depart. Will you bear me company?"

"Dear friend," said Sir Morogh, "anywhere on earth will I go with you but into Ossory. My race—the Mac-Davids and Mac-Morroghs are of the same—have, for ages back, waged an endless war with the Ormonds and their race. The Nore is to me and mine another Styx; beyond it lies our Hades. But wherefore do you rank yourself under the banner of the Butlers?"

"I inherited this fealty from my father, who had it from his father, and he from his. It is not for me to choose my own colours. Gratitude to Lancaster for favours, and to Ormond for alliance, in times past, I was born heir to, as well as to Drimnagh and Terenure. It is a hard task, oh, my friend, to part from you; harder still, may I not say, to leave behind, half won and half known, the fairest maid that was ever nursed in Leinster. Yet, must I go, or the motto of our house will become but a lying scroll, proclaiming that within, which inhabits not there."

"The way is long and dangerous," said the Wexford knight, "yet think not I would dissuade you from it. The hard way of honour should be as easy to the true knight as the rocky hill-path to the callous heels of goatherds. If you must needs go, let us at least spend one other day together, and then invoke your guardian saint, and gird your sword, and in God's name depart upon your way."

‡ Essay on the nature and principles of taste.

"And where may our next meeting be?"

"If I am living," said Sir Morrogh, "I will meet you in the Church of the Holy Trinity, at Glendalough, at noon, on a day within the next octave of St. Kevin."

"I, too, will be there," answered Sir Piers, "if God gives me life and health." Having made this resolve, the two friends embraced, parted to their several couches, prayed, and slept.

The night was not long, and passed swiftly away, just as thousands and thousands of nights have passed since darkness first girdled the globe. Over the living, breathing, thick-bedded city, over the silent graveyard, over the tuneful choirs of ancient convents, over the untenanted surface of solitary lakes, it passed never to re-pass. The evening before, Fionuala O'Connor had spent with her friends, discoursing of the legends which have long been linked with May morning, in the beliefs of our people. There was one of these on which she dwelt with more than usual thoughtfulness—and heathenish and wild though it was, it haunted her during the hours of night: the one which declares that whatsoever virgin will first after sun-rise on that morning look into a pure spring, will there perceive, reflected as in a mirror, the features of her future spouse and lord. It may not be denied that the strongest minds have sometimes been subdued by the weakest agents, that real learning has with open eyes juggled with itself; or, that the soundest discretion has sometimes forsook its stand, and let in, for a time, the most complete follies. Fionuala was up before the sun, and, by a delightful spring in the earl's garden, waiting for its first rays to read her destiny.

The grey dawn was long in retreating, and the faint forecast of the sun was sickly and slow in its advances. The birds in the trees around sang as if dubious whether it was day or no, and a lark that had risen from the neighbouring fields, and trolled a note or two in mid-air, as if deceived, descended to its dewy couch. At last a glancing beam brightened the face of heaven, and the lark's note was heard again: the brightness spread over the sky and the land, until it embraced the silent and shaded nook where the lady awaited her destiny. Eagerly, yet fearfully, she saw a ray descend upon the waters, and looking, beheld with wonder, and awe, and fear, the face of Sir Piers Barnwall pictured vividly on the surface. With a sudden start she leaped to her feet and turned to fly, when the Knight of Drimnagh caught her by the hand, and saluted her, with the ardour of a mortal lover rather than the chilling kiss of an unreal fetch.

"St. Bridget bless us; Sir Piers, how came you here?"

"Lady, I slept ill last night, being troubled with a sad dream, threatening a sadder reality."

"And what might your dream be?"

"I dreamt I was going to the church—with a fair festal company, who were chanting Hymen to Hymen! and covering the way with flowers. Now the church stood in the midst of a graveyard, walled about, and lined with yews, and willows, and melancholy ivy—evergreen over the ashes of the ever dead. We went to the first gate, but a coffin had got into the way, and we could not pass; to the second, and the clay from a new grave had been thrown up against it, and blocked the way; in the third sat three loathsome lepers asking alms, and we turned away to the fourth gate, whence the mourners from the late burial were pouring forth in a broad black stream, sighing dolefully as they came. On every side death stood between me and happiness."

The lady shuddered at the dream, while she smiled at the moral.

"Does this dark vision daunt you, Sir Piers?"

"Nay, dearest lady; there was one comfort which upheld my hopes through all. The bride was——"

"I!"

"Even you."

"Then, Knight of Drimnagh, tell me not dark dreams any more. Know you not that he whose proper day and dominion is darkness, has, in his hapless world, an infinity of visions, spells, cheats and enchantments, to unsettle our minds over night, and to discontent us with God and ourselves."

"I doubt it not. But, Nuala, am I to disbelieve all this, even the identity of the bride?"

"That, I do not say. If it relieves your frightened fancy it would be cruel to forbid you."

"And you do not?"

"I do not."

"Ah! happy hour. Nuala, it is May morning, and all earthly creatures, plants, birds, insects, flowers, are blessing heaven for its beneficence. Here do I too bless God for your pure love, the richest blessing, short of His soul-saving grace, for which I ever besought His throne. Here, in this newly verdant garden, even as our first father wedded the mother of man, do I vow to thee, before the same God, truth through life, and devotion until death."

"And here I return thee my fealty for thy fealty, never to be broken."

Well-a-day, young hearts, how quickly you have learned to cling to one another. How many a pair like you, since those of whom you speak, have vowed their vows on this round earth of ours. And time, the antithetic, that saw their morning of love dawn, how often has he seen a cold eve set upon their affections, or a fierce noon of trial melt them away. Ah! thou grey spirit of the mowing scythe, and the falling sand, why hast thou not written thy morals on stone, that we might read them from generation to generation. Thou that at the prime, attired as a bridegroom, stands before the chancel—and at evening, as a sexton, waits in the gate, speaking for ever to the ear of reason—"All things change but God alone—God alone." Even this pair, who doubted each other no more than they doubted the ground they stood on, heard in that hour of their new-born union, this solemn voice. For, never do thoughts of eternity come more keenly upon the soul, than when we have just made unto ourselves a new hope in the days of a coming time.

May-day was then a feast of social as well as religious observance in Dublin, especially for the citizens. The Lord Deputy and his friends were too deeply engaged in affairs of state to be witnesses of these sports, as was their wont; but the lady guests, at Thomas-court, were committed to the acquiescent hands of the younger knights, Sir Gibbon Fitzgerald, Sir James Fleming, Sir Morogh, and Sir Piers. After a dinner, prepared at an earlier hour than usual, they were ready to visit the scenes of civic enjoyment. Fionuala was dressed in green, with a white scarf fastened at her waist by a fibula of gold. Her snowy turban had assumed a fox-glove, instead of the wintry ivy-flower. The daughters of the earl were in pink and blue, with the tall head-dresses and long trains in fashion in England somewhat abridged and made manageable. Sir Gibbon came forth in all the finery he had displayed on the day of the hawking, and the three knights in the more ordinary and less costly velvet caps, slashed doublets, and tight-fitting hose.

Hugh Herrick, who, in the interval, had been abiding at the White Horse with as much satisfaction as his master at Thomas-court, had for some time arrived with the horse of Sir Piers, and delayed without, with a very ill grace. As the knight came forth leading out Nuala, all beauty and contentment as she was, the moroseness of the squire, arising doubtless from drought, somewhat relaxed, yet he could not help muttering in a very audible soliloquy.

"Always late—always late. O my word, Sir Piers, you will be late at your wedding, yet."

"Who is this?" enquired Nuala.

"My squire, who was also my father's, and like all old retainers, is readier with his morality than his obedience."

"And his name?"

"Herrick, lady mine, Hugh Herrick."

"Master Herrick," said the lady, "come hither," and she put some gold into his hand, "will you do me the favour of drinking my health herewith?"

"That will he, I can answer for him," said his master.

"I am not given, most fair lady," said the squire, "to many libations, and still less to the bacchant habit of pledging healths. Howbeit, your beauty, so sovereign over all others, shall find no rebel in me. I will drink it, and uphold it unparalleled in Christendy, nay, even among the Eastern heathens themselves, to whom, 'tis said, the devil hath given more beauty than heaven gives grace."

"Thanks, Master Herrick, many thanks; but I pray you do no battle in my name—'tis not worth it."

"By Saint Joseph!"

But the others of the company being in the saddle, delayed no longer, and the eloquence of Master Herrick was brought to an untimely period by the disappearance of his auditors.

"My squire," said the knight, as they rode along, "always invokes Saint Joseph; he has a peculiar devotion to him."

"Is he pious, then?"

"As pious as that Duke of Clarence, who chose to be drowned in a butt of Malmsey."

"The same Clarence, whose son, 'tis said, is to be set up as true heir to the English crown."

"The same—a true Yorkist; without one great Christian virtue to redeem his character."

"Tush, tush! do you not know, rash Piers, that that word, spoken in the earl's ears, might cause your death; or, the next worst evil to you, and even to me, your banishment."

As she spoke this, the daughter of O'Connor perceived a look of ineffable sorrow stealing over the features of Barnwall's face; but, like the summer cloud's shadow that sweeps across the ripe corn fields, it went as swiftly as it came.

The scene of the sports they came to see was Kilmainham, near the Liffey's bank, where already great numbers had assembled. In one part a tall pole was erected, dressed out with evergreens and flowers, under which sat two musicians, playing on the bagpipes to a ring of merry dancers around. Farther off, two swinging ropes were seen in a group of trees, which sport attracted its own set of spectators. Nearer the river, butts were erected, and the archers of the city were exercising before many distinguished spectators, among whom our noble company found the Prior of Kilmainham, the mayor, the Captain of the Bachelors, his lieutenant, the tanner, and the captain of the earl's guard. In a strip of meadow land on the opposite side of the river, a party of apprentices were playing at common.

"Seats for the earl's party; this way, Sir Piers—this way, ladies," cried the Captain of the Bachelors.

Seats were made, and after the momentary interruption occasioned by this accession of noble guests, the archers resumed their trial of skill. The prize, a small silver arrow, was in the hands of the mayor, as umpire. Two classes seemed to contest the superiority in marksmanship with all the pertinacity of party, the squires and retainers of the nobles, and the archers of the city. The tanner, who was reckoned a good shot, had just made the best of many aims, when Sir Piers observed his own squire stepping forward, having evidently obeyed the injunction of Nuala, and borrowing a bow from one of Kennelbreck's men, sent the shaft into the border of the inner mark. This seemed decisive, until Captain Myrtle taking his stand, reassured the courage of the citizens. The chief bachelor raised his athletic figure, drew his arrow up to the barb, fixed his bright eye upon the spot, and pierced it through the very centre. Loud and long was the cheering of the burgher party, and well pleased the worshipful face of Jenicho Marks, as he hung the silver arrow to the victor's baldric. One little maiden, with a face like a primrose, seemed the most gratified at this result. It was Maud, the daughter of the rigid elder, whom we saw in the street of the winetaverns, in the first chapter.

"Master Myrtle," said the Knight of Drimnagh, "I bid you joy, though you have beat my squire."

"I thank you, Sir Piers," said the victor, "and if Master Herrick will be a guest at our hall this evening, I will show him that the bachelors of Dublin are no less lucky than hospitable. Nay, Sir Knight, if these fair dames and noble gentlemen, and yourself, would be our guests—as the nobles of Dublin were wont to be in kinder days—we will do our best to make you cheer."

"I will, right willingly," said Sir James Fleming.

"And I, and I," said the rest.

"Perdie, Captain Bachelor, so would I too," said Sir Gibbon, "but that state affairs demand my joining the Lord Deputy."

"Which is much to be regretted by the citizens of Dublin," said Myrtle, in a tone very slightly ironical.

"Nay, indeed, now, captain, nay, it is not so; I could add but little to your entertainment."

The bachelor smiled, but did not venture a second sally.

After viewing the other sports of the evening, Sir Piers and his companions, with the ladies of their charge, returned to the city, and first directed their way to the hall of the bachelors, by Christ's Church, which was very tastefully decorated for the festivity. Here they remained for some hours dancing, and observing others dance, with such good nature and sympathy as quite charmed the hearts of the people. No other incidents occurred, save a fall experienced by Captain Kennelbreck, in a strathspey (which fall he attributed to the irregular movement of his next neighbour, Squire Herrick), and an altercation between the gossiping tanner and the pipers, on the subject of music generally, which ended in a confidential draught in the chimney corner. The attention of Master Myrtle to his guests was adjudged by all to be exemplary, yet Sir Piers though far from being a mere spectator of others' pleasure, thought he noticed his attentions directed to the little maiden of the primrose face, more frequently than to any one else of either sex present.

It was much farther from noonday than midnight when the earl's party re-entered Thomas-court; where, contrary to the usual custom, the windows of the Lord Deputy's chambers glowed with light, and the horses of the Prior of Kilmainham, the Lord Chancellor, and others, stood before the door. As Barnwall was giving directions to Herrick, who was not the soberer for his day's amusement, he felt a hand upon his arm, and was drawn aside into an angle of the courtyard.

"Sir Piers Barnwall," said a shrill cracked voice, speaking in low tones from the recesses of a Spanish cloak, "are you still here? How long will you palter with your fealty and forego your duty?"

"Who are you that so questions me?"

"An old man, and a servant of the house of Ormond. If you value your honor, faith, or life, fly this court to-night. Treason has reached a head, and the foul blotch is about to disspread its vile corruption. Mark those lights—they are lighting perjured nobles and rash young men into the dark ways of treason. Fly!"

The warner had himself flown.

"I will not fly like a thief in the night," said Barnwall; "I owe it to the earl as his guest, to my brother Morrogh as his friend, to my darling girl, moreover, not to abscond silently and without any explanation. I will stay till to-morrow, but no longer."

And he did stay.

CHAPTER VII.—THE CASTLE.

THE Earl of Kildare having once declared in favour of the new claimant of the English sovereignty, was resolved to enter with all his energy into the enterprise of seating him upon the throne he claimed. Ardent in all his undertakings, extreme in all his likings and hatreds—he was determined to treat all who opposed this scheme as his personal enemies, and all who joined in it as friends. Under pretence of going on pilgrimages, his emissaries had scattered themselves through the country, treating privily with the chief personages—as well clerics as laymen. To receive some of these who had returned, he arose on the morning after the day recorded in the last chapter, at an earlier hour than usual; and that business over, he now sat immersed in anxious thoughts in the audience-chamber of the court, when the Archbishop of Armagh was announced.

Octavius de Palatio, was by birth, as his name indicates, an Italian. He was now beyond the middle age, and of that spiritual cast of face, and lean habit of body which so well becomes the active ecclesiastic. His reputation for piety was great, but his fame for learning was still greater; for, even then, the world had begun to prize mere human acquirements more highly than victories of discipline, or conquests over temptation. The untroubled, yet thoughtful face of the primate prepared Kildare for a serious discourse, which he strove, with his natural ardour, rather to hasten than to delay.

"My Lord Archbishop," said the earl, "it is so long since this humble roof was honoured by your presence, that I need not say I am curious to learn the occasion of this visit."

"My Lord Deputy," replied the primate, "I will be as brief in words, as you seem resolved to be. Your cousin, the chancellor, hath taken into his protection an English lad——"

"Pardon me, my Lord," interrupted the earl, if I stay your further speech, From the tone of this prelude, I foresee what is to follow. You have come to declare against Edward the Sixth.

"Edward the Sixth! God's mercy, but treason is a crop that soon ripens. My Lord of Kildare, I come here to warn you as you love your life, as you would save your soul, as you would preserve your own name from infamy, and your children from reproach—to discard this impostor. Stay me not, earl, I will warn you out: I have credible information from Oxford, that this youth whom you style duke and king, is an organ-maker's son, and that Sir Richard Symon, his tutor, wo that I should say it of an ordained priest, is in the plot to deceive you all——"

"Say, rather my lord, you have had this wondrous news from the wise louts of Waterford. Believe me, I am not ignorant of the epistles of those saucy burghers. Even my own ears have been assailed with their invention; but the tongue that bore it, now hangs from a dry throat——"

"You did not hang the herald, Green!"

"Even so. And look you, my lord primate, if you were other than you are, you would leave Thomas-court, either for the gallows or the castle."

"Earl, I fear you not, nor will I waste other words upon you. I know the metal of your head-strong house too well, to think that any let will keep you from the precipice of your own will. When, even one life is taken, it is too late for parley on either side. But remember, I apprise you, this would-be prince of yours is the base-born heir of an unfranchised craftsman. You will hear it from other lips hereafter."

"My lord primate," said Kildare, with a deeper vexation than he had before expressed; "even if what you say be true, the upholders of the descendant of an adulteress need not taunt us with it; but this comes of Italian bishops."

For the first time, the calm prelate seemed moved. "Methinks the Earls of Kildare used to boast of some Italian blood"—he began, but checking himself, he added—"I have done my duty, my lord; I leave you to God, who I pray, for your own sake, will send you a calmer mood of mind. Farewell."

As he passed along the corridors he met Sir Piers, who was bound to the audience-chamber, to announce his departure. The young knight, with the instinct of true reverence, bowed his knee before him, and asked his benediction.

"Whom am I to bless?" said the primate, "a traitor to King Henry or a liege man?"

"A liege man, Piers Barnwall of Drimnagh," replied the knight.

"Arise, Sir Piers, and may the God of truth bless you; it is a fair morning, but a foul day impends." So saying he passed on his way, as calmly as he came.

In the ante-room of the audience-chamber, Sir Piers perceived Captain Kenelbreck, who smiled grimly upon him as he went in. The earl he found pacing up and down, in anything but a self-complacent mood.

"Brief words, Sir Piers," he said, turning abruptly round, "are needful in busy times. I do not bid you good morrow, because, by your own words, the good or evil of this day must be decided. Have you heard of the presence among us of the true king of England?"

"Henry the Seventh?"

"No, Sir, 'tis Edward the Sixth who is here! 'Ere another week will have passed, he here will be crowned—and before a month from that glad day, he will sit on the seat usurped by him you call Henry the Seventh."

"My lord——"

"Our friends are able to the occasion. Margaret of Burgundy is engaged to furnish men and munitions, Lord Lovel and Lord Lincoln of the English side will be with us, the chancellor, the prior, and myself, with others not powerless here, will also aid him to his rights."

"But, my lord, think of the number who will not take arms against Henry, Lord Bermingham, of Louth——"

"We have the Abbot of Mellifont, a better ally——"

"The Baron of Howth——"

"An evil scion of the least honourable line in Ireland; we can spare him."

"The citizens of Waterford——"

"We have the braver and better men, of Dublin."

"But, good, my lord, will you imperil your own house, your friends, yourself——"

"Sir Piers, I wished you hither not to take council, but to take service. Are you for the true prince or the usurper?"

"My Lord, I will answer you plainly. I am not skilled in titles, for seldom hath a baron of the pale asked whether his patron was or was not the true heir of England. I have felt the royal bounty of Henry—I believe him true king—and for him only shall my sword be drawn."

"Then, Knight of Drimnagh, I grieve to say that you are a prisoner of the state. Kenelbreck! ho, Kenelbreck!"

The captain of the guard and Sir Gibbon Fitzgerald entered together.

"Captain," said the earl, "convey this gentleman forthwith to the castle—by the side postern."

"I congratulate you, my lord," said the simpering Sir Gibbon, who came forward with divers genuflections, "on the—aw—detection of this gentleman. Do you know, my Lord, I came here this morning specialiter, I may say, to inform you that this gentleman was seen, by one of my varlets, parleying with the Earl of Ormond in Fein-iskhe, the day of our hawking there."

"Ha! the earl is then left ——"

"Yes, my lord," said Kenelbreck; "but he has left his spies behind. I wished to inform your excellency, that we took old Bolter, his conspiring major domo, last night in the court; the most impertinent Ormondist alive—he had been here conversing with this knight."

"What! treason in our very court. Away with him—away. Fool that I was, to trust a stranger here so long. Not a word, sirrah, not a word."

"Kenelbreck," added the excited earl, in a lower tone, "privily, secretly; let no one know of it—be gone!"

Sir Piers saw there was no use in immediate resistance. He was hurried along the almost deserted streets, wet and clammy with the heavy dew of the night, for the sky was thickly clouded and the sun invisible. As he passed the neighbourhood of St.

Owen's Church, a wizard face peeped for a moment from an aperture near the roof, and was as quickly withdrawn—and as he entered the castle gate, he thought he saw in the distance the figure of the Infirmary of St. Mary's, but the face was turned in another direction.

Handed over to the castle authorities, he was lodged in the third story of the Birmingham Tower, where a mat, a half-broken pitcher, a chair, and a rudely carved wooden crucifix—the unfinished work of some former captive—was the only furniture. A small and high window threw down at mid-day a distinct light, but in the morning and evening hardly admitted of any. The door which was narrow (and within another that opened upon the stairs leading to the leads and the floor), was carefully secured from without. After his legs had been fettered, his pitcher filled, and a brown loaf laid beside it on the floor, Sir Piers sat down upon his mattress, folded his arms, and hummed a snatch of an old ballad. Feeling that he was guiltless of any crime, that he had done his duty and asserted his loyalty, he was satisfied. There was another consolation in finding himself confined in the city where Fionuala was. Better a captive and near her, than at liberty if far away. He had, in addition, a presentiment that his confinement there would not be of long duration, and this, perhaps, tended more than any other thought to make him musical.

When Captain Kenelbreck had lodged him in safety with the keeper, he directed his way towards the hostlerie of the White Horse, where he doubted not to find Hugh Herrick, to whom he bore no great good will since their encounter on the eve of St. George. But Hugh, having instructions to be early at Thomas-court, had arrived at the main gate just as his master left it, a prisoner, by the postern. He rode into the yard, and dismounted at the entrance. Sir Gibbon Fitzgerald coming out at the time, the squire enquired if he knew whether the Knight of Drimnagh was yet astir.

"Perdie, yes," answered the coxcomb, "he is early up, that gentleman. He left by day-break, without bidding his friends adieu. He said that he had a loon of a squire who would follow him home, if he had not been too close to a spigot over night."

"A loon of a squire!" exclaimed Herrick. "Sir Gibbon, are you resolute those were the very words?"

"As I remember, faith these were his words."

"I will not follow him, then," said Herrick. "I will turn knight errant, and seek my own fortune in these wars that they say are nigh hand. If I follow him, my reputation I may say is gone. But," he continued, speaking to himself, "there may be something in this—mayhap the safety of the Lancastrian succession required it. I will after him—I see through it all. His unnatural abuse of me was a good feint—St. Joseph—an excellent feint. I will follow him."

With this meditation in his mind, the trusty scapegrace galloped from the courtyard, and before Kenelbreck returned from his search at the White Horse, Master Herrick was leaving the dust behind among the oaks of Inchicore.

CHAPTER VIII.—THE CORONATION.

THE lord deputy and his friends, having ascertained the sufficiency of their strength, now threw off all restraint, and openly waited upon the prince at the chancellor's. The citizens of Dublin, informed of the nature of their designs, were divided into rival parties, one set of commoners being for the present succession, and another for the Yorkist claim. But there was a third class, and, perhaps, the most numerous, who, having no great attachment to either the white rose or the red, sided with the strongest side, rather fearing to offend the deputy who reigned at their own doors, than Henry who reigned in London. Of this section was our friend, the Captain of the Bachelors, and his lieutenant, the tanner.

It was Sunday morning, and those two municipal worthies sat in the Bachelors'-hall, near the old cathedral of Christ Church. The day was fitfully gloomy, and the opposite wall of the cathedral still glistened with the damps of night. But though the sky was heavy no rain fell, and the wind rather fretted than blew.

"It is long since we had a king crowned in Dublin before," said Myrtle.

"None, that I have heard of," replied the tanner, "since Asculph MacTorcall's time, from whom the valiant Earl Richard, whose tomb is within yonder church, and MacMorrogh's son took the city for the king of England."

"The Ostmen had been long settled here," said the captain.

"A long time. I've heard Friar Roger of All-Hallows say, that of their kings, a score and five reigned here—and Friar Roger, they say, is as deep in books, even as the archbishop, Octavius, himself."

"They say the same learned prelate is much averse to this affair of the earl's, and refuses to be present at the crowning."

"So I have heard," answered the gossiping tanner, "and truly even to one so unlearned as I, it does seem passing strange, that a king of England and France should be crowned in our city. The Mayor of Waterford," he added in a lower tone, "in his letter to the archbishop, Fitzsymon, hath said that this young man—the rightful prince, as I am sure—is no other than an organ-maker's son, born at Oxford, and no more son to Clarence than to Prester John. But that so many sage and aged lords, as well bishops as counsellors of state could be thus deceived, is not to be thought of."

"'Tis not, at least, to be said," observed Myrtle—and a mutual pause ensued.

A humming sound now vibrated on the ears of the captain and lieutenant, and the bells of Christ's began to ring merrily. This was the signal for all the bells in Dublin, and peal answered peal, within and without the walls. On issuing into the street before the cathedral, the bachelors' commanders found, already before them, a vast concourse of people, all earnestly engaged in discourse or observation. The Archbishop of Dublin and the bishops who were to assist at the ceremony, had already entered the cathedral, and Kildare and the future king were momentarily expected. From the church gates up to Thomas-court, anxious crowds lined the route of procession, ranged along the footways, perched on pillars and in blind windows, hanging from windows and rude verandahs, and bristling along the eaves. The bells ceased to chime, and a peal, as of an hundred trumpets, was heard from the quarter of Thomas-court, as, at a fixed hour, the prince descended from the deputy's audience-chamber to the yard. He seemed pale, anxious, and dubious of his own mind. On the one side he was supported by the Lord Chancellor, and on the other by Sir Richard Symon. As he came out, Kildare's retainers and guardsmen filled the court-yard with their huzzas, and a fair hand dropped, from a window of the court, a garland of glorious flowers in his path. He looked up, but could not see the bestower of the propitious gift—then he looked down at the flowers, and, for the first time, a smile stole over his mournful, and withal majestic face. The quicker eye of one of the spectators, Sir Patrick D'Arey himself, caught sight of the wreath-giver, who was no other than the Earl's daughter Eustachia.

"By Saint Dooloch of Balgriffin," said the giant, "he shall be my king. Look you, Bat, how he takes up the flowers, and hands them to the good old priest. She has crowned him, and I will crown him. Long live the true prince," he shouted with lungs like Stentor's, "long live the true prince!"

The cry was heard far beyond the court-yard, and was repeated by all, even to the very doors of the cathedral. Then the procession being formed, it was put in motion. The sky cleared at the same moment, as if to favour the pageant—an omen which raised the spirits of both the actors and spectators of this remarkable scene.

First, there rode out, six heralds, in pairs, mounted on white horses. After these came the city trainbands, commanded by the senior warden, and the mayor of the city. These were followed by the civic authorities, Dowdal, Master of the Rolls; Plunkett, the Chief Justice; and Maurice Fitzgerald, the Chancellor. Then came a cohort of the grave knights of the temple, with their renowned prior and master at their head. The standard-bearer, and the sword-bearer of Ireland marched next, with such other representatives of the hereditary offices of the English in Ireland, as still survived. The secular and regular ecclesiastics of the second order followed—the bishops were already at the cathedral—among whom the mitred abbots of Mellifont, Holycross, Batinglass, and Selskar, were particularly distinguishable. After these, mounted on a white, unspotted steed, and attended by Sir Richard Symon, and two other priests, as his domestic chaplains, came the prince himself, armed cap-a-pie and bearing himself like a true heir of a royal inheritance. Kildare, in the midst of his guards, came next, and after him the Lords Portlester, Barry, De Courcey, and Gormans-town, the Barons Slane, Devlin, and others; the Knights Sir Morogh, Sir James Fleming, Sir Gibbon, and many beside. The procession closed with six other heralds, riding in pairs.

The sun shone, the bells renewed their peals, the crowds cheered louder and louder as the procession reached the church doors. Defiling to right and left, the several companies that preceded him, opened a way for the prince to enter first. As he crossed the door, two bishops advanced from the chancel to meet him, bowing slightly. Taking off his casque, the prince placed himself between them, as prescribed in the ceremonial, and advanced to the altar, before which the metropolitan, Fitzsymon, sat, vested in all the solemn garments of his high office. Around him, their chairs placed so as to form the likeness of a crown, sat the assistant bishops, to the number of ten, each vested in rochet and stole, white cope, and simple mitre. Near the altar, and nearly level with it, on a temporary platform, carpeted with cloth of silver, stood the throne, covered with purple and gold, and on the altar itself, were laid the sword, the crown, the sceptre, and the oil of catechumens. On the other altars were the relics of the cathedral, the famous Baculus Jesu, the object of pilgrimage for generations, supposed to have been the staff that fell from Heaven at St. Patrick's feet by the Tyrrhene sea, the Shrine of St. Cuba, and other sacred possessions of the church. At the extreme end of the left transept was a tent of spangled cloth, for the prince to robe himself in.

The then assistant bishops having brought him to where the archbishop sat, introduced him in these words:—

"Most reverend father, our holy mother the church demands that you should raise this illustrious soldier to the royal dignity."

To which the archbishop replied—"Dost thou know him to be worthy and useful for this dignity?"

The bishops answering that they knew and believed him to be useful to the church and the kingdom, the archbishop replied "Deo gratias," and the prince took his seat between the two bishops, with his face to the archbishop, who thus addressed him:

"Since you are about to receive from our hands to-day, oh! best prince, the sacred unction, and the ensigns of royalty, it is necessary that we admonish you of the great duty to which you are destined. You take on you to-day the royal dignity, and the duty of governing those committed to you. Truly this is a charge full of labours and anxieties; but if you consider that all power cometh from the Lord God, by whom kings reign, and the framers of laws decree justice, you must know that you will one day have to render an account to God of the charge committed to you. In the first place, you will be pious, you will love the Lord your God, with a whole mind and a pure heart. The Christian religion in which you have been nursed, you will retain inviolate to the end, and to the best of your power will defend it against all its adversaries. To the prelates of the churches, and the priests, you will exhibit condign reverence. You shall not trample on ecclesiastical liberty; justice, without which no society can stand, you will administer most impartially to all, conferring reward upon the good, and just punishment upon the wicked. Widows, minors, the poor, and the feeble, you must defend from oppression. To all those who approach thee, thou shalt exhibit thyself affable, benign, and gentle, as comports with thy royal dignity. And thus shalt thou carry thyself, as reigning for the utility of all thy people, and expecting the reward of thy good deeds, not here on earth, but in heaven, which may it be granted to you, we beseech of Him who reigns one God, world without end. Amen."

After listening attentively to this impressive prelude to the ceremony, the prince prostrated himself upon the floor; and the archbishop raising his hands to heaven, prayed devoutly to that God who caused Abraham to triumph over his enemies, and bestowed on Moses and Joshua an hundred victories—who raised the humble boy David to the throne of his kingdom, and enriched Solomon with the ineffable gifts of wisdom and grace—to hear the prayers of his humility for Edward, Duke of Clarence, now elected to be king, so that he might rival Abraham in fidelity, Moses in meekness, Joshua in fortitude, David in humility, and Solomon in wisdom. So that protected by the helmet of heavenly defence, armed with an invincible shield, and clothed with celestial arms, he might be a terror to unbelievers, and a preserver of the faithful, and finally, glorified with Christ, the conqueror, of Tartarus, in Heaven. Then making the sign of the cross over him, the archbishop uttered another short prayer and returned to his seat.

The prince rising, came to the archbishop's knee, knelt, and was anointed on the right arm and between the shoulders. The archbishop and bishop having prayed, and the sacred oil being absterged from the prince by the former, Simnel rose and proceeded to the pavilion, in the left transept, to enrobe, while the archbishop began the solemn mass.

Returning, royally enrobed, the Pretender approached the venerable Fitzsymon, who had resumed his seat, while the choir chanted the anthem; and the choiristers ceasing, he made aloud, in a voice clear and courageous, this profession:

"I, Edward of Clarence, about to become Edward VI., of France and England, profess before God and his angels, that I will do justice to the church of God, and to the people subject to me, pro posse et nosse. And to show canonical and condign honour to the bishops and the church, and observe all privileges conferred on her by emperors, kings, and lords, and that I will confirm to all abbots, earls, and my vassals, their privileges, according to the council of my lieges."

Having said this, he spread both his hands on an open copy of the Gospels, saying, as he did it, "So help me God, and these holy evangels of God."

After this the metropolitan again prayed, repeating solemn injunctions of the duties of Christian kings to the church and their kingdoms.

In giving to him each of the three ensigns of royalty, the sword, the crown, and the sceptre, he delivered him fresh exhortations, and prayed anew to God that he might rule in righteousness and wisdom to the end.

At last the solemn rite was done—the mass was finished—the choir chanted the majestic Te Deum—and the procession of the prelates, the nobles, and the people, began to be formed.

"To the castle! to the castle!" was the cry.

"Why do you not move, my Lord?" said old Port-lester to the deputy.

"We are waiting for those accursed bearers, who have got shut up in the throng without," said the earl.

"My lord earl," said a husky, scarce human voice, "wait for no bearers. The king is in his throne—loyal shoulders will bear him to the castle."

So saying, the gigantic D'Arcy strode into the open sanctuary, snatched up the throne and its new tenant, and placed it upon his herculean shoulders.

"On—on," said the wild giant; "long live Edward the Sixth!"

The procession formed. The gigantic knight of Platin, with the throned king on his shoulders, led the line. The people, mad with excitement, shouted vociferously, scattering flowers and evergreens in the way; and even the knights and nobles sharing in the general tumult, waved their casques, and bannerols, and favors.

As the giant deposited his burden at the inner entrance to the castle, the latter said—

"Sir, we are much beholden to your loyal shoulders, for escaping through this throng; they that have borne so well our weight, can well bear the honours we will hold in mind to give."

"So, please your grace," said the giant, who seemed to have a dim consciousness of the 'vantage ground he stood on, "as you deign to interest yourself in my fortunes, there is a lady who—"

"Oh!" said the king, who could scarce forbear bursting into laughter at the thought of such a monster being smitten in love, "we will hear of it again, to-morrow, mayhap, or the next day."

"Please your grace, you will remember——"

"To-morrow, to-morrow," said the deputy; "detrain not the king, good Sir Patrick; to-morrow tell us of your love, and I will back your suit myself."

"You promise."

"By Saint Brigid, I will."

At this declaration, the simple-minded monster broke into an uproarious fit of laughter, and looking with glances of the strangest perplexity at the lord deputy, turned away and fled.

"Most strange," said Kildare.

"Strange, indeed," said the new king. "My lord, will you order some of your men to watch this Atlas of our new sphere; his wits, I fear, are less tough than his thewes."

"Kenelbreck, let some of your fellows have a watch over Sir Patrick D'Arcy. Will your grace be pleased to enter?"

King Sinnel was quickly installed among his council in the castle, where Kildare at once surrendered to him the sword of state, which as Lord Deputy he held. This the new monarch graciously restored, calling the earl his governor and tutor, and praying him to retain that sword as an emblem of his long reign in Ireland. The other great officers of state made similar tenders of submission, which were received with equal grace, and their titles and offices confirmed to them. Then an address was recited from the citizens, written in ballad royal, by Friar Roger, of All-Hallows; letters from Burgundy and England were read, a tournament proclaimed, and a parliament resolved; and all the chief actors in this momentous scene, highly pleased with themselves, sat down to a sumptuous entertainment, presided over by the king, on whose right hand sat the archbishop, and on his left, the lord deputy.

THE HYMN FOR EASTER.

"O, Filii et Filia."

I.

"O, hear it, youths and virgins, hear!

The King of Heaven, the ever-glorious,

Arose to-day, arose victorious

Over Death and the grave so drear!

Alleluiah!"

II.

Far o'er the golden orient skies

Shines out the sunny Sabbath morning.

The Lord's Disciples, at the warning,

Seek the tomb where they think He lies.

Alleluiah!

III.

Now James and Salomè have met,

And Mary Magdalen comes weeping,

With precious essences for keeping

The dear Corpse from decay as yet.

Alleluiah!

IV.

When, wonder-waking sight to see!

An Angel, clad in shining vesture,

Who speaketh, with majestic gesture,

"Lo! the Lord is away in Galilee!"

Alleluiah!

V.

The Apostle John has left his room,

And, with light foot, each moment fleeter,

Outstrippeth even the eager Peter,

And is first to approach the tomb.

Alleluiah!

VI.

Some others mourn and droop apart,

When, 'mid the group, the Lord appeareth,

And, "Peace be here!" He saith, and cheereth

And reviveth anew each heart.

Alleluiah!

VII.

But Thomas yields them no belief;

He deems their tale an idle fiction,

And meets it still by contradiction:

It alleviateth not his grief.

Alleluiah!

VIII.

To him the God-Man, therefore, saith—

"Friend, see my side. Lay here thy hand on My hands and feet, and then abandon

All thy doubts, and be firm in faith."

Alleluiah!

IX.

And Thomas, at his Master's word,

Inspects with eye and probes with finger

The wounds whose bleeding chasms yet linger;

And he cries, "O my God and Lord!"

Alleluiah!

X.

Then Jesus: "Thomas! thou hast been Convinced by sight, but blessed rather

Are they before my Heavenly Father

Who believe, though they have not seen!"

Alleluiah!

XI.

May, then, our God inflame with love

The hearts of all! May youth and vestal,

In this most holy time, so festal,

Worship Him who is throned above!

Alleluiah!

XII.

Him who bestoweth Light and Grace,

Who deigns to accept our prayers and praises,

Who can abase and no man raises,

Who exalteth and none can abase!

Alleluiah!

The Death of Lord Macguire.

(A SKETCH OF '41.)

YOU have surely, if you love calm sleeping beauty, looked on Lough Erne's face. Still as an evening in summer, there she lies at length—stretching from Assaroe to Breffny O'Reilly—and none to worship her. Waves of silvery white smile round the dimpling islands, as she dreams in the very lassitude of beauty. Sentinelling mountains roam around, and all is silence—she is the Eden of the north, the loveliest spot of the loveliest land man ever died for.

In the youth of that "son of the waters," whose death may be the subject of many a fitter pen, the desolation of conquest was on her. The Earls had long since fled from Lough Swilly's mouth; and though the Macguires, like all the other sept of the north, wailed and prayed for the return of them or their sons, the old land fretted without a chief like him of old. A new language was being forced into men's mouths—a new religion had demolished all morality—the customs, dress, habits, and arms of the native races had almost vanished away. Courts of High Commission, of Castle-Chamber, inquisitions of escheat and forfeiture usurped the domains of the Brehon. Even in the ruins of Devenish, on the very grave of Molaise, the English had held their sessions. Old castles crumbled down under the blighting red-flag they supported. Unightly bands of Scotch and English—of vagabond pedlars of civilization from London, and chevaliers d'industrie, from Cantyre in Galloway, poached over the hunting grounds on the Lough sides. Nay, the fairy islands of the lake were not too sacred for the English plough. Innish-mac-saint, itself, with its holy relics, was under the hoofs of the heretic stranger, who found "great delightfulness in the place," as so he might. From Lough Melvin to Belturbet there were Spottiswoodes, and Coles, and Archdalls, and Lowthers, and Blenherhassets, and Foliots, and Atkinsons, and Loftuses, and such foreign marauders, who liked Lough Erne well; but the old people in the old place, they were "despairing Irishes."

And why should they not despair? old men among them remembered the days of Hugh O'Neill—but where was the might of the "red hand" now? Where was the Macguire among them all to gather the clans of Fermanagh? The "Earls" had not fled ten years, when a planter, one Davies, versed in English law, and called Attorney-General by the English, "represented" Fermanagh in the Irish parliament, and the race of Macguire bore it. Their acres had been taken over their heads, and they groaned in secret; martial law and its myrmidons were on them, and spies, and forgers, and suborners—and it was death to murmur.

And their faith, the faith of their fathers—that is the saddest fact of all.

If the ideas of a people have a consonance with the scenery in which they live, if nature influences the mind of man, we cannot wonder that on Lough Erne religion was always supreme. The grand paganism of our fathers pitched upon the mountains over it for their worship; but the serene catholicity of mediæval times, found in the quiet nooks and placid islands of the lake a kindred serenity. Nature and her beauty ceased then to be grandly symbolical, and became real to men's eyes. Belmore,* when the sinking sun threw down its sides dishevelled light, streaming like the golden hair of a Celtic god, ceased then to be reminding of terror; and the scenic placidity of the waters spoke audibly of peace, and quietude, and the after-life of man. There, then, Catholicity raised her earliest and some of her holiest fanes. Monastic brotherhoods settled on the islands of the lake, and the valley of waters was redolent of prayer. Crosses and effigies in stone, holy names for holy places, mark still the devotion of a happy people. The islands were paradises to them, and they laid there the bones of their dead, as in the safe keeping of a quieter world. The shore had its "ports of lamentation," where the living wailed as the dead were slowly borne over the lake; and, when the caoine died away round the headlands, the mournful tolling of the abbey bells still woke the silence of the waters.

But Devenish was dismantled now—her devotees were expelled and hunted. In the very hall sacred to the living God, the English held their sessions. Every insult that could be affixed to native piety was heaped upon the owners of the soil. Protestant Vicars were planted there, who robbed them for their souls' sake. "Oaths of supremacy" and divers other blasphemous instruments were used to coerce, or to test for the halter. The Catholic was an attainted native, he worshipped God after his own fashion, and "ploughed his horses by the tail;" two diabolical acts of treason to England. Brooding wrong settled in the people's heart, and a due vengeance came when the "despairing Irishes" stung in '41.

Then appears, for the first time in history, Connor, Lord Macguire; he was the son of Bryan, first Baron, by English law, of Enniskillen, and from his grandfather held, by royal letters patent, broad acres in Fermanagh. Though he had conformed thus to English practices, his property, by the intriguing of the Coles and Loftuses, passed into planters' hands, and, when Roger Moore came from Spain, he found Macguire almost without an acre. The vultures were settling around the possessions of his fathers, and a Cole was already "governor" in the very Castle of Enniskillen.

It was about Candlemas, 1640, in about the twenty-fourth year of his age, that he and Roger Moore, the great prime mover of the insurrection of 1641, met "in the house of one Peter de Costres in this city." If we can trust the narrative of Macguire, which has been handed down to us, he unwillingly afforded to Moore this meeting; they discoursed "of the many afflictions and sufferings of the natives of this kingdom, and particularly in those late times of my Lord Strafford's government." Then Moore "began to particularize the sufferings of them that were the more ancient natives, as were the Irish; now that on several plantations they were all put out of their ancestors' estates; all which sufferings, he said, did beget a general discontent over all the whole kingdom in both the natives, to wit, the old and new Irish." Topics, like this, lost none of their fire coming from him whose memory was full of the misfortunes of Leix. He spoke of the Irish rising and the "regaining of their own lands and the freedom of their religion." But Macguire was one of these men, steadfast, yet hard to move; these matters were altogether "out of his element." Moore changed the point of discourse. "He began to lay down to me," says the narrative "the case that I was in then, overwhelmed in debt—the smallness of my estate, and the greatness of the estate my ancestors had, and how I should be sure to get it again, or at least a good part thereof." Still the man was immovable; and Rory changed again. He showed "how the welfare and maintaining the Catholic religion, which, he said, undoubtedly the parliament now in England will suppress, doth depend upon it; for, said he, it is to be feared, and so much I hear from every understanding man, the parliament intends the utter subversion of our religion; by which persuasion he obtained my consent:" the Catholic yielded.

Next day they met again, and with them O'Reilly and Mac Mahon and others. O'Moore spoke of the "troubles of Scotland," the physical power of their country, their relations with Spain, where the son of Hugh O'Neill served at his regiment's head, and with Flanders, where Owen Roe learned to win Benburb. He hinted, too, at secret friends, and mentioned Lord Mayo.

Twelve months and more passed away. The power of the English parliamentarians was far in the ascendant. The king of "the graces" might have seen his merited fate without looking beyond Whitehall courtyard. Unseen hands too were working throughout Europe against Ireland. A young prince of the Red Hand was found strangled in his bed at Brussels; and the race of Hugh was extinguished for ever.

Thus, one hope of the clans of the north was baulked, and their prayers made purposeless.

Sir William Cole, an extensive planter in Macguire's country, was "governor" of Enniskillen castle. On the 21st October, 1641, a convenient coachman, laid bare to him a mighty plot of Lord Macguire's, to seize the castle, with 150 men, and murder him—the "governor"—and "throw him over the wall into the river."

On the next night, Mr. John Woodcock, "being one of the sheriffs of the city of Dublin," having received from Lord Justices Borlase and Parsons certain orders founded on the information of a drunken servant of Sir John Clotworthy, "did, by virtue of his office, walk up and down the city." This locomotive virtue further incited him to go to the house "of one Neville, a chirurgeon, in Castle-street," and enquire for Lord Macguire. The latter was within, with some "ten or twelve others;" nevertheless, Mr. Sheriff Woodcock did not proceed to arrest. A watch, which he had set upon the house, shortly after informed him that Macguire and his party had left for the residence of "one Kerne, a taylor."* There he immediately proceeded—searched for arms and found them, of course—searched "narrowly" for Lord Macguire, and found him, too, "in a cock-loft, with a cloak wrapped about him, standing by a bed, the door lockt upon him, there being no key to be found." As pretty a trap as ever Mr. Sheriff Woodcock devised!

This day is known in history as "Lord Macguire's day." The English honoured him with this memorial, because they said he had then planned the surprise of Dublin Castle.

The vengeance of the ejected race burst out all over Ulster. In Fermanagh, "one Captain Rori Maguire," says John Carmick, a servitor of Sir William Cole's, erstwhile in the Castle of Enniskillen, "took upon him the managing of all businesses." Rory "fortifies, first, the Castle Hasen, the house wherein he dwelt himself; he took in the castle of one Edward Aldrith, Esq.; he put out all the English there; he went to the town, burnt that, but killed none of the men (humane Rory! not even a Cole), went thence to another place and hanged one Eleazar M., one that was clerk of the peace of the county, and from thence he went to Newtown, four miles off from it, took in the town, and stript and disarmed all the Protestants that were in the church; murdered Arthur Champion, Esq., and many more. Twenty-two castles were seized upon, and the church of Monah, with eighteen Protestants burned in it—764 Protestants were destroyed in that county."*

Such a dread retribution the Lough sides never witnessed. Deeply did the planters there rue the day they plotted for the destruction of the chief.

He had seen his home for the last time. We too must leave it and follow him, a man apparently by chance, a man without innate nobility, as you would say—charged with machinating for the rights of property, and the mere toleration of that old religion, which the English parliamentarians had vowed to extirpate from the Irish soil—through a long imprisonment to a martyr's victory in the conqueror's land.

While the lovely scenes he should have ruled over were desolated by the conqueror's blight—while the old Milesian stock, the Macguires, "sons of the waters," the MacManuses of the Lough sides, the O'Flanagans and MacGillafinnans, were, now, rising with the wild vengeance of forbearing races stung to hatred; and, again, failing in all the miseries inflicted by a dominant alien, Connor lay in his dungeon. Sir Phelim raised his red arm of vengeance; the Cavan was up and at Belturbet, and Tully-mangan justified the historic pride of the clan of Maelmora; plundered O'Donnells rose in Donegal; and from Dartrey mountain swept down over Lough Melvin the torrent of the O'Rorkes; and still the Baron of Enniskillen knew it not.

"For, as Sir John Temple declared to the court, the Lord Macguire was then brought to the council board, and they could get nothing out of him." Afterward he was again (26th March, 1642) taken before Charles, lord Lambert, and Sir Robert Meredith, knight, "Chancellor of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer," in Ireland; and what purports to be his examination taken—"whereupon he was sent back to prison for that time."

And Rory O'More, thanks to our Lady, escaped from the capital of the pale, to die, thereafter, in Kilkenny of a broken heart. And Owen came from Flanders, and with the might of Hugh, broke the ranks of the Sagums at Benburb, to die, thereafter, too, of

* Either in Cooke-street or Lower Exchange-street. Tradition points out the house in the latter. The written evidences lean to the former.

* Deposition of John Carmick.—Trial of Lord Macguire. Half the number would have been, perhaps, the utmost of possibility; unless, indeed, we account for the extraordinary loss of life among the English in Ulster in '41, by the very natural theory that each of them had "as many lives as a cat."

a sassenach woman's treachery, in old Cloughouter; and Macguire, when the foreigners could charge nothing against him, save the material suspicion of being Irish, was transported with a MacMahon from Monaghan to the safe keeping of a gaol, thence to the Tower of London.

Of Macguire's imprisonment then we have the following graphic memorial, lately published in the Dublin Review :

"REVEREND FATHER—I have a sad story to tell you about Cornelius Macguire, Lord Inniskillen, who was at large hitherto, but who is now in Newgate, the filthiest prison in London—the prison of thieves and felons—himself, and Mac Mahon, and a Scotch captain, also a Catholic, who was brought with them from Ireland.

"They are all there in one small room, without food, or drink, or bedding, having only one small bed between them, and no place to relieve the necessities of nature (horresco referens) but the room in which they sleep. And the wicked tyrants are not content with this, but they say they will be brought to trial next week, at the assizes; and we fear very much they will be sentenced to death. I beg of you, for God's sake, to pray without ceasing for them. Enough for the present, but God be with you.

"Your own poor man,

"James" [surname in cipher.]

"London, May 23, 1643."

"Our own poor man, James," might have stayed his prayers for months. On the 18th August, 1644, the captives managed to saw their way through an oaken door, and grope to a loophole or window in the White Tower, whence they let themselves down by a rope. Then wading through the moat, they escaped to some friends in Drury lane.

It is dramatically related, that on the night of the 20th of the following October, an oyster-woman, with small imaginations of romance, was marching down Drury-lane. From an open window an Irish voice hailed her, and, in two hours afterwards, Mr. Conyers, lieutenant of the tower, had the fugitives in his safe keeping.

On the 18th of November, the Queen's Bench in Westminster was astir; crowded with loyal planters of the Macguire and MacMahon's countries; and swollen with that spirit of legal justice which is ex-officio English. MacMahon was brought to trial and at once condemned.

Not so the Fermanagh chief. A perfect master of the fence of English law, adroit in the dodgings of English justice, he resolved not to die without an effort to shame and balk his thirsting enemies. He pleaded his peerage, and the right of trial by his Irish peers. His trial was, in consequence, postponed.

At the beginning of the following term, Mr. Justice Bacon delivered his judgment "that a Baron of Ireland was triable by a jury in England." Whereupon the parliamentarians, lords, and commons, passed resolutions of indemnity to Mr. Justice Bacon, making his judgment "law."

And again, "on Monday, February 10th, Connor was brought from the tower of London, by the guard belonging thereto, unto the King's Bench bar." He demanded time to bring his witnesses from Ireland. "What can your witnesses say for you?" answered the Judge. "Can they say thus much, that you did not conspire, as this indictment charges you?" "I humbly desire," said Connor again, "to have a formal trial."

"In what respect do you mean?" asked the angel in English ermine. "I think it is so now. Now you are come to be arraigned, and the evidence is to come in against you, I conceive it is a formal one." Surely no more formality was needed.

A jury having been called, Macguire challenged the whole, peremptorily, "for causes best known to himself." Still a "speedy trial" should be effected; and accordingly, on Tuesday, February 11th, by virtue of a rule granted to Mr. Tower-lieutenant Conyers, Macguire was arraigned again for the last time. Every quiddity of "law," every merest common-law technicality of English "justice" he used. He moved, appealed, in vain. Another jury having been called, the following dialogue took place:

"MACG.—Under favour, I conceive, that my lands being sequestered, those men that have bought my lands, should not pass upon my trial; and, therefore, I desire they may make answer to it upon oath, whether any of them have adventured or no.

"SER. WHITFIELD.—To desire, that a whole jury may be demanded such a question upon their oath, is that that hath not been known. If my Lord Macguire have cause now against any, he hath run out the liberty which the law gave him, to challenge thirty-five peremptorily. Now, if he should challenge any more, he must make a particular challenge to every particular man that comes to be sworn, and he must have such a challenge, notwithstanding as is warrantable by law; but this general challenge is not warrantable by law, and if it were particular, it were not warrantable neither.

"SER. ROLL.—If you will challenge any more, the law does not debar you to show cause.

"MACG.—I conceive, that any that have given money for Ireland for my destruction, ought not to pass against me.

"SER. WHIT.—This is for the king, this is for no particular person whatsoever.

"MACG.—I beseech you hear me in it.

"JUDGE.—You know this, that the king cannot grant it without the consent of both houses, and in this case it may be put to the jury to try upon their oath. Thus far I shall agree, that if any of this jury be to have any particular benefit in Ireland, of land or goods, by his attainer, it is good; but if his lands come to the king, and that the king is no way bound to give it to any of them, it is no challenge. Look the statute.

"M. PRYNE.—Under favour, Mr. Justice Bacon, it doth not appear to the court that the prisoner hath any lands or goods in Ireland; and, therefore, no such question is to be demanded of the jury.

"JUDGE.—You may make needless disputes upon it.

"Then the jury being accordingly required to answer upon oath, whether they had adventured, or had any share in Ireland for the rebels land; Macguire desired the question might be, whether they themselves, their children, or brothers? But that would not be agreed unto, as being unreasonable."

Then another jury was sworn; and, beaten back to the wall at last, he stood upon his trial.

Among the witnesses against him were Sir William Cole, governor of Enniskillen, till Rory "took on him the managing of all businesses;" and another, Sir Arthur Loftus. Among the present possessors of "the land of the waters," are men with these very same names.

Against Macguire and his brethren in Ireland, it was principally alleged that they were "Papists." "The Lord Finghall is a Papist," said Lord Blaney, "and Clamorris a pestiferous Papist." "All Papists!" quoth Serjeant Whitfield, in that awe and horror which became a zealous defender of the Lord's word, and pure creature of English parliamentary justification.

From the report of the trial we extract the following scene:

"JUDGE.—You confess in your examination, when the day was for the rising, that you were in the conspiracy, and appointed for the taking of Dublin Castle; and that you were taken when you came about it: also, you rode about it, and provided arms.

"MACG.—I was in the house in the cock-loft where I was taken; I did not know where any army was.

"SER. WHITFIELD.—My Lord Macguire does forget himself, what he acknowledges under his own hand.

"Then the examination being shewed him, he said, there is my name, but not my hand.

"JUDGE.—I am sorry to hear it; I did rather expect, that you should have acknowledged it. Here are two able witnesses that can testify it against you; your denying your own hand, which is so manifestly proved, will be a great discredit to what you say. You acknowledged it at two several times.

"MACG.—What did I acknowledge?"

"JUDGE.—You say that you came to Dublin to settle your estate. By your own examination you acknowledge, that the Castle of Dublin was to be surprised by yourself.

"JUDGE.—It is now time we should draw to the jury. You hear my Lord Bramstone and my brother Finch here justify it to you.

"Then my Lord Macguire's examination was shewed to my Lord Blaney, being present in court, demanding whether he thought it to be Macguire's hand or no?"

"LORD BLANEY.—It is my lord's own hand, he hath written to me many letters.

"MACG.—I don't think I have written many letters to your Lordship.

"JUDGE.—Gentlemen of the jury, you may go to the business."

Mr. Justice Bacon charged; and the jury returned a verdict of "guilty."

Then occurred this other scene. Macguire's tact reminds us of the windings of a hare.

"CLARK.—Connor Macguire, alias Cornelius Macguire, thou hast been indicted for several high treasons, and thou hast been arraigned. Upon the arraignment thou hast pleaded not guilty; and for thy trial hast put thyself upon thy country, which country have found thee guilty, according to the indictment; therefore prepare thyself to receive the sentence.

"MACG.—I desire to know by what law?"

"JUDGE.—The law is well enough known. That is a treason within the statute without doubt.

"MACG.—I was not tried by my peers.

"JUDGE.—This is a general exception, formerly annexed in your plea. If you can shew some particular cause also, you shall be heard.

"MACG.—I desire counsel to advise me.

"JUDGE.—When you did put in a plea therein, you had counsel to advise you in your plea, and to argue it. Now your time is past for counsel; you must have none assigned to pick holes in the indictment.

"MACG.—I desire the court would consider of it, before they proceed to sentence.

"JUDGE.—You offer nothing to the court that is of any difficulty. You had counsel, whether you should be tried by your peers or the jury here, which jury are to try any man under a nobleman in this kingdom.

"MACG.—I desire to know under what seal you thus proceed against me; for I think you sit here by the new seal.

"JUDGE.—What seal do you mean? I sit here by virtue of the old, by order of parliament.

"MACG.—Under favour, I conceive, that the ordinance of parliament for the new seal, makes all done by the old seal to be void.

"JUDGE.—Here is nothing done but by good authority, and the parliament's approbation.

"MACG.—I conceive the ordinance for the new seal cuts off all proceedings of the old.

"JUDGE.—My authority is not cut off. I was made by the old seal, before there was any new seal, and so I am continued by the parliament; and the parliament did take notice that I have been allowed to sit. Besides this, there is nothing done in this court by the new seal. The sheriffs are here by a charter, and that comes in from year to year; and there is no seal in order of execution."

The Judge delivered judgment.

Then came the grand characteristic of Macguire. We have seen him flying secretly from the dungeon like a mere being, afraid to die—we have seen him caught again like a fool, unable to escape; we have seen him dodging through English law like an English lawyer.

Look now on the Irish Catholic:

"After judgment pronounced, the king's council demanded of him, whether he would have any ministers come to him, to prepare him for his end, and to advise him for the good of his soul.

"MACG.—I desire none of them; but I desire I may be sent prisoner to Newgate.

"COUNSEL.—His reason is, because there are some Popish priests there.

"JUDGE.—That cannot be. Your judgment is to return to the Tower, where you may have ministers (if you please) to return to advise you for your soul.

"MACG.—I desire you, that some gentlemen of my own religion may have access to me, to confer with me; and some who are my fellow-prisoners in the Tower, to speak with me in my keeper's presence.

"JUDGE.—You must name somebody in particular.

"MACG.—I desire to confer with Mr. Walter Montague. [Belike he knew him to be a Popish Priest or Jesuit.]

"JUDGE.—You must prepare yourself to die against Saturday next.

"MACG.—I desire a fortnight's time to prepare myself.

"JUDGE.—That is too long a space, and I cannot grant it; but you shall have convenient time.

"MACG.—I desire you, that I may have three days notice at least, to prepare myself.

"JUDGE.—You shall have three days warning; but, however, delay no time to prepare yourself."

And again arose in him the pride and dignity of a chief, and he liked not to die as felons die.

"MACG.—I desire my execution may be altered, and not according to the judgment: and that I may not be hanged and quartered.

"JUDGE.—This lies not in my power to grant. But here are some members of the House of Commons in court, and you were best address yourself to them, that they may acquaint the house with your desires.

"MACG.—I shall desire the gentlemen of the House of Commons, so many as are here, to move the house in my behalf, that I may have a fortnights time to prepare myself, and that the manner of my execution may be changed.

"SIR JOHN CLOTWORTHY.—My Lord, I have been your school-fellow heretofore, and have found some ingenuity in you; and I have seen some letters of yours, importing some remorse of conscience in you for this fact; and I should be glad to discern the like ingenuity in you still. And shall move the house, that you may have some ministers appointed to come to you; and likewise acquaint them with your other desires.

"Then the prisoner departing from the bar, Mr. Prynne advising him to confer with some godly ministers for the good and comfort of his soul; he answered, that he would have none at all, unless he might have some Romish priest of his own religion.

"To which Mr. Prynne replied, my Lord, these Romish priests are the chief instruments who have advised you to plot and perpetrate those execrable treasons for which you are now condemned, and have brought upon you that shameful judgment of a traitor, the execution whereof you even now so earnestly deprecated. Since then they have proved such evil destructive counsellors, to you in your life, you have great reason to disclaim them with their bloody religion, and to seek out better advisers for you at your death, lest you eternally lose your soul, as well as your life, for the blood of those many thousand innocents which have been shed by your means. To which he, pausing a little, answered: that he was resolved in his way. Whereupon another lawyer said: my Lord, you were best to hear both sides. To which he answered, in an obstinate manner, I am settled on one side already, and therefore I desire not to confer with any other. And so departed through the hall towards the Tower, the people crowding and running about to behold his person."

He petitioned—God forgive him!—these English lords and commons that he might be executed as became an Irish gentleman. "But this petition was rejected by the parliament, and on Thursday, February the 20th, he was drawn on a sledge from the Tower through London, and so to Tyburn, where being removed into a cart, he kneeled and prayed a while."

But Mr. Sheriff Gibbs was too much of an Englishman to leave this Irish chief even to the possession of his own thoughts.

We extract this scene too, fully satisfied that our pen is not half so graphic:

"SHERIFF GIBBS.—Do you believe you did well in those wicked actions?"

"MACG.—I have but a short time, do not trouble me.

"SHER.—Sir, it is but just I should trouble you, that you may not be troubled for ever.

"MACG.—I beseech you, Sir, trouble me not, I have but little time to spend.

"SHER.—Sir, I shall give you as much time after, as you shall spend to give satisfaction to the people; I do require you, as an instrument set in God's stead here, to make an acknowledgment to the people, whether you are sorry for what you have done or no, whether it be good or no.

"MACG.—I beseech you do not trouble me; I am not disposed to give you an account. Pray give me leave to pray.

"DOCTOR SIBBALD.—Give glory to God, that your soul may not be presented to God with the blood of so many thousand people.

"SHER.—You are either to go to heaven or hell; if you make not an ingenuous confession, your case is desperate. Had you any commission or no?

"MACG.—I tell you that there was no commission that ever I saw.

"SHER.—Who were actors or plotters with you, or gave you any commission?

"MACG.—For God's sake give me leave to depart in peace."

In peace! Die, amid thy enemies, for thy country and thy God, in peace! Oh! Connor, son of Bryan, why ask things impossible?

He returned no answer to their insults; but "continued mumbling over a paper which he had in his hand, as he had done from his first coming."

This paper contained notes of reflections, and short ejaculatory prayers, meet for a Catholic in death. A priest, "his friend William," was in the crowd, who, when Macguire would give a sign agreed upon, had promised to administer absolution. With these notes of prayer, was the following touching letter:

"My master, his coach shall wait on you infallibly. That day your friend William shall go by coach all the way, upon a red horse, with a white hat, and in a grey jacket, and then you cannot choose (by the grace of God) but to know the coach, of two whitish horses, and then you may do, or shew that token only, as to lift up to your face your hand, nodding (or inclining down) your head, and there shall go two or three (divers) coaches for the same purpose, and be sure to have plenary physick as you desire. I send you this holy stone, by virtue whereof you may gain a plenary physick, in saying any certain prayer. I beseech you, dear Sir, be of good courage, for you shall not want anything for that happy journey, and offer you yourself wholly for him, who did the same for you. Pray earnestly for your country, and for your own sons, that God may prosper them. I do humbly entreat you to pray for me, your own poor afflicted servant,

"Your poor GRAY.

"You shall do well to send your letters to-morrow to that young man that comes to me, and the wooden cross that I have sent there of late; I beseech you send me word, whether the reliquary that came along with those two crosses was yours or your companion's, Mac-Mohun Hugh.

"These words following were in an Irish character:

"Mo mhile beannacht chugad a mhic mhanma.

"In English:

"My thousand blessings unto you, son of my soul."

As his lips moved in prayer, "the Sheriff commanded his pockets to be searched." They robbed him of his beads and crucifix—all they found. Then Mr. Sheriff Gibbs having done his worst, Doctor Sibbald kept up the torrent of insult:

"Come, my Lord," he said, pointing to the symbols of Catholicity, "leave those and acknowledge your offence to God and the world. * * *

It is not your Ave Marias, nor those things will do you any good; but it is Agnus Dei, qui tollit peccata Mundi."

Not at all "regarding this discourse," Lord Macguire turned round to the people and calmly spoke as follows:

"Since I am here to die, I desire to depart with a quiet mind, and with the marks of a good Christian, that is, asking forgiveness first of God, and next of the world. And I do forgive (from the bottom of my heart) all my enemies and offenders, even those that have an hand in my death. I die a Roman Catholic, and although I have been a great sinner, yet am I now by God's grace, heartily sorry for all my sins, and I do most confidently trust to be saved (not by my own works), but only by the passion, merits, and mercy of my dear Saviour Jesus Christ, into whose hand I commend my soul."

Again he asked for "a little time to say his prayers"—and again, and again was insult flung upon him. At last Mr. Sheriff Gibbs bade him prepare for death.

"I do beseech," were the last words of this stern son of a glorious race, "I do beseech all the Catholics that are here to pray for me, I beseech God to have mercy upon my soul."

And in another few minutes Tyburn-hill witnessed the embowelling and quartering of a half-hanged man—and the realms of another world held the soul of an Irish martyr.

Thus died the chief of Fermanagh, one victim of 1641.

THE DEATH AND BURIAL OF Red Hugh O'Donnell.

(A.D. 1602.)

I.

The dark day of Kinsale was over,
And Ireland lay again in thrall;
No hope seemed left her to recover
From this her fatal, final fall.
Her goal was lost, her strength departed;
The Saxon hosts had scattered far
Those bright prestiges her High-hearted
Had shed around her arms in war.
Her glory bode a burnt-out star,
A voice of wailing and lamenting,
A cry of late and vain repenting
Rose from the centre to the sea,
Throughout the once-glad, songful isle;
And ruffian Force and treacherous Wile
Rode rampant o'er the Brave and Free.
A Night without a Morrow,
An ever-wounding Sorrow,
A death-trance that might borrow
No ray from Hope to gild its gloom,
A wild, vague thirst unsated,
For vengeance on the Hated—
A bondage fixed and fated,
Such seemed the trampled Nation's doom!

II.

And He, the Chieftain of the North,
The Red O'Donnell,
Who led her banded legions forth,
In green Tirconnell,
O'er fortified height and battle-plain,
So many a day to Death or Danger,
He, tended by the hireling stranger,
He droops—he sinks—he dies in pain—
He breathes his last in far-off Spain,
Alone, alas! in far-off Spain!
Mourn ye the Brave!
Mourn him with tears,
He goes down to his grave
In his youth, in his bloom!
On Iberia's dusk shores,
In the flower of his years
Is his life's lamp outquenched;
It bides dark evermore
In the gloom of the tomb!
He who never once blenched
Before falchions or foemen
Lies low, like a tree
Laid in ashes by lightning.
Alas! for the omen,
Sad Erin, to thee,
When thy fate appeared brightening!
Mourn we the Brave!
Mourn him with tears!
For he goes to his grave
In the flower of his years!

III.

Behold yon pile, that rises lone
Within Zimanca's* cloistered walls,
On whose dark arabesques of stone
Scarce even the noon-day sunbeam falls—
An ancient fabric! reared, I ween,
What time the Moors were here the masters,
As tellth well the sombre sheen
Of its carved arches and pilasters.
We enter, passing court by court,
And long-deserted hall and fort,
And blank alcoves and corridors,
And rooms whose tessellated floors,

* Zimancas is a small, but by no means insignificant, town, in the province of Old Castile. The historical associations connected with it (among which Irishmen, we hope, may be allowed to class those belonging to our melancholy story) are peculiarly interesting. In point of antiquity it stands, if not alone, at least on a parallel with the most ancient cities of Spain, and on this account was chosen by the Spanish monarchs of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as the National Depot for the chronicles of the kingdom. It was besieged and taken by storm by the Moors in the year 967, after a gallant resistance on the part of its inefficient garrison, but regained its independence (in common with most of the cities and provinces of Spain) long before the final victories of King Ferdinand, in the fifteenth century. Of late but little has been heard of it; but it has nevertheless (as we have reason to know) taken an active and decided part in the unfortunately over-numerous revolutions, for which the Spanish Peninsula has been disastrously distinguished in modern times.

And faded sandal-roofs appear
 To shadow forth, in many a token,
 The gloom and splendour blended here
 Before the Arab arm was broken.
 Now, up yonder winding stairs,
 Which Time day by day impairs,
 We wearily clamber,
 And lo ! a long chamber,
 Dim-lighted and cold,
 Like a King's mausoléum of old.
 Therein sleeps the boldest of Erin's best Bold !
 There sleepeth, laid low
 Not by musquet or spear in
 The field, but by Sickness and Wo,
 The last Prince that may battle for Erin !
 The winds, as in pity, sweep sighing
 Around the pale-canopied bed
 Where the corpse of the Hero is lying ;
 One brief hour ago
 They waited o'er the Dying,
 They now pour their dirge for the Dead !
 Two tall figures kneel beside him,
 These received his parting breath ;
 These alone stood by to guide him
 Through the Gates of Death.
 Their sacred robes, their prayerful mien,
 At once reveal those holy priests
 At home, abroad, far oftener seen
 At poor men's graves than rich men's feasts.
 O ! blest and honoured be the names
 Of O'Mulconry and Dunleavy ;
 Who, though themselves of worn-out frames,
 Yet, when the thought of Erin's woes,
 And future fate lay dark and heavy
 On their Prince's bleeding bosom,
 Nobly cheered him to the close
 Of this his bitterest hour of hours !
 May their memories ever blossom,
 Fresh and bright in Time's meridian bowers !

IV.

The moon is dawning, the West is darkening ;
 A sighing sound haunts the bodeful air ;
 The forest-pines appear hushed and hearkening,
 Like living forms, for the Vesper prayer.
 Their leaves are sparkling, but not in gladness—
 Who readeth well what their sheen bespeaks
 Will deem those pearly-pale dew-drops of sadness
 Most like the tear-drops on weepers' cheeks.
 The knelling fall of the Douro's waters
 Floats down the dells like the saddest song,
 As though the flood's fabled Fairy Daughters
 Bewailed some victim or deed of Wrong.
 And, as the gold of the sunset slowly
 Decays and darkens, till all hath fled,
 Those tones appear to unite in holy
 And choral swell for the Lost or Dead.
 Is this illusion ?—a poet's dreaming ?
 An airy legend from Peristán ?
 Or are the Thoughtful more wise in deeming
 That Nature sometimes may mourn with Man ?

V.

"What, ho ! my lords and lieges all !
 I call a Golden Revel !"
 The King commands ; the trumpets peal ;
 And all ranks known in Old Castile
 Meet in the royal palace-hall—
 Meet on one joyous level !
 And Pleasure takes the reins from Power,
 And Mirth unbounded rules the hour !
 The festival—the song—the dance—
 The brilliant lights and gay attire
 Recalled those days of Old Romance,
 And gallant knightly Chivalrie,
 Even then but known through lay or lyre ;
 A goodly sight it was to see !
 Here, some illustrious Caballero
 Bent low before an aguadara,†
 And there, a noteless calesero‡
 Led out the blood of Alcantara.
 While many Hidaigos, who, for years,
 Had proudly stood aloof and single,
 Almost from even their very peers,
 Cast off their state, and stooped to mingle
 With all who thronged around—unmasked ?
 And, what though every face was masqued ?
 Condemn not this ! for men have made
 Of Life a darker Masquerade,
 Where nought is genuine more—save Guile.
 His wrinkles mock the Conqueror's wreath ;
 And, where the false lips fain would smile
 The veiled heart often bleeds beneath.
 Enough !—but if thou wilt win pleasure
 From pondering how the things that seem
 The stablest—Beauty, Pomp, and Treasure,
 May vanish like a morning dream,
 Or turn to dolorous memories after ;
 If thou wilt fondly mark how soon
 Sighs may resound where late rang Laughter,
 Glance round thee through this wide saloon—
 The lights are quenched, the guests are gone,
 A few stray menials glide alone,
 Like spectres, o'er the matted floor.
 It is the gloomiest hall in Spain,
 For always ten-fold Wo must reign
 Where Gaiety was King before !

VI.

And wherefore such a change ? Oh, Spain ! unto thee
 Be the tribute of those tears, that fill mine eyes unbid !
 Thy Sovereign sought to make my country great and free !
 The gay lamps are darkened, and the wine-cups are hid,
 Because the cold corpse of the young Irish Chief,
 The Red Hugh O'Donnell is in Valladolid !

Yes ! He whose career was so bright, but so brief,
 He lieth on his bier in the palace-chapel aisle ;
 And Spain shares the glory and the gloom of Erin's grief !

Yet a few fleeting hours, and a train shall defile
 From hence through the city to the Place of the Dead
 Such as never until now left this venerable pile !

Oh, Philip, king of Spain, be blessings on thy head !
 Thou honorest O'Donnell for his nobleness and worth ;
 Thou lovest, too, the land for whose weal he fought and bled !

But this thou guessest not—that the House that gave him birth
 Is matchless even in Spain for its ancientness of line—
 Perchance is truly royaller than any on the earth !

Yet, thou givest him a tomb—thou yieldest him a shrine
 Among the highest lords—the magnates of thy land !
 The greater meed of praise, O King, is therefore thine !

VII.

Hark ! the Cathedral bell !

One deep knoll,

And no more !

How it thrills through the core

Of the heart and the soul,

That knell !

Hark ! yet another and deeper knoll !

A long hour hath passed

Since the last.

Now torch-lights are fitting to and fro

Around the high palace-wall,

And a Hearse, with coffin and pall,

Standerh anear in plumed woe.

Another hour—and a final knoll !

For the night weareth late.

The signal is given and obeyed,

And slowly the Funeral Cavalcade

Moves from the chapel-gate

On the way to its last dark goal !

VIII.

The Bannermen lead the van,
 Their black flags flapping high in the wind—
 Singly they move, man after man ;

After them pass

The Guards and Senors of the Bascaller class,

Two and two, in a long, long train behind ;

The Torch-bearers march afoot by their side ;

The chief Caballeros ride

On crape-covered steeds in front of the Hearse,

With its coffin and pall.

The Serge-bearers march afoot by their side.

In silence march all—

No sound ariseth to pierce

The ear of Night save the moanful toll

Of the far Esgueva ;

And so they wind through the Puerta del S61.*

The Bannermen lead the van,

Their black flags flapping again and again ;

Singly they ride, man after man.

Behind them appears

The line of the Guardsmen and Bass-cavaliers,

Two and two, in a long, long sable train—

The Torch-bearers march on foot by their side.

The King and his Nobles ride

In the rear of the Hearse :—and hark ! anon

A slow musical strain,

Funereal and sad, resounds from the wide

Ravines † to the plain,

And the notes fall, one after one,

Off the muffled drum, and blend with the swell

Of the rolling Esgueva,

Till the Cavalcade winds through the Puert' d' Isabel.‡

The Bannermen ride in the van ;

Then follow the Guards, Knights, Nobles, and King

Slowly move all, as when they began.

The mists of the night

Dull the red glare of the torches' light ;

And the Hearse, with its plumes of black heron-wing,

And its formless look in the dusk, damp air,

Seemeth like an Embodied Despair !

While the horn and the bass-bugle mingle their tones

In funereal strains,

That sound like the wallings of Dolorous Prayer

From a soul in her pains,

And seem sadder at whiles from the groans

Of the muffled drum, and the mournful flow

Of the rolling Esgueva,

As the Cavalcade winds through the Portal of Woe.§

IX.

But lo ! the Gate, with its Gothic arch,
 The Convent, with its mitred wall !
 The lurid rays of the torches fall
 Aslant on Saint Francis' Convent-wall.
 Enough ! here halts the processional March.

X.

With measured and solemn tread
The buriers all, the King the while Advancing at their head,
Move to the end of the lamp-lighted aisle,
And there lay down their Dead,
The Mass is chanted for the Dead,
Before the altar of the Lord !
The Brethren of Saint Francis raise Aloft,
With one accord,
The voice of prayer, the hymn of praise,
To Him, the All-wise God and Lord,
The only Ever-blest,
Who oft
Works out by chastening and mysterious ways
Salvation for the souls He loveth best !
And, as the midnight bell tolls forth its warning
That Night is nearing Morning,
The corpse is lowered into its bed of rest.

XI.

It is done ! All is over !
The too fond-hearted lover
Of his Mother-land is lying in his crypt of marble stone.
May a blessed resurrection
Be the meed of that affection
That burned in his bosom for Her, and Her alone !
Many, since, have shared his doom,
Of our Noble-souled and True—
For, wo is me, the brightest of the laurels Erin gathers
Still bestow their barren bloom
But on those, who, like to Heen,
Lay their bones far away from the valleys of their fathers !

[The following sketch of the character of the celebrated Chieftain whose death and funeral obsequies form the theme of the preceding poem, is paraphrased from the Annals of the Four Masters,* as translated by my friend Mr. Owen Connellan.]

Honour to Hugh of Tyrconnell ! Honour to him whose valour,
Through a long decade of years, baffled Elizabeth's power,
Him to whose manly cheek no danger ever sent pallor,
Him who in troublous times was Ireland's Buckler and Tower !
Truly a Chief was He !—a wise and masterly Leader,
Skillful in Peace as in War—foremost in council and field,
Yet, ever finding the Sword by far the most eloquent pleader
For the lost rights of his land, which the Enemy hated to yield.
Strong in his frame as the lion that roams the African forest,
Dauntless in spirit no less, in mind as in body robust ;
Well was he able to strike where the wounds to England were sorest,
And to bring down the proud plumes of Essex's Earl to the dust.
Kingly of aspect and air, with a voice like a resonant clarion,
Withersoever he went, he compelled submission and awe,
Cheering the Faithful and Brave, but casting to ravens for carrion
All, as well Irish as English, who dared to defy his law.
Though as a lamb or a dove, in gentlest bearing and meekness,
Towards the Poets and Priests, and those who obeyed his commands,
His was a soul that never gave way to womanly weakness,
As the base traitors found who at times fell into his hands.
Great was the good he achieved !—making to fly like pebbles
Under his conquering sword the heads of the foes of his isle,
Gibbeting up rapparees, and banishing obstinate rebels,†
Raising the Worthy to honours and bringing to shame the Vile.
Deep is his image enshrined in the hearts of Erin's Afflicted,
Though it is nothing so strange that these should remember him still,
Since it is known unto all that He was the Ruler predicted
Ages and ages before, in the verses of Saint Columkille.‡

‡ The passage alluded to here is the following quatrain, which is found in one of the poems of the Saint :

"There shall arise a Man of might and fame,
Whose death shall be a cause of woe and tears,
He shall be called The Pious Chief by name,
And reign as Prince for ten successive years."

Apropos of Duelling.

CANT words, whether they take the shape of old saws or of modern instances, are the bane of wisdom. Some people will never do right, because our grandfathers coined false proverbs ; and other some, because themselves know better, feel no concern for posterity. Civilization with these latter is an accomplished fact ; a moral sun that will shine unimpaired for ages, without needing, like the sun of nature or of fiction, to rest or set. The schoolmaster, they pretend, will remain abroad for ever, like the cedars. Intellect, once set a-going, shall never grow weary nor get off the rail. Winter floods shall not disturb, summer heats shall not disperse the pellucid and perennial rills of science ; and the ocean of truth shall flow and overflow for ever, without being subject to ebb like its watery type. Absurd things have been said and repeated, acted and reacted, throughout all the ages of the past ; but the brother of the Earl of Cork was as yet unborn. Our more gifted age is quickened with organic change. Space has succumbed to our engines. Our telegraphs cope with time. All the Past is in our grasp, and Futurity is barely ahead of us. We shall prosecute, therefore, under a more propitious horoscope, and with a more favourable projection, the great work of renovating the face of the earth. Our infinite resources considered, it is surely an easy task : yet, this task perfected, we enter on the millennium.

What a hydra-headed monster is this human vanity ! What a combination of infinite insolence, everlasting blindness, and perpetual youth ! It is as fresh to-day, and as ready to play the fool, as when the children of Adam opened their brick kilns in Sennaar. A millennium of some sort has been ever its dear delusion ; but a millennium of any sort is actually, alas, impossible. This nut was too unpromising to engage the attentions of the multitude. Of even the few who pierced it, some, disrelishing its fruit, have incontinently spat it from them. Yet, although of bitter flavour, in the first instance, this fruit is assuredly wholesome, and in the after-taste not unpleasant. Reader, shall we essay to unlock it, and to relish its recondite virtues ?

Wisdom is an attribute of man. How it originates in man, God only—who made him—knows. We can understand, after a manner, how it grows with his youth ; but when man dies, his wisdom disappears from earth, and its end, like its origin, is known only to its author. All that is wont to be said about a man's wisdom being bequeathed to posterity in his works, is mere cant ; and feeds, in no stinted measure, the insolence and folly of mankind. Good books, which are the most precious legacy the wisest can bequeath—good books, which are the greatest works of the greatest men—even good books are not wisdom ; they are only books. They may condense, perhaps, into a more pithy compass, or, according to occasion, amplify into more visible proportions, or they may distil into a rarer spirit, or they may fix on more enduring rolls the truths and beauties revealed in nature, which are too large or too minute, or too diffused, or too evanescent for the dull perceptions of ordinary men ; but still they are only books, only a dead letter—a skeleton, and a very imperfect skeleton moreover, of the soul of wisdom that inspired them. They may be overlooked, or they may be undervalued, or they may be misunderstood. They may be forgotten—they may be absolutely lost. Though all the revelations of nature were daguerreotyped in every encyclopædia, though all the harmonies of life were set to music and arranged for every instrument, the mass of mankind may remain, therefore, like the Cretans from of old, "liars, evil beasts, slothful bellies," to the bewilderment of those victims of metaphor and cant, who confound books with wisdom, and expect that knowledge will some time or other march up to the millennium.

Nor is the reason of all this very abstruse ; on the contrary, it lies very much on the surface of the world. Mankind is a most variable quantity—flowing and ebbing like the ocean stream ; appearing and disappearing like the changeful moon. Wisdom, therefore, which as we have observed, is an attribute of man, so far from always progressing as a matter of course, must fluctuate for ever as a matter of necessity. There is every day emerging into the region of consciousness a tide of humanity, as darksome as the gulf from which it flows, on which all the lights of civilization shed a most vain and ineffectual splendour. As far as this rising generation is immediately concerned, all the sages and savants of the earth may as well have been savages. Unless they themselves shall appropriate the truths of faith or of science, converting them by that alchymy so simple and yet so mysterious, from dead words into living wisdom, those truths are as though they remained buried in the undiscovered mines of nature. Now, this process of appropriation implies so many conditions of capacity, opportunity, leisure, and will, and each of these conditions representing an aggregate of dispositions still more remote, is such a creature of contingencies and—humanly speaking—of chances, that the odds are incalculable against the success of any given individual in conducting it, though he should have inherited a library—and innumerable against the success of a community. Thus it happens, that although the advent of universal enlightenment has been often solemnly promulgated and widely proclaimed, impostors of any profession, religious, medical, or political, have never lacked crowds of willing dupes to blazon their craft and to swallow their nostrums. So that, after all, the antiquated wisdom of the preacher outvies our swiftest machinery, outfaces our boldest inventions; and, however rapidly we may affect to be advancing, the echoes of his voice oracular shall still keep sounding in advance, with a solemn premonition of the experience that awaits us at the station house—"Nothing under the sun is new; neither is a man able to say: behold this is new; for it hath already gone before in the ages that were before us."

This train of thought involves the rationale of all idiosyncrasies. That any individual should think or act absurdly upon any matter or upon every matter, in despite of history, philosophy, reason, and religion, is as natural as cockerowing. That the absurdity has been demonstrated by some other person may be a fact, but that is all. There is room for two facts in the universe. One of these persons was wise; the other is not—as the tide is sometimes high, sometimes low. Philosophers will scarcely wonder at such a phenomenon, at least in its more obvious aspect—downright fools certainly will not; but there is a species of artificial ignorance, an enlightened affectation, that regards it as a puzzle, almost resents it as an affront, and refuses all comfort until it be somehow accounted for. Human perfectibility they must sustain at all risks—these artificial ignoramuses—it is their hobby; and though all nature and daily experience oppose them, they will back their hobby against daily experience and all nature.

How a false and absurd opinion may acquire and maintain a wider influence in society is thus also apparent. It is only a coincidence of idiosyncrasies—a whole circle of the heavens that is setting with all its stars. A variety of causes and conditions has so affected a number of men, that they remain unenlightened upon the matter in question. Other circles of society may be a-blaze; but this only shows again that there are circles and circles. These remarks, however, bear more especial reference to ethical truths, the realization of which more properly constitutes wisdom. Truths of pure science may be rather ignored than gainsayed; that is, when they really are truths of pure science. For, many opinions, such as that of the roundity of the earth, are vulgarly esteemed scientific truths, which are found to rest, when analysed, upon moral postulates, and which are therefore, according to our theory, fairly and fully debateable.

With these prolusions we introduce duelling to our readers, trusting that they may enjoy the reciprocal illustration which the prolusions and the duelling are designed to confer upon each other. For, heedless of all imputations, we hasten to pronounce duelling as absurd a system as ever tasked the equanimity of a philosopher, or puzzled the theory of an enthusiast. It has not an idea to stand upon. It moves a social monster, like that fabled Frankenstein, without a final cause, an ultimate end or a natural life; and it will keep moving, nevertheless, until it is supplanted by some fresher folly. But if such be the case, we may be asked at the outset, why we allude at all to the subject; or, indeed, how we should attempt to establish any truth, or to refute any error whatsoever, seeing that our ideas of the world's destiny tend towards a species of fatalism? A question more serious than opportune; but which, now that it has been started, must have an intercalary paragraph.

It is true we do not hope to alter, or to see altered, the condition of humanity. All such hopes we esteem vain and visionary. This world is a place of trial, and so will continue even to the end. Good and evil will battle upon it while time shall endure. There will be no universal enlightenment, no reign of reason, no improvement upon Christianity, no millennium. But individual men, few, perhaps, comparatively speaking, yet worthy of all consideration for their own individual sakes, will still even in this doomed and darkened world attain to wisdom, and through wisdom to happiness. The salt of the earth shall not utterly lose its savour. The traditions of man's original destiny and duty may not irreparably decay. Now, one of the agencies, doubtless, whereby the harvest of the elect will be ripened, nay, the specific agency expressly appointed and ordinarily employed by God for that purpose, consists in the testimony and teaching, the lives and works of those god-like men—patriarchs, prophets, apostles, saints, sages, heroes—who transmit from age to age, and develope as it pleases Providence, the primitive revelations of truth vouchsafed to man at his creation. Under these pillars of the temple, and it may be participating their grandeur as they have caught their fire, the lesser lights of civilization, the dei minorum gentium, influence according to their measure this predestined harvest. Schoolmasters who merit the title, essayists who essay aught, preachers who preach in earnest, all the brotherhood of the pen who honour their craft and respect their cognizance—this is their lawful office—their legitimate purpose in society; this the scope of their mission, and this the limit of their influence. To discharge, according to our incapacity, some minor ministrations of this office, to foster germs of wisdom that may otherwise suffer blight in perchance one reader—ah, if but in ONE! of the Catholic Magazine—with this consistent purpose and humble hope, we return, therefore, to the assault which that untimely question interrupted.

The system of duelling has presented three phases to the admiration and astonishment of the considerate. The monomachy of the ancient world, and the trial by battle, which, after the dismemberment of the Roman empire invaded our Christian codes, seem to constitute, both together, one of these phases, and to have been distinguished, each alike, by a principle of religious faith. Physical force exerted with courage, vigour, and effect, was regarded in this duel as a revelation from the god of battles. Victory sided always with justice; and the trial did not terminate until the fraud of the criminal was expiated by his death. The tournament of the age of chivalry was a second phase of the same system. The principle of faith which had predominated in pristine vigour throughout the encounters of the Christian knighthood with Saracen or Moor, was at length degenerated into a point of honour, which was at once extremely knotty and desperately sharp. Any pretension to rivalry in arms, or indeed in anything else, was put down at the sword-point. If you were not prepared, for instance, to swear that any given lady was the flower of all perfection, that her eyes were lustrous as a star, that her curls were wreathed sunlight, and her cheeks fresher than a morning rosebud, you were liable to be knocked off your horse with all due fatality. The period was critical for prudent men. Common sense had the worst of it for once. Staid and virtuous characters were overriden in all directions. Folly flourished her trumpets, and triumphed by the acclamation of heralds. However, the outward and visible form of the contest was still so imposing, physical force was so fully plumed and in such resplendent feathers, all the accompaniments of the combat shone so gorgeously through an intoxicating atmosphere of enthusiasm, that the fantastic motives of the champions were half redeemed from contempt, or even invested with a semblance of deceptive dignity.

The modern duel is the last phasis of the system, and by a long chalk the most ridiculous. In this, as in the tourney, we recognise a point of honour as fantastic perhaps as the craziest knight could worship, but infinitely more prosaic than an authentic knight would condescend to. It is no longer the sprightly offspring of an imagination unduly exalted, but quite a stupid child of commonplace and matter of fact. The externals, however, have fared worst in the flight of years. The physical force ingredient—the redeeming element, or at least the dazzling error of previous exhibitions—is frittered into sheer burlesque. Its accessorial splendours have faded one by one, into blank inanity. The lists, the banners, the caparisoned chargers, the mail-clad knights devoted to the noble sport, emulous of the danger and of the fame which their companions or rivals in arms are permitted to encounter, all have disappeared. The balcony hung with costliest silks and gold, redolent of roses and radiant with beauty,—the ladye-love for whose honour, belike, the jousts are celebrated, kindling with her lambent glances the spirits of her champion, the inspiration, the witness, the judge, the guerdon of his triumph, ready to receive him unharmed with refreshing smiles, or to pour balm into his wounds with her own sweet fingers—these also have vanished. The very sunshine of heaven is exploded from these modern farces, which are celebrated after the stealthiest fashion according—more or less—to the following programme:

A pair of ex-officio gentlemen creep out to what is called the sod; taking care, sometimes, to dodge the peace-officers in their progress. This sod is, be sure, a desolate waste—a place of skulls—sacred to misdemeanors in general and in particular. The time is also suspicious, being usually the latter part of the night; or if it should have stretched into early morning, there will be a compensating fog upon it, as nasty and disagreeable as the circumstances may warrant.

A few disappointed burglars get up a factitious interest in the proceedings, with a view to drown sorrow; while hardby, under some dripping hedgerow, a friendly sawbones shivers, enlarging his fringes like a Pharisee, or sharpening his stylus like a Scribe. Thus placed, and in these predicaments of time and circumstance, our men of pith erect themselves as best they may, and having coldly received the customary irons, and submitted, like lumps of putty, to the posture prescribed, vent all their valour in a slight twinge of the forefinger, which, if judged by its effects, should be often accounted a purely nervous affection. A short parley ensues, and the parties return to breakfast, if both are so minded; but if one wont have breakfast, then the other goes straightway on shipboard, choosing rather to trust the treacherous ocean than his more captious peers.

The educated adherents of this ludicrous system, for drunken foxhunters unhappily are not the only duellists, advocate it on grounds of justification or necessity which it behoves us now more seriously to consider. Ridicule, we admit, is not argument; besides that many attempts at ridicule may themselves be truly ridiculous. The first, then, and in some respects the most natural defence of the duel proceeds on this theory. The civil law leaves certain offences unpunished or inadequately punished. Of these the duel takes cognizance, and mulcts the offender with liability to a violent death. We shall not object to this theory on the fanatical principle that vengeance belongs only to the Lord; nor even on the principle proclaimed by the abolitionists of capital punishment, and which, they assert, is recognised by all enlightened jurists, that vengeance is not a legitimate object of human law. Believing that crime merits punishment, on its own account, without any reference to other or future criminalities, and that God may employ human agencies to inflict it, we are not altogether satisfied with these modern refinements. Neither shall we rest much on the distinction between private authority and public authority, or their respective warrants to punish offenders. It may be a useful distinction, but it reaches only to caution. Our objections go more to the quick; but before stating them we are tempted to nibble at the preamble. There is no reasonable ground for supposing that the civil law suffers any offenders to escape without adequate punishment; and if there be offences worthy of punishment which public justice cannot reach, this must arise from the fact that they are not proveable, from which fact it follows that they cannot be justly punished according to any system.

First, then, we object to this punishment theory that it confounds all degrees of criminality to the utter violation of natural justice. The man who ravishes your wife, and he who merely squints at you while you are walking apart him, are made equally liable to death by duel law. We object, secondly, that the nature of the punishment varies without any corresponding variety in the offence. Liability to a violent death is a very different punishment according to the different circumstances of the persons who incur it. The father of an unprovided and helpless family, and the scapegrace who was disinherited a week ago, would be very unequally punished for the same offence, according to this trenchant code. We admit that other codes are not blameless in this respect; but be that to the codemongers. We object, in the third place, that the amount of the punishment is equally variable and independent of all natural relations of justice. Liability to a violent death ranges between wide limits. If you chance to be corpulent, and your opponent a keen shot, it is a serious affair. If you are thin, and he palsied or purblind, it is a trifle. A double objection might be grounded, furthermore, on the uncertainty, first, of the punishment actually inflicted under this system, and then of even the liability to incur any punishment whatsoever. But we deem the objection, in both respects, more specious than solid. A certain liability to punishment is essentially a certain punishment; and the uncertainty of even the liability to punishment, may be merely a defect or an abuse of the code, from which it would be, of course, unfair to argue. We rely then on the objections put forward to demolish that defence of duelling, which rests upon the theory of punishment. Each of them singly is irrefragable; but if the three were skilfully combined, the champion should have a leaden headpiece that could withstand their force.

The next defence of the duel proceeds on a different view of the subject. In certain cases the civil law provides no remedy, or no sufficient remedy for persons aggrieved in fame or feeling. The duel interposes in their behalf, and affords them full and ample satisfaction in the premises. This may be designated the reparation theory. We shall on this occasion waste no time with the preamble, but attack the theory at once. It is by far the most preposterous defence that could be devised; and yet, judging by the usages of language, it would seem to be as prevalent as it is preposterous. Satisfaction, and gentlemanly satisfaction, have come in time to be synonymous with nonsense. Satisfaction!—exposition to a bullet in full swing, liability to a boring, how can this satisfy a man for the injury or insult he may have already received? What, though the transgressor is equally exposed, equally liable, the idea of reparation is yet utterly unrealized, or rather it is directly falsified and frustrated by this very equality. Nay, although the death of the offender were to follow, as a matter of course, while the innocent party should be always providentially preserved, the duel could not still be justified on this ground; for an injury done cannot be undone, or in anywise affected by the death of the perpetrator. Besides it may happen that the transgressor shall not be equally exposed to the bullet, nor equally liable to the boring, as in case he should be the hawk and his opponent the bittern; but we assume the average danger of all duels to be equal on either side, and are content with the average absurdity demonstrable on this assumption. It is truly pitiful.

What a singular illustration of our opening thesis! We had imagined that the superstition was obsolete during many centuries, but we heard a gentleman belonging to one of the learned professions, and in his profession not undistinguished, professing very lately an opinion at variance with the reasonable assumption we have just advanced. The offending party, this gentleman believed, must be always worsted in this encounter. The honest man, though he puts his hand in the fire, and with his eyes open moreover, must be kept unscathed by virtue of a clause inserted in the laws of nature for that especial behoof!

A more refined defence, and as such, we will admit, a more tenable position, pretends the prevention of wrong as the true justification of the duellum. This may be called the prevention theory, and it prevails amongst the better educated professors of the system. In support of it they quote history, and refer triumphantly to experience. We shall first observe in general of history and experience that there are no greater scapegoats in creation, saving their presences. Of all the folly that distinguishes mankind, nine parts in ten will be found, perhaps, on a close scrutiny, to flow from that source of error which logicians call “no cause, for a cause,” and which may be sufficiently described to the general reader as an easy acceptance of superficial causes for any effect that may need to be accounted for. True causes are not to be found like blackberries. When the microscope has detected a fungus, or an electrometer gauged the lightning, experience is produced forthwith to evidence the cause of the potato blight. But a cautious reasoner will reflect that it was not yesterday that fungi or electrical currents commenced their mission; that even earthquakes depend on their antecedents, yea, that miracles are only wrought in the fullness of time, and when their occasions have been disposed according to the ordinary laws of Providence. Though it were certain, therefore, that courtesy and charity varied in the direct ratio of duelling, we should be still most sceptical as to their mutual relationship.

But it is not, in this instance, by an illogical circuit that poor history is circumvented: she is belied in her very teeth. Courtesy and charity do in point of fact vary as duelling; not directly, however, but in the inverse ratio. The refinement of civilisation, which is the concrete result of perhaps innumerable influences, in proportion as it cherishes courtesy discredits the duel. Where this refinement is unknown, and in proportion as it is unknown, insults and duels are hand and glove. So much for the general case, which indeed includes particulars. Yet we shall essay to be more particular still.

We grant that a particular wrong may be prevented by an apprehension of those particular inconveniences which the duel involves. But if a wrong-doer, in any particular line, instead of being made a target, were to be made a lord mayor, you would find persons, otherwise prone to offence, abstinent through fear of the consequence. As a general rule, however, the class of persons who will be most disposed to do the wrong which duelling is presumed to prevent, will be the least affected by this restraint. We should rather apprehend on the contrary, that many who might not trouble themselves otherwise, may actually go out of their way and take pains to insult some one, for the sake of the eclat which must accrue to them. So that the notion of duelling being a safeguard to society, is quite a hoity-toity business. If society were not otherwise protected, many of us would have taken long since to the woods.

These are the only defences of duelling that have any real or positive character, even in appearance. There are others of a negative quality that might have been invented, for the most part, as examples of the vicious circle. First, a man insulted is believed by the world to have deserved the insult, unless he resents it by fighting a duel. By no means, master. The world is not all out such a simpleton. It knows, in a general way at least, the rules and the requirements of evidence. Even the hâstiest tempers reflect occasionally upon the necessity of hearing both sides of a story. Wiser people rather interpret an insult to the prejudice of the insulter. And people that are wiser still, will scarcely believe that a man merited the insult, even though himself should commit the question to the wager of battle. People find it rather safer to judge a man by his own conduct than by the misconduct of others; and Berkeley might have added to his list of queries, whether any man or men ever lost credit except through their own acts; and whether any disreputable character was ever solidly respected on the single ground that its owner could shoot a snipe.

Secondly, a man insulted is believed by the world, unless he fights, to be at least a coward. No man ought to lie tamely under such an imputation. Argal. This world is bad enough, God knows, without being bandied thus, like a shuttlecock, from foolery to foolery. An attentive listener will, in about four and twenty hours, hear of not less than five hundred worlds, every one of which labours under some strange hallucination, to the infinite amusement of the other four hundred and ninety-nine. The sporting world is remarkable for showing sport of this quality—it is thorough game. It measures time, which is its peculiar difficulty, by a cycle of horse races. The extraordinary events of its life are ordinaries. Cockfights are its holidays; and, like the primitive Chaldees, it worships Bel. The inhabitants of this world, if any grave citizen or member of a staid profession could only overhear their confidential chat, would astonish him quite as much as a council of Mohawks met in solemn palaver. Now it is very conceivable that amongst their other peculiarities, such people as these might really believe a man to be a coward who should decline to fight a duel. But surely it would be too silly to act a folly because otherwise fools may think one. If such a motive of action be decreed standard, it is hard to say at what particular stage of nonsense a man may rest himself. If one must do battle with common sense, until this or that world shall have learned wisdom, he shall have scant leisure for self-improvement. No, it is as vicious a circle as was ever yet described. Weak minded men may shiver within it, as if old scratch must have them bodily, unless they respect its prescriptions; but a rational child may walk through it, as it were a web of gossamer, and laugh at the conjurors.

On the contrary, he is the real coward who submits to such an absurd ordeal. And in all conditions of society, the innate cowardice of his soul would appear in some violation of eternal justice yielded meanly to a reigning prejudice. The man who is truly brave, the just man who will not swerve from his just purpose, he keeps to his honourable course, and deems of their censures as of the cackling of geese. He knows what a life is worth, and what it is no more than worth, and what it is not worth; and if a fitting occasion offers—a just cause, a high aim, and a fair field—then he shall approve his mettle, and not till then.

Non civium ardor prava jubentium
Mente quatit solidâ,

There yet remain for notice what may be described as exceptional defences of the duelling process; some grounded on theories fanciful and far fetched; others on alleged peculiarities of position which no general rule could or should comprehend. One example of each class must suffice. Assuming courage to be the point of honour in a man, some will gravely tell us that the duel is only intended to give a calumniated party an opportunity of showing that he possesses enough of that essential quality to entitle him to exemption from reproach on any other account. An opportunity with a wannion! But, supposing courage to be this invisible point of honour, what is courage? Is it an indifference to death, with or without an equivalent? a downright desperate determination to sell your life for half nothing? A plague on such courage.

The peculiarities of position should be detailed by the parties concerned; and then it is like play acting. Such fervor and such pathos, and so many je ne sçai quois are launched at you in words, in looks, in gestures, in silence, in repose, that your reason is left in a visible minority. Is an only sister at the bottom of it? Ah, only a brother can understand that predicament. Was there a special election at hazard? Oh! you must have been present then to appreciate the entanglement. This is all nonsense. Truth is stable and shall endure. God has power to extract, but man no right to expect, good from evil. The allotted wages of sin is death.

It is not an easy matter, however, to deal with these peculiar people. The general arguments you cannot in decency insist upon, seeing that they are freely and as it were conscientiously conceded to you; yet each must have a word. Fraternal affection we should strive to wheedle into sense, as thus: If, maugre your noted bravery, one man may insult your sister, why may not twenty? Is your life charmed, that you shall escape twenty shots? And if you do not, what then shall become of your sister? Electioneering ardour we should seek to quench by a more hydropathic treatment. You profess to be patriotic sparks, guides of your benighted country, watchers of her weal and zealous in her service. Traitors! a faithful sentinel will not risk the loss of his post for an idle brawl. Hypocrites! the interest of a dice-box measures the full dimensions of your patriotism. Idiots! the misconduct of that class concerns nobody a mite. Madmen! that class will pick you down, every man of you, and follow the hounds next morning as if nothing particular had occurred.

While meditating portions of this theme, some sage reflections have occurred to us, which, unwilling to hoard up like churls, and yet failing of a satisfactory peg whereon to hang them, we now feel as a burthen of which we would be fairly rid. A love of brevity which, like love in an old bachelor, is not the less overwhelming for visiting us late, suggests the form of the apologue as most appropriate for our purposes. Mankind, experience teacheth, is composed of tall men and short men, who regard each other with a mutual and mysterious antipathy. To the tall men appertain usually the elements and the organs of physical vigour, whereof the short men are curtailed by the dispensation of Providence. In ancient days the tall men were called giants, and they lorded it over the short men, as it is set forth in the chronicles of the time. Now, the short men smarting under this inferiority during a succession of ages, bore it, however, with patience until their necks were too sorely galled; but then becoming vindictive, they cast about for some artificial aid to compensate their natural defects, and place them on a level with their tyrants. And first, they invented stilts, but the invention availed them naught; for the tall men tripped them up, and converting their stilts into cudgels, belaboured them for their ingenuity. Other devices did the short men try with varying successes, until at last, their cunning being wrought to an agony, they invented gunpowder. Now the tall men had their turn at the bottom of the wheel. They were pulled down in every quarter, like superannuated maypoles, and the short men celebrated their overthrow by public games, in which tumblers performed prodigies in mockery of their fall. These games were the cradle of rope-dancing. Experiencing such a dire reverse, the tall men did at first murmur mightily against the caprice, as they accounted it, of nature, who gave them such superior endowments and then evacuated her gift by swindling. But when the first feeling of surprise at the novelty of the invention had subsided, the tall men ceased to murmur; for they found that when all the gunpowder was burned, or though it were not all burned, that when they closed upon the short men, their natural superiorities did revive, and enabled them to triumph, as of old, over their hereditary foes. This experience was embodied in companies of grenadiers. Hereupon the short men demanded a parley, and protested against the grenadiers with their accustomed acuteness. Are you not, they said to the tall men, contravening the manifest dispositions of our common mother, nature? For why should she have produced within her womb the ingredients of gunpowder, appointed laws for their union, and for their government when united, and initiated us moreover into all these secrets, except for the purpose of placing us on a perfect equality with you, as became a just parent and a non-respecter of persons. Disband your grenadiers, therefore, and let it be a religion between us, that whether the gunpowder is all burned or not, you shall never approach us nearer than within about a dozen paces of a man of the middle-size. At the conclusion of this speech, the greater part by far of the tall men did lay their thumb-tops on their noses, extending all their fingers like a fan—but of words they spake few, and those few sneeringly, to the effect: that if nature did indeed design such an equality as was pretended, she took a very circuitous and tedious route to her object, and overlooked a very short one; and that it would be a very childish game at cards, wherein one party might forge trumps which he received not from the dealer, while the other should resign even those which he had received, and chance it with the balance for his earthly fortune. Howbeit, a small party of the tall men who comprehended not the words of their brethren, for that they were sprung from a family remarkable for the thickness of its wit, fell into the snare that was laid for them, and signed a treaty with the short men to the effect aforesaid. Thus originated the duel, which all the tribes of the short men continue to advocate, and some tall descendants of the thickwits to patronize, even to this our day.

Druidism.

PAGAN ANTIQUITIES.

MANY interesting Antiquities in Ireland are connected with the Pagan times. Druidical Remains are still abundant in Ireland. In our bogs, and deep in the earth, in various places, have been frequently found, gold and silver ornaments of a crescent form, symbols of the moon, and some with rays representing the sun; they were no doubt used in solar and lunar worship by the Druids. Many curious figures of bronze, considered to be images and idols used in Druidical worship, and various other articles and utensils for the same purpose have been often found, and are to be seen in abundance in different museums. Plates representing these antiquities are given in Vallancey's Works, and in the Dublin Penny Journals. Copious representations of Druids and their costume, and of Druidical antiquities are given in the illustrated work entitled "Old England," lately published by Knight, of London.

The Crom-Leac or stone of Crom, so called from the god Crom of the Pagan Irish, was used by the Druids as an altar for sacrifice, and also as a place of sepulture; for under them, deeply buried, have been found fragments of burned human bones, urns, and other sepulchral remains. These Cromleacs, or parts of them, are found not only in every county, but almost in every parish in Ireland; having, from the massiveness of their materials, withstood the hand of time for more than two thousand years, and are still strong enough to stand for two thousand years to come, these rude and massive monuments of Celtic architecture, being as durable as the rocks of which they are composed, and almost indestructible by time, like the Pyramids, and Cyclopean Walls of ancient days. Many of those memorials of Paganism were no doubt destroyed through the religious zeal of the early Christians, and hundreds of them have been broken up in modern times to clear out fields, and build houses and ditches out of the materials; the moss-covered Cromleac though defying the course of time, thus falling by human violence. The destruction of these interesting Pagan antiquities, as well as of the venerable ruins and remains of abbeys, churches, stone-crosses, and other Christian monuments, by modern Vandals, evinces utter barbarism and disgraceful ignorance: for such memorials of the arts of distant ages should be inviolably preserved to after times. When we find so many of these Cromleacs still remaining, it is evident they must have existed in vast number in remote times—and seem to demonstrate that there was a great population in Ireland in the Pagan ages. They are generally composed of three, four, six, or eight pillar stones, standing upright, and fixed deep in the earth on their smaller ends, and varying from four to six, to eight or ten feet in height; on the top of these is placed a flag or table-stone of prodigious size, in a sloping position, one end being much higher than the other; these table stones are of enormous dimensions, from twelve to twenty feet in length, six or eight feet in breadth, and three or four feet in thickness, and some of them estimated to weigh from twelve to twenty or even thirty or forty tons. Many of the Cromleacs are situated on high hills and mountains, others in deep valleys, glens, and sequestered places of difficult access; some are composed of limestone, others of granite, greenstone, sandstone, &c., and these huge fragments of rocks have in many instances been conveyed several miles, as no such stones can be now found in the neighbourhood; hence these circumstances have naturally given rise to the popular opinion that the Cromleacs were constructed by giants, as it would appear that a race of men of gigantic strength were alone capable of placing those prodigious stones in their present position; and it would be found extremely difficult, perhaps in some instances impossible, to convey these immense fragments of rocks any considerable distance, and place them in such positions even by the power of modern mechanism and machinery. As specimens of the Cromleac, it may be mentioned, that there are two magnificent ones to be seen within a few miles of Dublin, one at Mount Venus, near Tallaght, and another at Glen Druid near Cabinteely, but there are larger ones than these in many remote parts of Ireland.

The Druidical Temples were likewise numerous in Ireland, and there are remains of many of them, and of the great pillar stones of which they were composed to the present day. They were constructed of huge stones standing upright, in a circular form, with great top stones placed on them in many instances; but others consisted merely of circles of large upright stones. Giraldus Cambrensis, or Gerald the Cambrian, whose name was Sylvester Giraldus de Barri, a celebrated ecclesiastic and native of Wales, came to Ireland in the reign of King John in the 12th century, and wrote a work on the antiquities and topography of the country. He states that there was in ancient times a prodigious monument of stones on the plains of Kildare, near the fortress of Naas, erected with wonderful skill by the strength of men, and called Chorea gigantum (the circle of the giants); as the giants in the days of old were said to have brought the huge stones of which it was composed from Africa to Ireland. He says that immense stones resembling each other were standing there to that day, and that it was astonishing how so many and such large stones could have been collected, raised in one place, and fixed by art on top of each other. He further adds, that, according to British History, the huge stones of the ancient monument on the plains of Kildare, were carried over to Britain, by order of Aurelius Ambrosius, king of the Britons, assisted by the supernatural art of Merlin, the famous Welsh magician; and that to leave some memorial of such a mighty deed, they were arranged in the same order, and according to the same art as they had originally been in Ireland, in the place where the flower of the British chiefs fell by the swords of the Saxons. This last passage alludes to the massacre of four hundred and sixty of the British chiefs, in the fifth century, on Salisbury plain, where along with their king, Vortigern, they held a conference with the Saxons under Hengist, and were all treacherously slain, at the place where Stone-Henge stands; therefore this account from Cambrensis signifies that according to some fabulous traditions, the huge stones of the Druidical temple on the plains of Kildare were removed to Britain in remote ages. This account of the removal of the monument in Kildare to Salisbury plain is also given by Geoffrey of Monmouth, a chronicler of the 12th century, and by others who say it was done by the magic arts of Merlin, either in the time of Aurelius Ambrosius or Uther Pendragon.

An ancient poem by Alexander Necham, a monk of St. Albans, in the twelfth century, in which is the following passage, ascribing the conveyance of the monument from Ireland to Ambri (the place called Ambresbury, on Salisbury plain, near Stone-Henge), may be regarded as a quaint summary of these fabulous tales:

"Nobilis est lapidum structura Chorea gigantum,
Ars experta suum posse peregit opus,
Quod ne prodiret in lucem segnius artem
Se viresque suas consulisse reor.
Hoc opus adscribit Merlino garrula fama,
Filia figmenti fabula vana refert,
Illa congerie fertur decorata fuisse,
Tellus quæ mittit tot Palamedis aves,
Hinc tantum munus suscepit Hibernia gaudens,
Uther Pendragon molem transvexit ad Ambri."

These curious legends may probably signify that the model of Stone-Henge might have been originally copied from the great Druidical temple on the plains of Kildare, in very remote ages; but Stone-Henge was constructed many centuries before the time alleged in the reign of Aurelius Ambrosius, and was raised, no doubt, before the Christian era, or the arrival of

Julius Cæsar in Britain. The tradition amongst the Irish in the time of Cambrensis, that the stones of the monument in Kildare were brought from Africa by giants, had its origin perhaps from this great structure having been raised for the worship of their gods, or as a temple of the sun, by the Phœnicians, Tyrians, or Carthaginians, colonies of whom are considered to have come to Ireland in very remote ages. Naas, near which this monument is said to have been situated was, in ancient times, a celebrated seat of the kings of Leinster, and there are remains of great mounds and raths there to the present day. The stupendous monument of Stone-Henge is the most magnificent Druidical temple now existing in the world; and there are remains of another of immense extent at Avebury in Wiltshire. In ancient Gaul there were many great temples of the Druids, and extensive remains of some of them still exist; the most remarkable now found in France, are those of Carnac in Bretagne and at Poitiers; that at Carnac consists of huge stones standing upright, some of them from twelve to fifteen feet in height, and of those immense stones no less than four thousand still remain, formed into numerous concentric circles, and covering an area of about half a mile in diameter. There are still remains of many Druidical temples in Ireland; there was a great temple of the Druids at Moy-Sleacht, or Fenagh in Brefney, of which there are yet some remains, and it is said to have been destroyed by St. Patrick. Between Glanworth and Fermoy, in the county of Cork, there is a Druidical monument of prodigious size, which shows this place to have been a celebrated seat of Druidism. In the county of Down, near the church of Drumbo, between Belfast and Lisburn, there are remains of a great temple of the Druids, described by Vallancey and in Dubordieu's Survey of Down. It is called the Giant's Ring, and consists of an immense circular entrenchment of earthwork, about one third of a mile in circumference, 579 feet in diameter, and contains an area of about eight acres. The ramparts are forty-five feet high and twelve feet broad at top. This magnificent temple was calculated from its dimensions to contain six or seven thousand people; in the centre stands a great Cromleac, and at a short distance, near the church of Drumbo, is an ancient round tower.

The Cairns and Sepulchral Mounds are connected with the days of Druidism. The cairn is so called from the Irish Carn, which signifies a heap of stones. These cairns are huge heaps, many of them containing several thousand cart-loads of stones, and are still numerous throughout Ireland; mostly situated on high hills, and mountains. They were raised as sepulchral monuments over the remains of warriors and kings, and according to Toland and others, Druidical rites were performed there, and the officiating Druid was designated Carneach, or the priest of the cairn; human victims were sometimes sacrificed at the tombs, to the manes of the departed heroes, as amongst the Greeks and Romans. Some of these heaps of stones, raised as tombs, were termed by the Irish, Leacht, and Taimleacht, which signify sepulchral monuments. The Sepulchral Mounds, commonly called moats, and by the Irish writers Dumha, are to be found in all parts of Ireland, but are particularly numerous in the counties of Meath, Louth, Dublin and Kildare. The great Cemeteries of the Pagan kings were at Tara, Tailtean, and Brugh of the Boyne, in Meath, at Emania near Armagh, and at Cruachan near Elphin in Connaught, at a place called Reilig-na-Riogh, that is the cemetery of the kings. At each of the royal cemeteries of Tailtean, Brugh, and Cruachan, there were according to ancient writers, no less than fifty mounds, the sepulchres of kings, queens, and chiefs, and many likewise at Tara; but few of those mounds now remain, having been levelled and the materials removed at different times. The mounds are of various sizes, of a circular or conical form, resembling hillocks, hence those artificial elevations have been sometimes mistaken for little hills formed by the hand of nature. The interior is often composed of a heap of small stones, resembling a cairn, but covered with earth, and others are almost entirely formed of earth. When opened, they have been found to contain kistvaens or stone coffins, funeral urns, remains of human bones, military weapons, &c., which prove them to have been sepulchres constructed occasionally on battle-fields, or as regular cemeteries for the remains of kings, chiefs, and warriors, in the Pagan times; for after the introduction of Christianity, the erection of these mounds was discontinued, and churchyards were used as cemeteries. In England these sepulchral mounds are called Barrows, and are numerous on Salisbury plain and other places. Sepulchral mounds were raised as monuments to their kings and warriors by various ancient nations, as the Greeks, Gauls, Scythians, Scandinavians, &c., and some of the great mounds erected to Homer's heroes, Achilles, Ajax, Patroclus, Hector, &c. remain on the shores of the Hellespont to this day. These places are well described by our talented countryman, Dr. Madden, in his "Travels in the East."

The stupendous mound, resembling a large hill, raised as a sepulchre for Alyattes, king of Lydia about six centuries before the Christian era, is still to be seen: that of Agamemnon, at Mycenæ, was the greatest in Greece. In Italy are still to be seen the mounds of the ancient kings of Etruria; and in the Crimea remain some of the mounds of the old Scythian kings, mentioned by Herodotus, as those of the German, Slavonian, and Scandinavian warriors, are found scattered over Germany, Poland, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

The mound at New Grange, in Meath, near the Boyne, between Drogheda and Slane, is the greatest in Ireland, and has been described by Molyneux, Ware, Harris, Ledwich, and Vallancey. This Irish pyramid covers an area of nearly two acres, and is about seventy feet in height, having the appearance of a natural hill of considerable size, and has been planted with trees in modern times. The interior is composed of a huge heap of stones, but it is covered with earth some feet in depth. It was much higher than at present, for about a century ago it was broken into, and many hundred cart-loads of stones carried off by some barbarian road-makers. But these excavations, however, led to an interesting discovery, for a long gallery or narrow passage was found leading to the interior; and in the centre of the mound was discovered a large circular chamber, constructed of huge stones standing upright; it is about twenty feet in height, and twenty-two feet in diameter, and covered with a dome made of massive flag stones; three quadrangular recesses, forming a cross, branch off from the chamber. The entire length of the passage, from the outer entrance to the end of the recess off the interior chamber, is about eighty-two feet; this passage is covered with immense flag-stones, from twelve to eighteen feet in length, and about six feet in breadth; at the entrance the passage is about three feet broad, but scarcely two feet in height, so that it cannot be entered except by creeping on the hands and feet, but after a progress of about twenty or thirty feet, it expands to a height of from six to ten feet. Many persons have at various times entered this cavern with lights, and in the three recesses of the interior chamber were discovered three great vases or urns of granite, of a circular form, well sculptured, and each nearly four feet in diameter; they stood on supporters of stone, but only two of these urns now remain. There was also found a pyramidal stone, six or seven feet in height, standing in the centre of the chamber, and near it some remains of human bones. About a century ago, there stood on the summit of the mound a great pillar stone, which has been destroyed; and the base of the mound was encircled with a ring of stones of enormous size, standing upright, varying in height from five to ten feet above ground, and each estimated to be about ten or twelve tons weight, but of these huge stones only nine now remain. There were discovered on the top of the mound, about a century ago, two coins of the Roman emperors, Valentinian and Theodosius. This mound, like the Egyptian pyramids, was the sepulchre of some of the Irish kings or great warriors, in the Pagan times; and though the erection of these sepulchral mounds, has, by some antiquarians, been attributed to the Danes, no doubt they were constructed many centuries before the Northmen set foot in Ireland. Many of the champions buried in these mounds, were men of gigantic stature; and it appears that some persons while rummaging "burglariously, broke the coffin-lid" of one of them, and rudely disturbed the repose of the warrior who had slept there for a thousand years. Ware mentions, that in a sepulchral mound near Forrest, in the barony of Coolock, (at Knocksedan, near Swords,) opened in his time, there were found the remains of a man of gigantic stature, the skeleton measuring from the ankle bone to the top of the cranium, eight feet four inches; the bones of the skull were very thick, and the teeth of enormous size; the limbs were all very large in proportion, and it appears that this giant, when living, must have been nearly nine feet high, or about the size of Goliath of Gath. All the bones except the teeth, were in a crumbling condition. There were many other remains of human bones found in the same place; so this mound appears to have been raised over the warriors slain on some battle-field. Amongst the historical associations connected with these mounds, it may be mentioned, that in ancient times, they were used as places for holding great national conventions, and assemblies of the kings, chiefs, and people, Bards, Brehons, and Druids, for legislation, inauguration of princes, and other public purposes. The tombs of the olden time, were far better constructed for durability than those of our days; for wooden coffins soon fall to fragments, and graves of a few feet in dimensions, become a blank in the course of a hundred years; and even monuments of more lasting materials, as tomb-stones and columns, are liable to fall to decay in a few centuries; while the Pyramid and Sarcophagus, the Cromlech and Cairn, the earthen mound and Kistvaen, will withstand the changes of three thousand years. Time is the architect of ruins, but he destroys his own works, for even the very ruins disappear, and his iron hand crumbles the marble statue, the granite column, and the cyclopean wall, in the course of ages.

THE PURGATORY OF ST. PATRICK.

[Translated from the Spanish of Calderon.]

——— *Andò verso l' Irlanda,
E vide Ibernìa fabulosa, dove
Il santo vecchieirol fece la cava
In che tanta merce par che si trone,
Che l'uom vi purga ogni sua colpa prava.*

ARISTO. Orl. Fur. canto x., sts. 91, 92.

“——— He next for Ireland shaped his course,
And saw the fabulous Hibernia, where
The goodly, sainted elder made the cave
In which men cleansed from all offences are,
Such mercy there, it seems, is found to save :—”

ROSE.

ACT II.*

SCENE—A Room in the Palace of Egerio.Enter LUDOVICO and POLONIA.

Lud. Polonia, whoso'er has brought
His heart to trifle with Love's chain,
Has no reason to complain
If another heart be thought
Worthier of the bliss he sought—
For it is his fitting fate;
(Who has ever soared above,
That fell not also?) Thus, my love
Dareth to anticipate
That of Philip, though his state
Far exceeds what mine can be,
He on Nature's bounty liveth,
But in what exertion giveth—
I am greater far than he:
I, Polonia, by this hand
Have obtained far higher merit
Even than Philip doth inherit:
If thou dost a proof demand,
Look around this grateful land,
Which hath almost frantic grown
At the victories I have won:
Round about the pleasant sun,
Now three rapid years have flown,
Since upon these islands thrown,
I thy happy slave became,
Quicker than the thoughts that fly
Has the fleeting time gone by.
Need I call to mind, or name
Those great trophies of my fame
Won in many a fight by me,
But to offer them to thee—
Which within this palace stand—
Being the amazement of the land
And the wonder of the sea?
Polon. Ludovico, by thy valour,
Whether by your own worth merited,
Or with Nature's gifts inherited,
Thou hast stamp'd a glow—a pallor
On my cheek, and thou hast lit
Something blent of heat and coldness—
Something blent of fear and boldness,
In my breast: 'tis scarcely fit
That I call it love—for it
Doth awake my grief and shame,
When I feel the Archer's aim
Shoots the poison'd arrow through me,
And the Deity subdue me
In his wild resistless flame.
But I make this one confession,
Long thy hopes had been possession,
Did I not so deeply fear
My father's wrath; but persevere,
And thou need'st not feel depression.

Enter PHILLIP.

Phil. Here, perchance, my death I find.
Why then come distracted, blind,

[Aside.]

To seek it? But what man is he Who would have patience not to see
The cause whereby his bosom pined?
What dost thou pledge that thou'lt be mine?
This hand.

Lud.
Polon.
Phil.

Not that, my will is stronger,
Which can endure this sight no longer.
Ah, me!

Polon.
Phil.

Wilt thou thy hand resign
Unto a stranger? (How confine
The grief I feel for such a crime!)
And thou who in thy daring flight
Dost seek the sun, that in his light
You may obtain a death sublime,
Why wilt thou not recall the time
When thou my fetter'd slave wert seen?
Why dost thou dare to cross my way?
Because I dare to be to day
What now I am, not what I've been.
'Tis true I was your slave—for none
Are safe from Fortune's fickle wheel—
But in my very heart I feel
That in the fame that I have won,
And in the deeds that I have done,
(Why should I now the truth conceal?)
My honour equals yours; indeed
Some might surmise it doth exceed.
Phil. Exceed me! vilest among men!
Lud. Philip in these words I've heard,
You have err'd.

Phil.
Lud.

I have not err'd,
If you have not err'd— What then?

Phil.
Lud.

You have lied! Thou'rt vile again. [Gives him a blow.]

Phil.
Polon.

O Heavens!
Why do I not take
Instant vengeance? When my ire
Burns within me, like the fire
That from Etna's top doth break,
Which not seas of blood can slake.

Polon.
Lud.

[They draw their swords, KING EGERIO and soldiers enter, and all place themselves on the side of Phillip.]

King.
Lud.

What is this?
A lasting wo—
A misfortune—an abuse—
A wild, angry fiend let loose
From the infernal gulf below.
Let no one presume to go
Between me and revenge. Reflect,
Fury heedeth nought beneath;
Neither has it fear of death,
Nor for any man respect—
My honour must I re-erect.
King. Seize him.

King.
Lud.

Let the man who sighs
For his death obey! you'll see
What his valour gains—for he Shall be slain before your eyes;
On this very spot he dies.

King.
Lud.

Quick pursue the daring slave—
Who'd have thought of this?

Lud.

I lave
In a blood-red stream each limb,
On whose breast I seem to swim,
Seeking Phillip o'er the wave.

[There is a clash of weapons, and they all go out but EGERIO, who remains alone.]

King.

This new blow alone was wanted;
For a rumour has arisen,
That the slave who fled from prison,
He by whom my dreams are haunted,
Has to Ireland, nothing daunted,
Come from Rome, and hither guided,
Has the world in bands divided,
For the multitude enticed
To believe the faith of Christ,
Have along with Patrick sided.
People say that he must be
A magician—rumour saith
That being sentenced unto death,
By some other monarchs, he
From their fetters set him free,

* The account of the early legends connected with St. Patrick's Purgatory, &c., promised in a former note, is postponed for the present. I hope to be able to give it as a supplemental paper after the termination of the translation.

And with such prodigious wonder
 Did he burst the cords asunder
 That did bind him to the stake,
 That the earth began to quake
 From its darksome caverns under,
 Where the dead lie hid; the air
 Groan'd aloud—the sun grew dark—
 And the moon lay cold and stark,
 Missing the long golden hair
 Which the sun's bright brow doth wear.
 It is plain, from all one sees,
 Patrick holdeth Fortune's ball,
 For the people, one and all,
 Who beheld such prodigies,
 And with what miraculous ease
 He regained his liberty,
 Follow him from far and near
 In astonishment and fear.
 Here to day approacheth he
 To try his magic spells on me,
 Well, let him come, before my rod
 Shall his magic spells be fleeing;
 We shall learn who is that being
 Whom they call the Christian's God.
 At my hands must Patrick die,
 If 'twere only but to try
 Whether he, by art or vigour,
 From the circle of my rigour,
 Can with life escape and fly.
 We shall see what countless sums
 Of magic wealth he now can master,
 He this Bishop—he this Pastor—
 He who in the Pope's name comes.

Enter the CAPTAIN and soldiers, with LUDOVICO as a prisoner.

Capt. Ludovico cometh taken,
 After leaving in their gore
 Three of thy guard, and wounding more.

King. Christian, is thy breast not shaken,
 Seeing my wrath at length awaken—
 Seeing my hand upraised for blood?
 But vainly now, in frantic mood,
 Doth suffering tear my tenderest nerves—
 This, and more, that man deserves
 Who e'er has done a Christian good:
 Reward, not punishment, should be
 Your gift to-day; for it is plain,
 That I alone should feel the pain
 Of having done aught good to thee.
 Here, guard him close, till our decree
 Pronounce his death; my will is known— [To soldiers.
 All hope of mercy now hath flown—
 So you may spare your tears and sighs—
 Not for his crimes, this Christian dies,
 But for his Christian creed alone.

[They all go out but LUDOVICO, who remains alone.]

Lud. If for this I die, thou makest
 My unhappy death most happy—
 Since he dieth for his Maker,
 He who dieth for His honour:
 And a man whom fortune doometh
 Here to live in pain and trouble,
 Ought to bless the falling death-stroke
 As the happy end of all things;
 Since its greatness comes to shorten
 Life's poor thread—so wildly tangled!
 Mine to-day becometh evil—
 Like a phoenix it arises
 From the ashes of dishonour.
 Here my life were deadly poison—
 Here my breath were serpent venom—
 Till I could, throughout all Ireland,
 Shed of blood, such sweet abundance
 That would wash away the insult
 And the memory of my wrong:
 Ah! honour, honour, low thou liest,
 Struck down by a rigorous hand!—
 I shall die with you. Together
 We shall conquer these barbarians—
 For my death will, in a moment,
 Give us sweet and certain triumph.
 In this sharp and pointed dagger
 Lieth honourable vengeance!—
 But, God bless me! what fell demon

Prompts my hand? I am a Christian—
 I have got an immortal soul,
 And the pious light of faith:
 Is it right that I, a Christian,
 Should commit, among these Gentiles,
 Any act that would bring insult
 On the religion I profess?
 What example shall I give them
 By this dark crime of self-murder,
 But that my actions give the lie to
 All the virtuous works of Patrick?—
 Since the people here, who only
 Worship their degrading vices—
 Who deny the soul's existence,
 And its future pain or glory:
 They would surely say—what boots it
 Patrick's preaching that man's spirit
 Is immortal? What imports it?
 If the Christian Ludovico
 Kills himself: thereby proclaiming
 His own ignorance of its nature—
 Thus would we with doubtful actions
 Keep the beams of faith from falling:—
 He the light, and I the darkness.
 Well, there is such evil in it
 That it must not be attempted:
 Not that I at all repent me
 Of the crimes that I've committed—
 Nay, I rather sigh for new ones:
 Oh! if I could now but free me
 With my life, from out this prison,
 I would soon become the terror
 Of the world, in all its quarters,
 Europe, Africa, and Asia:
 I would make a dread beginning
 In these islands of Egerio;
 So that there would live no person
 Who would satisfy the anguish
 And the blood-thirst of my vengeance.
 The angry bolt, the sky that cleaveth,
 Warns us with its voice of thunder;
 And, in mingled smoke and shadows,
 Imitating fiery serpents,
 Darteth through the tremulous air.
 Thus have I in thunder threatened,
 So that every man could hear it;
 But the fiery bolt is wanting;
 Ah! alas! it hath miscarried,
 And before it reach'd its object
 Was but the sport of every wind;
 Death itself has got no terrors,
 No, not even a death so shameful,
 But what grieves me is to perish
 In my strong and early manhood,
 Ere my heart with crime is sated—
 Life alone, for this I covet;
 That I yet may act far greater,
 Heaven doth know for nought beside.

Enter POLONIA.

Polon. Hesitation now is over—
 Ludovico, there are moments
 When love must no more be silent,
 But give proof how strong it is:
 Now your life is in great danger
 From the angry king, my father:
 And it doth behove your safety
 To escape his wrath and fury:
 By my liberal hand, the guardsmen
 Round your prison are suborned,
 And their watchful ears are deafened
 By the wondrous sound of gold;
 Fly: and that you may hereafter
 Know, how much a woman hazards,
 When she yields to love's delirium:
 How she tramples upon honour—
 How upon respect she trampleth—
 I with you will go: 'tis needful.
 Henceforth, for my whole existence,
 I must live or die beside you:
 Without you my life were nothing—
 You who in my fond breast liveth.
 I bring gold and costly jewels
 More than we require, to place us

[Aside.

In the farthest land of India;
Where the sun burns up and freezes—
Now with beams, and now with shadows.
At the door there stand two horses;
I will call them swiftest panthers—
Daughters of the wind—or rather,
Thought itself would best describe them.

They are safe as they are rapid—
For, although upon them flying,
Swifter than the sudden lightning,
Scarcely shall we feel their motion.

Oh! be resolute—why dally?—
What delays you?—time is pressing—
And that fortune which doth ever
Interrupt love's course, at present
May not mar a deed so noble!

I shall show the way before you.
With ingenious speech and action
I shall gain the guard's attention,
Giving you a chance of flying—
See the sun our project favours,
For he sinketh in the ocean—
There to rest him from his labours,
And to cool his burning tresses.

Lud. To my very hands hath fortune
Sent the chance I so much wished for—
For, Heaven knows, the proofs of liking
Which I gave unto Polonia,
Were but feigned—assumed in order
That I might thereby avail me
Of the jewels which she carries,
Soon or late, to fly with gladness
From this Babylonian bondage;
For although in her my person
Lived esteemed, yet it was only
Servitude disguised—my roving
And unfettered life was pining
For the pleasant breath of freedom,
Which the heavens this day have granted.
But for the future which I painted,
A woman is a weight and hindrance;
Love with me is but a fancy,
Quickly gone as quickly born,
Which when satisfied, the fairest
Woman bringeth nought but tedium:
Being so—of what importance
Is another murder, added
To the many gone before it?—
By my hands must die Polonia,
She has chosen for her loving
A most unpropitious epoch,
When there's nothing loved or worshipped:
Had she loved like other mortals,
She would have lived as others live.

[Exit.]

Enter the CAPTAIN.

Capt. From the King I come, with orders
Here to read to Ludovico
The fixed sentence of his death;
But the prison-door is open!
And the tower is bare and empty!
Something must have happened—soldiers!
No one answers to my calling!
Help! assistance! treason! treason!

Enter the KING, PHILIP, and LAOGHAIRE.

King. Who is calling? Who's proclaiming?
What is this?

Capt. That Ludovico
Has escaped; and with him also
Have the guards departed.

Laogh. Monarch!

Here I saw Polonia enter.
Heavens! it is now too certain
That 'twas she who gave him freedom;
You must know he was her suitor—
Jealousy doth now incite me,
And provoke me to pursue them—
From this very day, Hibernia
Will be called a second Troy.

King. Let me have a horse; in person
I those fugitives must follow.
Who are those two daring Christians,
Who combine, with doubtful actions,

[Exit.]

One to shake my bosom's quiet,
One to steal my dearest honour?
But the two shall be the trophies
Of my hand's far-reaching vengeance—
From whose aim no man can hide him,
Not even the mighty Roman Pontiff.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE. A Forest.

POLONIA enters wounded and flying from LUDOVICO, who pursues her with a naked dagger in his hand.

Polon. Oh! for Christ's sake, thy God, who reigns above,
Restrain thy bloody hand—if not for love;
Take all I have, my gold, my honour take;
But leave me my poor life, for pity's sake!

Lud. Luckless Polonia, since creation's hour,
Misfortune ever hath been beauty's dower—
Where beauty dwelleth happiness must fly,
As moonbeams fade when sunshine lights the sky—
In me you see the most un pitying wretch
That ever yet his murderous hands did stretch
'Gainst human life—and so this stroke I give,
For you must die that I may safely live;
If you came with me, I would bear along,
In you, the witness of my crime and wrong;
By means of which I might, the whole earth round,
Be tracked and followed—sought and surely found:
If, with your life, I leave you here, 'tis plain
I leave you wild with anger, rack'd with pain;
And thus, I leave behind me, for my woe,
One foe the more, and Heavens! how great a foe!
Alas! there seems no method to relieve you—
I would do wrong to take you, or to leave you—
And so it is much better, hapless woman!
That I, with rage as cruel as unhuman,
Heedless of God, or law, or pity, slay thee,
And in the depths of this wild forest lay thee.
Thus shall I hide my wretchedness from view,
And gain a novel mode of vengeance too;
If Philip lives within your heart, the blow
That takes thy life will rid me of my foe—
And thus but one shall live—your sire to save,
Some future time, my vengeance and my hate:
As first from thee the storm of insult burst,
So must thou feel the strokes of vengeance first.

Polon. Ah me! I've but contrived my own undoing,
Like the poor worm, its fatal task pursuing,
Weaving the silken coil of its own death!
Art thou a Christian? Breathest thou human breath?

Lud. I am a demon—by this proof believe me.

Polon. Oh! may the God of Patrick then receive me!

[He stabs her, and she falls within.]

Lud. On a bank of flowers extended,
Sad Polonia's woes are ended;
Now I feel no weight detain me,
Free I move, and nought shall chain me—
I bear with me all the treasures
Life doth need, and all life's pleasures;
With them I to Spain shall take me,
There to live till time doth make me
Somewhat changed in outward feature;
Then as 'twere a new-born creature,
Thither shall I come, with greater
Hope to avenge me on a traitor.
Till that hour my bosom weepeth
(Injured honour never sleepeth!)
But why now am I delaying,
Here amidst death's shadows straying?
'Mid the gloom of daylight dying,
I have lost my way; and flying
From the tyrants, may be going Into their very hands. The glowing
Of the unrisen moon is showing
Where a peasant's hut is standing,
Here it may be, by demanding,
I may have my path-way righted.

[He calls.]

PAUL and LUCY answer from within.

Lucy. Who is there?

Lud. A man benighted—

By the darkness overtaken—

Interrupts thy rest.

Lucy. Awaken,

Juan Paul, for some one's calling
At the door.

Paul. He must be bawling
For you; so answer him instead—
For me, I'm well enough in bed.

Lucy. Who is there?

Lud. A traveller.

Paul. Eh,

A traveller?

Lud. Yes.

Paul. Travel on I pray,

This is not an inn.

Lud. The clown

Vexeth me. I must tear down

This door—it falls upon the ground.

[He strikes down the door.]

Lucy. Ha! Juan Paul, will not the sound
Awake you? They have burst the door.

Paul. Why I'm half awake and more,
I have one eye open, but Still the other eye is shut;
Well, come down with me—for fear
Somewhat troubleth me. Who's here?

[They enter half naked.]

Lud. Silence, peasant, or you die.

Lost amid these hills, have I

Hither come: without delay

You must put me on my way,

How the nearest port to gain,

Thence to fly across the main.

Paul. Oh! the road's as clear as light;
Take this pathway to the right,
When you pass a mountain cleft,
Turn a little to the left,
Then you'll go along a plain—
To the right then turn again,
Where a beaten path doth wind,
And the port you can't but find.
And of this be sure, in short,
When you're there, that 'tis the port.

Lud. Come and guide me hence, if not
You must die upon the spot.

Lucy. It were better, cavalier,
That till dawn you rested here.

Paul. Ah! you're very kind, my lady;
Have you fallen in love already?

Lud. Peasant quick, for time doth fly;
Do you choose to guide or die?

Paul. Do not vex yourself. If I,
Without question or reply,
Rather choose to guide than die,
I am ready now to go;
Not through fear of death—oh, no!
But lest Lucy should rejoice.

Lud. I must stop this babbler's voice.

Lest he tell where I have flown—

In the sea he must be thrown,

When he puts me on my track.

As for you, retire alone,

Soon your husband will be back.

[LUDOVICO and PAUL go out at one side; LUCY at another.]

SCENE. Another open in the Forest.

Enter the KING, LESBIA, LAOGHAIRE, and the Captain.

Lesb. Not a trace can be discovered
Whither they have fled. The mountain
Has been search'd from top to bottom,
And throughout the wood and valley,
Every rock and leafy arbour
Have been visited; but nothing
Gives the slightest indication
Whither they have gone.

King. 'Tis likely
That the Earth the two has swallow'd,
To preserve them from my fury—
For the Heavens could scarcely guard them
From my anger and my vengeance.

Lesb. See the sun his golden tresses
In the orient disentangling,
Spreads them o'er the woods and mountains—
Timely comes his light to aid us.

Enter PHILLIP.

Phil. If your Majesty will hearken,
You will learn a great affliction—
More prodigious and more novel,
Than e'er time or fortune fashion'd,
Or imagination fancied:
Seeking through these woods Polonia,
And the whole night having wander'd
Through their wild and dark recesses—
When the dawn began to glimmer,
Clothed in ashen robes of mourning,
And by thick black clouds surrounded—
When the pleasant stars were absent
Not to see a sight so dreadful—
Running hither—running thither—
Soon I came where tender blossoms
Were with crimson blood-spots sprinkled,
And upon the earth were scatter'd
Fragments of a woman's trinkets.
By these mournful signs directed,
Soon I came where I discover'd,
'Neath a grey rock, frowning over,
In a fragrant tomb of roses,
Dead and cold, Polonia lying!

[The scene opens and discovers Polonia lying dead beside a rock.]

Thither turn your eyes in anguish—
There the young tree lies extended—
There the flower lies pale and wither'd—
There the bright flame is extinguished—
There is Beauty's form laid prostrate,
And its sinuous outline rigid—
There the dead Polonia lieth!

King. Ah! my heart is overwhelmed!
I have not the power within me
To endure such dire afflictions—
Such innumerable sorrows,
And such varying forms of anguish.
Ah! my poor unhappy daughter—
Ah! my darling, wildly sought for!
Evil is the hour I've found thee!

Lesb. I have been so stunn'd and startled,
Breath is wanting for my wailing!
O Polonia! let thy sister
Share thy fate and thy misfortunes.
King. What wild hand could e'er have lifted
Muderous steel against such beauty?
Oh! my life doth set in sorrow,
This disastrous day doth end it!

PATRICK within.

Patr. Wo to thee! forlorn Hibernia!
Wo to thee! unhappy people,
If with tears you do not water,
Day and night, the land in weeping:
Opening thus the gate of Heaven,
Which you closed by disobedience.
Wo to thee! unhappy people;
Wo to thee! forlorn Hibernia!

King. Heavens! what voice so sad and mournful
Falls upon my ear? it pierceth
Like an arrow through my bosom,
To my heart's core penetrating.
Learn who thus doth interrupt me
In the moment of my sorrow.

Who but I has need for wailing?
Who but I has cause for sorrow?
Laog. This, my gracious lord, is Patrick,
Who since he has come to Ireland,
Back from Rome, and since the Pontiff
Unto him has given the title
And the preeminence of Bishop,
Wanders thus about the island.
Patr. Wo to thee! forlorn Hibernia!
Wo to thee! unhappy people!

Enter PATRICK.

King. Patrick, who my bitter anguish
Interruptest, and my suffering
Doublest, with your golden accents,
Their deceitful poison hiding,
Why thus persecute me? Wherefore
Wander thus about my kingdom,
Preaching novel modes of worship,
And by frauds our peace disturbing?
Here the scope of all our knowledge

Is that we are born and perish;
'Tis the doctrine we inherit
In the natural school our fathers
Have bequeathed us. But O Patrick!
Who is this new God thou preachest,
Who doth give us life eternal,
When this mortal life is over.
When the soul forsakes the body
How can it a new life enter,
Whether of reward or suffering?
Patr. By its being fully loosened
From the body, which to nature
Giveth back the human portion,
Which is only dust and ashes—
And the spiritual essence,
To the upper sphere arising,
Finds the goal of all its labours—
If in grace it haply dieth,
Which is first conferred by baptism—
Ever after by repentance.

King. See this form of matchless beauty,
In her own blood coldly lying,
Is she living at this moment?

Patr. Yes.

King. If so, the truth establish
By some proof.

Patr. O Lord of Heaven!
Turn thine ear unto thy servant—
Here 'tis needful to exhibit
Your almighty power and greatness.
King. You do not answer me.

Patr. The Heavens
Wish themselves to give you answer:
In the name of God, I bid thee,
Prostrate corse, thy soul resuming,
Rise and live—in this way giving
Proof of all the words I've spoken;
Preaching thus the Christian doctrine.
Polon. Alas! alas!—Oh! Heaven preserve me!
Oh! how many things are open'd
To the soul!—Oh! Lord Almighty
Stay the red hand of thy justice,
Do not hurl against a woman
All the rigour of thy anger,
All the lightnings of thy power.
Where, oh! where shall I conceal me
If thy countenance be wrathful?
Fall upon me rocks and mountains!
Mine own enemy this moment
I would think it joy to hide me
From thy sight in earth's dark centre.
But of what advantage were it,
If to every place I fly to,
I should bring with me the memory
Of my crime with my affliction?
See this mountain range recedeth!
See this hill hangs threatening over!
See even Heaven itself doth tremble,
Shaken on its poles. The tempest
Throws its blackened shades around me.
Now my trembling footsteps falter—
Now the waves recede before me,
Everything but wild beasts fly me,
Which approach as if to seize me.
Pity—mighty Lord! have pity!
Mercy! mercy! Lord Almighty—
Humbly do I ask for baptism,
And to die in grace and favour.
Mortals! mortals! listen! listen!
Christ is living! Christ is reigning!
Christ is the true God—the only.
Of your crimes repent! repent ye!
What a prodigy!

Phil. A wonder!
Capt. What a miracle!

Lesb. How glorious!
Laogh. What enchantment! what bewitchment!
King. Which of you this sight believeth?
All. Christ is the true God Almighty!
King. Can you not perceive, blind people,
How appearances deceive you?
But to make this matter certain,
I will own myself in error,
If a little while disputing,

Patrick doth convince my reason;
To the argument then listen—
If man's spirit were immortal,
It could never rest a moment
From some active operation.
Patr. Yes, and this is proved in slumber;
For the shapes that dreams engender
Are the workings of the spirit,
Which doth never sleep; but even
When half loosened from the senses
Forms imperfect words and actions:
This is why man often dreameth
Things he waking never thought of.
King. This being so—Polonia lately
Was alive or dead: if only
In a swoon, you wrought no wonder;
But on this I do not rest me—
But if dead, her soul had enter'd
One or other of the places—
Heaven or Hell, as you have taught us:
If 'twere Heaven, it shocks God's mercy,
That for any cause, a spirit
Which had been allowed to enter
Heaven, and taste his grace and favour,
Should be sent back to the world:
This appears to me quite certain;
If in Hell, 'twould shock his justice,
For it were not just that any
Soul, which punishment did merit,
Should obtain so great a favour
As to have the chance of gaining
Grace a second time: it follows,
Either that your words were idle,
Or that, in God's nature, justice
Is another name for mercy:
Where then was Polonia's spirit?

Patr. Hear, Egerio, how I answer:
I concede that Hell or Glory
Must be the great goal and centre
Of the soul baptized, whence no one
Can depart: for so 'tis written
In the laws of the Eternal—
Speaking of God's usual ways—
But if God so willed it, using
His omnipotence, the pit-fall
Of the deepest hell should yield up
Any soul that He demanded:
But this now is not the question.
When a soul is doomed to enter
One or other of the places,
Well it knows its fate the moment
That it leaves the mortal body,
Never to return thereafter:
But when it is doomed to visit,
Once again, the earth, it wanders
Like a traveller through creation,
And, in this way, hangs suspended
In the universe—a portion
Of itself—without obtaining
Any local habitation:
For the Omnipotent—the Highest—
Knowing all things by his prescience,
Since the instant that his essence
Drew the world and all its wonders
Into light—a glorious copy
Of his own divine idea—
Seeing that this thing would happen,
That this soul would come back hither
Held it for a time suspended,
Without giving or denying
It a final place to dwell in.
So far, as a theologian,
Have I answered your objection;
But another truth remaineth
To be told: there are more places
In the other world, than those of Everlasting pain and glory:
Learn, O King, that there's another,
Which is Purgatory; whither
Flies the soul that has departed
In a state of grace; but bearing
Still some stains of sins upon it:
For with these no soul can enter
God's pure kingdom—there it dwelleth

[She arises.]

[Exit.]

Till it purifies and burneth
All the dross from out its nature,
Then it flieth, pure and limpid,
Into God's divinest presence.

King. So you say, but I have nothing,
Save your own words, to convince me;
Give me of the soul's existence
Some strong proof—some indication—Something tangible and certain—
Which my hands may feel and grasp at;
And since you appear so powerful
With your God, you can implore him,
That to finish my conversion,
He may show some real being,
Not a mere ideal essence
Which all men can touch: remember,
But one single hour remaineth
For this task: this day you give us
Certain proofs of pain or glory,
Or you die: where we are standing
Let your God display his wonders—
And since we, perhaps, may merit
Neither punishment nor glory,
Let the other place be shown us,
Which you say is Purgatory;
That we all may know and worship
God's almighty power and greatness:
The honour of thy God is resting
On thee—tell him to defend it!

[They all go out but PATRICK.]

Patr. Here, Mighty Lord, dart down thy searching glance,
Arm'd with the dreadful lightnings of thine ire,
Wing'd with thy vengeance as the bolt with fire,
And rout the squadrons of fell ignorance:
Come not in pity to the hostile band,
Treat not as friends thy enemies abhorr'd—
But since they ask for portents, Mighty Lord,
Come with the blood-red lightnings in thy hand.
Of old, Elias ask'd with burning sighs
For chastisement, and Moses did display
Wonders and portents: in the self same way
Listen, O Lord, to my beseeching cries,
And though I be not great or good as they,
Still let my accents pierce the listening skies!
Portents and chastisement, both day and night,
I ask, O Lord, may from thy hand be given;
That Purgatory, Hell, and Heaven
May be revealed unto these mortals' sight.

A good ANGEL descends on one side and a bad ANGEL on the other.

B. Angel. Fearful that the favouring skies
May accede to Patrick's prayer,
And discover to him where
Earth's most wondrous treasure lies;
Like a minister of light
Hither have I dared to range,
That I may disturb and change
That same prayer with demon might.

G. Angel. Back again, then, thou may'st soar,
Cruel monster; to defend
Patrick do I here attend:
But be silent, speak no more:—
Patrick, God has heard thy prayer,
He has listen'd to thy vows;
And as thou hast ask'd, allows
Earth's great secrets to lie bare.
Seek along this island ground
For a vast and darksome cave,
Which restrains the lake's dark wave,
And supports the mountains round;
He who dares to go therein,
Having first contritely told
All his faults, shall there behold
Where the soul is purg'd from sin:
He shall see with mortal eyes
Hell itself—where those who die
In their sins for ever lie,
In the fire that never dies.
He shall see, in blest fruition,
Where the happy souls do dwell.
But of this be sure as well—
He who without true contrition
Enters there to idly try
What the cave may be, doth go
To his death—he'll suffer wo

While the Lord doth reign on high—
Who this day shall set you free
From this poor world's weariness;
It is thus that God doth bless
Those who love his name like thee.
He shall grant to you, in pity,
Bliss undream'd by mortal men—
Making thee a denizen
Of his own celestial city.
He shall to the world proclaim
His omnipotence and glory,
By the wondrous Purgatory,
Which shall bear thy sainted name.
Lest thou think the promise vain
Of this miracle divine,
I shall take this shape malign,
Which came hither to profane
Your devotion, and within
This dark cavern's dread abyss
Fling it; there to howl and hiss
In the everlasting din.

[The Angels disappear.]

Patr. May the Heavens proclaim thy praise!
For thou lovest to impart,
Mighty Lord! how great thou art,
By thy wonder-working ways!
Come, Egerio!

[All enter.]

King.

Well!

Patr.

With me
Come along this mountain's base,
Thou shalt see the destined place—
Thou and all who come with thee—
Where the severed souls remain;
Some in bliss and some in pain—
Of a never-ending sorrow,
Of a night that knows no morrow,
Thou a rapid glance shalt gain:
Thou shalt see where angels dwell
In a bright and happy sphere.
In the wonders buried here
Thou shalt see both Heaven and Hell!
Pause, O Patrick! thou are going
To a dark and dismal spot—
Where the mid-day sun hath not Ever entered bright and glowing—
Where no living thing is growing;
Shunn'd at once by man and brute.
Cease then from thy vain endeavour,
For that rugged path was never Trodden by a human foot!

Phil.

We for many a lengthen'd year,
Who have lived here from our youth,
Never dared to learn the truth
Of the secrets hidden here:
For the entrance did appear
Terror guarded, as to make
Even the bravest bosom chill!
None have ever cross'd this hill,
Or this dark mysterious lake.

King.

And the only sound we heard,
Borne the troubled wind along,
Was the sad funereal song
Of some lone nocturnal bird.

Phil.

Do not persist to enter here.

Patr.

Let not fear disturb your breasts—
'Tis a heavenly treasure rests
In this cavern.

King.

What is fear?

Could the wild volcano wake
Any feeling of the name?
No; although the central flame
Rush'd thereout, and lightnings brake
From the Heaven's disjointed sphere—
Though the cover'd earth were brown
With the smoke and fire rained down,
Yet my soul were proof to fear.

Enter POLONIA.

Polon.

Stay! unhappy people, stay!
Daring, wild, and indiscreet,
Pass not in with erring feet—
Ruin lieth in the way!

From myself, with hurried footsteps, flying,

I have sought this wilderness profound:
 Where the pure bright summer beam is dying
 In the shadows of this hill oak-crown'd—
 That at length as in its dark grave lying,
 Never more could my offence be found:
 Here I seek a brief repose from strife,
 Shutting out the angry waves of life—
 Not a guide had hostile fate decreed me,
 As I dared upon my path to stray,
 Vain the hand that would attempt to lead me,
 Through the tangled wildness of the way,
 From the terror; yet I have not freed me
 From the admiration and dismay,
 Which were waken'd by this mountain's gloom,
 And the hidden wonders of its womb;
 See this rock (that it has not descended O'er the vale a miracle appears!)
 Still it hangs as it has hung suspended,
 Threat'ning ruin for unnumber'd years;
 In the mountain's cavern'd jaws extended
 Still it lieth—checks and interferes
 With the breath that from this cave escapes,
 Wherewith the melancholy mountain gapes:
 By these cypress trees, in terror speeding
 Through the lips of sever'd rocks, I stray'd,
 There I saw a monstrous neck receding,
 Deep and dark and noisome in the shade,
 Though little life the sunless air was breeding—
 Some useless plants about the entrance played
 Of that vast space—the horror and affright
 Of day, and dwelling of the frozen night:
 I enter'd there to try and make my dwelling
 Within the cave: but here my accents fail,
 My troubled voice, against my will rebelling,
 Doth interrupt so terrible a tale:
 What novel horror, all the past excelling,
 Must I relate to you, with cheeks all pale,
 Without cold terror on my bosom seizing,
 And even my voice, my breath, my action freezing?
 But scarce had I o'ercome my hesitation,
 And gone within the cavern's vaults profound,
 When I heard such shrieks of lamentation,
 Screams of grief that shook the walls around—
 Curses, blasphemy, and desperation;
 Crimes avow'd that would even Hell astound—
 Which the Heavens, determin'd not to hear,
 Had placed within this prison dark and drear.
 Let him come who doubts what I am telling—
 Let him bravely enter who denies—
 Soon his ears shall hear the dreadful yelling—
 Soon the horrors gleam before his eyes—
 But for me I feel my bosom swelling,
 And my tongue grow silent with surprise,
 I must cease—for it is wrong, I feel,
 Heaven's most wondrous secrets to reveal.

Patr. This cave, Egerio, which you see, concealeth
 Many mysteries of life and death,
 Not for him whose hardened bosom feeleth
 Nought of true repentance or true faith,
 But he who freely enters, who revealeth
 All his sins with penitential breath,
 Shall endure his purgatory then,
 And return forgiven back again.

King. Dost thou think, O Patrick, that my spirit
 Is so despicable poor and weak,
 That a woman's nature I inherit?
 But which of you shall enter? Phillip speak.

Phil. My Lord, I dare not.

King. Captain, then the merit
 Is for thee.

Capt. My Lord, some other seek.

King. Laoghaire, thou wilt not act the part of those?

Laog. My gracious Lord, the Heavens interpose!

King. O cowards! lost to every sense of shame!
 Unfit to gird the warrior's sword around
 Your shrinking loins—Men are ye but in name!
 Well, I myself shall be the first to sound
 The depths of this enchantment and proclaim
 Unto this Christian, that my heart unawed,
 Nor dreads his incantations, nor his God!

[Here the mouth of the cave is discovered, the most horrible that can be imagined; within it is a pit, into which EGERIO rushes; he sinks in it with much noise—flames rise from below, and many voices are heard.]

Polon. How terrible!

Laogh.

How awful!

Phil.

What a wonder!

Capt.

The earth is breathing out its central fire.

[Exit.

Laog.

The axis of the sky are burst asunder.

[Exit.

Polon.

The Heavens are loos'ning their collected ire.

[Exit.

Lesb.

The earth doth shake, and peals the sullen thunder.

[Ex.

Patr.

O Mighty Lord, who will not now admire

Thy wondrous works?

[Exit.

Phil.

Who that is not insane

Will enter Patrick's Purgatory again?

END OF ACT II.

A SHORT

History of the Irish Franciscans.

XIV. WEXFORD.—The convent of Wexford, in the maritime town of that name, in the diocese of Ferns, in Leinster, is considered to have been founded about the year 1260, since it was placed under the Custody of Dublin by the general chapter of Narbonne, held in that year. It was reformed in the second year of the reign of Henry VIII., King of England, the year of our Lord 1486. In the third year of the reign of the Queen of England, the year of Christ 1560, it was devastated and ruined by the heretics, and remained in this condition till the year 1615, when Father Daniel Mooney, being provincial, a residence was erected in the town, and Father John Synnott, a man of respectability, and a preacher, was appointed superior, who, along with his brethren, sowed the word of God and the truth of the faith, in the neighbouring country. The first founders of this convent are supposed to have been the Chiefs of the Fitzgerald family; and, in the English Annals of Ireland, it is related that Maurice, the first of the Geraldine family who came to Ireland, died in Wexford, in 1177, and was buried in the monastery of the Grey Friars, a name which was applied to the Franciscans on account of the grey colour of their habits; but this cannot be the case, since St. Francis himself was not born at that time, unless, as some would have it, that the convent was previously in the possession of other religious, and was transferred by the Geraldines to the Franciscans.

"On the 11th October, 1649,* the octave day of

* It was on this day, as we learn from Cromwell's Letters, that Wexford was taken, [See O. Cromwell's Letters and Speeches. By Carlyle. Vol. II, p. 78.] by the captain yielding up the castle, which commanded the town. We learn, from the conditions proposed to Cromwell by Colonel David Sinnott the governor, and rejected, that the secular and regular clergy were, at that time, in possession of their churches and convents. No notice was taken, in Cromwell's dispatches, of the massacre of the friars, here related, unless the following may refer to it. He speaks of the slaughter of the inhabitants:—"Of those, scarce one in twenty can challenge any property in their houses.—Most of them are run away, and many of them were killed in this service. God," he says, "by an unexpected providence in his righteous justice, brought a just judgment on them, causing them to become a prey to the soldiers, who, in their piracies, had made preys of so many poor families, and now with their blood to answer the cruelties exercised upon the lives of so many divers poor Protestants." He gives two "instances;" one was—"They put divers poor Protestants into a chapel (which since they have used for a mass-house, and in which one or more of their priests were now killed), where they were famished to death." This "instance," then, I imagine, refers to the massacre of the Franciscans. As for the cruelty to the poor Protestants, we would wish to have some better authority for it than that of the ruthless fanatic, justifying his murder by blasphemously appealing to the providence of God.

the feast of St. Francis, in Wexford in Ireland, seven friars of the Order of Minors, all men of extraordinary merit, and natives of the town itself, perished by the swords of the heretics. They were, 1st.—Father Richard Sinnot, a lector of theology, formerly first diffinitor and custos, and frequently guardian. 2nd.—John Esmond, a preacher and confessor, formerly guardian and many times confessor of nuns. 3rd.—Father Paulinus Synnot, a preacher and confessor, and formerly confessor of nuns;—he suffered a great deal for the faith among the Turks, for he exercised at one time, a plenary commission from his Holiness, Urban VIII., over all Catholics detained in captivity. 4th.—Father Raymond Stafford, a most eloquent man, and formerly guardian; he was heir to his father's estate, but despising all things for Christ he determined to follow his Saviour, under the banner of St. Francis; and, for fifteen months before his death, led an austere and mortified life in a certain island, taking food but once in the day, and that only such as is used in lent. 5th.—Father Peter Stafford, a man entirely given up to prayer; he acted as parish priest for fifteen years, with the greatest praise, in the time of persecution, as there was then no secular priest to fill the office. 6th.—Brother Didacus Chouers, a lay-brother, over seventy years of age, and blind. 7th.—Brother James Rochford, a lay-brother likewise, these were both men of innocent and exemplary lives, and laborious in their vocation. Some of them were killed kneeling before the altar, and others while they were hearing confessions. Father Raymond Stafford, holding the crucifix in his hand, came out of the church to encourage the citizens, and, preaching with great zeal to the infuriated enemies themselves, was killed by them in the public market-place. As those religious were all of exemplary life and abounding in virtue, and as their death was precious in the sight of the Lord, he did not long delay to manifest his judgments in their regard. 1st.—When they were fired at the musket balls fell near some of them without doing them any injury. This I heard from Mrs. Margaret Keating, of the county Wexford, to whom it was told by the enemy themselves in the presence of her children and family. 2nd.—When they were cut down by the sword, it happened that a portion of their blood stained the hand of one of their executioners, and, though he tried every means to remove it, he never could do so—all the water in the world would have no effect on it. I heard this from Mr. John French, of Ballolone, in the county of Wexford, who saw the blood with his own eyes, and heard all the circumstances from the malefactor himself after the city was taken; for he settled there, and told the story with the most profound sorrow, saying: I will carry to my grave the mark which you see of the blood of the religious man I killed. 3rd.—Mrs. Margaret Keating, the wife of Captain Doran, and the daughter of Mr. Wm. Keating, states, that she heard, in the presence of many persons, from a certain soldier in the English army, of the name of Weaver, that while the friars, mortally wounded, were breathing their last in the street, he, out of compassion, to put an end to their agony, fired two balls at one of them, and though they struck his capuce, they did not penetrate it, but fell on one side: Weaver was told to fire at him once more, but he said: I have done quite enough; up to this I have never killed any of the Irish, neither will I do so. He forsook the army and became a Catholic: I was sent for myself to reconcile him to the church, but could not be found at the time, so that I never saw him, but nothing can be more certain than the fact that he was received into the church by the Rev. Patrick Hampton, of pious memory, the Chancellor of Ferns. 4th.—Several of the soldiers, who dared to wear their habits, perished miserably. Mr. William Hore, of Harperstown, in the county of Wexford, told me, that a certain English soldier wore one of their habits in his house, and he, in a friendly way, admonished him to leave it off as it was not safe to scoff at St. Francis or the other saints, but the soldier said that was all childish superstition. 5th. Francis Whitty, a gentleman of the county Wexford, told me, that he saw one of the English soldiers, after putting on the habit of one of the massacred friars, die a horrible death blaspheming. 6th.—It is currently reported, that when one of the soldiers fired at the crucifix which Father Raymond held in his hand, that the bullet rebounded and killed their captain. This I heard from Sir Thomas Edmond, (Esmond?) knight, and several others. 7th.—Father John Turner, the parish priest of Maglare, told me, that he saw, on the very day in which the friars and others were killed, a glorious and splendid flame of fire, ascending to heaven, over the town of Wexford. When this happened he was five miles from the town, and knew nothing of it having been taken on that day, or of the religious being put to death there. 8th. Strange things happened also to some of the enemy who took possession of the convent previously inhabited by the friars, for many of them died soon after and were buried in the garden of the convent; and those who remained were constantly troubled, so that they told their neighbours that they knew now they had done very wrong in killing the friars, and that they would live no longer in their house, though there was not another residence in all Wexford. I learned this from some of the neighbours, who were perfectly acquainted with the fact. I, the undersigned, protest, on the word of a priest, that all the foregoing facts were related to me by the secular persons mentioned, and that I have faithfully written them as they were told to me." "B. FRANCIS STAFFORD, of the Conception, Preacher and Confessor, and formerly Guardian, of the Convent of Wexford."—Addit aliena manu.*

XV. KILDARE.—The convent of Kildare was founded in the episcopal see of Kildare, in Leinster, about the year 1254, and was formerly placed under the Custody of Dublin. It was reformed in the year 1450, and destroyed by the heretics in the year 1547. It remained desolate till the year 1621, when, under the provincialate of Father Nicholas Shea, it was again occupied by the friars, and repaired, Peter M'Gheghogan being appointed superior. The first founder of this convent was the Chief of the Earls of Kildare, and a magnificent tomb was built for him in the chapel of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Others of the same family were also buried there, as well as many nobles of the neighbouring territory. There was a chapter held here in 1320.†

* We give this curious document in the words of the author, without, however, pledging ourselves to the supernatural facts recorded. It is natural to suppose that the pious Catholic witnesses of the horrible massacre of their venerated clergy, would look for some Divine interposition in the punishment of their murderers, and in perfect good faith confound natural causes with supernatural manifestations.

† A Franciscan convent flourishes still in Wexford. It is en-

XVI. ARMAGH.—The convent of Armagh was built in the metropolitan city of all Ireland, Armagh in Ulster. It was founded before the year 1260, but the friars were solemnly inducted into it, long after, by the Most Rev. Patrick O'Scanlan, the primate, and hence it was that the opinion spread abroad that he was the founder of the convent. It was placed under the Custody of Nenagh by the general chapter of Narbonne. It began to be reformed about the year 1518, but the reformation was not complete until the time of the prince, John O'Neill, called O'Neill the Great, and, at his instance, the convent was given up to the Observantines, under the provincialate of Father Walter M'Wade. When the English wars and persecutions began, the heretics, in the year 1587, under the leadership of one Donald, spoiled the convent, and flogged some of the friars whom they caught, the rest having escaped. The friars, for all that, continued to live in community in the neighbourhood, under the protection of the unconquerable prince, Hugh O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, who had a most special affection for the brethren of the Seraphic institute. For many years he was engaged in constant war against Queen Elizabeth, draining the treasury of the English crown, and exhausting its forces, while he preserved the Catholic faith in his own territory and that of others; at length, obliged to yield to the tyranny of England, in the year 1607, he fled to Rome, together with the Prince O'Donnell, his children, and many other nobles, exiles for their faith; having lost his two sons, Hugh and Henry, who died young, he rested in the Lord, by a holy death, in the year 1615. He left after him one son, his heir, who was colonel of the Irish brigade in the Netherlands, and who was destined for great things. He had the same love for the Seraphic order as his ancestors and father; and, in the year 1616 he became a member of the third order of St. Francis. Some think that the first founder of this convent was M'Domhnall Galloglach; others, the Primate of Armagh, already mentioned; but the most probable opinion is, that it was Prince O'Neill.*

XVII. GALWAY.—The convent of Galway, in the maritime city of that name, in the diocese of Enagh-down, now united to the archiepiscopal see of Tuam, in the province of Connaught, was placed under the Custody of Nenagh, in the general chapter of Narbonne in 1260. It was founded about the year 1247, and was reformed in the first year of the Reformation, that is, 1460. When heresy sprung up, it was suppressed in the fourth year of Edward VI., King of England; the dwelling-house was thrown down, and the church alone was preserved entire on account of the tombs of the nobility who were buried there. It was afterwards converted into a court-house for the judges of assize. It remained in that state till the year 1612, when, Father Maurice Ultan being provincial, a residence was built in the city, and the friars, by frequent preaching, laboured strenuously for the salvation of souls. The church, which was burned down, was restored in 1616, by Father Henry Brennach, a most learned theologian. The first founder of this convent was William De Burgo, Baron of Clanrickard, and his posterity are now earls of the same territory, and are branched out into other noble families. They changed their burial place, some years ago, from this convent to another place, but still the first noblemen of that country, and the first citizens of Galway erected and maintain sumptuous burial places for themselves there. Provincial chapters were held here in 1319 and 1494.†

† The present Franciscan convent in Galway, is called the Abbey. The church, a modern erection, in the Doric style, is well worthy of a visit from the admirers of ecclesiastical architecture. In the Nun's Island there is a large convent of Clare nuns, under the government of the Franciscans, and a curious document is in their possession relative to the establishment of the nuns of St. Clare in this kingdom. "In the year 1625, six nuns, of the first Order of St. Clare, and of the Collet Reformation, came from Gravelin to Dublin to found, where they lived in Cloister (their names were Mary Joseph, and Cisley Foran, both daughters to Sir Viscount O'Dillon, &c.) for two years, and during that time they received twelve more, and were then by the Lord Lieutenant banished out of the city. They then went to the Bethlen, where they increased to sixty. Some time after provincial, Barnwall, sent seven of them to found a convent in Drogheda, not inferior in virtue and austerity to Bethlen, where there was also an exemplary convent of the third order in Cloyster, that founded many others of the same order. They led a most perfect life in Bethlen, till the approach of the troubles, when their provincial, Anthony Mac Geoghegan, afterwards bishop of Meath, was requested by the inhabitants of Galway to send some of them, and in particular those of their own town, that were there to found a convent of the same rule and constitution in Galway. Said provincial, with the diffinitory and other grave fathers sent, fourteen nuns to Galway. About 1642, they founded in Galway. Of the thirty that remained in Bethlen, after the convent was burned, the Vicaress Martha, with some others, went to Wexford, where they founded a convent of the same constitution, &c. In 1642 the remainder of the nuns of Bethlen settled in Athlone; and those of Drogheda, by Cromwell taking it, were forced to go to Wexford. Some of the nuns of Galway founded in Loughrea some time about those years. In 1652, when Cromwell subdued the kingdom, all those convents were dissolved. The visible punishments that fell on those who burned Bethlen, occasioned their enemies to be more moderate to the nuns, although not content to be permitted to live, when they could not live together, and in Cloyster, they chose to go abroad; I mean as many of them as could procure means to do so. Sister Catherine Bernard, alias Brown, abbess of Galway, died in odour of sanctity in Madrid, in 1654, much venerated both before and after her death. Subsequently Margaret Clare, alias Tommines, died in 1659, in the odour of sanctity. In 1641, Sister Mary Gabriel, alias Martin, was elected abbess, to be foundress and abbess in Galway, with twelve other sisters, and in Bethlen, Drogheda, and Waterford, they observed the first rule, with the Collet constitutions, in the greatest purity and austerity. In the first year they received in Galway eighteen novices; in 1644 they received five more; in 1648 the corporation of Galway granted them the Nuns' Island, where they built a commodious house, with 200 and odd pounds of the sisters portions, from whence in Cromwell's time they were banished and went to Spain. The troubles being over in Charles II. reign, Alicia and Elizabeth Barrett, with some other sisters, divinely inspired, returned to Galway and settled in the said island. N.B.—Mary Gabriel, first abbess of Galway, before going to Spain, had for her portion £200; sister Catherine Blake's portion, in 1641, was £165; sister Elizabeth Blake's portion was £150; sisters Mary Anne and Sabina Kelly, their portion was a maintenance through life; Mary Augustin Skerret's portion was £100; Mary Patrick, alias Deans, had £100; Mary Jommines and Bridget Bodkin, £100 each; same time, sisters Catherine Patrick and Anne Darcy's, both sisters, had £500; sister Elizabeth Bab. Lynch, £100; sister Cisley Francis, alias Lynch, £140."

riched with a valuable library, and the archives contain many interesting manuscripts relative to Irish ecclesiastical affairs; among the rest, several of Peter Walsh's papers are there preserved.

* Other accounts say that this convent was founded by William De Vesey, and completed by Gerald Fitzmaurice, Lord Offaly. Hugh O'Neill sleeps among the Franciscans, whom he loved so well. On the summit of the Janiculum in Rome, stand the church and convent of St. Peter, in Montorio. There it was that the illustrious Luke Wadding lived before he established his own convent of St. Isidore. On the floor of the church are two marble slabs, commemorating the virtues and sufferings of Tyrone and Tyrconnell, who rest beneath. Among the manuscripts in the archives of St. Isidore is one, in the Irish language, marked "The flight of O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, after the rebellion of Sir Cahir O'Doherty, in 1607."

Ecclesiastical Architecture.

PART III.

In the examination of the details of decoration in ancient ecclesiastical structures, we perceive the spirit of symbolical teaching* still predominant and united

* The spiritual significance which many of the writers of the middle ages attributed to every portion of a church, is worthy of observation. Durandus says—"The roof signifies charity, which covereth a multitude of sins; the floor signifies humility, of which with the greatest artistic beauties. The floor glows with encaustic tiles of various beautiful and mystic devices, and with monumental brasses,† containing pious aspirations for the eternal happiness of those whom they commemorate. Looking forward to the chancel, you will find it divided from the main portion of the church by a screen of exquisite design and workmanship, bearing aloft the holy rood, or representation of our Lord on the cross, with figures of his blessed Mother, and the beloved disciple. Often was the screen decorated with groups of sculpture, brilliant colours, and gilding, and not unfrequently, with precious stones. The chancel was the great object of attention, and on it was lavished the highest efforts of artistic genius. This was the seat of the adorable mysteries, and the glories that radiated from its sanctuary were suggestive of the heavenly Jerusalem of which it was the faint and imperfect type. The chapels dedicated to our blessed Lady, the patron, and other saints, were kept in due subordination to the chancel, which was the "Holy of Holies;" but often the pious zeal and liberality of the founders made them appropriate adjuncts of the sacred locality. The windows were too convenient opportunities for the display of varied beauties to be neglected; and hence we find them not only filled with delicate and intricate tracery in stone, but bright with "celestial radiance." A pious poet,‡ whom we can now number amongst the reconciled and faithful children of the one Catholic Church, says,

"I saw the sunbeams steal
Through painted glass at even song, and weave
Their three-fold tints upon the marble near Faith, Prayer, and Love."

Here were united all glowing and contrasted tints, yet producing one harmonious effect; nor were these colours arranged in meaningless display, from them shone forth subjects from Scripture and Church history, and edifying representations of fathers and martyrs of the church, or they served as beautiful memorials of the departed faithful. Unity of design pervaded all. It was not sufficient that windows, and floor, and chancel, and screen were so decorated, but the walls and roofs had also their appropriate adornments. Pious texts, or suitable frescoes, covered the former, while the roofs glowed again with colours, and gilding. In open wooden roofs, the spaces between the rafters were covered with azure and spangled with stars. But, in fact, to examine and enumerate the various beauties of details, the canopied niches, the David saith: 'adhaesit pavimento anima mea,' 'my soul hath cleaved unto the pavement.' The language of St. Paul has consecrated the pillars as an allusion to the apostles and great doctors of the church; James, Cephas, and John, saith he, seemed to be pillars. The glass windows in a church are the Holy Scriptures, which repel the wind and rain, i.e. all hurtful things, but transmit the light of the true sun, i.e. God, unto the hearts of the faithful. They are wider within than without, because the mystical sense is the more ample, and precedeth the literal meaning. Also, by the windows the senses of the body are signified, which ought to be closed to the vanities of this world, and open to receive with all freedom spiritual gifts."

† Mr. Pugin has revived those beautiful memorials of the departed, and has shown in his "True Principles" that they are perfectly suited to our times, and that many parts of modern costume well accord with the style of the ancient delineations on brasses. He has also proved that they are not only much more appropriate and beautiful, but cheaper than those cold quakerly tablets of black and white marble, with which it has been the fashion to disfigure churches in latter times. We intend, in a future number, to speak more particularly on the abuses—not to say irreverence—of modern sepulchral monuments and memorials.

What must have been the emotions produced in the minds of men by these glorious structures, can be in some sort conceived; for in our times, notwithstanding the desecrations of Protestantism in these countries, and the degeneracy of taste, and vitiating influence of Pagan art on the Continent since the sixteenth century, they affect the imagination in such a way as no works of ancient or revived Pagan art ever can. "Let one only represent to himself," says a modern French writer, "the effect of the lights on those prodigious monuments, when the clergy moved in procession through those forests of columns, animating the dark masses, passing and repassing through the long aisles, under those complicated arches, with its rich vestments, its tapers, and its chants, when light and sound of unearthly harmony issued from the choir, while the ocean of people responded from the shade below; there was the true drama, the true mystery, the representation of the journey of humanity through the three worlds, that sublime vision which Dante has immortalized in the "Divina Commedia."

Turning from the contemplation of the works of our Catholic ancestors, to those of our own day, the contrast presented is extremely painful. To point out errors, is not a grateful task, though a necessary duty; for unless the faults are clearly shown, it will be impossible to expect improvement. Nor does it suffice to point out the errors, unless the way of avoiding them is also made clear. If we be severe in our censures, we beg to assure our readers that our reproaches are not intended for individuals.—"Nos omnes peccavimus." We cannot blame those who have erred in ignorance, but the time has come to mend our ways.

During the last thirty years, as much money has been raised within the city of Dublin, and expended on the edifices erected therein for Catholic worship, as would have built two appropriate churches in every parish of the metropolis. We select Dublin as our example, for what has been done there, is of a piece with what has occurred over the entire kingdom. We are sorry to say that not one of those edifices approaches the idea of an ancient Catholic church. They all seem to have been designed and carried forward in utter ignorance of every principle and rule of ecclesiastical art, and with a total disregard of all ancient precedent, the only safe and legitimate guide in those cases. Individual taste seems to have been the sole director in those structures, or more properly speaking, caprice, for we can really see no marks of genuine taste about them. This we conceive to have been one of the most fruitful sources of error. Ecclesiastical, as well as other arts, has its fixed principles, beyond which the greatest genius cannot travel far without perpetrating the most grievous improprieties. We have seen that Catholic symbolism is the true source of Christian art; and we cannot therefore be surprised, that those who either were ignorant of, or despised the source, should greatly err concerning its material development. We do not mean that it is impossible to arrive at future developments of Christian art. That, indeed, would be limiting the powers of the human mind to a very narrow sphere. But we contend, that a new development of art never has been, or never can be the production of an individual mind, but the growth of times and circumstances. In existing art there may be one example better than another, according to the ability and character of the mind, which conceived and matured the design, yet all will bear evident marks of a common origin and tolerably fixed principle. The middle ages produced a species of art, which, as we have seen, was the offspring of the church, most suitable in all its arrangements for the purposes of religion, and illustrative of its doctrines. Its beauty and majesty are undeniable. It affects with religious emotions the hardest hearts and the most sceptical minds. Why not return to that style in our new churches, and give up the vain, selfish, and unattainable notion of "originality," or rather, our false ideas of originality; for surely there is such a thing as "the union of genius and imitation." We hold that the canon of Hugo de St. Victor, concerning ecclesiastical music, is equally applicable to ecclesiastical architecture—"Non enim decet, ut cantus et usus ecclesiasticus fieri debet secundum arbitrium diversorum, sed firmiter servandus est secundum scripta et instituta majorum."

A contemporary periodical* contains the following apposite passage respecting future developments, which we cannot help giving in full: "One caution, and then we conclude. Because Christian architecture may be developed, it does not follow that we are the generation that shall develop it. Far otherwise; we are children, and disobedient ones moreover, and very ignorant, and hitherto extremely idle and truant. We have numberless faults to atone for, and an incalculable amount of ignorance to overcome, before we can hope to do anything towards developing any future degree of excellence in Christian art. We have not yet learned our alphabet, and it is absurd to attempt to compose; we do not know the names of our tools, and it is insane to attempt to model. All that we can expect to do is, to copy carefully in hopes of realizing at the last, through numberless copyings, some first principles which we may store up for our children to make use of. Our task is humble, but it is useful; and the more humble the spirit in which we undertake it, the more surely it will be blessed from above. We do not work for ourselves, we work for other days; and if we undertake our task unselfishly, its results will continue for endless ages, even for evermore."

Another primary cause of the inferiority of modern churches, is a mistaken notion of economy, which we shall see is false in principle, and consequently injurious in its effects, at the same time that it entirely fails in its object.

"Give all thou can'st, high heaven distains the lore
Of nicely calculated, less or more."

That is the true principle of economy. No one should counsel expenditure beyond available means; but it does not follow that because an humble and plain church only can be afforded, a staring and hideous barn must be built. In fact, we are aware of several instances where those barns have been erected, with high staring walls, low roof and gaping windows, at a much greater expenditure than a true but plain church, with characteristic low massive walls, high and bold roof (the strongest and best, and most suited to our climate), could have been built for. Afterwards, in very many of those cases, the clergy and people get ashamed of their church. They see it is not church-like, and they wish to give it some ornament to help out the appearance, which, of course, cannot be done without the once much dreaded expense; but now they are so horrified at their own handy work, that they must need mend it some way or other. Then comes in the play of the "men of taste," such as they are. One suggests "pillars," that is, a revived Pagan portico in front; another prefers a tower behind the altar (the only place we may remark that a tower should not be placed), the lower part of which would serve as a vestry; a third person suggests buttresses to prop up nothing, but just for effect, surmounted by "nice pinnacles" to "set them off." 'Tis well if a fourth does not suggest, in addition to all, to have Roman cement architraves and entablatures to the doors and windows, the outside "coated with compo," and secured by a surcoat of puritanical whitewash. It is no wonder this class of buildings should turn out abominations.

* Ecclesiologist. February, 1846.

When anything like a church of some architectural pretensions is contemplated (and here the saving clause of "economy" cannot be pleaded in defence of barbarity), a professional architect is sent for, perhaps some enlightened worthy who entertains a profound contempt for the "dark ages," and everything appertaining thereto, and whose ideas of ecclesiastical art are limited to the magical "five orders," and their application to assembly rooms and "T houses" for Catholic worship. He, of course, has no certain opinions on the subject, but is willing "to draw" anything his employers desire, be they ever so ignorant, and their demands ever so absurd and ridiculous; and all styles are the same to him. The "Grecian fret," "Italian guillochi," "urns and vases," which he perpetrated in his last coffee-room or cigar-divan, he is willing to repeat even "ad nauseam" in his new church. From this source emanates either of two descriptions of modern church—the pseudo classic style, or mock pointed architecture. The Pagan temples of old were doubtlessly beautiful objects, perfectly adapted to their purposes, and characteristic of their use; but we are not Pagans in religion, nor is the climate of our country like that of Greece or of Italy; therefore, Pagan temples cannot be revived here without certain alterations and adaptations to suit them to our clime and religion. Those being made, the temple is destroyed. Either the idea of a Pagan temple or a Christian church must be abandoned. Hence we find, that modern churches which have attempted to combine both, are utter abortions.

When the classic styles do not chance to find favour, the only alternative appears to be the gothic. We have not had anything Egyptian or Moresque, although we have had an overflow of the nondescript styles, probably called "originals;" but we may truly call modern attempts at pointed architecture gothic, in the real sense of the term. In those "gothic" edifices the faults are as manifold and as greivous as in the pseudo classic styles; for in them we find no aim at ecclesiastical propriety. Architects appear to think it quite sufficient to put pointed arches to doors and windows,* and to stick a hideous sentry-box, by way of a tower, at one end of the church. The due orientation is vainly looked for—a vestige of a chancel turned eastwards. "Whence the tall window drinks the morning rays" is nowhere discernible, nor indeed any of the features of an ancient church, but a profusion of meaningless and expensive decorations. How often do we see a "street front" of neatly hewn stone, consisting of useless buttresses and pinnacles, blanks and recesses, ins and outs, mock doors and windows, all "got up" merely to "look well," which they never can, as they do not unite utility with decoration, and all this at an expense which might have supplied the essentials of a true ecclesiastical edifice. We know of structures at present being erected at an expense which, if properly applied, would produce really beautiful and true churches, yet the old method of mere showiness against truth and reality is pursued; and this is all the more reprehensible at the present, than at any former time, so much ecclesiological information having been of late set forth by Mr. Pugin and others, that ignorance can no longer be pleaded as an excuse.

As we have been criticising, and we hope not over severely, the general character of modern ecclesiastical architecture, we are, before concluding our present article, bound in justice to take some particular notice of a few churches, which are designed or in progress, and which give satisfactory indications of a better state of things than has hitherto prevailed. The churches being erected in Ireland from the designs of Mr. Pugin, are, it is almost needless to say, in the true style. Killarney cathedral will be a glorious structure, and in every respect most consoling to those who ardently desire a return to the glories of the olden times. It will be a cruciform church, complete in all its arrangements; it will consist of a nave and aisles, well proportioned transepts, and spacious choir or chancel, with side chapels. There will be no false ornament about it, but everything will be real and consistent. The church of St. Kevin, at Glendalough,† by Mr. McCarthy, is the first uncompromisingly true church of the old type erected within the archdiocese of Dublin. It is a small structure, and extremely plain and simple, suited to the romantic locality in which it is situated, consisting of the two essential parts of a church, a nave, and fairly proportioned chancel. It will have a south porch in the second bay of the nave from the west end, and a sacristy on the north side of the chancel. Internally all the arrangements and furniture will be complete, including baptismal font, chancel screen, stone altar, &c., &c. The new churches of Ballinasloe, and of Kilskyre, in the county of Meath, by the same architect, will be also in the true style. We have seen some designs for churches by Mr. Atkins of Cork, which show that that gentleman is well skilled in ecclesiastical art, and induce us to hope that he is one of those whose mission is to contribute, both by precept and example, to the dissemination of sound principles and practice. The churches erected in Dundalk and Newry, and the Cathedral in progress in Armagh, by Mr. Duff, are works of considerable architectural merit; but unfortunately Catholicity of arrangement has been too much neglected in those productions. We entertain hope, however, that the artist will make amends for former defects, and that in future he will give his valuable aid to the cause of Catholic art.

Indeed we can never hope for extensive and permanent improvement, till we possess a class of architects

† Vide Battersby's Directory for the present year.

* "The pointed arch is only one element of the pointed style, though it is the chief one. Verticality, as opposed to horizontality, was the real principle, and this seems to have been suggested by the pointed arch. But the mere use of the pointed arch alone would not make a gothic building."—Paley's Manual, p. 65.

who will be devoted to their profession from the highest and purest motives; men who will cheerfully sacrifice emolument for the maintenance of their principles. On this subject, the recent translators* of the first book of "Durandus' Rationale," make some admirable observations; the truthfulness and beauty of which, induce us to give them at full length in this place: "A Catholic architect must be a Catholic in heart. Simple knowledge will no more enable a man to build up God's material than His spiritual temples. In ancient times, the finest buildings were designed by the holiest bishops. Wykeham and Poore will occur to every churchman. And we have reason to believe, from God's word, from Catholic consent, and even from philosophical principles, that such must always be the case.

"Holy Scripture, in mentioning the selection of Bezaleab and Aholiab as architects of the tabernacle, expressly asserts them to have been filled with the SPIRIT OF GOD in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, to devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in cutting of stones to set them, and in carving of timber to work in all manner of workmanship. And this indeed is only a part of the blessing of the pure of heart, they see God the fountain of beauty, even in this life, as they shall see him the fountain of holiness in the next. From Catholic consent we may learn the same truth. Why else was ecclesiastical architecture made a part of the profession of clerks, than because it was considered that the purity and holiness of that profession fitted them best for so great a work?

"Nay, we have remarkable proofs that feeling without knowledge will do more than knowledge without feeling. Now, allowing the respectability which attaches itself to the profession of a modern architect, and the high character of many in that profession, none would assert that they, as a body, make it a matter of devotion and prayer—that they work for the church alone, regardless of themselves—that they build in faith and to the glory of God.

"In truth, architecture has become too much a profession; it is made the means of gaining a livelihood, and is viewed as a path of honourable distinction, instead of the study of the devout ecclesiastic, who matures his noble conceptions with the advantage of that profound meditation, only attainable in the contemplative life, who, without thought of recompense or fame, has no end in view but the raising a temple worthy of its high end, and emblematical of the faith which is to be maintained within its walls. It is clear that modern architects are in a very different position from their predecessors, with respect to those advantages. We are not prepared to say that none but monks ought to design churches, or that it is impossible for a professional architect to build with the devotion and faith of an earlier time; but we do protest against the merely business-like spirit of the modern profession, and demand from them a more elevated and directly religious habit of mind. We surely ought, at least, to look for church membership from one who ventures to design a church. There cannot be a more painful idea than that a separatist should be allowed to build a house of God, when he himself knows nothing of the ritual and the worship of the church from which he has strayed; to prepare both font and altar, when perchance he knows nothing of either sacrament, but that he has always despised them. Or, again, to think that any churchman should allow himself to build a conventicle, and even sometimes to prostitute the speaking architecture of the church to the service of her bitterest enemies! What idea can such a person have formed of the reality of church architecture? Conceive a churchman designing a triple window, admitted emblem of the MOST HOLY TRINITY, for a congregation of Socinians! We wish to vindicate the dignity of this noble science against the treason of its own professors. If architecture is anything more than a mere trade; if it is indeed a liberal, intellectual art, a true branch of poesy, let us prize its reality and meaning, and truthfulness, and let us not expose ourselves by giving two contraries one and the same material expression.

"The church architect must, we are persuaded, make many sacrifices; he must forego all lucrative undertakings, if they may not be carried through upon those principles which he believes necessary for every good building, and particularly if the end to be answered, or the wants to be provided for, are in themselves unjustifiable or mischievous. Even in church-building itself, he must see many an unworthy rival preferred to him, who will condescend to pander to the whims and comfort of a church committee, will suit his design to any standard of ritualism which may be suggested by his own ignorance, or other's private judgment, who will consent to defile a building meant for God's worship, with pews and galleries, &c. But hard as the trial may be, a church architect must submit to it, rather than recede from the principles which he knows to be the very foundation of his art."

The examples of improved taste and feeling we have mentioned, though few, are nevertheless most encouraging, and give us an assurance, that by perseverance and zeal, truth, reality and Catholicity will again, as in the ages of faith, characterise our ecclesiastical architecture. In conclusion, we must confess, in the language of the good bishop who has been our guide, that "that which is worthy hath been taken from the sayings of others, whose words we have introduced," and beg the reader's indulgence for the imperfections of our own part of the task. For the present we have done, but we shall not be unmindful of the subject, and every help to the good work which we can afford, will be freely given in the pages of the IRISH CATHOLIC MAGAZINE.

Scenes and Legends of Clare.

ROUND Callan's wild mountain so bleak and romantic,*
Fierce howls the rude blast of the stormy Atlantic,
The cloud of the night o'er its summit is stealing,
The mists roll above it—the thunder is pealing!
Old legends are found in the lore of our island,
And some have been told of this desolate highland,
There Conan the swift, of the battle-chase weary,†
Long rests in his mountain-grave lonely and dreary.
Beneath yon grey stone where the brown fern is sweeping,
All silent and lone the dread warrior lies sleeping—

* Mount-Callan, near Miltown Malbay.

† On the top of the mountain is a tombstone, with the following inscription in the ancient Gaelic: "Here lies Conan, the intrepid, and swift-footed." Irish historians state, that Conan was of the line of Brian Boru.

* Rev. John Mason Neale, B.A., and Rev. Benjamin Webb, B.A.

His rust-cover'd sword, which was crimson'd with slaughter,
The peasant hath found by Lough-Callan's blue water,*
And down in that lake, in its clear depths so lowly,
A serpent is laid by a spell that is holy!

The name of the brave that old tomb-stone discloses,
And blest be the spot where the hero reposes—
How hallow'd the scene of his last honour'd pillow,
Be it on the hill side, or beneath the green billow!
Oh bright be their mem'ry so sacred in story,
The chiefs of our Isle in the days of her glory,
Whose battle-axe hew'd through the ranks of the foeman,
Who drove to their galleys, the Dane and the Roman!
In the fanes of our country their ashes lie blended,
Sage, monarch, and chief to the grave have descended,
The saint and the hermit are sharing their slumbers,
The bard, who has silenc'd his war-breathing numbers,
No more to the red field of battle shall guide them—
He hung up his harp, and he's sleeping beside them!

If Nature's stern grandeur can wake thy emotion,
From Callan gaze down on the cliffs and the ocean,
Where rocky Malbay the rough surges is braving,†
And loud on its shore the hoarse billows are raving!
Behold—they rush on with their white crests uprearing,
Like the foaming of war-steeds to battle careering,
They crash on the cliffs—and in air dash'd asunder,
Like giants they fall with a death-note of thunder!
Beneath that dark wave that so fearfully rages,
The bones of the Spaniard lie bleaching for ages,‡
And oft' o'er the strife of the waters prevailing
A dirge for the brave through the night-cloud is wailing—
And a warrior form with bright armour clashing,
On the path of the storm when lightning is flashing,
While strange and dread notes on the air are resounding,
Is seen on his steed o'er the surf wildly bounding!

On Freagh's stormy cliffs, and no vision is grander,§
In morning's young dawn it is glorious to wander,
To see the bold fisher so dauntless and daring,
His nets and canoe for the ocean preparing,
He looses his skiff from the beach by his dwelling,
But ere he moves off 'midst the breakers rough swelling,
He turns up his eye with a saint's veneration—
And marks on his brow the bless'd sign of salvation!
Oh that is the sign whose bright promise was given
To the victor of old as it blaz'd in the heaven—
On his valorous breast the Crusader hath worn it,
The Saracen fled from the chiefs who have borne it,
And now the poor fisher, to perils no stranger,

* A sword, said to have been far heavier than our modern weapons of war, was dug up near the lake, on Mount-Callan, about half a century back, and transformed into farming implements by some vandal of a blacksmith.

† The beach of Miltown Malbay.

‡ A portion of the Spanish Armada had been cast in near this coast, at a place hence called "Spanish Point." The legend, though not unlike that of O'Donoghue's White Horse, appertaining to Killybeg, is much more appropriate to this wild shore.

§ Freagh is a long line of rocky coast between Miltown and Leihinch.

Still trusts it will guard him in tempest and danger!
Ah! should the night's darkness o'ertake him returning,
His wife, and his fond ones the beacon are burning,
That light o'er the deep is affection's bright warning,
To mark the lov'd shore which he left in the morning;
Yet often in vain the fond signal is gleaming,
And burns from the cliff 'till the day-light is beaming,
He comes not alas—for the wave hath roll'd o'er him—
The deep is his grave—and they're left to deplore him!

The spirit of air, and the ocean rough raging,
In yonder dark cavern wild warfare are waging,*
The wave rushes in, like a cataract roaring,
Its gloomy recesses and fissures exploring,
But meets a dread shock, as a thunder-cloud riven,
And high o'er the rock in the air it is driven,
While the beautiful hues of an iris are blending
With its crystalline spray like a snow-show'r descending.
High, frowning, and dark o'er the waves of the ocean,
Old Moher, thy cliffs mock the tempest's commotion;
Let monuments crumble—time's ravage sustaining,
The bulwarks of nature are proudly remaining!
They say, that at night, from the rocks of Liscannor,†
Is seen on the billow a white waving banner,
Then woe to the mortal whose vision is haunted
By mystical walls that are rising enchanted;
Soon, soon, from his kindred and life he shall sever—
The snare of the storm-fiend shall bind him for ever!

Wild haunts of my boyhood, where oft' I've been roaming
When bleak was the blast, and the winter-wave foaming,
When o'er the dark rocks the rough surges were breaking,
And high in the cloud the shrill seagull was shrieking,
Your legends of yore in the fairy-spells bound me;
And twin'd the sweet wreath of their magic around me!
He is gone to the grave—his life's journey is over,‡
Who told these wild tales to the minstrel and rover,
A saint and a sage—yet he lov'd to unfold them,
He deem'd them not true, for he smil'd as he told them;
The spirit of him, who was sinless and hoary,
Hath pass'd from this earth to a circlet of glory!

Oh Clare, thy rude shores so sublime and so dreary,
Well suit the strange lore of the legend or fairy;
Thou art dear to my soul, and the sky that's above thee,
Through sunshine and tempest 'tis bliss but to love thee!
Unskill'd, the bold harp in thy praise to awaken,
Yet deem not my muse hath thy beauties forsaken,
Lov'd home of my childhood, 'tis sweet to explore thee—
This heart shall be cold ere it cease to adore thee!

† A popular legend that a city rises betimes from the sea, which it is deemed a sign of death to behold. A French History of Ireland, in the library of the Irish College at Paris, throws a curious light upon this tradition. It states, that an earthquake swallowed part of the Clare coast into the sea.

Local Memoirs of Ireland.

GLENDALOUGH.

THE third day of the present month will, to many of our readers, we hope, recall associations of personages and a locality which, we trust, shall ever be dear to Irishmen. It will be the festival or "PATRON DAY" of one of the most renowned of the many illustrious saints of the early Irish church. ST. COEMGEN, or as it is now written, SR. KEVIN, of Glendalough, in the County of Wicklow.

Equal to any other country in Europe's wide extent, as Ireland unquestionably is, in the great men who have adorned her, and in the mighty events which have been enacted on her soil, they have still no bidding place in the memory of her people. We lament the fact, that many localities which have been rendered sacred by the lives of distinguished or holy personages, religious institutions, and remarkable events which should hold prominent places in the memories of Irishmen, are utterly neglected, perhaps despised or desecrated. How great a loss religious sentiment and action, national honour, and we may add, the purest gratification an intelligent being can enjoy, have sustained herein can scarcely be fairly estimated. The desire of visiting places which have been the scenes of memorable events, the birth places, or dwellings of remarkable men, where kingdoms have been raised or annihilated, where human freedom has been achieved or trampled down, where philosophers have taught, sages and saints meditated and prayed, or poets sung, is one of the most general and invariable of human feelings, and is interwoven with the best sympathies of our nature. It has been recognized in all ages and climes. No man ever yet stood and meditated upon a spot sacred in his memory and his feelings, without appreciating more fully than before the events of which it had been the scene, without feeling, although it might be only momentarily, his love and respect for truth and virtue increase, his patriotism grow warmer, and his hatred of oppression wax stronger. "I have always loved to wander," says Lamartine, "over the physical scenes inhabited by men I have known, admired, loved, or revered, as well among the living as the dead. The country which a great man has inhabited and preferred, during his passage on this earth, has always appeared to me the surest and most speaking relic of himself; a kind of material manifestation of his genius, a mute revelation of a portion of his soul, a living and sensible commentary on his life, actions, and thoughts. And I have been thus attracted by several authors and great men, whose names and writings were deeply engraven on my memory. I wished to study them, and to become acquainted with them on the spot which has given them birth, or that had inspired them; and almost always a scrutinizing glance might discover a secret and profound analogy between the scene and the actor, between the country and the individual who graced it, between nature and the genius which derived its inspirations therefrom." To assist in awakening such feelings and associations in the hearts and minds of our countrymen, is a task peculiarly the province of our MAGAZINE. Most of our interesting localities convey few other or higher sentiments, to the greater number of visitors, than those produced by the natural and characteristic beauties of the scenery. The only pabulum the mind too frequently has, are some idle stories or ill conceived legends, which reflect no credit on the venerable religion, history, or civilization of our land, and are only calculated to bring them into disrepute both at home and abroad. The guide books to our remarkable places are meagre enough. Deficient in elevation of spirit and feeling, they are generally composed of worthless descriptions of what every eye can see, with a few foolish and hacknied legends to make the visitors laugh at the absurdities of the "queer old fellows" who formerly "dwelt thereabouts," or sympathize at the hard fate of the beautiful and young nun who was confined in yonder cell, because she would not go out to her moon-struck lover; or feel piously indignant at the voluntary mortifications endured by the cowed monks for the good of their souls, and that they might the more hospitably entertain strangers, instruct the poor, and feed them on something more solid than soup; with some well-seasoned philosophic observations on the dullness of mind which could have substituted such mere practical observances for the "spirituality" of the newly "enlightened," unpractical though it be. These, with an illustration or two, explanatory of some "popular superstition," a vignette of a scene that never occurred, and the portrait of an artful knave of a guide, who can "coin more legends at night than will divert the quality by day," by way of a tail piece, form the staple of Irish guide books.

Our object in the present article is neither to supply a suitable guide book to Glendalough, nor to furnish a manual of legends. If we can enable our readers to trace the interesting remains of antique art that abound in that sequestered vale, and call up to their memories some of the men who have graced the scene, or make them appreciate more fully than hitherto the worth of former days, our task will have been accomplished.

Without further preface we enter on our office of guide, first begging our reader, or supposed visitor, to banish from his or her memory the ideal "young St. Kevin" of whom he or she may have heard as a "cruel-hearted saint."

Glendalough is situated in the barony of Ballynacor, in the county of Wicklow, and is about twenty-two miles distant from Dublin. It derives its name from Irish words expressive of one of the chief natural characteristics of the place, "Glean-da-loch," or the "Glen of the two lakes." It is surrounded by lofty and precipitous mountains on all sides, except the east. These mountains are now quite barren and bare of wood, although some centuries ago they were covered with trees to the very tops. Within less than a century since, the lower parts of the mountains were thickly wooded, but now nearly every trace of foliage has disappeared, except in the narrow ravine called Pollanass, between Derrybawn and Lugduff mountains on the south side of the valley. There a mountain torrent tumbles from a considerable height through a series of beautiful cascades and natural basins, till it reaches the bottom of the vale, where its waters unite with those of the river Avonmore, which winds its tortuous course through the scene, and thence on by Rathdrum (a few miles beyond which it joins the Avonbeg, at the famed "Meeting of the Waters"), till it falls in with the Avoca. It was a portion of the territory of the O'Tirthuathal, the country of the ancient sept of the O'Tooles, who once owned sovereign sway here. St. Coemgen,* or, as it is now written, St. Kevin, the pronunciation being the same, was of this illustrious race. With him begins such authentic history of Glendalough as we possess. He is said to have been born in the year 498, and to have lived to the extraordinary and venerable age of 120 years. Be this as it may, it is certain that his death took place on the 3rd June, 618. His father's name was Coemlog, and his mother was a princess of the house of Dal Mas-sincorb, and was called Coemella. He was baptized by St. Cronan, and when he had attained his seventh year, he was placed under the tutorage of St. Petrocus, a Briton, who had spent twenty years in Ireland, engaged in the acquisition of knowledge. Having spent five years with St. Petrocus, he was transferred to the care of three holy anchorets, named Dogain, Lochan, and Enna, or Æneas, with whom he studied, and became well versed in the holy Scriptures. Leaving his three tutors, he became a disciple of the hermit Beonanus, and afterwards of a bishop named Lugid, who ordained him a priest, and directed him to build a cell for himself at a place called Cluanduach. Obtaining many disciples in this place, who, we have good reason to believe, led rather an anchoretical than a conventual life, somewhat like the solitarii of the primitive Christians in the east, and the Carthusians of a later period, he left the care and government of the establishment to some of his monks, and, taking the remainder of his disciples with him, returned to his own country. He founded an abbey at Glendalough, as is generally supposed about the year 549, and dedicated it under the invocation of St. Peter and St. Paul. In the same year he went to Clonmacnoise, to see its founder, the celebrated St. Kieran, but did not arrive till three days after the saint's death. He, however, assisted at his funeral obsequies. Returning to Glendalough, he visited a holy hermit who lived near Dublin, named Garbhan, who dissuaded him from a long journey which he meditated, telling him "that he ought rather to fix himself in one place than to ramble up and down in his old age, for that he could not but know that no bird could hatch her eggs while flying." It would appear that the saint took the anchorite's advice, for we are told that he retired from his monastery and disciples, and built himself a cell in a deeply wooded recess of the mountains, near the upper lake. Here he lived an ascetic life for four years, till his monks prevailed upon him to return to his abbey, where he dwelt till his death, which took place on the 3rd of June, 618, after he had received the holy viaticum from the hands of Mochurog, a Briton, who dwelt in a cell on the east side of Glendalough.

Hanmer says St. Kevin was the author of two books, one "De Britáinorum Origine," and the other "De Híbero et Heremone," but Harris thinks it more probable that he merely wrote a "rule for monks." Some writers suppose him to have been a bishop, but this is not certain. It is most probable that he was only an abbot, and that Glendalough did not become a bishopric during his life time.

The fame of the sanctity of St. Kevin's life soon attracted crowds of pilgrims and others to Glendalough, which rapidly rose to the distinction of a great city and bishopric, and became "the luminary of the western world, whence savage septs and roving barbarians derived the benefits of knowledge and the blessings of religion." Harris, who is of opinion that St. Kevin was a bishop, says he resigned the see in 612, six years before his death, and that he was succeeded by his nephew, St. Molibba or Libba. It is certain, however, that St. Libba was bishop of Glendalough in the seventh century. He died on the eighth of January, which day is marked in some calendars as his festival, but the exact year is not recorded. Aidan is also mentioned as bishop in the seventh century. There is a large chasm in the history of the see from the latter end of the seventh to that of the ninth century, but the names and succession of many bishops from that period, till the reputed union of the see with that of Dublin, in the thirteenth century, are recorded. Of the lives and public actions of these ecclesiastics, however, unfortunately few records are known to exist. Gilda Na Naomb, bishop of Glendalough, assisted at the synod of Kells in 1152, where Cardinal Paparo distributed the palls to the Archbishops of Ireland. Cineath O'Ronan, bishop, and Benignus, abbot of Glendalough, with St. Laurence O'Toole, were witnesses to the charter for the foundation of the Priory of All-Saints Dublin, granted by Dermot, king of Leinster, to his confessor Edan O'Kelly, bishop of Clogher, in trust for the priory. Cineath O'Ronan died in 1173. Pope Alexander III., by a bull dated 13th May, 1179, in the twentieth year of his pontificate, granted to Malchus, sometimes called Macrobius and Matthew, and to his successors, "the city of Glendalough, in which the cathedral is, with the churches and other the possessions and appurtenances of it," saving the rights of the abbot of Glendalough.

But the most distinguishing individual whose name and memory are associated with Glendalough, is St. Lorcan O'Tuathal, or as it is now written, St. Laurence O'Toole, the glory of his age and country, equally renowned for his sanctity and his patriotism whose counsel and example, had they been acted upon by the chieftains of the land, would have saved Ireland from ages of bondage and suffering such as no people else have ever endured. He was of right royal blood, his father being sovereign prince of Imaile, and his mother a child of the equally noble family of the O'Byrnes. He received the rudiments of secular and religious knowledge in the vale of Glendalough, and at the early age of ten years became remarkable for the earnestness of his youthful piety, as well as for the ardour of his patriotism and the promise of future greatness. At this period the infamous Dermot Mac Murrough was perpetrating acts of the most detestable tyranny, not only upon his own immediate subjects, but also upon neighbouring princes. Without cause he ravaged Imaile, and could only be persuaded from committing the greatest excesses by the surrender of the young Lorcan as an hostage, upon whom he inflicted the most dreadful sufferings his tender frame was able to endure, allowing him but as much food as was barely necessary to support life. The Prince of Imaile having heard of the savage treatment inflicted upon his beloved child, determined to avenge him, and, descending from his mountain fastnesses, made an incursion into Mac Murrough's territory; and having captured twelve of his soldiers, threatened them with immediate death unless his son was restored to him. This threat had the desired effect, and Laurence was again received in Glendalough, where he resumed his studies; and, resolving to abandon worldly honours and distinction, devoted himself to the service of religion. His virtue and abilities became so distinguished, that at the age of twenty-five years he was chosen by the clergy and people to preside over the abbey. The repeated invasions of the Danes, previous to this time, had introduced several relaxations of discipline and many vices hitherto unknown amongst the Irish people. These, the abbot laboured to root out from amongst those committed to his care, and we are told that he was eminently successful. About this time a famine had fallen on the land, and Laurence's liberality and kindness in relieving the distresses of the poor, so endeared him to all classes of people, that at the death of Gilda na Naomb, they sought to raise him to the episcopal dignity; but he declined, alleging that he had not yet attained the canonical age required in a bishop. The death of Gregory, Archbishop of Dublin, occurring in some time after, he was elected to the see of Dublin, which he likewise declined, but afterwards consented, on representations being made to him of the good he would be enabled to effect in so extensive a sphere of action. He was consecrated in Christ's Church Cathedral, in 1162, by Gelasius, the Archbishop of Armagh, assisted by many Irish bishops, to the great joy and satisfaction of the people. By his advice the clergy of his cathedral became regular canons of the order of Aroasia, and he himself also conformed to the strict discipline, and constantly wore the habit of the order under his pontifical robes. King Roderic O'Connor having convened a national council of various classes of his subjects, to meet him at Athboy, in Meath, in order to take counsel together for the preservation of their independence, then menaced by the treason of Mac Murrough and the anticipated invasion of the English, Archbishop Laurence repaired thither and assisted at their deliberations. This council passed many regulations affecting church government and religious discipline. When the English adventurers first arrived before the City of Dublin, Laurence laboured strenuously to stimulate the citizens to boldly oppose their invaders, and to aid in the preservation of the liberties of their country. His efforts, however, were fruitless; the citizens terrified at the martial display of the invading forces, begged their archbishop to become the negotiator of a peace with the strangers. He accordingly advanced into the lines of the enemy, and while discussing the terms of the surrender, Raymond Le Gros, and Milo de Cogan, with a party of their adherents impatient of the prey which they sought, scaled the walls of the city, and commenced a scene of frightful slaughter and pillage within. The archbishop returned, and exercised the peculiar province of his mission in a manner worthy of his character. He walked through the streets at the imminent peril of his own life, everywhere protesting against the atrocities of the invader, but in vain; administering the consolations of religion to the dying, and performing the last sad offices for the dead. Thus fared the first whining petition ever presented by Irishmen to the representatives of English power. If the early Saxon church added to her litany, as we believe she did, the prayer "a furore Normanorum, libera nos Domine," how much greater reason had the Irish church to add the same request. He afterwards endeavoured to unite the Irish princes with the Danes of Dublin, for a combined effort against the English invader, then confined to the narrow limits of Dublin and a few towns on the east coast. The harangue which we may suppose him to have delivered, in one of his exhortations to union, has been rendered into verse of great power and beauty by one of our living poets. It would seem, however, that some fearful judgment hung over the Irish nation; for notwithstanding those vigorous exertions on the part of Archbishop Laurence, and the presence round the entire of Dublin, north, south, and west, of many of the Irish princes with vast forces, while their Danish allies guarded the seas on the east, the English, after having endured a close blockade for two months, being rendered desperate by hunger and other sufferings, sent out a detachment of six hundred knights, who attacked in the first place King Roderic's forces, and, having signally defeated them, put the remainder of the Irish chieftains, with their followers, to flight. Returning to the city victorious, enriched with the spoils of the enemy, and laden with provisions, in the insolence of their triumph, they put to death Hasculph, the Danish chief, whom they had captured; his offence being that of having used language not sufficiently respectful to his vanquishers. The ardour of Archbishop Laurence's patriotism was not extinguished by this unfortunate turn of affairs. He still laboured to unite the Irish princes in a powerful league for the protection of their liberties, but his efforts were ineffective. On the arrival of Henry II. at Waterford, in October, 1172, McCarthy of Desmond and O'Brien of Thomond, with other Irish princes, having submitted and done homage to that monarch, Laurence, with other ecclesiastics of the country, likewise acknowledged the temporal supremacy of the English king. It was on this occasion that the bull of Pope Adrian IV., for the invasion of Ireland, was first exhibited. Its genuineness has been doubted, but we fear with very little reason.

* "Pulcher Genitus," i.e. "Fair-begotten."

* A "Life of St. Patrick" has been also attributed to him.

Laurence assisted at the synod held in Cashel about Christmas, 1173, in which it was decreed that the rituals of public worship in Ireland, which hitherto had been many and various, should henceforth be rendered conformable to that of England. This was the principal reform in the Irish church then deemed necessary. Shortly after this, the archbishop, with the assistance of Strongbow and others of the English settlers in Dublin, re-erected the choir of Christ's Church Cathedral, and built two chapels adjoining it, one dedicated to the Blessed Virgin and to St. Edmund, the Saxon king and martyr, and the other to St. Laud. Having gone on a mission, in 1175, from King Roderic to Henry II., he repaired to the shrine of St. Thomas a Beckett, at Canterbury, to make his devotions; where, while saying mass, he narrowly escaped being murdered, by an insane fanatic, it has been charitably said, who thought he would have done a meritorious action by making the archbishop's fate similar to that of the saint.

The second general council of Latern being summoned in 1179, he went to Rome to assist at it. While passing through England he was arrested by order of Henry II., and bound by solemn oath not to prejudice him or his government at the Roman court. A proof that the king was conscious of guilt; for of course there were English bishops at Rome then also, who might have answered any complaints against their sovereign, made by Laurence, if they were unfounded. During our archbishop's stay at Rome, the Pope granted a bull by which the diocesses of Glendalough, Kildare, Ferns, Leighlin, and Ossory, were assigned to the metropolitan jurisdiction of Dublin, but we find no mention made of the "union" of the sees of Glendalough and Dublin, which in some years afterwards caused considerable confusion. Laurence returned to his country with legatine authority, and in the following year, 1180, he went to England to endeavour to effect an amicable settlement of a dispute between King Roderic and Henry II. He took with him a son of Roderic's, who was destined as an hostage for the English king. Henry would not listen to the archbishop's terms, and having given orders that he should not be permitted to return to Ireland, passed out of England into Normandy. Laurence retired to a monastery at Abingdon, where he remained three weeks, and then passed over to Normandy, hoping that by another interview with the English monarch, he might be able to accommodate matters between him and the King of Connaught—for such was Roderic's title, as recognized in a former treaty with Henry. Having reached the frontiers of Normandy, he was suddenly seized with a fever, and feeling that his mortal career was nigh finished, he went to the establishment of Canons Regular of St. Victor, at Augum, now Eu, where, having prayed for some time in the church, he was received into the hospice. He there prepared for his final dissolution, by making his confession to the holy abbot Osbert, and receiving the viaticum from his hands. Being admonished to make his will, he replied: "God knows that I have not at present as much as one penny under the sun." In his last moments his thoughts were with and for the "dear old land," whose fallen state he lamented in her own sweet tongue, saying, "Ah, foolish and senseless people, what are you now to do? who will cure your misfortunes? Who will heal you?" He passed from this life to a better, late on the evening of Friday, 14th November, 1180, and was buried with great solemnity in the church at Eu.

Thus, far away from the land he loved and served so long, died one of Ireland's most faithful sons, whose virtues have scarcely been sufficiently appreciated by his countrymen, and to whose honour no marble has been sculptured, or bronze cast, or fresco or canvass made to glow. But though the present seems to be the darkest hour of Ireland's destiny, surrounded by such memories, we must entertain hope of a bright future for our country, and when Ireland, truly emancipated, builds her Valhalla to commemorate the sons who have served and adorned her, and the events which have consecrated her soil, the life and actions of Lorcan O'Tuathal will afford ennobling subjects for future generations of artists. The reader who has accompanied us through this brief and imperfect sketch of the life of our illustrious archbishop, may, perhaps, feel that there exists some apparent contradiction between his devoted patriotism, and the fact of his submission to the English monarch at Waterford. But if at this distance of time from the events we allude to, we may attempt to weigh and examine the motives of such a man as Archbishop Laurence, we must allow that his province as a minister of the Gospel of Christ was to preach

"peace on earth to men of good will," and that having done his duty to his country as long as there remained a hope of the preservation of her ancient nationhood, and finding that her only strength for this purpose—union amongst her sons—was wanting, his labour for a union of the invaders and invaded, from which a new, but no less Irish nation than that which had declined, would certainly have arisen, was dictated by the purest and the wisest motives. We have of late heard a good deal about "antipathies of race." No such stupid enmities were or are genial amongst Irishmen; but they have, and we hope ever shall cherish an undying hatred of foreign rule. The various races, Danes and others, which had, for centuries previous to the advent of the English, settled in Ireland, became incorporated with the more ancient inhabitants of the island, were known as Irishmen, and were identified in their common interests. So would the Norman adventurers have done, if the spirit of English imperialism had not been working from the beginning. It was therefore a holy labour for Laurence, and one especially becoming his character, to strive to render the new elements infused into Irish society, subservient to what he doubtlessly believed would be, in future times, advantageous to his country.

It is related of him, that during his government of the see of Dublin, a severe famine afflicted the country for three years, all which time he daily gave alms to five hundred poor persons, besides supplying three hundred more throughout the diocese with clothes, provisions, and other necessities. He was munificent in his hospitality to strangers, entertaining them in the most sumptuous manner, yet never tasting any of the luxuries of the table himself, but living in the simplest and most mortifying way. He frequently retired to Glendalough, there, amongst the scenes of his youth, for a time to forget the cares consequent on his dignity, and to meditate on holy things.

The canonization of St. Laurence, by Pope Honorius III., took place in 1226, after which his relics, which had before remained in a shrine before the altar of the martyr Leodegarius, were, with great solemnity, placed over the high altar of the church at Eu. The church was dedicated anew to him, and ever since has borne his name. During the visit of Queen Victoria to Eu in 1843, she visited this ancient church, and a French writer describes her standing before the shrine of St. Laurence as a touching scene, and apostrophizes the memory of the saint in terms which it would not be prudent to repeat. It is scarcely necessary to say that St. Laurence O'Toole is the patron of the archdiocese of Dublin, and that his festival is observed on the anniversary of his death.

No sooner had the early English adventurers gained standing room in Ireland, whither they had come with the pious intention of bringing the inhabitants of this ancient island "to obedience to law"—that is, the law of the wolf and the lamb—and "to root out from among them their foul sins and wickedness," as well as "to recover them from their filthy life and abominable conversation," than they commenced the fulfilment of their mission, after such fashion as has been faithfully persevered in by their successors and representatives till this hour. Immediately after the death of St. Laurence O'Toole, Henry, the English King, sent his faithful chaplain, Jeffery de la Hay, into Ireland to seize and hold the temporalities of the see of Dublin for his conscientious lord and master. By this means the king contrived to absorb the revenues of the diocese for nearly an entire year. Being unable to hold the see vacant any longer, he determined on the appointment of an English ecclesiastic to so important an office. Accordingly, on the 6th September, 1181, he caused a few of the clergy of Dublin to meet at Even-sham, and elect as bishop, John Comyn, a benedictine monk, who was not then in priest's orders. Archbishop Comyn appeared not to admit the truth of the adage, "Ecclesiam auro non strui sed potius destrui," in which the primitive Irish church seems to have implicitly believed, for in 1184 he received from his royal master the lands of Coillagh,* with its appurtenances, in "barony tenure," in right of which he became a lord of Parliament, and was the first bishop of an Irish see who arrived at such distinction. But it would seem that the possession of the broad lands of Coillagh, and the dignity of a baron of Parliament, were not sufficient for the necessities of the English archbishop. The diocese of Glendalough extended not only through the entire of the now County of Wicklow, but also over the country south of Dublin, even to the very walls of the City. The diocese of Dublin was sufficiently extensive, both in jurisdiction and temporal possessions, for such an archbishop as Lorcan O'Tuathal, of whose liberality we have seen something which we do not find recorded of his successor, but for the requirements of Archbishop Comyn it was too limited. Moreover, Glendalough was in the possession of the O'Tooles and O'Byrnes, rather troublesome neighbours, it must be granted, to the new settlers; and to bring them ecclesiastically under the jurisdiction of Dublin, was doubtlessly considered an easy way to introduce them to the "politeness and civilization" which the English wished to establish. Accordingly, on the arrival of Prince John at Waterford, in 1185, Archbishop Comyn and several English nobles received and did homage to the royal youth, then a mere boy; and in the course of the same year, "the thinness of the population of Dublin, and the poverty of the church," having been represented to the prince, he, "moved by divine love, and for the safety of his soul and that of his father, and all his ancestors and successors," granted to the archdiocese of Dublin "the bishopric of Glendalough, with all its appurtenances in lands, manors, churches, tithes, fisheries, liberties, &c.," for ever. A provision, however, was made, that the union should not take place till after the death of the then bishop of Glendalough, William Piro or Peryn, which not occurring till 1214, Archbishop Comyn was never enabled to enjoy the benefits of the grant. On the death of William Piro, Henry de Londres, then archbishop of Dublin, turned his attention to the union of the sees, which was effected upon terms not unlike those of other "unions" which have occurred since. It was conceded that the Irish see of Glendalough should remain a bishopric, with a distinct cathedral and archdeacon within its limits, though united to the English see of Dublin by the "golden link" of the mitre. The collegiate church of St. Patrick, which actually stood within, though on the very verge of the diocese of Glendalough, and sufficiently near Dublin to be quickly absorbed in it, was accordingly erected into a cathedral church.† The Irish, however, appear not to have been completely satisfied with this sort of "union," and it would be hard to expect they should. The learned and impartial Dr. Lanigan says, "that even from that period till 1497, the union was little more than nominal, for the Irish septs of that territory would not submit to the see of Dublin, but we find a continuation of bishops of Glendalough, some of whom were confirmed by the Pope." Denis White, who held the see of Glendalough in 1497, formally resigned in the chapter-house of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, on the 30th of May in that year. But it appears that this surrender did not finally extinguish the claims of Glendalough to independence as a bishopric; for we find that the see was held afterwards by Ivo Russi, a Franciscan friar, and that John, a member of the same order, was consecrated bishop of Glendalough in August, 1495. And in 1500, Francis de Cordova was appointed by Pope Alexander VI. In 1535, Henry VIII. nominated Christopher St. Laurence, or Howth, to the bishopric, which he held till the final suppression of religious establishments. We thus perceive, that, notwithstanding its many vicissitudes of fortune, Glendalough continued a bishopric either de jure or de facto from the seventh to the sixteenth century.

Glendalough was several times ravaged by the Danes during the ninth century, also in the latter part of the tenth and beginning of the eleventh century. The Annals of the Four Masters record that the Ostmen reduced the City of Glendalough to a heap of ruins by fire, in the year 1020.

The courtiers of the English king having procured the banishment of the royal favourite, Pierce de Gaveston, he was sent into Ireland as lord lieutenant; and in 1309, "in order to conciliate the affections of the English, he attacked the O'Byrnes and gave them a total defeat, and having rebuilt the castles of Mac Adam and Kevin, cut down and scoured the pass between Castle Kevin and Glendalough, in despite of the Irish, and then made his offering at the shrine of St. Kevin."

We have thus, as far as is in our power, collected and laid before our readers such of the historic memoirs of Glendalough as we at present possess. They bring us down to the memorable change in religion called the "reformation," and from that period there is little history of the locality of any interest to us. There are some few records of gallant struggles for nationhood by individual chiefs, but so fitful in themselves, and so unsupported by the neighbouring dynasts, that their issues were ever unsuccessful. One memorable event has been recorded by a recent writer:* "At last all the Munster and Leinster Irish were broken and reduced, except the redoubtable Fiach Mac Hugh of Wicklow; and during all this long and inglorious war, the only day of which we can speak with pleasure, is the day of Glendalough. Immediately on Lord Grey's arrival in Dublin—it was the summer of 1580—he led a large force of horse and foot into the mountains, fully resolved to grapple with the fierce O'Byrne in his own strongholds, and crush that gallant sept for ever. When the army arrived at the entrance of the passage from the grant ascribed to John, given by Harris from the book called "Crede Mihi," which says that the Archbishop of Dublin should take possession of the bishopric of Glendalough on its becoming vacant, and that the Bishop of Glendalough for the future should be "chaplain or vicar of the Archbishop of Dublin," that, "according to this strange sort of deed, there was still to be a Bishop of Glendalough (for the spiritualities of course) while the revenues were to belong to the Archbishop of Dublin."

† It has been said, that at a synod held in Dublin, in 1192, Matthew O'Heney, archbishop of Cashel, presiding as apostolic legate, the annexation of the see of Glendalough to that of Dublin was confirmed; but the candid historian, Dr. Lanigan, entertains great doubt of the truth of this statement, and remarks, on the valley, the cavalry, under command of Grey himself, scoured the open ground, while the foot were ordered to advance into the glen. The O'Byrnes allowed them to proceed into the silent recesses of the mountain, wondering that they found no enemy, and then suddenly shouting their battle-cry, rushed from all sides upon the sagums dearg, and hewed them to pieces till their arms were weary with slaying. Grey and his horsemen could give no assistance, and had to retreat much more rapidly than they advanced, leaving in that fatal glen eight hundred slain, and amongst them Sir Peter Carew, Colonel Moore, and Captains Audly and Cosby. Never, since black Monday at Cullenswood, had the sword of the Cullane mountaineer drank so deep of the stranger's blood." The stranger, however, became master in the end, and how he sped "in the punishment of sin, the reformation of manners, and the planting of virtue," is told in the ruins of Glendalough.

There is no locality in Ireland which presents so many interesting relics of the ancient national church as Glendalough; yet, till a very recent period, it has been singularly unfortunate in its illustrators. And this is to be the more regretted, because every successive year has witnessed, and still witnesses, some decay or destruction either from the slow but certain operations of time, the influence of the elements, or the mischievousness of ignorant or irreverent visitors. It ought to be almost unnecessary to mention that Dr. Petrie is the recent illustrator who has done so much for the preservation of the history of those relics, as well as for the illustration of their state some time since. From drawings made for Colonel Burton Conyngham, by foreign artists, between sixty and seventy years ago, Dr. Petrie was enabled to present illustrations of interesting objects which have long ceased to exist, and his own faithful pencil has preserved memorials of relics which have disappeared since the publication of his book. At present there is in almost every country in Europe a "movement" for the preservation of historic monuments. Ireland is the only exception, notwithstanding that she possesses remains which are of the utmost importance in tracing the history of Christian art. In all other European states this "movement" is protected and guided by the national government, or by voluntary associations of respectable and educated men. Here we have no national government, strictly speaking; and it would be the extreme of folly to hope for any assistance towards the preservation of national memorials from a foreign government, which has laboured to destroy the nationality itself. There certainly exists a government commission which is charged, amongst its other duties, with the rebuilding and conservation of churches belonging to the Protestant Church of England in Ireland, but its genius, as far as regards antiquities, seems to be destructive not conservative. Instance Lusk church. The only organization of private individuals we have is the Celtic Athenæum, but the sole proof lately given of its existence, is its ineffective remonstrance with the ecclesiastical commissioners aforesaid, relative to Lusk church. Let another half century pass without some organization for the preservation of our historic monuments, and, from the combined influence of time and railways, ecclesiastical commissioners and holiday tourists, we shall be as destitute of such memorials as if our ancestors never "made history," or were never converted to Christianity. But to return to Glendalough.

The general characteristics of its ruins may be well described in the words of Dr. Petrie, in reference to the relics of early Christian architecture in Ireland: "It is true that these remains will be found to be of a very simple and inartificial character, and to exhibit nothing of that architectural splendour, so gratifying to the taste, which characterizes the Christian edifices of Europe erected in the later day of ecclesiastical power; but if as the great sceptical poet, Byron, so truly says,

"Even the faintest relic of a shrine
Of any worship wakes, some thoughts divine."

These simple memorials of a Christian antiquity rarely to be found outside our own insula sacra, and which in their grave simplicity, exhibit a characteristic absence of meretricious grandeur, typical of the primitive ages of the Christian church, can scarcely fail to excite a deep and reverential interest in the minds of Christians generally, and still more of those who may justly take a pride in such venerable remains of their past history." It may be also necessary to premise, with respect to some few of the distinguished peculiarities of the architectural remains at Glendalough, that they are all ante-Norman, both in date and style, and that they possess no traces of the pointed or gothic architecture of a subsequent period. They may be considered purely Irish developments of Romanesque or Byzantine Christian architecture. They possess characteristics which have not been found in any other country in Christendom; and, it must be confessed, bear a nearer resemblance to the architecture of Greece and the east, than to that of Rome and the west. A few of these peculiarities are the absence of the semicircular apsis or termination of the chancel or choir, so general, almost universal, in the contemporaneous churches or basilicæ of the Continent, and so often found in the most ancient Saxon churches in England; the inclining sides of the doorways, and their flat lintels, with the generally massive and cyclopean character of some parts of the masonry, especially of the stones of which the doors are composed; the fewness of windows, and the smallness of their external openings, while their inward splay for the admission of light is of considerable amplitude; the semicircular heads of the windows and chancel arch.

The first church which the visitor meets as he enters the vale by the narrow road which winds along its north side, is nearly as perfect a specimen of this primitive architecture as is anywhere to be found. It is traditionally known as the "CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY," and doubtlessly the tradition is correct. The structure is composed of the two essential parts of a church destined for public worship, a nave and chancel. The internal dimensions of the former are twenty-nine and a-half feet long, by seventeen and a-half feet wide, and of the latter, thirteen and a-quarter by nine feet. The chancel is divided from the nave by a semicircular triumphal arch, composed of large blocks of hewn granite. This church (like all the others in the valley) is duly orientated, and in the east end of the chancel there is a small semicircular-headed window, eleven inches wide. On the south side there is a small triangular-headed window, and on the same side of the nave there is a semicircular-headed window of dimensions similar to those of the chancel window. These were the only apertures for the admission of light. In the west end there is a low door, with the characteristic flat lintel and sloping sides, which communicates with the remains of a tower now nearly entirely destroyed. This tower, Dr. Petrie supposes to have been of no older date than the thirteenth century. In Archdall's time it must have been considerably higher than at present, as he describes it as a circular structure standing on a square basement, and retaining marks of having been used as a belfry. An interior view of this very interesting little church is given in Dr. Petrie's book in "the Round Towers and Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland."

The visitor leaving the church of the Holy Trinity, is introduced to an assemblage of ruins at some distance westwards. They are the remains of the ancient city of Glendalough. They are entered by a semicircular-arched gateway, which was once the entrance of the cashel or wall which surrounded the cathedral with its appendages. When Dr. Petrie sketched this portal the north and south arches were entire, but in an impending state. The former fell about sixteen months ago; so that this relic, as it existed two summers since, can now be seen only in Dr. Petrie's work. The stones of which the arch was composed, are yet lying where they fell, the Parish Priest having interfered so far as to prevent their removal. Their restoration would at present be a task of no great difficulty or expense, and would preserve an unique relic of Irish antiquity, which otherwise must soon entirely disappear. We wish that the Celtic Athenæum would look to it. Having passed this ruined gateway, the visitor finds himself in "the inestimably singular scene of Irish antiquities." On every side he turns, something there is to interest him. His attention will probably be attracted first by the ROUND TOWER, "a gnomon raised by time to count his centuries." We assure our readers that we are not about introducing them to that very "crux" of antiquaries, the "origin and use" of those towers. We leave the question to their own patience and ingenuity: and if they should be so minded as to prosecute the puzzling inquiry, we recommend them to hear Dr. Petrie's opinions, as expressed in his own words, and not through the medium of plagiarisms, anticipatory or otherwise. We shall merely note at present, that this tower wants only its conical cap to be perfect, the projecting eave course upon which the cap rested, yet remaining. The next object of interest is the "CATHEDRAL," which is the largest of any of the remains. Like Trinity Church, it consists of a nave and chancel, or choir, the dimensions of which respectively are—the nave, forty-eight feet long by thirty feet wide, and the chancel, thirty-seven and a-half feet by twenty-three feet wide. On the south side of the choir there are vestiges of a sacristy which was about sixteen feet long by ten wide, internally. The nave is entered by a door at the west end, formed of characteristic masonry, and with the usual sloping sides and flat lintel. The weight of the superincumbent masonry is, however, removed from the lintel by a semicircular discharging arch, the tympanum, or space between which and the flat lintel, is filled up with solid masonry. The lower parts of the walls of the nave are formed of courses of large blocks of squared granite and mica, which are considered indications of great antiquity. The nave of the Cathedral was lighted by two windows on the south side. The head of one of them is wrought in a single stone; that of the other is composed of a number of small stones forming an arch. The chancel arch is entirely ruined, as is also the east window. The only fragment of the latter remaining is a portion of the moulding which formed part of the internal architrave. Dr. Petrie has preserved a delineation of this beautiful window from the drawings made by Colonel Conyngham's artists. In the south wall of the chancel there yet remain the ancient piscina and aumbrey. From the style of the masonry of the chancel, it would appear that that portion of the building is much later in date of erection than the nave. This is tolerably evident too, from the style of the east window, unless we admit that feature to have been an insertion subsequent to the erection of the general mass of the structure. There are further evidences, likewise, of the comparative lateness of the chancel in the imperfect bonding of its walls into those of the nave, and in the absence of those projecting stripes of masonry which are found on the angles of the east and west ends of the nave, and which were continued along the gables. A few feet south west of the cathedral, stands a large cross, ten and a-half feet in height, formed of a single block of granite. It is perfectly plain, but has the usual circle at the intersertion of the arms with the head and shaft. The uses of those crosses were various, some were sepulchral, others were used to define the limits of church lands, others were set up to commemorate the building or re-edification of a church. It was probably for this latter purpose that the cathedral cross of Glendalough was erected.

Distant a few yards south west of the cathedral, are traces of a building which must in times past have been an interesting object. The walls at present are little more than a foot high over the surrounding surface, and all relics of its once ornamental character have disappeared. To Dr. Petrie we are again indebted for the only available memorials of the "PRIESTS' HOUSE"* which we now possess. The form of this building was a simple oblong, measuring externally twelve and a-quarter by nine and a-half feet. On the east end there was an external arched recess of extremely ornamental character, with a window in the centre. Towards the south-west angle, there was a door, the curiously sculptured tympanum of which, representing a bishop or abbot and two other ecclesiastics, afforded Ledwich room for some stupid bigotry. It was preserved in the neighbourhood till a short time ago, but cannot now be found.

Passing from the "Priests' House," southwards, we approach that singularly interesting ruin, "ST. KEVIN'S HOUSE." This building, till a recent period, presented all the features of a church for public worship, a nave, chancel, sacristy, and west bell turret. With good reason Dr. Petrie believes the tradition which recognizes this building as the dwelling of the saint whose name it bears. The nave consists of two chambers, a lower vaulted apartment and an upper croft. The former, in all probability, served as the dwirtheach, or oratory of the ascetic who dwelt in the croft. The high pitched stone roof is yet in a good state of preservation, as also the arched ceiling of the lower chamber. This was entered as usual by a door, at the west end, of characteristics similar to those of the cathedral door. The internal evidences of the subsequent erection of the chancel, sacristy, and bell-turret, to convert the oratory into a church for public worship, are quite apparent, both in the difference of the style of masonry, and in the head of the old east window of the nave, which yet remains, while the lower part was long since cut away to form the chancel arch. These additions are supposed to have been made not long after the death of St. Kevin. There formerly existed a semicircular-headed window in the south side of the nave towards the east end. It has been described as "ornamented with an architrave elegantly wrought;" but "being of freestone, it was conveyed away by the neighbouring inhabitants, and brayed to powder for domestic use." The west gable is surmounted by a belfry, similar in shape to the isolated round towers, "as if," says Sir Walter Scott, "some architect of genius had discovered the means of uniting the steeple and the church." The chancel is now completely ruined. The outlines of its highly pitched roof are traceable on the east gable of the nave. The sacristy, situated on the north side of the chancel, is, in a tolerable state of preservation. The nave of the church measures externally thirty feet, by twenty-two and a quarter. The walls are little better than two and a-half feet thick. The chancel measured internally eleven and a quarter feet, by nine and a quarter. The sacristy ten feet, by seven and three quarter feet. The height of the belfry to the top of the conical roof is forty-six feet. The recent history of "St. Kevin's house" is truly painful. Between twenty and thirty years ago, the then Parish Priest took possession of the building, and used it as a chapel, till he was prohibited by the authorities of the "established" church, who claim ownership to those relics of former times. The priest submitted; and the people had no longer the consolations of the old religion amidst the scenes of their fathers' piety. Those conscientious persons who would not allow the building to be used as a house of Divine Worship, have since permitted it to become a shelter for the beasts of the field! A little to the north side of this church, a broken vault and a granite slab, incised with a cross, are pointed out as the tomb of Bishop Denis White, who resigned the see in 1497.

The ruin of the ancient city which lies most to the west, is that of the church of "OUR LADY," frequently called "the Ivy church." The chancel of this church is nearly entirely dilapidated. Its dimensions internally were twenty feet by eighteen. The nave is thirty-two feet by nineteen and a-half, and its walls are more perfect than those of the chancel. The most interesting feature it possesses is the west doorway, which is of the usual form, but has the peculiarity of a flat band or architrave round the external face of the jambs and lintel; and the soffit of the latter is inscribed with a cross placed saltier-wise. 'Tis said that Sir Walter Scott, during his visit to Glendalough in 1825, remained for a considerable time contemplating this doorway, and spoke in enthusiastic terms of its remote antiquity. The tomb of St. Kevin was shown in this church till the last century.

Besides the churches and other ruins we have mentioned, there are various other remains scattered within the precincts of the ancient city. Within the chancel or choir of the Cathedral, are two ancient sepulchral slabs, with incised crosses, and in the adjoining burial ground there are several of the same character. There were formerly three other churches in the immediate vicinity of St. Kevin's house, but now every vestige of them has disappeared. They are not even traditionally remembered by the peasantry of the locality. Dr. Petrie has determined their exact positions from a ground plan of the various buildings made by Colonel Conyngham's artists. The first stood to the north of St. Kevin's house, two perches, ten links; the second, south, the same distance; and the third, which was called St. Kieran's church, to the south-east, distant about eight perches. Dr. Petrie thinks the south church was that of the "Two Sinchells," who, with St. Kieran, it appears died of the plague which raged in 549. Dr. Petrie attributes the building of the cathedral and Round Tower to the "Goban Saer," a famous "cementarius" or artificer in stone in the sixth or seventh century, whose skill in the art of masonry remains proverbial in Ireland to this day. The "Lady Church" is supposed by the Dr. Petrie to have been the first erected by St. Kevin within the city, but not to be so old as that which we are now about to introduce the reader.

The "REEFERT CHURCH" is situated at the distance of about a mile to the west of the Cathedral and Round Tower, and is unquestionably the locality pointed out in the Bollandist's life of St. Kevin, in the following passage: "Et exivit ab eis solus ad superiorem ipsius val- lis partem, quasi per unum miliarum a monasterio; et constituit mansiunculam ibi in loco angusto, inter montem et stagnum sibi, ubi erant densi arbores et clari rivuli, et praecepit monachis suis, ut nullum ciborum sibi, genus darent, et nemo ad eum veniret, nisi pro maxima causa." This church is now as ruinous as that of Our Lady, and presents few objects of interest to the mere architectural antiquary. The west door is similar in character to that of Our Lady's church, but it wants the flat architrave and the cross inscribed on the lintel. On the north side of the door there is some chiseling, as if an architrave was commenced and never completed. The name of this church signifies the "burial place of the kings," and it is said that seven scions of a royal race were interred here. Till a very recent period the tomb of one of the kingly house of O'Tuathal was shown on the south side of the chancel. It consisted of a slab, sculptured in bas-relief, and bore the following inscription:

"Jesus Christ. Mile deach feuch corp re Mac Mthuill."

"See here the resting place of the body of King M'Toole who died in Christ, 1010."

This interesting remain has been removed in the most disgraceful manner. Year after year it had been disappearing piecemeal, fragments being distributed by the guides to visitors as "curiosities," till now not a vestige of it remains.

The ruins of a causeway lead from this church westward to the summit of a bold cliff, upon which is situated the remains of "ST. KEVIN'S CELL," and which commands an extensive view of the valley eastwards, including the Cathedral and Round Tower. This is undoubtedly the "mansiunculam" referred to by the Bollandists. The walls are now not more than three feet high. The cell was circular, and was doubtlessly one of those dome roofed tuguria or huts which there is good reason to believe formed the cells of the primitive Irish monks. In the centre stands a low cross, formed of the mica slate of the district; and it would seem that the entrance was from the east. We have no doubt of this being the cell occupied by St. Kevin during the four years he dwelt apart from his monks, and not the "bed" as some legend-mongers would have us believe. The "bed" is an excavation, partly natural, partly artificial, in the north side of Lugduff mountain, and is about thirty feet above the surface of the lake. The legends connected with it, have been mellifluously sung by Moore and Gerald Griffin. And Archdall, in plain prose, has described it as "terrible of aspect and difficult of access." The lovers of the romantic, if they wish to enter, will find Archdall's description not quite correct; but they will find the interior daubed with names for the most part "unknown to fame." Beyond the "bed" a few perches, there are fragments of another church called "TEAMPULL NA SKELLIG," or "the Church of the Wilderness," of which but very few vestiges now remain. "Teampull na Skellig" is the most westward of the "seven churches," six of which we have now examined. One more remains to be explored, and that is the most eastward, as well as the most interesting as a work of architectural art. We therefore return eastwards by the road which winds along the south side of the valley, at the base of Derrybawn and Lugduff mountains.

"THE MONASTERY" is the name given by the peasantry to the ruin situated most eastward in the vale. Archdall and other more recent writers have called it the Priory of St. Saviour. This name has been adopted in the map of the Ordnance Survey, but Dr. Petrie thinks there is no warrant for it. It had lain concealed for many years, in consequence of the falling in of the stone roof of the chancel. The rubbish that had accumulated around it for so long a time, was removed by Samuel Hayes, Esq., of Avondale, about the year 1770, when its curiously ornamental character was brought to light. There are few vestiges of this structure now remaining except the chancel, which measures internally fifteen feet six inches, by eleven feet five inches. The east end appears to have had an ornamental recess similar to that of the "Priests' house," with a semicircular headed window. An insulated stone altar also stood in the chancel, about two feet distant from the east end: its size was five feet long, two feet eleven inches wide, and four feet high. No traces of these ornamental features, nor of the altar, can now be found. There are three niches in the south wall internally, one of which served as a piscina, and the others were probably used as aumbreys or safes for the reservation of the sacred vessels; one of them may have been used as the credence or table of prothesis. There is also a niche in the north wall, which may have been used for any one of these purposes. There appears to have been no windows in the chancel, except that in the east end. According to Dr. Petrie, the nave measured internally forty-two feet long, by twenty-six feet wide, and was entered by a door in the south, situated near to the chancel. The same author says, "on the north side there appears to have been a range of apartments for the use of the officiating clergy of the place, but their divisional walls cannot now be traced." The most interesting remains at the Monastery now are those of the chancel arch, which in the day of its perfection must have been a beautiful work of art; and, if Dr. Petrie's conjectures as to its age, which makes it not later than the tenth century, be correct, affords a proof of the taste and skill in ecclesiastical art which must have existed amongst our ancestors at an early period. The general description of this arch is given by Dr. Petrie in the following words: "This archway is a compound one, consisting of three receding piers with semi-columns. * * * Its breadth at its innermost arch is ten feet, and its height to the vertex was eleven feet; the height of the semi-columns is six feet, one inch and a-half, of which the capitals measure nine inches and a-half, the shafts four feet, the bases eight inches, and the plinths eight inches." The capitals of the piers on the north side have been removed, as has that of the centre pier on the south side. A correct delineation of the latter, however, is preserved in Dr. Petrie's invaluable work. The capital of the innermost pier on the south side, is composed of a square abacus, with representations of human heads under its external angles. The spaces between these heads are filled up with a curiously interlacing ornament, which unites itself with the hair of the heads; a bead or torus moulding, conformable to the horizontal section of the pier, completes this capital. The capital of the external pier south side, is composed of an abacus and torus moulding, like those of the foregoing, but the cushion, or space between these members, is of different character; at the angles it is rounded off from the point of the abacus, to conform with the contour of the shaft: the under part of the cushion is ornamented with a sculptured leaf, and the space above it bears an ornament, which Dr. Petrie says is not to be found on any other capital in the kingdom, but which is frequently to be met with on tomb stones. The bases of the piers stand upon square plinths, and are likewise rounded off at the angles, to correspond with the shafts. They are decorated with bead mouldings, pellets, ornamental scrolls, and triangular shaped tracery, which Dr. Ledwich called "Runic knots," but which are now known to have been ecclesiastical symbols. Many of the stones of the semicircular arch are to be found on the south side of the chancel, where they have been piled clumsily together so as to form a sort of rustic seat. They present several objects of beautiful design and execution, amongst which may be found crosses of various devices, the mystic Vesica Piscis, chevron or zig-zag mouldings, &c., all of which are well known Christian symbols or ornaments, although Dr. Ledwich—in his ardour to prove all the ancient saints of our country mere imaginary beings, and the records of our civilization so many idle fictions—has endeavoured to show that they belonged to his favourite "Runic ornaments."

It remains for us to say a few words in reference to the recent mode of observing the Patron's festival, which was of such a character as often to have caused us to desire a discontinuance of such observances. The origin of pilgrimages and visits to the scene of the Patron Saint's life and death was, no doubt, most commendable, and their observance during the ages of faith, constituted some of those customs which, as has been well said, "brought religion home to men, backed such as were religiously disposed by public opinion, served as visible acknowledgments of an invisible world, the substantial confessions of a nation's faith in things unseen." But that fanaticism, "which swept away many sensible, yet innocent incentives to devotion, as abominations, and guarded effectually against religious excess, by substituting for it religious indifference," having completely prevailed, the people, who still congregated on the wonted day to the scene of their former devotions, finding neither Priest nor Sacrifice, fell into those excesses, which, with their termination, have been thus described by Mrs. Hall: "The peasantry, until very recently, honoured the memory of the Patron Saint by assembling in the church-yard to drink and fight; a custom put an end to by the Parish Priest, who, a few days before one of our visits, had actually turned the whiskey into the stream, gathered the shillelahs into a huge bonfire, and made wrathful and brutal men, who had been enemies for centuries, embrace each other in peace and good will over St. Kevin's grave."

A little to the right of the road by which the vale is entered on the north side, the visitor will observe a large wooden cross. It marks the site of THE CHURCH OF ST. KEVIN, now in progress of erection, in which, we hope, the same sacrifice, which was offered up in this holy vale twelve hundred years ago, will be again celebrated for ages to come. The lovers of ecclesiastical art will be glad to find, that this simple structure—some short account of which was given in our last number—will be a revival of the venerable architecture of our Catholic forefathers. Too much praise cannot be given to the worthy parish priest, the REV. EUGENE CLARKE, with whom the design originated of thus reviving religion and its appropriate externals, in this most interesting locality, nor to those who seconded so pious and truly patriotic an undertaking. And we sincerely hope that the good Priest will be enabled to realize all his intentions and desires, in thus raising a temple to the honour and for the worship of the living God, suitable to its purpose, harmonizing with the scene and its associations, and symbolical of the Ancient Faith to be maintained within its walls.

Death of O'Connell.

BEFORE these pages meet the eyes of our readers, the tidings of our loss will not need to be told. All Europe is pouring out its tribute of admiration and sorrow. To other lands his death is as the extinction of a star, the brightest in their firmament; but Ireland—where so long he was as the sun himself, sole and unapproachable, the living centre of vitality and heat, what words shall she find to utter? If love to the living be the measure of sorrow for the dead, her grief will surpass any ever bestowed by nation on its departed hero.

The verdict of the world has marked him the greatest man of his time, yet it is most wonderful under what manifold aspects he has earned his fame. To the patriot everywhere he was the impersonation of patriotism—the restorer of one down-trodden nationality. By the democrat he was honoured as the mightiest tribune and marshaller of the people against their oppressors known among men. The English radicals lauded him because when circumstances linked him to their mean party his eloquence breathed heat and life into their barren doctrines. The haters of England cherished him as her most powerful foe; the Protestant nationalists of Ireland, in spite of all their prejudices, yet, for Ireland's sake, had a throb for him; by the Catholics all over the world, legitimist or republican, he was revered as the foremost lay Catholic, the obedient son of the Church, and her zealous champion against regal or popular tyranny. But in the breast of the Irish Catholic people, the rays from all these aspects of his greatness converged and found their focus; between him and them was entire sympathy, and in all his opinions, and in all his changeful moods their hearts were wholly his.

O'CONNELL's popularity in Ireland is a thing absolutely without parallel in history. Familiarity has blinded us to the wonder, but as we recede from it, our astonishment will grow in proportion. For what are all other recorded popularities in comparison? Many demagogues there have been, lords of a transient outburst, rising on the wave of excitement and sinking as it sank. Many founders of sects and systems there have been, who lived and died amid the devotion of their partisans; many kings and rulers whose personal qualities made them familiarly endeared to their people. The combination of all these may convey the relation in which O'CONNELL stood to the Irish people. For more than thirty years he was the chosen king of seven millions of people, wielding that gigantic force as a general does his trained soldiers. Yet this visible ascendancy and its manifestations—the sway he held over constituencies and municipalities—his monster meetings, assemblages of myriads whom he gathered together with the crooking of his finger and dispersed with the waving of his hand, furnish a gauge of but one aspect of his position. Far deeper, far below the surface of the multitude's applause, in the recesses of almost every Catholic household in Ireland he was the object of unbounded admiration and affection, and of an almost religious reverence. And this personal worship was perhaps greatest with those who cared least for politics. Homely mothers of families, pious nuns in their convents, simple mountaineers and fishermen in remote villages, who spoke no English, and to whom the sound of political tempests came faint and incomprehensible in the distance—all of those had one deep, definite, public interest, which began and ended in O'CONNELL. Any one who has travelled through the south of Ireland, must be familiar with instances of the almost preternatural devotion and confidence which he inspired.

To produce a phenomenon like this we may well imagine an extraordinary confluence of internal and external causes. Mighty and various capacities in the man himself—and, in his times, the utmost need of such a man. He came among an enthusiastic, loyal-hearted people, weary of their long bondage, yet too destitute of self-dependance to know their own strength to set themselves free—yearning for deliverance but ever linking their hopes with the idea of some one deliverer. And they at last recognized that deliverer in one of themselves—an Irishman to the core; Irish even in his faults—a Catholic too, that no point of sympathy might be wanting—a lawyer, to whose skill opponents bore reluctant testimony, endowed with eloquence, daring, versatility, indefatigable energy—a brain teeming with expedients, and that sagacious eye which saw how difficulties were to be met and ends accomplished—now with the forehead of the buffalo, now with the windings of the serpent—and, added to all this, a nature full of genial humour, and a lofty presence.

This is not the place, or at least now is not the time, in the freshness of Ireland's sorrow for his loss, to begin historically to sketch his career. Yet a few words may be written, to remind us of things which later events have effaced, for it seems the special lot of great political actions to be lost in the shadow of their successors. In the year 1793, the Catholic Committee lost entire Emancipation through their own timidity. Not that good men and brave men were wanting on that committee; individually they were both, and superior in most respects to the same class at this day. Yet such was their hereditary awe of power, that, though they had the government at their mercy, they were frightened by some bluster on the part of the minister, and cowed into a shameful compromise. To that compromise may be traced the subsequent vindictive tyranny of the government, the united Irish system, the insurrection, and the Union.

In that disastrous time, O'CONNELL, at the age of five and twenty, began his career. A more desolate prospect never was opened to a patriot. We say not that O'CONNELL then made a vow to accomplish the regeneration of his country; neither did he set himself to beat the air and battle with necessity, on the contrary, he so far yielded to the tyrannous expedencies of his time as to become ultra-loyalist, and take up arms against Emmet. He followed the instincts of a mind in which strong purpose was tempered with practical sense. He worked wherever he found an opening and opportunity, attended Catholic boards and councils, made loyal speeches, ingratiated himself with his class. But all the while he persevered with zealous industry at his profession, earning for himself a position and character as a lawyer, the indispensable standing place of Archimedes. The day of his triumph came. In the year 1812, William Saurin was Attorney-General for Ireland—a man possessed, in those miserable times, of almost despotic power—a fanatical partisan of the Orange faction, and a very fountain of virulence against the Catholics—altogether, a man of whom attorney-generals such as live in these degenerate days give no conception. This man prosecuted Magee, the editor of the Evening Post, for a seditious libel. O'CONNELL defended him in a speech, the greatest of his kind ever spoken in a Court of Justice. He did not condescend to palliate the offence of his client, but with words of deadly bitterness he covered the whole Irish government, and Saurin himself beyond all others, with ridicule and contumely. There, in the Court of King's Bench, in the face of partisan judges and a packed jury, he defied, reviled, and spat upon the omnipotent Attorney-General. It was a feat, the audacity of which we have lost the power of measuring. To enable us to comprehend it, we must transport ourselves back to those times, when the Orange party rioted in the fulness of an insolent ascendancy. Then let us fancy the potent head and concentrated type of that ascendancy, bearded and cowed on his own battle-field by a young Popish lawyer of seven-and-thirty. It was the knell of the prestige of Orangism. We can well imagine how the crouching gait of the slave became erect, and the submissive eye grew bold, with the daring that one speech inspired. From that hour forth, DANIEL O'CONNELL was marked as the leader and future emancipator of the Catholics of Ireland. Yet, for seventeen other years the result was delayed. How his buoyant, sanguine heart bore him undepending through that weary time—how his subtle intellect devised, and his unwearied perseverance carried out the organization which wrung liberty from a loathing Cabinet and people, is a history with which all the world is now familiar. And when it was wrong, he began, at the age of fifty-four, a new career—in the face of Europe a new and more gigantic path of labours for his country. His labours were among three generations of men—for, to his last illness, he knew no repose. Of his earlier struggles, a few old men are the contemporaries. The victory of '29 was the time of our fathers, but the youngest amongst us have seen, and will transmit to the children of the twentieth century, the scenes of '43. On the verge of three score and ten, when the light of other men flickers faint, his burst forth once more into its fiercest blaze. The nation caught that fire and arose in fever and delirium, breathing the wildest thoughts, ready for the wildest deeds, yet obedient as children—lifting no hand without his signal. On Tara hill—the greatest of the electric chain of demonstrations—on that historic hill, and around it, seven hundred thousand men and women were gathered, dense as sand—one expectation beaming in their eyes. It seemed as if a whole people, flying from their task-masters, had assembled there to await the guidance of Heaven upon their course. Suddenly the dense mass opened, like the Red Sea to Moses, and between the living walls his chariot came, drawn by a thousand hands; he stood in the front, erect, his right arm outspread, looking round him with a royal glance and smile, greeted by one long, transcendent shout of welcome: it was a sight to be seen, a sensation to be felt, once in a lifetime and no more. That day he was absolute lord of the hearts and limbs of those men, to lead them freely to the cannon's mouth, or to the gallows foot. In a few hours there was not a trace of that assemblage, and the hill lay quiet in the summer evening, with nothing but its trodden grass to distinguish it from yesterday. Call not that year fruitless. The fact that such things have been, the possibility that they may be again, is in itself fruit that will not die.

Of O'CONNELL'S eloquence, so familiar to us all, little need be said; like his whole mind it was essentially practical. By far the first orator of his day, and having spoken more than any man who ever lived, he never made one speech for the sake of speech-making; the business of the hour was all in all to him; for that alone he put in play his infinite variety of power, plain, prosaic sense, argument, statistics, and again floods of humour, invective, anger, and the deepest pathos and tenderness—there was nothing too high or too low for him, so that he produced the effect he sought. It was his peculiar art never to cease repeating the same truths till he had burned them into the hearts of his hearers. When he had a theme of real sorrow to deal with, he was as great a master of the pathetic as ever spoke—some of his sentences about Rathormac and the widow Ryan's son no one can read to this day without tears.

The advanced period of the past month at which the lamented intelligence reached us, limits the space which we would desire to apply to a sketch of O'CONNELL. But in all our desolation—mid the tears and prayers of a sore-afflicted people—our remembrance of him shall not be unworthy of his greatness and our love. His obsequies shall be such as never monarch received from people: we will build him a mighty mausoleum beside his own Atlantic. Though the ripple of a foreign sea now accompanies his dirge, yet around his grave shall beat the familiar wave rolling from Labrador—from whose music he so often caught the inspirations of freedom. Among all coming generations of Irishmen his name shall be a watchword and spell of power, and, far above these human memorials, Catholic Ireland, in communion with all Christendom, will cease not her fervent tribute of prayers and aspirations for his soul.

PASSAGES IN THE Life of Pope Julius Secundus.

ALEXANDER VI. died in the middle of August, 1503. It has been said that he was poisoned, but it is needless to inquire what agency bowed his hoary head. Seventy years were given him in this world, and a great Catholic authority asserts that he was unmindful of his position as the vicar of Christ and a Christian prince.* None mourned him, save his idol, Duke Valentino; and yet it were hard to think that such a monster could have shed one generous tear—if he wept, it was because Alexander's death thwarted his designs, and marred his hopes of aggrandizement. Be that as it may, when the news of the Pope's demise reached him, he sprang from the bed where he had lain for several weeks, agonized by a poisoned wine cup which he had unconsciously quaffed, and calling to his aid a gang of desperadoes, took forcible possession of the Vatican. Stained by every excess which renders man odious in the sight of heaven, and lost to all feelings of humanity, it were hard to find the parallel of this remorseless coroneted freebooter. Judas, in Da Vinci's picture of the last supper, may give you a faint notion of this stern, muscular villain, but you will vainly seek in the pages of history, or fiction, for any one so revoltingly steeped in blood, lust, and rapine, as was Cæsar Borgia, surnamed "Duke Valentino."

Down from the Sabine mountains, and the wild passes of the Abruzzi, came armed brigands, headed by the princes of the Colonna, to aid and assist their chieftain who had resolved to intimidate the cardinals in the election of Alexander's successor. Trembling as for their existence, a deputation from the Sacred College waited on Valentino, who held his revels in the Vatican, and implored him to retire from Rome pending the interregnum. It pleased him to do so, and he pitched his camp eight miles from the city. Protected by Spain, loved by the French, and girt by those black bands who inscribed on their banners that they were "quellers of princes, lovers of justice, and champions of holy Church!" what had he to fear? Ah! holy and everlasting church, if thy perpetuity depended on those wild marauders, and not on the infallible promises of thy founder, where wouldst thou be to-day? But Duke Valentino is gone—the city breathes freely, as though it had been relieved from a hideous incubus. Thirty-seven cardinals hold conclave in the church of the Minerva, and on the 22nd of September, Francis Piccolomini is proclaimed Pope, with the title of Pius III.

Alas! holy father, the days of thy vicegerency are few—the torch which blazed a moment, and was quenched by the breath of thy servitor, was a fitting emblem of thy short-lived, flickering existence; and yet ere thou goest to the tomb, sorrow and furrowing grief will leave deeper traces on thy brow than the tiara's weight. Cæsar Borgia is at the gates of thy capital—the horsemen of the Orsini could not check his march—the Bourbon of Spain wars with the Bourbon of France—the Adriatic queen, collecting her mercenaries from the islands of Greece, is preparing to resist the Emperor Maximilian, and is seizing on thy states—all Lombardy is in the grasp of King Louis XII., and thy aged heart is breaking at the contemplation of the wo which lours over the fair land of Italy.

Fold thy cope around thee, man of sorrows, twenty-six days of pontificate are all that are decreed thee. St. Peter's keys, and St. Paul's sword, are too massive for thy nerveless hands. Italy needs a man of sterner stuff, and ere the charnel worm has become familiar with the aroma of thy shroud, that man, thy successor, shall appear.

But who is he? Julian della Rovere, born in Savona, the son of poor parents, who had won his way to eminence by a life of holiness and energy. The court of Rome accorded not with his taste, during Alexander's pontificate, and he bent his course to Avignon, where he became intimate with Charles IX. and Louis XII. Avignon was then the theatre of jousts and tourneys, and the usages of society did not preclude even the purple from a participation of the pleasures which a passage of arms was sure to afford. Cardinal Julian della Rovere was often present at the lists, and if one could have looked into his soul, it would be seen that he burned for an opportunity of girding on the sword, and tilting in no mimic field with the oppressors of that beautiful land, which licentious Frenchmen and semi-savage Teutons were tearing to pieces. Had Julian della Rovere lived in the days when Bernard swayed the chivalry of Europe, he would have taken the cross, like the metropolitan of Pisa, who smote the Saracen in the Balearic Isles; but he was destined for a period not less spirit-stirring, when he succeeded the short-lived Pius, with the title of Julius the Second.

Coming to the pontifical throne, he found himself stripped of the most important towns and sea-ports in his states. The Venetians, not content with their possessions in Cyprus—Candia, Dalmatia, and Istria—had occupied that portion of the Papal territory which is washed by the Adriatic, while Cesena, Forlì, Imola, and Forlimpopoli, were garrisoned by Cæsar Borgia's free lances, and refused submission to their rightful prince. One all-absorbing passion had taken possession of the Pontiff's soul, and he vowed to cherish it; Germans and Frenchmen he regarded as barbarians, and he prayed that "he might live to see them driven beyond the Alps." Cæsar Borgia, with his brigands, was accused of God and man, and Julius determined to crush him. Vast and momentous projects these, but he who entertained them loved Italy with an intense love, and sighed and prayed for the advent of that day which would see the foreigner driven from the soil, and the native population banded together in defence of their down-trodden nationality.

And then, as well as now, there were bitter hates and proud rivalries. Verbose Hidalgos, with high-sounding pedigrees, affected to despise artistic Italians, whose hands they said were fitter for the lyre, pencil, and easel, than the sword, lance, and buckler. The volatile Frenchman sneered at the arrogance of the Spaniard, and stigmatized the Italians as a race of imbeciles, while the uncouth Teuton, in his rough, harsh-sounding guttural (for the apostate monk had not yet softened its asperities), muttered deep curses upon Iberian, Gaul, and degenerate Roman. The duello was then regarded as a highly honourable practice, for then, as well as now, there was abundance of cant and misnomers in the world. If a Colonna unhorsed a Consalvo in the lists, a thousand voices made loud acclaim, and pronounced Italian chivalry indomitable. Jabbering Frenchmen, swathed in burnished steel, were ever ready to defend the title which they claimed for superlative bravery, as though the tilting ground epitomized the history of their nation's prowess, and a petty victory was hailed by the companions in arms of the successful competitor, as the prestige of superiority which was sure to distinguish the combatants whenever circumstances might marshal them on a larger field, and face to face, in compact masses. The brawney ruffian, skilled in fence, who could disarm his antagonist gladiator, was deemed a champion; the courage and capabilities of a people were estimated according to an individual standard, and the mettle of antagonistic nations rose and fell with the sunshine and the shade of their delegated representatives. Thus, in the days of Queen Johanna, thirteen Frenchmen challenged thirteen Italians, to meet them in sanguinary combat; the defeated (so ran the programme) were to forfeit their horses and warlike harness. Nothing loath, the parties met—eager eyes watched the result, as though it was fraught with a world-victory; dust clouds hid the combatants for a moment, and when they disappeared, a triumphal shout rang out from a thousand Italian throats, as though their land was saved by the victory of a few hot heads. Oh, reader, when will men learn to judge correctly, and cease to deduce general conclusions from particular data?

One man mourned in bitter grief over the calamities which had come upon Italy, and watched with eager glance the progress of events. Division and dissensions distracted the popular mind, and the Italians lacked every trait of nationality. Pope Julius prayed that a spirit of concord might descend upon those who seem born to an inheritance of slavery, no matter whether conquerors or vanquished, and his heart beat responsive to one grand aspiration, that Italy might be for the Italians, and the Italians for Italy.

Dolorously enough three years went by, nor could Pope Julius make a step in advance till the year 1506. In the interval, earth had been rid of one miscreant—Cæsar Borgia was slain, and his body flung into a dyke somewhere in Navarre. The Papal coffers were empty, else the Pontiff had not been inactive; but it was now high time to strike a blow. The Princes Bentivogli had taken possession of Bologna, determined to occupy it as an independent principality, but Julius summoning the cardinals, acquainted them with his intention of marching against the usurpers. At the head of four hundred men he proceeded to the rebel city, reduced the various towns that had been held by the adherents of Borgia, and finally expelled the Bentivogli, having severely chastised their licentious adherents.

Ill fared it then with the French, who were driven from Naples and Gaeta by the Spaniards. Pisa, too, warred with the Florentines, and all Italy was in flame. The Emperor Maximilian having espoused the quarrel of the Pisans, solicited the Venetians to grant him a passage through their states, and was refused; the refusal was tantamount to a declaration of war; and the Doge despatched troops to obstruct Maximilian's march. The result was favourable, for the republic clipped the wings of the two-headed eagle in the passes of the Friuli, and before the battlements of Cremona.

Emboldened by their success, the Venetians resolved to retain Ravenna, Rimini, and Faenza; Julius seeing that he had not power enough of his own to win back these portions of his principality, made a league with King Louis XII. against the Venetians, and this league is now known as that of Cambray. Well had it been for the Venetian republic, if content with her possessions and great prosperity, she had not warred against the feeble power of a mitred ruler, but rather marshalled 'neath her banner those broken and divided hosts, who might have driven the invaders from the land of Italy. Alas! she is now a petty dependency of Austria—her mighty fleets, her Greek mercenaries, her proud flag, and all that make the grandeur of a nation, have perished, and so shall it be with every power divided against itself. The Papal influence moved King Louis and the Duke of Lorraine to march against the Republic, at the head of 50,000 men—the Venetians met them on the Adda, and were defeated. Francis della Rovere, the nephew of Julius, attacked and carried Faenza by storm, while the French following up their success, reduced Bergamo, Brescia, and other strong-holds of the Adriatic. It was now time for the Venetians to think of conciliating Julius and the Emperor Maximilian, and they gladly surrendered to the Pontiff these towns, the unjust detention of which had induced him to join the league of Cambray. Louis returned to France, proud of having humbled the Venetians; and Maximilian having fought a decisive battle before Ferrara, in which he inflicted a terrible punishment on the Republic, marched into Germany to recruit his army.

Reduced to the greatest difficulties, the Venetians sent Ambassadors to the Pontiff, praying him to withdraw from an alliance which they represented as anti-national, and urging as an incentive to his abandonment of the league, that they had ever been the implacable enemies of the Turks, who might sooner or later descend on the Italian shores. Hating the Transalpine princes as much as he detested the followers of the Koran, the Pope listened to the prayer of the Venetians, and renounced all connexion with the French king.

Henry VIII. of England was then at variance with the king of France, and Julius lost not a moment in adopting such measures as would bring about a conflict between the two powers. He was led to hope, that if he espoused the quarrel of Henry, the French would not be able to send troops into Italy, but in this he was mistaken, for in the year 1510, an army composed of French and Germans, marched over the Alps, and wasting Lombardy, committed such barbarity as did Ludlow in Ireland, and Bugeaud, in our days, in Africa.* 'Twas at this period when Julius flattered himself all Italy had been roused to oppose the invaders, that one man could be found corrupted by French and German gold to sell his country, and aid her oppressors. That man was the Duke of Ferrara, and when exhortations failed, the Pontiff excommunicated the matricide, and sent his nephew, the Duke of Urbino, to crush him: The Papal arms triumphed—Modena opened its gates, and the cross and keys floated from the battlements. But sadly disastrous was the campaign to the Venetians; their adversaries had an army of 34,000 men, who, roused to deadly vengeance by the appearance of Turkish subsidies led by John of Epirus, fell upon, and routed them with dreadful slaughter.

Yet, notwithstanding these reverses, the martial pontiff sought to keep alive the spirit of resistance and nationality. His active mind knew no repose, and he furnished 70,000 ducats to the Swiss cantons, who pretended to be interested for him, but having received the money, refused to march. Vainly did King Louis urge on his Holiness the necessity of retracing his steps, and re-joining the Cambray league; all overtures were rejected, and the French monarch called a council of bishops, at Lyons, to decide on the legality of making war on the Pope; the bishops removed the royal scruples, and pronounced that it was nowise contrary to the spirit of the church to make war against its head, who was also a temporal prince. In fact, Maximilian and Louis contemplated the deposition of Julius, whom they regarded as the great obstacle to their "planting and undertaking."

Such was the state of parties in the year 1511, when Julius, roused by the threats levelled at his spiritual supremacy, resolved to appear at the head of his own troops. Mirandola was besieged by the Venetians, and the Pontiff impatient of delay, set out in the beginning of a dreadful winter to hasten the capture. Carried before his jaded soldiers, he rebuked the beseigers, and ordered an immediate assault. Where the shot fell thickest, there was the Pope to be seen, clothed in armour, bright and beautiful, as that in which Angelo has painted the slayer of the dragon; at length a breach was made, and when the storming party was about to advance, a loud voice was heard above the din of battle—it was that of Julius, commanding a halt, that he might be the first to cross the bloody threshold, on the other side of which lay the object he ambitioned. Elated with his success, he retired on Ravenna, and having sent 5000 men to reduce Ferrara, marched forthwith to Bologna, and exhorted the Italians never to lay down their arms till they had driven out their implacable foemen. 'Twas at Bologna that he made his acquaintance with Michael Angelo, who, having furnished the model for a bronze statue of his holiness, inquired of him what he should place in the uplifted hand—"a book, holy father?" "No," was the reply, "give me a sword; I am no scholar." Yet, take not this as an admission of ignorance, good reader, for the name of Julius is everlastingly connected with the greatest embodiments of genius that this world worships. These triumphs, however, were of short duration, for in the succeeding year Bologna fell into the hands of a party of traitors to their native land, and paid agents of a foreign power. Bologna was garrisoned by the Bentivogli for the French; the bronze statue of Pope Julius was shivered by the rabble who could not appreciate the work of native genius or the holy love of country. Vainly did Julius thunder at the gates; the Spanish chivalry who followed his standard, retreated before the young Gaston de Foix, a column of whose army was defeated at Bergamo and Brescia, by Luigi Avogadro, who shortly afterwards falling into the hands of the French, lost his head on the scaffold.

Not disheartened by these calamities, Julius proclaimed his determination to carry on the war "till the barbarians were driven out of Italy." At his earnest solicitation, Maximilian made a truce with the Venetians for ten months, at the very moment that Gaston de Foix, with 30,000 men, was marching on Ravenna. Alas! on what a day of dread remembrance ces did the Italians confront their oppressors. 'Twas the anniversary of man's redemption; even so, on the anniversary of that day Brian fought and vanquished the Norwegian infidels on the Irish shore, but success was not with the Italians. Marcantonio Colonna maintained a terrible struggle all Good Friday and Easter Sunday; the Papal banner and Papal benediction were with him; nor did the youthful French commander lack the prayers and counsels of a churchman, for the Cardinal San Severino, armed to the teeth, had espoused the cause of the lilies. More than 10,000 Italians perished on the day of Ravenna. Italy trembled as though an earthquake had shaken her foundations; all hope seemed to have deserted her, and in the high places and homesteads of France there was bitter wailing, for Gaston de Foix had fallen on the fatal field.

* At a place called La Grotta di Massano, they burned 600 Italians who had taken refuge in a cave.—Muratori Raf. Volterrano.

How felt he then, that aged, stern Pontiff, when the news of this catastrophe reached him? Did he sue for mercy, and whine for pardon at the hands of the French, intoxicated with success? No; though the world were in arms against him, his heart knew no fear. A miserable conventicle of bishops assembled at Pisa, and assumed the name of a council, protesting vehemently against the acts of the warrior Pope. The conciliabulum was schismatical, the men composing it were traitors and dastards, who in fitting time paid the penalty of their arrogance and hardihood. Twenty thousand Swiss recruited the ranks of Julius's army, in the June of 1512, and with energy which would reflect honour on the most revered names of old, the Pontiff advanced on the French who retreated to Pavia, and made a show of resistance on the Ticino, till the Papal subsidies passing the river, dashed amongst them, and pursued their flying columns to the base of the Alps. What a moment of enthusiasm! What a glorious triumph for that grey old man, whose every thought and aspiration had but one desire to gratify on this earth, the overthrow of foreign dominion, and the restoration of Italy to her freedom. But we may not pursue the military career of Pope Julius beyond the limits we have prescribed to ourselves, in this brief memoir. He was mainly instrumental in chasing away the French from Italy—and their return thither in the year 1512, was not to be looked for, as Henry of England and the Spanish monarch gave them ample employment in other regions. One wish of the Pontiff was well nigh realized—Italy was once more the possession of her own children, and this reflection was enough to shed glory on the declining days of Julius, and consign his name to immortality.

But there are other memories of this great man which entitle him to the esteem of Catholic posterity. Unreflecting cynic, sneer not at the portrait of a mitred sovereign with hauberk on breast, and sword buckled round his loins. Remember, that in other times, when Norman William landed at Hastings, a bishop led his cavalry; and in days nearer our own, Heber Mac Mahon charged at Beinburb, and the bishop of Ross perished on the gallows tree rather than connive at the surrender of Carrig-adrohid. Quakerism would have been rank heresy in the eyes of Julius, and he would as soon have subscribed the doctrine of the Millennium as believe the paradox of non-resistance. But a truce to war and all its trophies.

If your footmarks have ever been on the sacred dust of Rome, doubtless you have visited the Church of San Pietro in Vincoli. There repose the ashes of the Pontiff Julius. Supposing you have not been so fortunate, you must have heard, oh! reader, of that wondrous monument created by Bonarotti, to eternalize the name of his friend and patron. "It is Moses, by his beard's thick honours known," the greatest of the divine artist's works, and the most fitting idolon of the man who, burned with indignation when he saw the Italians worshipping alien dominion, and then girded himself with the sword to chastise traitors, and save the remnant of the people. Never, oh, never shall the name of Julius be forgotten, as long as that "stern monument of art" thrills the beholder with terror.

And the foundations of the "vast and wondrous dome" were laid by him, who could cultivate the arts of peace as well as lead a charge or storm a citadel. Deep seated in the bowels of the earth, are the sub-structures of the mighty fane, which may not crumble till the graves give up their dead, and he who conceived the gigantic design stands before the judgment seat of God. In the universal wreck, nothing shall perish more closely resembling the productions of the Deity than these, for which the world stands indebted to the genius of the warrior Pope. Down in the abyss there may be anguish and coiling serpents, like Laocoon's, on earth there is nothing like that petrified agony. Right well the Pontiff knew this, when he blessed and rewarded the poor peasant who disinterred the group from the grave of ages.

Never till the reality bursts upon the world, shall eye of man behold such ineffable woes and radiant delights, as loom and flash from that vaulted roof, whereon Angelo has pictured the day of Doom. And the concentrated glories, fears, hopes, and withering despair which live and move in that mighty work, grew into existence under the guidance of Julius, whose impatient spirit chafed and pined till he saw it glowing and frowning upon him.* Oh! mighty potentates of earth, where be your trophies compared to these? Scoffers of the Papacy, what have ye produced, or what are you likely to effect for which posterity will bless and admire ye? See you not how heaven has breathed its creative spirit upon those who came to embellish the material temple, and then returned to the bosom of him from whom they emanated? And these Pontiffs, so long traduced and vilified as oppressors of the human race, anathematizing the advance of intellect, and chaining down the immortal mind, oh, how little do you know them! Search all your chronicles, put together all the works of your great men, contrast them with what the Papacy has produced, and then see on what side the scale preponderates. The battle for native freedom may have been more successfully fought by others, but where will you find in the history of the past a single man who, against such fearful odds, made nobler efforts to right his native land than did Pope Julius? A great authority, Francis I., gave testimony of this in the days of Pope Leo X. Angelo's chisel, and Raffaell's pencil, effected greater wonders when Julius passed out of this life, but they never forgot the gauntleted hand which blessed their infancy, and chastised the invaders of the soil that gave them birth. Be not hasty in your judgments then, O, cynic, and blame not him who wielded the flesh-cleaving as well as spiritual sword!

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SCHOOLMAN,

JOHANNES DUNS SCOTUS.

SAINT Thomas of Aquin, of blessed memory, in the year of our Lord, 1274, while journeying to Lyons, to attend the second general council held in that city, being mortally taken, died in a convent near Terracina, in his fiftieth year. He was regarded while in life as unrivalled among schoolmen; in the year of his death was born, at Lecale, in Down, one destined to divide with him the empire of European mind, for three succeeding centuries.

The date of the origin of the scholastic philosophy, in Europe, has been variously laid in the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries. Mosheim asserts it to have originated in the Irish schools, at the earliest of these periods; Guizot and Turner look upon Erigena as its author, on the Continent.* All historians of philosophy have a perception of its indications among the active Irish minds, intervening between Columbanus and Erigena. But it was about the close of the thirteenth century it attained to scientific completeness and universal repute.

Its progress up to this time had been remarkably rapid, for it never seized on a school, or on an intellect, it did not retain. Abellard, following in the footsteps of Erigena, defended his doctrines and spread them, wherever he had the power. His chief pupil, Peter Lombard, afterwards Archbishop of Paris, wrote the "Book of Sentences," which became the text-book of the schools. St. Bernard—"the last of the Fathers"—complains grievously of the swift growth of the new system. "Their books," he exclaims, "fly; their darkness invades cities and castles; they pass from nation to nation, from one kingdom to another. A new gospel is fabricated for states and peoples; a new faith is proposed; a very different foundation is laid from that anciently established." But St. Bernard, whether right or wrong, stood alone, and against him—almost in his own age—are the venerable names of Anselm of Canterbury, Albert of Cologne, and O'Heney of Cashel. The "Summa" of St. Thomas established the system.

Scholasticism was an attempt to reduce the rules of faith, to a logical definiteness—to reconcile reason and religion, inquiry and submission, mystery and understanding. Yet, the attempt had not, as would at first appear, its origin in the folly of human pride. The necessities of the missionary, the progression of education, the seductive influence of the Arabian schools, founded in the Peninsula, and the challenges of heresy, all demanded that Christians should be able to give reasons for their belief. And the schoolmen invariably prayed before they disputed, humbling themselves before that Almighty whose ways they were about to vindicate, and whose various revelations they undertook to reconcile. It has long been fashionable to ridicule the schoolmen, and yet their system is to-day as universal as the spread of revelation. The Catholic preacher reasons us into submission from evidence of the finiteness of our comprehension, and the Protestant acknowledges no higher guide than his own understanding. If we even investigate the origin of our social ideas, we would find that very many of them were cradled in the schools of the middle ages. Not but there is much frivolity attached to some of the doctors, but this is as the dust on the hem of a prophet's garment. The class of Erigena and Abellard, of Peter Lombard and Aquinas, of Anselm and Dunensis, is not one which a wise man would sneer at. They are truly an imposing, though, mayhap, a quaintly-spoken troop, conspicuous in the march of created intellect, along the vale of ages. Behold their ever-brooding brows, and meditative carriage, their weighty manuscripts and iron styles, their humble dresses, and sandaled feet! If you would look for a St. Paul, or an Aristotle, and if your imagination refuses to go so far into antiquity as the age of the Redemption, you may find likenesses of both here.

The birth place of Duns Scotus has been disputed, against us, by the Scotch and English. There was also, at one time, a claim laid to him for Italy. The English writers said that he was born in the village of Duns, in Northumberland; the Scotch, that he was a native of Dumfries. But, in neither do we find the origin of his title. He was called Dunensis, from Down (which the old English wrote Dune), and which was a part of the English "Pale" in Ireland, in 1274. Being educated, as we will see, in an English college, that appellation was naturally given him. The affix Scotus, of course, determines nothing to the contrary, as all historians know, that the ancient name of this country—Scotia—was continued to it by the mediæval authors. But other evidence is not wanting to settle the question. From his works we learn, that St. Patrick and St. Francis were his patron saints, a choice the most natural in a Franciscan, born in Lecale where St. Patrick first landed, in Ulster, where he died and is buried. Of all his biographers, there is scarce one who does not agree in fixing on this locality. Fray Samiengo defines the precise spot, as being at "the extremity of a promontory;" but whether this extremity is on the side of Strangford Lough, or one of those points of mountain which look into the deep bay of Dundrum, it would be unprofitable to enquire. Among the Clarendon MSS. in the British Museum, is one of four pages, entitled "Reasons why Duns Scotus was not an Irish, but a Scotchman." It is bound up with some of Sir J. Ware's papers, and is noted on the margin with the words "a lie" "these reasons are confuted in Colgan, &c." The chief "reasons" are derived from the name Scotus, which we know to be nothing worth.

When Johannes was born, Lecale had been impaled for near a century. Twenty towers, built by John De Courcey, at the close of the preceding century, yet stood, though some of them had fallen into the hands of the Magennis and other native families of that district. Still a constant communication was kept up by the English garrison at St. John's Point, Ardglass, and Carlingford, with those remaining in Dundrum and Strangford.* And so fallen were the ancient fortunes of that coast, that Bangor, "the vale of angels," held scarce an Irish monk, and not one student now copied or chanted amid those Ards, where thousands upon thousands had once learned and lived. The youthful Irishman had, therefore, to turn his eyes abroad in search of an education, and he fixed on Oxford College as the most accessible seminary for his purpose. This famous University, both before and after the invasion, was a favourite resort of such Irishmen as sought for education in England, which number necessity had largely increased in that age.*

Johannes, arriving at Oxford, entered Merton College. That establishment was founded by a bishop of Oxford, in 1270, "when," according to Ackerman, "the allowance for the scholars was fifty shillings per annum for all necessities.† By extraordinary application, aided by an uncommon capacity, he soon outstripped in learning, not only those of his own age, but many of the fathers of the schools. Nature had early gifted him as a prodigy, and seldom was fair promise so rapidly realized. "Bishop Rada records of him," says the editor of his Contemplations on Divine Love, "that coming to be a reader, many masters left their chairs to listen to his divine wisdom."‡ His own master was William de Ware, who, dying at the time when the fame of Johannes had somewhat ripened, was succeeded as an instructor by the young scholar. Berrington says that multitudes of students now "crowded to hear him"§ at Oxford, and some have rated the numbers who attended his discourses so high as 30,000!

In 1298 he first became known as an author, by the circulation of his "Book of Sentences," which had obtained the sanction of Pope Boniface the VIII., in the March of that year. In those ages, the pontifical approbation served a work only in so far as it saved it from all suspicions of heterodoxy, and its lasting success depended solely on the sufficiency of its merits. This work of the young philosopher grew quickly into favour, and induced him to continue his literary exertions. In 1303, he also circulated from Oxford copies of his "Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans," which bore the approbation of Benedict XI.

It is probable, that in the five years which intervened between those periods, he had retired from his chair in Merton college to the adjacent convent of St. Francis, where he became a member of that august order. To this interval also are assigned the devotional works ascribed to his hand, and which might well be the work of a novitiate in the school of the Assisian saint. Of these I have seen but one—his "Contemplations of Divine love," which in its English dress is so eloquent and edifying, that one may almost venture to compare it to the master-piece of A'Kempis.¶ Take, as an example of its definition of divine love, itself:

"Love solders up what is broken, raiseth what is depressed, and renders a staggering mind constant. Love teacheth and learneth, and knoweth no enemy. Love praiseth and reprehends—love is free from evil suspicion. Where love is wanting, whatsoever is done is worth nothing; on the contrary, all things are valuable and precious which are done by love. Love gladdeth or maketh one joyful, and raiseth him above the earth and earthly things. Love never plays the truant or drone, but is ever doing, encreaseth, and augments. Love is the life of the soul, and he that loveth not is a dead man."

There are some other passages scarce less forcible in the same tract.*

On the appearance of his Commentaries on Saint Paul, the reputation of Dunensis may be said to have become fixed. In 1304, the general of his order, Gonsalvus, writing with him an introduction to the Superior of the Franciscans at Paris, says: "I recommend to your charity, and appoint, that after the above mentioned Father Ægidius, principally and ordinately to present our beloved Father in Christ, John Scotus, of whose laudable life, excelling science, his most subtle sharp wit, and other remarkable conditions or qualities I am fully and largely informed, partly by long experience, partly by (his) fame which is everywhere spread."† His abandonment of Oxford—if, indeed, he had returned to it after his profession—would have been but a matter of course in that time. By travelling from place to place, and by word of mouth, the great mediæval scholars propagated their own views and reputations. Aquinas had lectured in Paris and at Cologne, and to these two scenes of his great predecessor's glory, God was now directing the footsteps of Dunensis.

"The subtle doctor" (as he began to be called) entered Paris in his thirtieth year. His intellectual character was fully developed. Possessed of a profound penetration, he examined the most abstruse theories of philosophy, anatomizing them with as much skill as a skilful mechanist shows in taking asunder a machine. His industry was equal to his endowments; his mind never slept, and his body but little. In the school, in the pulpit, in the cell, the thinking power within him was for ever revolving; busy, even when fruitless. With all his logic, he was one of the purest enthusiasts that has ever appeared; in him, indeed, the fervor of inquiry must have often mounted to a feverish anxiety, or sunk to utter abstraction. Visions and ecstasies were his frequent visitors, brought on, no doubt, in most cases, by the exhaustion of his bodily powers, and the over-excitement of his mind.

In the first year of his sojourn at Paris, the University there bestowed on him the degree of bachelor of arts. In the halls of this institution he frequently lectured, though it does not appear that he had formal possession of any of its chairs. It was then the prime school of the west, and no less than fifteen new colleges had been added to its foundation in the preceding century.‡ It was frequented by students from every quarter of Europe, and had no rival in fame but Bologna, which also was originally an erection of Charlemagne's. Next to the approbation of the Roman Pontiff, that of the University of Paris was the

* The preliminary address of the translator of the Contemplations, is a gem of quaintness in its kind. It runneth thus:

"COURTEOUS READER—Although many erratas may have intervened through human frailty in printing this book, yet I am confident that they are not so material, but that ability concurring with your charity, you will easily rectify all mistakes. As for those trivial errors that have happened in the orthography, or in putting one number for another, as the singular for the plural, or in the pointing, it will not to thee seem a points matter, and so I weigh them not; presuming you to be no spider that seriously take such books as this in hand, but a spiritual bee, to gather honey. Farewell." (How much the art of writing salutations has degenerated!)

highest reward of European learning in the fourteenth century.

Johannes also lectured in the Cathedral Church of Notre Dame. Here he expounded the "sentences" of Lombard, and preached the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin. But his theology was not considered as sound as his philosophy. He contended that the mother of our Redeemer could not have confessed to St. Peter, after the institution of penance, without sin against God; and he held that the salutation of Gabriel—"hail, full of grace"—should be understood literally. On the subject of the efficacy of grace, its operations, and conditions, he differed from the judgement of Aquinas, and the fervor with which he asserted his own views involved him in controversy with the many devoted followers of that doctor, just as his advocacy of the Immaculate Conception had raised other and numerous antagonists against him.

This theological agitation seized on the Sorbonne, and afterwards extended throughout all the schools of Christendom, and opposite interpretations were delivered from the chairs of divinity and from the altars. Of Dunensis, as of Bossuet, it might have been said that "no one went into the pulpit so early or remained in it so late." Fray Ximenes Samiengo relates, that the statue of our Lady graciously bowed its head to the champion as he passed to the pulpit, and the translator of the "Contemplations" reports that the infant Jesus appeared to him on the eve of Christmas Day, while he was meditating on the mystery of the Incarnation, and sat on his arm, conversing with him.* There is recorded a saying of one who heard him preach, without knowing his person, and who, in admiration of such energy and power, declared that that must be either an angel, a demon, or Duns Scotus. Doubtless, this intense enthusiasm prepared the way for his early death.

His labours as a friar preacher did not turn him from his studies in philosophy and criticism. Before the picture of the Madonna, he composed, at Paris, a volume of commentaries on St. Paul, another volume on Aristotle, his celebrated book "of Questions," and his "Lectures on Genesis." His great temperance of life sustained him in this almost slavish devotion to study; he seems never to have left his cell, but to go into the church, and only to have quitted the church to return to the cell. "Many," says the author last quoted, "do justly question with Cornelius a Lapide (in sap.), whether it were not more supernatural than natural." Truly, a very reasonable dubiousness.

In 1308, Dunensis was offered the professorship of sacred theology, in the University of Cologne, whither he removed. Here he wrote in part, or whole, his book "On the Perfection of states," and his "Metaphysical Treatises." According to custom he preached in the cathedral frequently, and there, in the very stronghold of Albert and Aquinas, he propounded his favorite theological views of grace, the conception, and other dogmas. But on All-Souls day, in that year, he expired suddenly of apoplexy, having only reached his thirty-fourth year, yet possessing a reputation, second to none in Europe, for eminence in philosophy and theology.

* "After this grand favour," continues the same author, "our Duns Scotus buckled himself to great matters, never after eating flesh, going barefooted, never changed his garment, wholly forgetful of himself, being inebriated with the love of our blessed sweet Saviour." Supp. Contemp. p. 196.

The history of the influence of Duns Scotus on European mind, is an indispensable sequel to the brief record of his life. Its facts are very abundant and diversified.

On his death, his remains were interred in the convent of his order, at Cologne, and his works, placed beyond risk by the vast number of authenticated copies of them dispersed to all the corners of Christendom. His school greatly increased in number, and in many countries—Naples, for example—his name was invoked as a saint.* In 1313, the Thomists enjoyed a great triumph in the canonization of Aquinas, who was placed in the calendar as the fifth doctor of the church. None of the explications of Scotus, however, were at any time censured by the church; nay, in the end they wrought themselves into the very core of Catholicism.

In philosophy, we have before said, these two great men mainly agreed. Both were staunch realists. Both rejected the nominalism and emanation of Erigena and Abellard, as dangerous and untrue. "We say," writes Dunensis, "that the universal is a being, because nothing is understood under the ratio of a non-existence; because the intelligible moves the intellect; for since the intellect is a passive virtue (according to Aristotle de Anima), it does not act unless it be moved by an object. A non-existence cannot move anything as an object, because to move is the property of a being in action. Therefore, nothing is understood under the ratio of a non-existence." The difference between the philosophy of Aquinas and that of Dunensis, is a difference of method rather than an opposition of principles. The Italian reasons well, but with less closeness than the Irishman, and he occasionally rises into a pure eloquence, superior to all syllogisms. He is, therefore, considered the more agreeable master of the two, though by some held to be the inferior metaphysician.

From the time of the discovery of printing to the "Reformation," Scotus was the great authority in the European schools, and his works in that half century were generally accompanied by the Expositions and Commentaries of O'Fihely. Panegyrics were annually preached on his life and doctrines, and the title of venerable was always given him in the sermons and writings of churchmen. Even the Lutheran revolution did not overthrow his philosophical influence, though it raised formidable prejudices against his theology. In 1535, the students of Oxford—his alma mater—in a fit of ill-judged zeal, tore up the College copies of his works, and strewed them over the quadrangles.† Bishop Hooker, notwithstanding, stiled him "the wittiest of the schoolmen;" and John Milton, no less great as scholar than as poet, mentions him with great deference. In Germany he fared as ill for a time as at the hands of the Oxonians, but this hate did not last. In 1519, Julius II. being Pope, Maximilian, archduke of Austria, and Father John Custer, guardian of the Franciscans at Cologne, the remains of Dunensis were disinterred in the presence of the faculty of the University, and placed in a sarcophagus, under the altar of the chapel of his convent. A splendid monument to his memory was, at the same time, erected in the choir of the cathedral. In 1616, the sarcophagus was examined, and some repairs made about the tomb, in presence of James Bagnacabel, general of the Franciscans, of which the official account signed "John Felix de Brixia," is given in Wadding.*

In the sixteenth century, various editions of his chief works were published, as those of Antwerp, Venice, and Paris. But the Lyons edition of 1639, in thirteen volumes, folio, edited by Luke Wadding, is that which has been most popular and serviceable. Into this publication, that indefatigable collector arranged, before the several volumes to which they apply, the commentaries of O'Fihely of Lychetus,† of M'Caruell, and of John Ponce. The edition is embellished with an excellent engraving of Dunensis, who is represented as writing, before the Madonna, and near an open window, through which a conventual house is seen in the distance.

In the number of biographers, no author of the middle ages can compare with ours. They are of all nations—Italians, Portuguese, Spaniards, Germans, Britons, and Irish. But in nearly all cases, these memoirs or memorials display more rhetoric than research, being indeed little better than eulogiums, with a few facts as a foundation. Besides these are the regular panegyrics, of which Colgan, in his second chapter, enumerates fifty-six, delivered at various times between the age of Dunensis and his own.‡ Many of them are compositions of very eminent men.

In the Sorbonne, at Salamanca, and at Rome, Scotus continued to be throughout the seventeenth, and most part of the eighteenth century, a studied authority. Though within the last century Aquinas rose to be considered, and now continues to be considered, the great exemplar of the philosophy of the middle ages.§

The greatest minds among the moderns have done justice to the schoolmen, even while dissenting from their doctrines. "Erasmus," says Butler, "admired neither the Scottist nor Thomist system, but inclined to the former." Leibnitz commends the schoolmen for "penetration, solidity, and industry," and wished that some one acquainted with modern philosophy, would sift the golden grains from their chaff.|| Florence Conroy, James Usher, and Luke Wadding, with no less learning, held even more favourable opinions of scholasticism. Sir Kenelm Digby was its warm admirer. "In this scheme," says Burke, "the allegorical gave way to the literal explication; the imagination had less scope, and the affections were less touched, but it prevailed by an appearance more solid and philosophical, by an order more scientific, and by a readiness of application either for the solution or exciting of doubts and difficulties."¶ Charles Butler observes that some of the schoolmen were gifted "with a large portion of his (Aristotle's) genius." Doctor Hampden says of scholasticism: "Its philosophy was a mixture of heathen and scriptural truth. * * * Its religion a mixture of two lives—the perfect life of the heathen philosopher, and that of the Christian."†† Another late author, speaking of its influence in the world, says: "As truly as we owe our laws and ecclesiastical architecture to the middle ages, so truly do we owe to them our forms of thought and language."‡‡

It was the schoolmen who introduced into Christendom, and consecrated to its great ends, the element of intellectual curiosity. But this element they had so blended with humility, and had limited its exercise by so many scruples, that the daring disciples of change in the sixteenth century, spurned at their over-conscientious system. Luther warred on it in Germany, and Henry VIII., though he had been a Scottist in early life, banished it, by an exercise of his authority, from both the English universities. Yet, had not a higher and less cumbrous philosophy succeeded, its empire would certainly have been restored. Machiavelli and Gassendi, Bacon and Montesquieu, stepped into the field, speaking through living languages, with the aid of the telescope and the press, with the superior polish given by the recovered classics, and the superior freedom of nationalism, and addressing ages of generally-aroused curiosity and intercourse, they supplanted the Thomists and the Scottists. These men may be said to have founded the modern philosophy, a vast and beautiful fabric assuredly, yet indebted for its material, at least, as much to the mediæval as to the ancient schools of philosophy.

A STORY OF IRELAND IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER IX.—THE LADY OF DRIMNAGH.

HUGH Herrick spurred on at a brisk rate, over the plain which lies between Dublin and Drimnagh, straining his eyes to catch a glimpse of the knight, his master, but in vain. Topping a slope that lay before him, he pulled up, as much to rest his horse as to collect his thoughts, which were beginning again to perplex him. It was a cloudy, humid day, and the face of the campaign was darkened by a grey, dripping fog, which took away its genial earthly look. A clump of trees, on his right, clad in this foggy vesture, looked like fantastic shadows, which, in the absence of the lightsome sun, had emerged from Tartarus. At times, the tinkling of a bell about the neck of some favourite of the flock, a bark, or a whistle, was heard, and then all was stillness as before.

The squire of Sir Piers did not pause mistaken in his way, for that he had often made out when as hard beset with fogs and mists of his own conjuring. But a sudden doubt seized him, that his master might still be in the city, detained by love, or, even in durance for his partizanship; and he was puzzled whether or not he should go forward or return. While he was in this dilemma, he heard a voice, which grew louder and louder, singing in the mist:

"The raven's nest is built with reeds,
 High on the hollow tree,
 And the raven's couch is spread with weeds
 High on the hollow tree;
 And the raven himself telling his beads,
 In penance for his old misdeeds,
 Upon the top, I see.

Telling his beads from eve till morn,
 High on the hollow tree,
 In penance for stealing the abbot's corn,
 High on the hol——"

"Hallo!" cried Herrick, "pray you, melodious Sir, come forth out of this mist, and show us your proper person."

"Is it not," said a clownish-looking fellow in motley, shuffling forward, "is it not by the worshipful Master Herrick I am challenged?"

"As you say; but Sir natural, what do you here, so far from the roaring ingle, and the larder door of the castle?"

"Bound on a fool's errand," replied the man in motley; "going to Devylin in search of you and your master."

"My master! Has not Sir Piers arrived?"

"No! except he ran up the wind faster than I ran down."

"Then," said the squire, after a pause, "I will go back to the town; he must still be there."

"The dame, his mother, is in her last extremity," said the simpleton, "and wants to see him, anon. Peradventure, by this time she is deceased, for I met the crows going to the wake."

"Peace! you headless hound," cried out the squire. "You have ever a stock of ill-omened prophecy in your shrivelled pate. Return to the dame Catherine and say——; no, I will go myself," and so he dashed his rowels into his charger's flanks, and rode furiously onwards. In half an hour he was at the outer gate of the castle, which was enclosed in a square embattled wall, turreted at each corner, and entirely surrounded by a deep and broad ditch.

"Who comes?" cried the invisible warden from the fog-wrapt summit of the main tower.

"I!" shouted the squire—"open quickly."

There was a rustling as of chains, a swinging of gates, and in a moment the heavy horse of the squire bore his master through the inner gate of the main tower. Within the walls, the castle consisted of two towers, connected by a long, high corridore, divided into chambers, and accessible only from the inner yard. Facing the inner front of the quadrangle was a garden, where a few flowers, marygolds, and other odorous pot-herbs were scattered, which garden was flanked at each side by the offices and stables. The whole presented the appearance of being the work of a much earlier age; indeed, justified the opinion of the antiquaries, that it then stood just as it was erected after the Anglo-Norman invasion.

The second floor of the main tower was the state chamber. It was a spacious, oblong room, dimly lit from the western end, which looked out upon the inner yard. Here, on a low couch, moved upon rude wooden rollers, lay, under the window, the Lady of Drimnagh, pale, motionless, and apparently dead. Two fair-haired little girls, like two vigilant angels, stood at either side, near her head, bending down alternately to catch the sound of her breathing, and to whisper hope into her ears. In a distant corner—half hid with the shadows—was an old friar, dissolving some herbs in a goblet, while a female servant stood by him handing him the different materials he required. On the hearth lay the embers, a dull red heap, adding to the gloom within, so congenial to the melancholy prospect without. As the sound of the horse's hoofs was heard upon the drawbridge, the dying mother turned her head and moved her lips, with a strong effort.

"There comes but one horse" she said, "God send it is my boy."

The sound ceased. Then there was heard the heavy tread of an armed man approaching the door. As the step came nearer and nearer, that frail form gradually rose up, little by little, and as if by the mere strength of will, to a sitting posture. But the step grew slower and more dubious, and when at last the door was opened, and the glaring eye of the sick matron beheld only Herrick enter, she fell back like a lifeless corpse, upon her couch. Terrified at this result, the two fair-haired children began to cry bitterly, and so pitiable was the spectacle presented to him, that even the honest squire felt the hot drops rolling down his face. He turned from the group of the widow and her orphans, and addressed a few broken words to the friar, whose brown habit told that he was of the order of St. Francis.

"It is all over," said the father. "If she lives till vespers, it is the most. She has been subject to these fits, but this is the last that will trouble her."

"Can nothing be done to save her until——"

"Nothing. If she is able to give her last advice to these poor babes, it will be as much. Happily, she has lived a life of piety since her birth, and her soul this night will be on the wings of angels, even as the corporal part of her holy patron, Saint Catherine, was borne by them into heaven. God's will be done."

"Amen," said the female attendant. Herrick shook his head sorrowfully and sighed.

The tears of the little girls had trickled on their mother's face, and their helpless sobs, perhaps, had pierced into her brain. Souls hovering over the abyss of dissolution, it is said, have been for a time recalled to earth, by the lamentations of beloved friends. However this may be, the poor, pale mother opened her filmy eyes, and parted her clinging lips, and in a voice that seemed to come from her bosom by some director way than her mouth, said—"Be comforted, my girls, God, your father, will not die." Then turning her gaze to the dim end of the room, she raised her small transparent hand, and beckoned Hugh to come to her. The squire approached the couch and dropped on one knee.

"My son," said the dying lady, "my son."

"Madam, he is well, praise be to St. Joseph, our Lady, and the blessed Trinity."

"Where?"

"In Thomas-court—Kildare's guest."

"Ha!" said the dying woman, clasping her two weak hands in terror, "in Thomas-court, with Kildare; with the greedy usurper of my lands and his. The robber of my orphans—the violator of his knightly oaths and vows—the warrior who fought a woman for a ploughland—the viceroy——" here her passion grew too great for her strength, and she fell back again on her couch.

A long pause followed. The Observantine and the woman servant gathered round, and the latter held to her lady's nostrils what the good Leech had been preparing—an infusion of some aromatic spices and herbs, from which a grateful incense rose and diffused itself about the couch. Sense returned, as if for a moment, to the patient; but the power of speech was gone for ever. She stretched forth her hands, like the age-blind Patriarch, and laid them on the heads of her two children. There was an effort to sign them with the sign of the cross, and then her hands fell heavily to the couch, and the deathly dew settled upon the rigid, but graceful features of the Lady of Drimnagh.

For some moments a breathless silence and motionless attitude marked the awe of the speakers. The two children and the woman on their knees, the religious and the squire standing up, with an inclination towards the dead, seemed like five figures ground around a central statue, emblematic of the reality of affliction. The bursting sobs of the younger orphan first broke the silence. Her sister, only a little older, commenced comforting her, but had not spoken more than one or two words, when she began to weep more bitterly than the other. The woman servant approached them both to lead them away, but the infection extended to her also, for she was an old retainer, and she joined in their grief against all her efforts to continue calm. Master Herrick now felt called upon to act.

"Mistress Rose," said the squire to the servant woman, "you know this is all God's will, and not ours; so we must even bear what we cannot forbear." "Take away," in a lower tone—"take away with you the young lady Alice, they make one another sad sitting here, like two widowed doves."

"Take them both away," said the Franciscan, "and let sear-cloth and shroud be brought. This poor body is now of little consequence; but it was, and will be against the judgment day, the tabernacle of a soul, and so we must honour the house, though it be of clay, for the dignity of the tenant."

The woman and the mourning orphans left the room, where the Observantine and the squire alone remained. These gradually withdrew, as if by instinct, from the corner possessed by the dead, and drawing up on either side of the window, entered into discourse. The day had not mended as it grew older. The vapors had fastened upon the plain, and had defeated all the power of the winds to disperse them. Wave upon wave, like a shadowy sea, they undulated before the castle, while here and there the spread arms of a tree, dimly revealed themselves, like vessels in the grey dawning, before the sun has cleared the atmosphere. The franciscan, who was advanced in years, did not appear much to heed the prospect, but the squire's eyes were fixed upon it, as one fascinated.

"I was making my accustomed visit for our poor house," said the friar, "when two days ago I reached here, and finding that the dame—whose soul God rest—was suddenly taken ill, I remained, fearing the worst. The silly people here did not think her in danger until to-day, when I got them, at last, to send for the knight her son."

"Truly, father," said Herrick, "it is the saddest part of this business that he hath not been here. Pray God, he is not in durance in the city."

"What say you?" asked the friar.

"That Sir Piers may, for aught I know, be the Lord Deputy's prisoner at this hour. We were to have left Devylin this dawn for the Earl of Ormond's country; I was at the court betimes, for he lodged there while I put up at the White Horse (a very commendable hostelry, be it said); but I was told by the earl's people that Sir Piers had already left, so I pursued hither, thinking to overreach him."

"Beyond doubt," said the Observantine, "he hath been discovered and is now in chains. And these poor children, Master Herrick, my heart bleeds for them."

"I had best remount and ride back to Dublin," said the squire.

"To what end?"

"I will go to Kildare, and charge him with the imprisonment of Sir Piers—I will appeal to this new king—I will supplicate the Archbishop Octavius——"

"No! no!" said the religious, "you must not do any of these things. Drimnagh requires some governor, and having neither lord nor lady, now must fall into your hands. Have you no messenger?"

"None," said the squire, "but the natural, or one of the herds. The four warders we could not spare; for if they lowered the drawbridge to let themselves out, there would not be strength enough left within to raise it."

"I will go myself," said the franciscan. "Often have I eaten of the bread of that lady's table, and drank of her beer—I will go."

Here the woman servant and another female—the wife of one of the warders—entered the chamber, to do the last rites to the dead.

"Master Herrick," said the friar, as they reached the courtyard, "my horse is in this stable, and I have here a couple of inconsiderable bags, filled with corn and pulse; I pray you have a care of them for me till I return."

"That will I," said the squire; "by St. Joseph not one grain of them shall be taken away, whatever may be added to them, at your coming back. But pray, father, how do you mean to proceed?"

"I must resolve that upon the way," he replied, "before I reach the city walls; in truth, at this moment I cannot tell how; the Virgin and St. Francis will guide me."

"There is a gentleman may be of great service to you," said Herrick, "Master Myrtle, captain of the bachelors of the city, whose abode bears the inviting sign of a winepress, trodden by vintners; it is in St. Bride's-street, near to the Poole-gate. If you mention to him your errand, you will not find him adverse."

"I have heard of him," said the franciscan, "as the best bowman in the Pale—it is, I suppose, the same."

"Doubtless," said Herrick, "he is not an indifferent archer; neither do I think him a paragon. For, instead of advancing his left foot——" but here the squire suddenly reigned his garrulity, and as he led the franciscan's pad by the rein over the drawbridge, he added: "in God's name, holy father, leave no stone unturned in your search."

CHAP. X.—FRIENDS IN NEED.

It was the second evening after the death of the Lady of Drimnagh, and no tidings of the Observantine had reached the castle. The night fell dark and starless, and the mountain winds, with their strange melancholy voices, keened about the tower. The body of the departed spirit lay in a small rude chapel in the inner tower, and was watched by three or four of the women old followers of the family, one of whom had at her knee a curly-headed boy of seven or eight years old. The two daughters of the house, worn out with watching and sorrow, lay asleep in an adjoining chamber, locked in each others arms; and Master Herrick, to prevent the same influence from overcoming his own vigilant faculties, had taken post with the warders on the tower-top.

The dreary conversation of the death chamber gradually sunk into silence, and the speakers, one by one, fell asleep. The little boy alone remained awake; and he, overcome by the awful silence, hid his face in his mother's lap, and pretended to sleep also. The hour of midnight drew nigh, and still those wearied watchers remained fast bound in their unconsciousness. Suddenly, however, the noise, as of a foot, was heard from without, and the child raising his fearful head, beheld Sir Piers himself enter, his face sad and sorrowful, his buskins all travel-stained, for his armour had given way to a common kerne's jerkin, and his helmet to a mechanic's cap. As he entered, he looked neither to the right hand nor the left, but approached to where his dead mother lay upon her bier.

Three tapers burning round her head, reflected by the black funereal cloth which hung that angle of the chapel, showed the rigid features of her whose breast had nurtured his youth, and whose mind had moulded his own. The cold lips no more could speak to him—the glazed eye no more could smile on him—the soft small hand would never again stroke his head, or lean upon his shoulder. Terrible, indeed, is death, in whatever shape we meet him, whether as the destroying angel, walking half hidden in the anger furrowed sea, and gathering into his net of storms, men, fleets, and islands, or as the unseen and voiceless guest, whose invisible hand snatches friends from the midst of friends, and blinds even argus-eyed affection to the blow, until the doomed one has been felled. But death looking at us from the senseless eyes, and speaking to us from the silent lips of a dear friend, is, perhaps, more terrible than when he comes in battles or in the tempest. Then memory, as if illumined by a light from the wings of the departed, reminds us how many omissions in duty to that friend we have been guilty of; and every cold or unkind word or look we may have ever given, crowd back to us, giving to the fullness of sorrow the bitterness of remorse. Sir Piers had never been unfilial or unkind, yet he had never felt, until that hour, the value of having in the world a nature to which he could always turn for sincere counsel and loving sympathy. He stooped down, and the cold sweat stood in beads along his brow. He kissed the cold lips, and then the brow, and the pallid cheeks of the fair corpse, and threw himself upon his knees and prayed. The prayer was a litany for the dead; and ever as he repeated the supplication for her soul's eternal rest, the sobs that broke from his bosom showed how deeply he felt the visitation to which he could not choose but submit.

Half an hour might have passed in this solemn duty, when he rose, took one of the tapers in his hand, and entered the sleeping chamber of his sisters. The knight, during the time he remained in the dead chamber, had contrived to stifle his emotions of sorrow. But now, as he lifted the taper and saw the faces of the two fair children, which like rain-drenched flowers leaned against each other, the tears that had been rising to his eyes overran his swarthy cheeks.

"Poor little ones," he said, "you sleep here almost as soundly as the mother that bore you, though there seems but a wall between you; but the gulf that divides life from death, will long divide you. What woes and trials may befall you earthward of that dark abyss, who can foresee? Lonely you lie there, my children, and I fettered on limb and lip, dare not speak to you—dare not stay with you."

As he said this he stooped down, and kneeling upon one knee, kissed them both. The elder made a slight stir, and murmured as if her soul would fain speak what the dull senses would not let out. Sir Piers rose hastily and returned into the dead chamber. The tired watchers were still asleep; but as the vision encountered for the second time the eyes of the retainer's son, the lad uttered a loud shriek, which rose through the vaulted chapel, and reached the very summit of the tower. Alarmed by this, the knight drew his cap over his brows, and hastily quitted the chamber, but not unperceived. As he crossed the courtyard, Hugh Herrick, who entered it from another quarter, saw and pursued him. He passed rapidly through the garden of the castle, and opening a postern gate which led into the open plain, he issued forth, and attempted to close it after him, but the squire who had come up held it from within, while he challenged the intruder.

"Who are you that steal in and out of Drimnagh under cover of night?" he demanded.

The door opened, and although the night was utterly dark, he could perceive his master standing before him, with his finger upon his lip, and his other hand on an empty scabbard.

"In the name of St. Joseph, Sir Piers, what mystery is this? Are you still among the living, or——"

Here the waving of a torch in the courtyard disturbed some poultry, and a cock began to crow. The knight waved his hand mysteriously, and disappeared.

"Dead! dead!" muttered the squire, and he reeled under the sudden shock of awe, and fell. In this condition the alarmed inmates of the castle found him; and when the child's story, and the young lady's dream—for she had dreamt that her brother stood by her bed, kissed her, and blessed her—when these, we say, were coupled with the awakening recollections of the squire, the belief became general, that the young lord, as well as the Lady of Drimnagh, had passed out of this life.

It was the first grey hour of the May morning's dawn, when Sir Piers found himself passing in front of the Cathedral of St. Patrick's. The sculptured heads of the abbots and kings that supported the mouldings of the doorway and the windows, seemed to look forth from the wall, to invite him to moralize on the vanity of life—but he passed on, until he reached the postern gate of the castle. Here he raised his hand to knock, but the door gave way before him. He entered, and to his surprise, saw the keeper overcome with sleep, or some other influence, lying stretched upon the paved way. He lifted him up and tried to rouse him, but in vain. He then closed the postern, secured it, and passed on; but had not gone more than two paces when he heard steps approaching, and in the next instant he was confronted by the Captain of the Bachelors, and by the wizard shape which served Sir Patrick D'Arcy.

"Well met, Sir Piers," cried the bachelor, "we have just been in your chamber, but found it empty. The guards are all drunk with the new king's Burgundian wine—the door is open—the streets empty—come, come, with me."

"I cannot," said Barnwall.

"Cannot, Sir Piers!"

"I have plighted my knightly word to return to my gyves; nay, more, not to speak to mortal until I was within the walls of this castle."

"Knight," said the gallant vintner, "shamed would I be to advise you to your dishonour, but bethink you whether you are bound to keep faith with your enemy, who, when you were his guest, sent you from under his own roof to a dungeon."

"My friend," said Barnwall, gravely, "say no more of this to me. Malo mori quam fœdari is the motto of my house, which means die rather than lie; I must in to my fetters. But pray tell me how came you here, or how knew you that I was in the castle?"

The bachelor pointed to the elfish retainer of Sir Patrick D'Arcy, and added, "does your pledge outlast to-night?"

"No."

"Then, scrupulous knight, look for another visit from your friends, for know that I do not stand alone in Dublin in esteeming you."

"Thanks! gallant bachelor," said the knight, "if you should see anything of ——"

Here the drunken sentinel at the gate began to murmur in his sleep, and the knight said "fly, friends, fly."

"I understand you," said the bachelor; "if I should see a lady."

"Yes, begone."

The two adventurers did not wait a second bidding, but while the drowsy sentinel was slowly regaining his eyesight, they slid past him, opened the portal, and went out. The sentinel was known afterwards to assert, that on a certain night being at his post—he saw in the last watch—the devil and another gentleman come from the interior of the castle, and pass bodily through the keyhole. As a Jew had died in Dublin the same night, he was generally supposed to have been the evil one's companion in this midnight visit to the castle.

When Myrtle and the dwarf got into St. Bride's-street, they turned into a little courtyard, from which emerged towards them, Sir Patrick D'Arcy himself, and the friendly observantine.

"Have you brought him?" exclaimed both.

"He would not come," said the bachelor.

"God-a-mercy!" said the friar, "would not come!"

"In the devil's name, why not?" said the giant.

The bachelor told the story of his interview with the knight, and declared he would make another attempt.

"Hush!" said the dwarf, "what sound is that?"

It was the echo of a very distant horn which came from the direction of the sea. It had not yet ceased to vibrate about their ears, when another nearer, and more distinct, answered it, and then another and another repeated the note.

"Tis the coming of the Germans," said the bachelor, "let us down to the river side and see them."

"I must home to my brethren," said the religious, "already I have wasted two days in this expedition."

"Twas a mission of mercy," said the bachelor.

"I do not regret it," quoth the friar, "it was a debt due, I may say, from our whole house to the lady of Drimnagh—whose soul God assoil! But she must be interred to-morrow, and 'twere meet some one should be there to bless the clay and read the office."

"Truly is it, holy father," said Myrtle; "and whereas, the children of the dead widow may not have yet come to the use of gold or silver, I pray you——"

Here he drew forth a deer-skin pouch from his doublet, which was fastened by a steel chain, and taking from thence near a score of marks, gave them to the astonished friar.

"But bethink you, master vintner," said the latter, "who is to repay you this great sum?"

"I have had some dealings with the house," said the generous bachelor, "and I will be repaid; fear not for that."

"But, Sir, there hath been drawn no bond."

"Think not of that," said the vintner.

"But I may lose this by the way, or be robbed by some prowling kerne."

"Do not fear, do not fear."

"In good truth, then, Master Bachelor, I do not like to be the bearer of so great a sum. I have been now thirty years in my order, and was twice sub-prior, but I have never seen half so great a sum—nor do I ever wish to see it. The devil, as saith Saint Francis, our blessed founder, cometh in the guise of gold and silver upon men. Now, what if he should be in this pouch?"

The bachelor, who could not help smiling at the simplicity of this good man, answered, "but this I give you, father, to be used in charity, in requiting kernes and mourners, and doth not the intention of the giver purify the gift." Blasphemy.

"Of a certainty, but there is no need for so much; good friend, take back one-half the sum."

To relieve the scruples of the religious, the bachelor did so, and then receiving his benediction, he, in company with Sir Patrick D'Arcy, and the little imp, his page, made towards the river's edge.

CHAP. XI.—MARTIN SWAART AND HIS MEN.

THE early sun of the May morning was glittering along the river, shooting his beams hither and thither, as if to pierce into every cranny where darkness might have found refuge.

The three personages took station on a knoll of the rising ground which ran by the foot of Winetavern-street, towards Fyan's tower. This as they rightly conjectured would be the place of the debarkation of the Germans. They were soon joined by many others, burghers, men-at-arms, and even knights and nobles, who had been roused from sleep by the same sounds as they had heard.

The scene that was now spread before them, much resembled one of those Italian seaports painted by Claude, in which trees and houses, human figures, boats, shipping, and water, are all grouped on the same canvass. The vista towards the sea, also, was such as that great master might have painted—the palpable, grey haze, struggling against the sunlight, and dipping its fringes into the green, undulating water. But, a charm was added to the enjoyment of the landscape, which painting can never give. The distant sounds of warlike music, of hautboys, trumpets, horns, and drums, came rolling along the full tide, making the old city quiver to its foundation with the martial sounds. Suddenly the music ceased, and the vanguard of the fleet appeared in the distance, advancing slowly and stately up the river.

Among the crowd who had collected on the spot where stood our men, were several esquires, an ancient herald, and the gossiping tanner. These, as the different vessels came into sight, commented aloud, and sometimes disputatiously, on the bearings of the several noble adventurers.

"This is the royal banner of Burgundy," said the tanner, "coming first, and this which follows must be St. George of England."

"Not so fast, master tanner," quoth one of the squires, "may it not be St. George of Burgundy?"

"That it may," said the herald; "there is such an order founded an hundred years back by a pious gentleman of that kingdom, who brought home some relics of the glorious martyr from Palestine."

"It is mainly like our own George," said the pertinacious tanner; "but who is he that standeth on the next deck in the white damask habit, and the violet-coloured hood?"

"This," said the herald, "must be a brother of the order, called among the French 'the Broom Flower in the Husk,' founded by St. Louis, of blessed memory. He is the first of them I have seen."

The next galley that hove into sight was the largest that had yet appeared. On its deck, among a number of knights, stood a tall, powerful figure, of a fair and agreeable complexion, wearing on a surcoat of a creamy colour, a simple purple cross, edged with green.

"This," said the old herald, "must be Swaart himself, and that star is the order of Rodolph of Hapsburgh."

The crowd who looked upon the ancient herald, as in this case, most infallible authority, fell to cheering for the brave German. The next two vessels were those of the English Lords, Lincoln and Lovel, who were hailed with new clamours—Lord Lincoln being an especial favourite for his noble bearing and chivalrous character.

Whilst this fleet was thus slowly nearing its destined point of debarkation, the sound of clarions and music approaching the river, from the neighbourhood of Thomas-court, announced the coming of the deputy. In a little time Kildare, the prior of the Hospitallers, the chancellor, and old Fitz-Eustace, with many nobles and gentles more, rode slowly down Winetavern-street. It was so arranged, that their horses just reached the river's edge as the galleys came to the landing. The Irish noblemen dismounting stood uncovered, except the deputy, who, as the representative of the king, dispensed with the ceremony. German and English nobles and knights, stepping on shore, were warmly greeted by those of Ireland, who advanced to the tide mark to meet them.

Then Swaart advanced some paces towards the lord deputy, holding in his hand a billet, tied with a crimson ribbon, which he presented, bowing low. Kildare taking his dagger, cut the billet, and read its contents; then speaking aloud, he said:

"Lieges of King Edward, and dear friends, this silent messenger informeth us, that he who bears it to our hand, is none other than the most renowned Captain Martin Swaart, whose fame hath been sounded from many a field, from the day of Morat to the fray of Nanci. Let us bid him welcome." He then advanced and embraced the German leader, amid the acclamations of the crowd.

"I pray your pardon, noble Earl of Lincoln," he continued, as that personage advanced to pay his respects, "not to me, but to the king. 'Tis I should offer homage to you."

Lincoln bowed low, but the deputy lower still.

"And you, my Lord Lovel," he said, "we have met before now, and should count each other old friends."

"Thanks, noble Kildare," replied Lovel, "I am honoured in your remembrances of me."

"Nay, nay, my lord. Noble Sir, companions of these redoubted soldiers, I bid you all heartily welcome, whether you be of Germany, Burgundy, or France. His majesty lodged here, in our poor castle, will be better able to thank you for your coming than I am. Pray you mount your horses, and come with us to his presence."

The horses of the knights had now been landed from their boats, little, if at all, oppressed with their long sea voyage. Their owners obeyed the deputy's command and mounted. Before they moved, the latter turning about to the citizens, said:

"Loyal burghers and men of Dublin, you have here 3000 valiant strangers, come to tarry with you a week or two, and then to be your comrades in bringing the true king to his throne in England. For his dear sake, and mine, and your renowned city's honour, treat them generously. Aid and refresh them for to-day, to-night they will be lodged in the castle. And so, long live Edward VI."

"Long live Edward VI.!" shouted the enthusiastic crowd. "Long live the Deputy!"

When these cheers had subsided, other voices cried out, "long live Earl Lincoln—long live the valiant Almain."

Amid these gratulations, the allies marched towards the castle, which they soon reached. Dismounting from their horses, they were arranging the order of precedence, according to the custom of the age, when king Simnel, robed in scarlet and crowned in gold, looking as majestic as any Louis or Phillip of France or Spain, presented himself at the door. At his shoulder stood Sir Richard Symon.

"Welcome, brave friends and allies!" he exclaimed. "You have come so far to serve me, that I could not but come thus far to bid you heartily welcome."

All present were captivated with the grace with which this speech was delivered. A murmur of approbation ran through the ranks of the knights, but Lovel and Lincoln looked at each other with sinister eyes.

"Which of these gentlemen is the renowned Swaart?" he continued.

"Most puissant prince, I am the man you ask for. Ten days and nights, I and these noble persons, numbering some of the choicest knights of England, France, and Germany, have spent in travail and anxiety at sea. God and St. Gall be praised, we are here at last."

"Amen," answered Symon.

"My brave subjects and allies, and you Lords Lincoln, Lovel, and the other peers and knights, I again bid you welcome, and will not longer hold you at parley here. Follow us."

While this scene was being enacted at the castle, the captain of the bachelors, apparently in compliance with Kildare's injunctions, was exerting all his efforts with the citizens for the debarkation of the Germans. To one of these, a middle-aged man-at-arms, of a very jovial exterior, with a beard, in which the white hairs were struggling against the black for a majority, and an eye where jollity had put shrewdness into a corner, he particularly attached himself. This person spoke some words of English, and seemed more than a little pleased to be so favourably noticed by a personage of such consequence as the bachelor. Their short intimacy quickened marvellously soon, so soon, indeed, that Myrtle carried the German to his own house, and insisted on entertaining him during the day. The best wine in his vaults were drawn to light, noon found them carousing and as the evening of the day fell darker, the goblet of the stranger was the oftener filled.

About twilight trumpeters were sent about the city, calling the Germans to their night quarters in the castle.

"Der Teufel!" exclaimed the disturbed trooper, "must I go and leave you, mine friend."

"There is no choice when the trumpet blows," quoth the bachelor; "I wish the trumpeter in limbo."

"Ha! ha! sho do I, mid all my heart," replied his guest, "but I sponse I must go."

"We will meet to-morrow at the tournament," said the bachelor; "did you not hear of it?"

"Na."

"There is to be a grand one, indeed. Some of your foreign lances will be tested, I tell you. But the noblest knight of our kingdom will be absent."

"How's so?"

"He is a prisoner in the castle you will sleep in to-night. Perhaps you may be in the same tower."

"Ha!"

"He is my friend, and the tournament will be spoiled without him."

"Der Teufel! it shall not be spoiled! I will set him free myself—I will cut his chain—I will draw his bolt—I warrant——"

"No, no," said the bachelor, "but I will go with you to the castle, and stay there if I can. I may count on you."

"You! der Teufel! man, count, make me count! oh, yaw, count me, yaw, yaw!"

The new friends pouring a parting libation, set out for the castle, the bachelor stopping on the way, and leaving his orders for the night with the gossiping tanner, who looked mightily puzzled at his companioning with a German jackman.

The Geraldine's Heir.

THE sunlight is waning, and evening's calm shade
Is mantling with sombre hue dingle and glade!
Dark shadows crowd over the Shannon's deep bed,
Where the tower of the Geraldine rears its proud head.

There hangs round that castle an aspect of gloom,
And peals from the belfry a death-boding boom;
There the song and the revel no longer resound—
What means the dread stillness that hovers around?

In her lonely apartment, the fair Emmeline,
The beautiful wife of Fitz Gerald, is seen;
The trappings of woe o'er that chamber are spread—
Can it be that she mourns for the dying or dead?

* * * * *

*'Twas midnight last eve—she watched o'er her sick child—
When a Voice broke the silence in murmurings wild!
Now it rose on the air in a loud, piercing cry—
And again died away in a low, moaning sigh!*

Oh! she well knew the omen that fatal shriek bore—
It told her the days of her Eugene were o'er!
'Ere morn, her loved son, as the Beanshee foretold,
Lay in that apartment, pale, lifeless, and cold!

* * * * *

Fair Emmeline wept as she gazed on the face
Of that once lovely child, and endeavoured to trace,
In the motionless form that reclined on the bier,
The fair, blue-eyed boy to her bosom so dear.

But grim Death had deprived that fair cheek of its glow—
It resembled in whiteness the storm-driven snow;
And those eyes which once sparkled with joy and delight
Were bereft of their brilliancy, beauty, and light!

Oh! imagine her grief and her bitter despair,
As she looked on the wreck of her innocent there!
In vain, oh! in vain, were her tears and her sighs—
The spirit she cherished had soared to the skies!

* * * * *

O'er yon hill moves a train sad, dejected, and pale,
And a wild burst of wailing is heard on the gale.
To the grave they are bearing the corse of Eugene,
And the mourners are chanting the soul-rending caïone :

CAÏONE :

Bright was thine eye, Eugene,
Piercing and bold ;
Waved o'er thy brow serene
Tresses like gold ;
Fair was thy rosy cheek—
Loving thy smile ;
Pure was thy heart and meek,
Shrinking from guile.
Lifeless that heart is now—cold in the urn !
Gone is that loving smile, ne'er to return !
Uluu, ululu, gulla, g'one !
Long may we weep—thou wilt never return !

Would we had died with thee,
Since thou art dead—
We would abide with thee
In thy cold bed !
But though we leave thee now,
Lonely to lie,
Seraphs receive thee now,
Sent from on high !
Gently they'll bear thee away from the tomb—
Beauty like thine should immortally bloom !
Uluu, ululu, gulla, g'one !
Beauty like thine with the angels will bloom !

High was thy destiny—
A Geraldine !
Higher thy throne shall be
With the DIVINE !
In His dominions bright
Ever to reign,
All that can give delight
Thou wilt obtain !
Angelic minstrelsy ever shall roll,
Shedding sweet melody over thy soul !
Uluu, ululu, gulla, g'one !
Joy shall for ever encircle thy soul !

Cold is the couch where we lay thee to sleep—
O'er thy white bosom the worm shall creep !
Sad, oh, how sad ! is thy last lullaby !—
Eugene, beloved one, why didst thou die ?
Uuluu, ululu, gulla, g'one !
Why art thou gone from us ? Why didst thou die ?

The anthem is ended,
Upturned is the clay,
The corse has descended,
And all kneel to pray—
Chronicles say
The heavens were rended,
And, beautifully blended
With bright hues, a ray,
Whose brilliance transcended
The beams of the day,
Shone down o'er the spot where the Geraldine lay !

And wondrous sounds were heard on high.
From out the sky—
As if a million lyres
With golden wires
By seraph hands were sounded !
Oh ! were the beauteous minstrels seen
By man, I ween
Amid the throng would shine
The Geraldine,
By Heaven's host surrounded !

In a vale near his birth-place this fair child is laid,
Where he softly sleeps on, 'neath a green willow's shade ;
A silvery brooklet winds by his lone bed,
Fertilizing the flowers that grow o'er his head ;

And the warbling of birds and the waving of trees,
As they yield to the sway of the oft-changing breeze,
Make the scene one of melody, love, and delight—
A sweet resting-place for a being so bright !

JUVENIS.

SKETCHES OF

The Lives of Great Christian Artists, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

No. I.—FRANCISCUS RAIBOLINI, CALLED IL. FRANCIA.

CHRISTIAN ART—How full is its history of instruction and of edification, of consolation and of grief, of glory and of shame ? Revolving the long and eventful history of the Christian church, its early sufferings from the time of its formation by its Divine Author, and the first preaching of its sublime doctrines by the humble fishermen of Judea, in that period when the faithful poured forth their aspirations of faith and love in the catacombs of Rome, when the martyr's tomb was the altar of the great Christian sacrifice, and when the cross, to all men—except to the suffering disciples of him who had redeemed mankind by his atoning sacrifice upon it—was the sign of shame, and the symbol of deepest infamy: the mind cannot be oblivious of the earliest offerings of piety, with which the primitive Christians decorated those sepulchral oratories, embodying their dogmas in mystic symbols, delighting to translate into fresco and mosaic, the Baptist's description of their dear LORD, as the "Lamb of God," or the beloved disciple's tender picturing of him, as the "Lamb which was slain from the beginning of the world," and adorning with their costliest gifts that cross, by his death on which their Divine Master had become "to the Jews a stumbling block, and to the Gentiles foolishness." Again, when the eagle had succumbed to the cross, when the labarum floated in triumph over the standards of old Rome, when the subterranean catacombs were relinquished for the Imperial Basilicas, the statues of Jove fell before the effigies of God made man—Venus and Diana yielded place for the Virgin Mother of the Incarnate Word, and the pure vestals who loved "to follow the Lamb," and sages and heroes of the old Pagan world were supplanted by apostles and martyrs of the new dispensation. So on in after ages as the church gained strength, as she rejoiced in the conversion of the heathen, or mourned over the treason of the heretic, art was ever an eloquent exponent of her deepest feelings, so that its remains are now the memorials of long past ages of her history and testimonies of her eternal truths. Whether we view the simple monuments of our own dear, long suffering isle, or the gorgeous triumphs of art in distant and more fortunate lands, the same conviction irresistibly presses upon us, that the spirit which animated and developed the arts of the middle ages was the genius of Catholicity, that "in the abyss of the passion lies the thought of the middle age—an age wholly contained in Christianity, as Christianity is in the passion. Literature, art, the different developments of the human mind, from the third to the fifteenth century, are all suspended in this eternal mystery."* And a feeling no less powerful demonstrates that it was the influence of the spirit of the world, as exhibiting itself in the rebellious frenzy of the sixteenth century, and in the false illuminism and mistaken liberalism of a later age, which ruined art as a faithful mirror of the mind of the church.

The church was the great school in which the artists of the middle age were formed; and so long as they remained her loving children and faithful allies, the inspiration of genius was purified by the flame of devotion; when they treasonably forsook her fold, and disdainfully scorned her protection, their sublimest efforts were valueless; and, volunteering first in the service of the Pagan Mythology, they quickly degenerated to sycophants of licentious courts, and ultimately took refuge in the patronage of ignorant fashion or vulgar wealth. Thus art fell from her dignity, from the loftiest glory to the lowest degradation. The study of material nature, and the embodiment of her forms and effects, became the highest aim of the artist. He no longer believed that art had a purer, a holier sphere than the mere representation of natural objects; that his true mission was to elevate the grosser conceptions of mankind, and raise their loves and hopes from this to a better world.

"To bind with pure and consecrated hands,
Round earth and heaven, a festal flowery chain."

Then were subtle theories propagated, and learned disquisitions held by connoisseurs and virtuosi, as to the cause of the decline or total disappearance of "high art," and profound analysis published, which analysis, we may observe, never enabled an artist to produce a tolerable work. Academies were formed for the protection of fading art, but with what success, let the heart-burnings and heart-breakings of many a foiled artist tell—it is not our province to meddle with the subject. Finally came a race of poking dilettanti, who, having seen "high art" fairly dead, assisted at her funeral obsequies in the character of chief mourners, with the same amount of sincerity of feeling which we may suppose the "mourners supplied," by the undertaker of a modern funeral to possess.

But though Christian art withered, the Christian church cannot decay, and its influence, ever young and vigorous and vivifying, is again beginning to be felt, and, in that land where the fatal schism first began, is restoring to art its religious sentiment. The example of Cornelius and Overbeck is the morning star, we may hope, of a more glorious day than ever yet has beamed on Christian art. These distinguished men, guided by that spirit in which lived and moved all the institutions of the middle ages, have greatly contributed to the restoring of art to its legitimate sphere; and doubtlessly they will not want disciples. The study of the pure feeling and devotional sentiment, which so eminently characterised the earlier masters, they found necessary for a new development; and amongst the most eminent of these old men, may be classed the venerated name we have placed at the head of this sketch, and whose life and character we shall endeavour to describe.

The gold and silversmiths of the middle ages were a race of remarkable artists, and exercised a considerable influence in the development of the arts of painting and sculpture. To them we are also indebted directly for the art of engraving on metal. There existed, in Italy, in the fifteenth century, a class of artists who worked in what has been called niello, by which nearly all the church plate of the time was adorned. This description of art was extremely simple in its process, and beautiful in its effect. The process consisted in tracing with the sharp point of a graver, the outline of the subject to be represented, and then filling up the indentations with sulphate of silver, which being black, contrasted with the surface of the metal. Maso Finiguerra was one of these artists in niello, and to him first occurred the idea of multiplying copies of his works on metal, by filling the engraven lines, prior to the insertion of the nigellum or niello, with a black fluid, and then laying over the surface of the metal a damped paper, which, being pressed by the hand or a roller, imbibed the fluid and presented a tracing of the design. The first engraving of this kind is from the pax,* by Finiguerra. It is preserved in the royal library of Paris, while the original pax yet exists in the church of San Giovanni in Florence. It is remarkable that, although the arts of wood cutting and metal

* The pax must not be confounded with the pyx, as has been done by some Protestant writers. The pyx is a cup or case for the reservation of the Blessed Eucharist for the use of the laity, and is now generally called the ciborium. The origin and use of the pax will be understood from the following notes:

"After the priest has given the salutation of peace, and the people have returned their answer, a deacon goes on to proclaim solemnly that they should salute one another with a holy kiss—and so the clergy salute the bishop, and laymen their fellow men. (Apostolic Constitutions, lib. 8.) Hence arose the custom which is still kept up in many places on the Continent, and in several country congregations in England, of men and women occupying separate sides of the church." Dr. Rock's Hierurgia, vol. i. p. 154. See also Bingham's "Origines Ecclesiasticæ," book xv. chap. 3, sec. 3. and book viii. chap. 10, sec. 9.

"Pax, or pax-brede. A small plate of gold, or silver, or copper, gilt, enamelled, or piece of carved ivory or wood, overlaid with metal, carried round, having been kissed by the priest, after the Agnus Dei in the mass, to communicate the kiss of peace. There were various images on these pax-bredes, sometimes the crucifixion, sometimes the face of our Lord, sometimes our Blessed Lady with our Lord in her arms, and occasionally that of the Lamb. These images were variously produced by engraving, chasing, enamelling, and painting, or carving, according to the material of the pax.

"The Pax as administered by a kiss, is a practice of remote Christian antiquity, but it does not appear that its transmission by instruments was common before the thirteenth century. It is mentioned in a council held at Oxford, in 1287. Duo osculatoria occur as belonging to the chapel of St. Radegunde, in the Inventory of old St. Paul's, made in 1295. They are continually mentioned in the inventories of ancient church ornaments.

"There are many examples of ancient paxes yet remaining, several in private collections; three at St. Marie's College, Oscott, one of the fifteenth century, in silver parcel gilt, is exquisitely wrought; round the outer circle is this inscription—'Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi miserere nobis.'" Pugin's Glossary of Ecclesiastical ornament and costume, p. 185 and 186.

The subject on Finiguerra's pax is the coronation of the Blessed Virgin by our Saviour, surrounded by saints and angels. This was favourite a subject with the artists of the middle ages.

* Michelet's History of France.

engraving, for pictorial purposes, and typography, to supply the place of the ancient manuscripts, were invented in the same century, the pictorial arts had the precedence of the typographical; the earliest known engraving from wood being that of St. Christopher, in the collection of Earl Spencer, which is dated 1423; the engraving from Finiguerra's pax, 1452, while the first printed book is ascribed to 1455.

Thus it was that the gold and silver smiths of the middle ages often abandoned their labours in metal for others in fresco and on canvas, and amongst the most distinguished of these artists was IL FRANCIA, or FRANCISCUS RAIBOLINI. He was born at Bologna, in the year 1450. Of his early life, little is known beyond the circumstance of his having learned to work in gold and niello, from one Francia, a goldsmith, of his native city, whose name, in grateful recollection of his memory, he adopted, and ever afterwards signed to his pictures. He practised his profession of goldsmith and niello worker till he had attained his fortieth year, when, we are told, the influence of some artists, who had been invited from Ferrara and Modena to Bologna, gave an opportunity for his grand genius to develop itself. His first picture was a Madonna and the Divine Infant, enthroned and surrounded by groups of saints. It is at present in the gallery of Bologna, and is described as a beautiful and wonderful production for its time. So must have thought Giovanni Bentivoglio, Lord of Bologna, who was so pleased with this first pictorial production of the goldsmith artist, as to commission him to paint an altar piece for the Bentivoglio chapel. Lanzi* says "he signed himself Franciscus Francia Aurifex, as much as to imply that he belonged to the goldsmiths' art, not that of painting. Nevertheless, that work is a most beautiful specimen, displaying the most finished delicacy of art in every individual figure and ornament." The same author assures us, that he afterwards enlarged his style, and that two manners were attributed to him. His earliest pictures were in oil, and we can easily conceive how the habits of his former art must have clung to him, and with what difficulty he must have surmounted the minute and restricted style consequent on his niello works, yet we are told that his success in fresco was almost instantaneous.

The fame of Francia soon extended throughout all Lombardy, and his services were sought for by the magnates of every city in Italy. At present there is not, we are informed, a picture gallery in Europe, with the exception of the Louvre, which does not contain at least one of his works.

His first pictures in fresco were the History of Judith and Holophernes, executed for his patron Bentivoglio, in one of the chambers of the palace. He afterwards decorated the chapel of St. Cecilia, with a series of fresco illustrations of her history. The composition of these works is described by Kugler as "extremely simple, without any superfluous figures—the action dramatic and well conceived. We have here the most beautiful and graceful heads, the most noble figures, a pure taste in the drapery, and masterly back grounds." These beautiful works are now, it appears, rapidly falling into decay.

A few of Francia's works have found their way into England. Passavant† says there is a "Holy Family, with the apostles SS. Peter and Paul, in the possession of Mr. Noney, purchased by him from the collection of the Orleans gallery, exhibited in London from December 1798 till August 1799." He also says, that there was in the collection of Messrs. Woodburn, of St. Martin's-lane, London, in 1833, "a small picture, which, in style of treatment, is very similar to the 'Adoration of the Kings' in the Dresden gallery. This is one of the three Predella pictures by Francia, and represents the baptism of our Saviour, with two angels and two turbaned scribes or heathens on the left."* There are also two of Francia's pictures in the collection at Hampton-court—one a "San Sebastian," and the other, "St. John baptizing our Saviour in the Jordan."

But, perhaps, the noblest of this great master's works in England is the altar-piece painted about the year 1500, for the Marchesa Buonvisi, of Lucca, and placed in the Buonvisi chapel, in the church of San Frediano, where it remained till purchased recently by the Duke of Lucca, who sent it to England for sale, with other pictures. It was purchased by the government for £3500, and presented to the National Gallery. It is described by Mrs. Jameson as "composed of two separate pictures. The larger compartment contains eight figures rather less than life. In the centre, on a raised throne, are seated the Blessed Virgin and her mother, St. Anne. The Blessed Virgin is attired in a red tunic and a dark blue mantle, which is drawn over the head. She holds in her lap the infant Christ, to whom St. Anne is presenting a peach. The expression of the Blessed Virgin is exceedingly pure, calm, and saintly, yet without the seraph-like refinement which we see in some of Raffaello's Madonnas; the head of the aged St. Anne is simply dignified and maternal. At the foot of the throne stands the little St. John, holding in his arms the cross of reeds and the scroll inscribed: 'Ecce Agnus Dei.' On each side of the throne are two saints. To the right of the Blessed Virgin stands St. Paul, holding a sword, the instrument of his martyrdom, and St. Sebastian bound to a pillar and pierced with arrows. On the left, St. Laurence, with the emblematical gridiron and palm-branch, and another saint, probably St. Frediano. The heads of these saints want elevation of form—the brow in all being rather low and narrow—but the prevailing expression is simple, affectionate, devout, full of faith and hope. The back ground is formed of two open arches, adorned with sculpture, the blue sky beyond; and lower down, between St. Paul and St. Sebastian, is seen a glimpse of a beautiful landscape. The draperies are grand and ample—the colouring rich and warm—the execution most finished in every part. On the cornice of the raised throne or pedestal is inscribed 'Francia Aurifex Bononiensis, P.,' but no date. It measures six feet and a-half by six feet wide. Over this square picture was placed the lunette, or arch, which now hangs on the opposite side of the room. It represents the subject called in Italian a Pieta. The Dead Redeemer supported on the knees of his Virgin Mother. An angel clothed in green drapery supports the drooping head of our Saviour; another angel in red kneels at his feet. Grief in the face of the sorrowing mother—in the countenance of the angels reverential sorrow and pity—are most admirably expressed."†

* Passavant, vol. i. p. 250.

† In copying the above very truthful description of Francia's works in the National Gallery, London, we have given the Virgin Mother of our Divine Redeemer the appellation which the Angel Gabriel declared should be given her by all nations, "Blessed,"

† Tour of a German Artist in England, vol. ii. p. 188.

The place occupied by Francia, in the history of art, has been called the "modern antique." He stood between the old and new world of artists. For three or four centuries before his time, a struggle had continued between two different classes of artists, which have been denominated the naturalists, and the idealists or mystics, the respective characteristics of which are thus described by Mrs. Jameson: "On the one side, a race of painters who cultivated with astonishing success all the mental and mechanical aids which could be brought to bear on their profession, profoundly versed in the knowledge of the human form, studying and imitating the various effects of nature in colour, in light and in shade, without any higher aspiration than the representation of beauty for its own sake, and the pleasure and the triumph of difficulties overcome; on the other hand, we find a race of painters to whom the cultivation of art was a sacred vocation, the representation of beauty a means, not an end; and by whom nature, in her various aspects, was studied, and deeply studied, but only for the purpose of embodying whatever we can conceive or reverence as highest, holiest, purest in heaven and earth, in such forms as should best connect them with our intelligence and with our sympathies." For a long time the issue was doubtful, whether art should hold her dignified position as hand-maid of religion, or sink to be the slave of mere secular purposes. Francia appeared to be one of those destined to vindicate the true province of high art, and he was contemporary with, and succeeded by able men, who would probably have sustained the real dignity of the arts, had they not been overpowered by the influences to which we have already alluded. He lived to see the triumph of principles not quite in accordance with his own, the establishment of which ultimately eventuated in the ruin of all that was most noble in art. Had the ardour of Da Vinci, the sublime genius of Michael Angelo, and the exquisite feeling and gracefulness of Raffaello, been more directed by the Christian spirit of an older time, than by the "mighty movements" of the "spirit of the age" in which they lived, art would have reached elevation hitherto unattained.

As a Christian and a man, Francia's character is no less good and amiable than his genius was large and refined as a painter. One loves to dwell on the reflection that his life corresponded with his talents, that while he sought to improve others by the teachings of his works, his practice bore testimony to the sincerity of his precepts. From what we have already seen of him, we may discover in his character two virtues—the most sublime in the entire code of Christian morality, humility and gratitude; the former is manifested in signing himself "aurifex," at a period of European history, when painters may be said to have ruled in courts, as they swayed the populace; the latter is seen as a graceful adjunct of the former, in the affectionate manner in which he venerated the memory of his early master. That his private life was the harmonious counterpart of his general character, we have the assurance of Vasari, who describes him as "a man of comely aspect, of exemplary morals, of amiable and cheerful manners; in conversation so witty, so wise, and so agreeable, that in discourse with him, the saddest man would have felt his melancholy dissipated, his cares forgotten; adding, that he was loved and venerated, not only by his family and fellow-citizens, but by strangers, and the princes in whose service he was employed."

The "great master of Christian device"* in our own times, says, that "any man who possesses the true spirit of Christian art, so far from desiring to occupy an unrivalled position, is delighted when he is equalled, and overjoyed to be surpassed; and this is precisely the point which distinguishes the Catholic from the Pagan artist. The former seeks the glory of God and the church; the latter the applause and the admiration of men." And this is shown by the friendly relations which existed between Francia and the divinest of painters, Raffaello; Francia was thirty-four years the senior of Raffaello, and survived him thirteen years. In the history of their correspondence, we find no assumption on the score of "the experience of years" by the former, no expressed or implied insinuations of the want of wisdom in the "young man," nor any deficiency of gentle kindness and well regulated deference in the latter. How unlike the members of modern academies and schools? On the contrary, we see the utmost respect for each other's genius and brotherly affection to have existed between them. Raffaello says of the Madonnas of Francia, that he "never beheld any more beautiful, more devotional in their expression, and more firmly composed by any artist;" and he concludes a letter which he addressed to him about 1508, with these affectionate words: "continue to love me as I love you, with all my heart." About the same time, Francia addressed a sonnet to the young artist, in which he styles him "the painter above all painters." Eight years after, Raffaello sent to Bologna his picture of St. Cecilia, which he had painted for a princess of the Bentivoglio family. He addressed it to the care of Francia, requesting him to repair any injuries it might receive in the carriage, and to correct any defects in the execution. Francia, on beholding the beautiful work, "burst into transports of admiration and delight, placing it far above all he himself had accomplished."

An interesting circumstance in the life of Francia is told by Lanzi, on the authority of Albini. Raffaello died on Good Friday, 1520, in the midst of his fame. His friend outlived him, and painted a celebrated picture of San Sebastian, which he exhibited in a chamber of the mint of his native city. As was usual at that time, a great work of art attracted admiring crowds of all classes. "Francia, on perceiving the concourse of people increase round his picture, and diminish round the St. Cecilia of Raffaello, apprehensive lest they should suspect him of having executed and exhibited his own, in competition to such an artist, instantly removed and placed it in the Church of "Miserecordia." As we may believe that he always painted for the glory of God, rather than to be distinguished amongst men, it is probable that now, in the decline of life, he felt that

"The voice
Of worldly fame is but a blast of wind,
That blows from divers points, and shifts its name,
Shifting the point it blows from."

During the latter years of his life, he held the office of master of the mint of Bologna. He died on the 7th April, 1533. His son and pupil, Giacomo, was also a distinguished painter.

and which Mrs. Jameson, all through her works, studiously avoids. It is a degree of irreverence, which characterizes much of the popular literature of England, and, consequently, renders that literature unsuitable to a Catholic people.

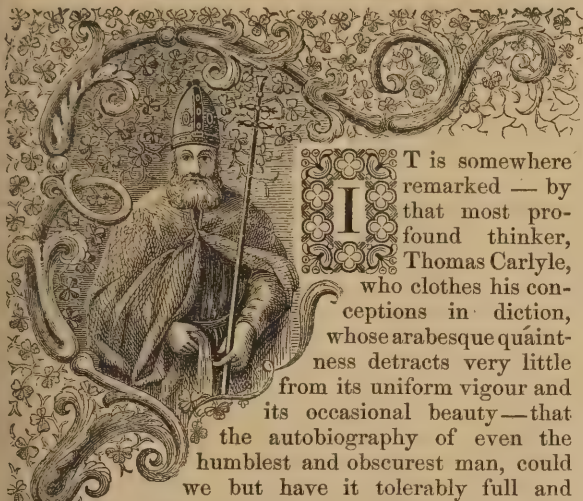

MEMOIR OF THE LIFE

OF THE

Late Right Rev. John Murphy, D.D.,

BISHOP OF CORK.

PRELIMINARY ON BIOGRAPHY.

IT is somewhere remarked — by that most profound thinker, Thomas Carlyle, who clothes his conceptions in diction, whose arabesque quaintness detracts very little from its uniform vigour and its occasional beauty—that the autobiography of even the humblest and obscurest man, could we but have it tolerably full and candid, would contain abundant matter of an instructive, nay, a good deal, too, of a startling kind. The interior life, could we but fairly get at it, of the poorest drudge, would present a spectacle, not for profane jesting, but for solemn reflection, for wonder, and, perhaps for tears. That strange microcosm into which we so seldom obtain a glimpse, would surprise the complacent apathy of the mere man of fashion, and subdue into awe the arrogance of the self-styled philosopher, whose mind is habituated to the exclusive investigation of the laws and observation of the phenomena of the external world. Generally speaking, where that most curious branch of literature, to which we have adverted—autobiography—does not step in to our relief, and present its interesting light for our guidance through the mazes and the dark windings of the mental labyrinth, we are left at the mercy of conjecture—an uncertain, an unsafe, and in most cases a fallacious leader. The difficulty of a complete and thorough analysis of an individual, is by no means removed by an appeal to the great broad features that identify all human beings as belonging to one vast brotherhood, or to the common faculties which men are found to bring into play, and the more obvious motives by which they are governed. These, after all, even when elaborately and learnedly descanted upon, when elegantly and scientifically classed, when eloquently described, may fill bulky volumes, and give, as undoubtedly they have given, an abundance of task-work to the pens and the tongues of metaphysicians and moralists, are of little service to the writers of a LIFE. They characterise the race—they do not individualise the man. By their help we are enabled to trace the grand lineaments of humanity; to discriminate the human being from the angel that soars above him on the one hand, and on the other from the brute that grovels beneath him. But they afford, if any, an extremely imperfect clue to the intricate mechanism and the endlessly varied complication of motives, whether conflicting or conjoined; of feelings, whether pure or selfish, or mixed; of anticipations, whether clear or confused, whether slowly evolved or instantaneously brightening into existence; of conceptions, vague or exact, congruous or imperfect; of moral convictions originating in sound knowledge of the nature of duty, or springing partly from emotional impulses, partly from some traditional ideas of right and wrong; of thought, whether linked in harmonious connexion and brought, in a lucid chain of reasoning, to some noble and satisfactory issue, or floating, fugitive, and unconnected; all which, notwithstanding, in a greater or lesser degree, constitute the elements that are at work in each man's brain and heart, and separate him and his little kingdom of the mind (so wondrously diverse in their combination) from the millions of his species. The conscious self, is in this respect, as completely insulated from the universe of its fellows, as if it belonged to another order of intelligent existences. Each man may be said to be the wizard of his own enchanted chamber, and alone to possess the key for unlocking its mysterious secrets. Our only resource for guessing at the nature or the extent of those secrets, in the instance of any given individual, is to be found in conclusions suggested by analogy; and that analogy supplied by the inquirer's own strict or loose habits of reasoning, and the wider or more circumscribed range of his observations and experience. But the whole force of analogy will not enable him to penetrate very far: some few of the outworks may be stormed or undermined, but the holder of the fortress still eludes the fury of the assault, and retires leisurely within the shadow of the citadel, which throws an impregnable barrier against any further approaches. The most powerful intellect, gifted with even rare sagacity, will be frequently at fault, and will often be baffled in the attempt to explain some obscurity, to reconcile some apparent inconsistency, and to give a rational account of some startling anomaly in the conduct or the language of the person whose life he has undertaken to write, simply because some unrevealed, yet real, motive of which he does not suspect the existence—some particular, nay, singular train of ideas of extraordinary influence on the mind of the party entertaining them, but that never occurred to the better regulated or more common-place imagination of the biographer; some delicate, yet most decisive spring of action, undetected, and incapable of being detected by any but the spirit which has bent beneath its sway—one or all remain in the dark background, undisclosed and undiscernible. We have only the outward result; interpret its significance as we may, conjecture its principle and its origin as best we can. The attempt at exposition, the effort to appear analytical may be solemn and learned enough, but it is dull, and perhaps uninformative work; it frequently also is mischievous and silly work—whenever it happens to fall into the hands of the shallow, the malignant, or the presumptuous. The real charm that attaches to biography of any kind, consists in the quantity and the quality, combined, of whatever so exclusively and individually belongs to one person, that it is not shared by another; and failing the inner world of thought and emotion, into which we have no full and satisfactory means of admission, except that very rare but most delightful one of autobiography, we must rest content with such revelations of human life and character as may be furnished by a liberal and impartial survey of those incidents in a man's career, which may help to throw some light on the powers of his mind, the dispositions of his heart, his intellectual and moral worth, in relation to his professional calling, to his official rank if such he has attained, and, above all, to the still higher interests of literature, of freedom, of country, and of religion.

Should a man's entrance into life coincide with some stirring epoch in the history of human society, whether religious or political, and either his own abilities or the accident of birth and position, bring him into connexion with the feverish and absorbing excitement of the period, the narrative of his fortunes becomes singularly interesting, from the intermingling stream of private adventures with the impetuous flood of public revolution and change. But if his genius lift him on the crest of the billows, and enable him to command and to controul the moving world beneath him, our sympathy with his struggles, as well as our feeling of glory in his success, rises to the highest pitch of literary enjoyment, and swells from the contemplation of individual prowess, and heroic effort, into the grandeur of a conquest achieved for the good of all. The story of one's life becomes then the history of one's country. The biographical materials, or the biographies already written, which exist in all languages, are really innumerable, and of every conceivable shade and degree of merit. And to a very large class of readers, this merely external view of human existence affords an inexhaustible source of attraction and of harmless amusement; a class, in short, utterly careless, if not contemptuous, of the inward and true life to which we in our sheer simplicity annex so high a degree of importance. These are the admirers of great captains, great reformers, great revolutionists, and great adventurers of every description.

The readers who take a lively interest in the biography of literary and scientific men, compared with the very large class just mentioned, are extremely few, indeed. But their number, too, is perceptibly and gradually increasing. Those who are attracted to the perusal of the records of intellectual activity, struggling with difficulties, conquering prejudices, adding each day some fresh conquest to the territory already won from darkness and error, and at last realising its hopes and reaching its cherished object—in whatever department that may lie—must themselves be imbued with somewhat of the same fine spirit so inaccessible to the temptations of vulgar ambition, and so intimately allied with intrinsic beauty and enduring nobleness and worth. Here, too, unless the subject of the biography be communicative enough to let some of his own secrets escape from his inmost sanctuary, or some loquacious Boswell encroach on his confidence, and with the scrupulous fidelity and the tenacious memory of a worshipping humble friend, journalise the sayings and doings of his idol, little can occur to interrupt the course—the level monotony of the narrative, or to throw across the obscure path along which the literary way-farer is travelling, the startling flash which heralds a storm and brings danger as well as light. Respecting the quiet studies and the tranquil ambition of literary men and votaries of science, it may be safely pronounced, with a few variations easily understood and easily accounted for, the life of one is the life of all. What to the ordinary reader will seem either entertaining or instructive, will be the account of the incidents that may have chequered their career, and of those mere striking and salient points that may have served to illustrate the peculiarities of their character.

The lives of men eminent in the political world, distinguished either for the wiles and trivialities of diplomacy, or for the higher and nobler art of statesmanship, as they are commonly written, are destitute of a vivid personal characterization, and vanish for the most part into cold and shadowy abstractions. The man merges into the politician. He is good for little else than to stand as the formal exponent of a set of actions or a parcel of opinions. Nearly akin to this stately and pompous sort of biographies, is the account we generally obtain of personages who reach the loftier ranks of professional or official life. The human being disappears in the dignitary. And, beneath the solemnities and pageantry of exalted station, beneath the costly and cumbrous habiliments of the magistrate, the judge, or the prelate, into which a petty mind has swelled, or a great one has shrunk, how seldom can our biographical writers enable us to observe the pulsations of a heart of flesh. The instructive peculiarities of the individual, the foibles or the strength of his character, those minute and countless shadings-off that run into each other and exchange places with each other, and that glide with a startling rapidity along the prevailing tissue even of his outward conduct—tokens of the secrets that lie deep within—either elude the notice or baffle the powers of the narrator to record them. And yet, without these what is any biography worth? Given, the age, the profession, the country, a greater or lesser number of personal adventures, the manner and the date of birth and death, the problem of life-writing is easily worked out, and is not much better than a mechanical copy of a recipe, care being taken to omit none of the more important ingredients.

The imperfections to which we have now adverted, perhaps at too great a length, inhere in the very nature of such compositions, and are inevitable in the hands even of the most practised writer, and of the most sagacious critic. The ideal of a genuine biography has never perhaps been realized; the utmost that can be accomplished in the case, a rare one, where the subject and the author are both great, will be a generous, a truthful, and an honest endeavour to approximate to the standard that one cannot reasonably hope ever to reach. The remarks now offered in this preliminary way, are meant to refer to those biographical works which are written with consummate care, with artistic skill, with elaborate precision of thought, and that simple elegance of diction, which is its appropriate clothing, and is the last grace that genius can bestow on its productions in this walk. To the following brief and unpretending memoir of the respected Bishop of Cork, they can have no other relation than the very simple one of suggestion—having naturally occurred to the present writer while preparing, to arrange in order the few materials at his disposal, for the performance of the task he has voluntarily undertaken.

The life of a Catholic Bishop in Ireland, spent in the unostentatious discharge of his laborious and most important duties, and filled up with those deeds of substantial benevolence and worth, the occasion of which is sure to recur each day, but the record of which has nothing in common with the notabilities of the political or the fashionable world, is, generally speaking, of so even a tenor, and is diversified with so few incidents capable of startling us by their singularity, or of awakening our sympathies by the suffering or the magnanimity involved in them, that nothing particularly attractive to the liberal curiosity of the reader can fairly be demanded from the writer. Exceptions, however, will sometimes occur; when a prelate is coerced by the necessities of his position, or prompted by the peculiar bent of his talents, or stimulated by a conscientious view of the obligations imposed on him by the sacredness of his office, to take a prominent part, by his pen or his counsels, in the political strife or the religious discussions of the day. His name then becomes distinguished; it is encircled with that pale and fallacious halo of evanescent celebrity which a breath may dissipate; or it gradually but surely brightens into the enduring glory of true fame. The Right Rev. Dr. John Murphy, late Bishop of Cork, was not one of those exceptions. He was content, during his lengthened career, with the punctual discharge of the various functions attached by usage and by right to the several offices which he successively filled in the Catholic Church of Cork, and appeared to look for no reward but the approval of his own conscience, and an humble confidence in the merciful dispensations of his God and Redeemer as to the final adjustment of his lot in the world to come. He was satisfied with taking an active, yet unambitious, part in every great and good work connected with the preservation of religion and the progress of sound learning—whether it was originated by others or was suggested by himself—the applause and the merit he willingly relinquished to the more ardent, the more bustling, or the less delicate persons with whom he was called upon to co-operate. Provided he was able to do good in secret, and to work out, with silent and untiring zeal, the completion of some beneficent project, he was disinterestedly ready to forego human praise however gratifying to vanity, and a still harder task—to disregard, though he might not condemn, the sharp censures of the presumptuous and the uncharitable. In his steady pursuit of the path of rectitude, without being altogether indifferent—what good man can be so?—to the approbation of the wise, he yet neither courted eulogy nor shrank from misrepresentation. This was not owing to apathy, but to a cautious and well-regulated policy; and, in no small degree, to a constitutional reluctance to obtrude himself or his affairs on public attention, and thereby to expose himself to those petty irritations by which the equanimity of his temper might be disturbed, and that tranquillity of rational enjoyment which he so dearly prized, be rudely encroached on by the unwelcome and the ungracious labour of self-praise or self-defence.

From a frame of mind thus naturally constituted, and with its peculiarities strengthened by habit, it were vain to expect actions of romantic interest, or events that would in any remarkable degree excite the admiration or gratify the curiosity of the reader. A strange thing it is in the history of man, while we contemplate the distribution of praise and the allotment of fame, that by the very necessity of the case, the deeds of subordinate worth, and of secondary excellence, are those precisely which more frequently arrest the attention of the world, and burst into light upon the astonished gaze of the multitude. While the voiceless merit of heroic generosity, with its thousand sacrifices—the beauteous and blessed offspring of self-denial, gentleness, forbearance, forgiveness, mercy—the hourly martyrdom of Christian love—renewed for ever, and perpetuated through a long life, perhaps of wasting illness, of obscure toil, and of chilling poverty, has no memorial to record its nobleness, and no eye but the eye of the All-seeing Father to look with complacency upon the fairest earthly image of his Divine nature. O history! O reputation! O human celebrity!

Dr. John Murphy was born in the City of Cork, in the year 1772, of parents remarkable for their piety, integrity, and respectability of character. His family were engaged, on a limited scale, in those commercial pursuits which have since that period exercised the talents, and crowned the enterprising spirit of their descendants with that amount of opulence, whose best characteristic it is that as it has been amassed with unspotted honour and honesty, so is it uniformly dispensed with a liberality which is as generous as it is judicious, and a hospitality not unworthy of the merchant princes of the glorious old republics of Italy. While yet a boy of tender years, he displayed that union of fervent devotion and of attachment to learning, which even then led his anxious and affectionate parents to prognosticate, with fond hopes, his future vocation to the ecclesiastical state.

The dispositions and talents thus manifested, were carefully nurtured by a proper course of study, and by those religious exercises suited to the temper and the opportunities of the child, but above all, by the happy influence of domestic precepts enforced and enriched by the example of domestic virtue, for which no other species of discipline to which a young creature may be subjected, can be a safe or an adequate substitute. He was also singularly fortunate in one circumstance at this early period of his education. Among the men of talent and piety who used to frequent his father's house, and shed, on the hospitable board, the blended lights of religious wisdom, and of playful Irish wit, the great Arthur O'Leary was the most welcome and distinguished guest. The attention of this true sage, patriot, and humorist, was soon attracted by the insinuating address, the devout conduct, and the literary tendencies of his youthful host, who was invited to enjoy the privilege and the delight of reading whole chapters of the sacred volume; and, with upturned face and looks beaming with gratitude and wonder, to listen to the exposition of the more difficult passages, which fell with simple beauty and grandeur from the eloquent lips of the good priest. The effect of such honoured companionship must have sunk deep into the heart, and penetrated as it improved the whole character of the student. Under such auspices was his early boyhood ripened into a passion for learning, and into the love and the practice of virtue. And it was not long before he won the friendship and the respect of the Venerable Dr. Moylan, then Bishop of Cork, by whose advice and under whose direction he was induced to leave his native city, at the early age of fifteen, and proceed to Paris for the purpose of completing his classical and initiatory course of studies, and entering upon the graver, the severer, and more important departments of the mathematical, moral, and theological sciences. Perhaps, in no European capital, were the facilities presented to so great an extent as in Paris, for the prosecution of every branch of knowledge, from the humblest beginnings and the simpler elements of polite letters and the more common sciences, up to the loftiest speculations in theology, and the comprehensive range of the mixed and applied mathematics, not to speak of the pure and transcendental provinces of that science. The public libraries, the great lecture-halls, the several seminaries, the colleges, the renowned University, with its many dependencies and tributaries, and the eminent men who occupied, in each of those nurseries of erudition, the professors' chair, constituted a staff and a materiel, unrivalled for attractiveness and efficiency, in the view of a youthful aspirant, anxious to accumulate the trea-tures of ancient and modern lore, and to prepare himself for an honourable career of professional utility or of literary eminence. We may rest assured that ideas and hopes of this description were by no means unfamiliar to the mind of the pious, ardent, and intelligent John Murphy. But his prospects in this direction were doomed to be speedily darkened, by those disastrous shadows which the coming events of the great French revolution threw, in their gigantic proportions and with baleful pressage, over the whole length and breadth of the devoted land, while the hearts of men were strangely agitated, as they yielded to the alternate and conflicting emotions of hope and of dread. Immediately after the demolition of the Bastile—an event pregnant with important results, far beyond the sample it afforded of the terrific power which an infuriate populace can wield when stung, by oppression, into outrage—and when in blind wrath it wreaks itself on the first symbols of tyranny it can grapple with; beyond, too, the instances of heroic daring, as well as of precipitate cruelty, exhibited in the transaction itself, the young Irish student, before he had completed a sojourn of two years in that city, was prompted by his fears or his prudence to retrace his steps homeward, and there to resume and continue in a safer though an obscurer asylum, the literary avocations which had been thus rudely interrupted by the first shock of that mighty political convulsion.

From the autumn of 1789, till January, 1791, he pursued in the city of Cork his elementary studies, and then set out for Lisbon, with the determination of prosecuting his ulterior views as to the Christian ministry, and qualifying himself by a proportionate progress in professional and ecclesiastical attainments, and by the equally necessary culture of genuine holiness of heart and a clerical sanctity of demeanor, for the high office and the grave responsibilities of the priesthood. The Irish College at Lisbon was at that critical period under the enlightened and zealous superintendence of the Rev. Dr. Daly, a man distinguished for good sense and firmness in the discharge of his duties as president of that seminary, under circumstances of peculiar delicacy and danger. John Murphy, besides other circumstances which were calculated to embalm, in the sacred and precious memories of his early life, his Lisbon residence, had the good fortune to form the acquaintance and to cultivate the friendship of the late learned and truly estimable Bishop of Cloyne and Ross, Dr. Bartholomew Crotty, who was then a professor in the college, and in that capacity was enabled at once to appreciate the virtues, the character, and the extraordinary mental powers of his interesting young countryman and disciple. This strong attachment that grew up between the student and the professor, grounded on the solid foundation of mutual esteem and reverence, and cemented still more closely by a community of tastes, of pursuits, and of objects, knew neither interruption nor decay through the protracted period of more than half a century, and the various vicissitudes of subsequent life which marked their respective careers, until, at last, elevated to the same rank in the Catholic church of this country, they became allied in their high functions as prelates in neighbour dioceses, just as they had been previously allied in the affections of their hearts. And in death, too, they were not divided, for they died within a few months of each other; and but a few short miles separate the graves where their mortal remains lie buried—in Middleton the one, in Cork the other.

How well he profited of the ample means for intellectual improvement that were placed at his disposal in this excellent theological school, may be easily conceived from the fact, that he was earnestly pressed to accept a professor's chair in his college—an honourable post which he was obliged to decline accepting, in consequence of the commands of his bishop, who required his presence in Cork, and was most anxious to bring so important an accession to the piety and learning that then distinguished the officiating Catholic clergy of that city. He returned, therefore, to his native diocese in August, 1797, after more than six years' residence in the capital of Portugal. On his arrival in Cork he was immediately appointed curate and fellow-labourer, in the parish of SS. Peter and Paul, with the great and good Dr. Florence M'Carthy, who for some years previously had been actively and usefully engaged in the administration of it. The example of this illustrious missionary so truly designated—by the preacher of Dr. Murphy's funeral sermon—as the greatest of parish priests, whose robust intellect enriched by so many acquisitions in every walk of human learning, was only surpassed by his goodness of heart and by his indefatigable zeal in the discharge of his duties, must have exerted a most beneficial influence on the mind and the conduct of his junior assistant. The Rev. John Murphy soon displayed so remarkable a union of ardor, activity, and enlightened piety, with a chastened yet fervid eloquence in his public instructions; in short, so much good taste and good sense in what he said, combined with so much of edifying regularity in what he did, that the expectations and the predictions of his venerable bishop were more than realised; and as an unequivocal proof of his confidence and respect, upon Dr. M'Carthy's removal to the charge of St. Finbar's, the south parish, our young priest was immediately entrusted with the superintendence of SS. Peter and Paul's. It would be difficult to name a man who discharged the functions of this important mission, with greater efficiency, and with happier results to the cause of morality, of religion, and of sound Christian knowledge. And during the fifteen years which elapsed from his appointment to that parish, to his consecration as Bishop of Cork in 1815, he joined, what is rather uncommon in the life of an Irish missionary priest, a regular and systematic attention to study in every branch of professional and miscellaneous knowledge, with an exact and an unwearied assiduity in the fulfilment of the active duties of a laborious parish priest; a circumstance illustrative at once of his conscientious views as to his sacred obligations, and of that attachment to literature which formed so honourable a characteristic of his career, and which neither the weight of years, nor the distraction of manifold pastoral cares, nor the pressure of disease was ever once found to relax. This admirable adjustment of the outer to the inner life, this harmony between what divines technically denominate "THE CONTEMPLATIVE AND THE ACTIVE"—a problem, the solution of which lies beyond the conception and the power of your bustling men of business, could only be the result of a judicious and punctual distribution of time, wisely adopted in early manhood, and rigorously persevered in to the last.

If this observation be attended to, we shall not be surprised at the blessed fruit which on all sides sprung up in the wide field entrusted to his spiritual culture. Equal edification and equal benefit were produced by the manner in which he performed every part of his ministry. Nothing could exceed his fatherly solicitude for those classes, that, alas! are but too numerous in every large city, where the extremes of our social condition are brought into such close and startling contiguity. His pastoral tenderness and care were pre-eminently conspicuous in his visitation of the sick; his consolation to the dying; his intrepid vindication of the poor and the oppressed; and his promptitude to alleviate every form of anguish, of suffering, and of trial to which the destitute are exposed. It was interesting to remark, also, the masterly skill with which he was able to conduct two very opposite methods of public instruction, and the ease and rapidity with which he passed alternately from one to the other—the perspicuity and simplicity of his catechetical lectures to the young and the uninstructed; yet, adorned with those picturesque and apposite illustrations which are by no means inconsistent with that style; and the widely different and more elaborate and ornate tone that distinguished his pulpit eloquence. His style in this department, though it bore evident traces of studious preparation, was yet singularly fluent and lucid, like a rivulet which has widened into the graceful flow and the transparent depth of a stream, without the tumultuous rapidity of the torrent, or the solemn grandeur and the majestic movement of a great river. His arguments were of the obvious and common-place description; his method, or rather his plan of division, was neat and intelligible, resembling a good deal the system of French preachers, whom in this respect he looked up to as the choicest models. His figurative language was bold, without trespassing the limits of a lively rhetoric, or ever aiming at, much less reaching that felicitous audacity of eloquence—the lightning safely wielded only by divine hands—hurled now and then from the flaming lips of a Demosthenes, a Bossuet, a Danton, a Mirabeau, an Erskine, and a Grattan. Dr. Murphy might occasionally remind one of the amiable and accomplished Archbishop Murray; his style, however, never attained the finished yet masculine elegance that marks the discourses of the last named prelate; but the bishop of Cork successfully cultivated his powers of elocution, so as to render his delivery more fervent, more impassioned, more effective, and yet not less harmoniously regulated and controuled than Dr. Murray's.

As Dr. Murphy had been a zealous and most exemplary parish priest, so upon his elevation to the episcopal rank, on the death of his saintly predecessor, Bishop Moylan, in the spring of 1815, his conduct from that period to the day of his death, uniformly evinced those excellent qualities which add dignity to rank and usefulness to splendour. The youthful prelate had a noble career opened to his talents and his love of religion, and with honour, fidelity, and benefit to the church did he pursue it. It is already known, that on the occasion of his first visit to Rome, he was employed by the Irish prelates on an important mission with Dr. Murray and the present bishop of Dromore, Dr. Michael Blake; by their temperate yet firm, their most judicious yet inflexible resistance to the odious and unpopular because dangerous measure of the Veto, that insidious embryo, generated by the unhallowed junction of craft and of weakness, was finally crushed—never again, let us hope, in any shape to be revived. As soon as Bishop Murphy returned, after the successful accomplishment of his mission to the Holy See, he commenced the discharge of those extremely laborious and difficult duties which devolved upon him. It became one of his principal cares to carry out into complete fulfilment those beneficent and wise projects, for the good of religion and improvement of society, which had originated in the devout forethought and profound sagacity of Dr. Moylan's religious mind. The education of the poor—more especially of the female poor—and the restoration of public worship to something of the splendour, or at least, the befitting decency of which, in most parts of his extensive diocese, it had been long divested. The first of these two most important objects he never ceased to have at heart, and his strenuous exertions were incessantly directed, till within a few hours of his lamented death, to the thorough realization of it. Branches of that invaluable order of religious ladies—the presentation nuns—were spread by his zealous and unremitting solicitude, from the parent stock in the city to those localities in the diocese where their benign and blessed presence was most needed. And under his auspices, also, this signal boon of heaven was extended throughout the greater part of the kingdom, where its beneficial results are appreciated by every friend to education and to the moral and intellectual advancement of our poor people. His attention was directed, in a most particular way, to the erection of schools and the appointment of competent teachers, both male and female, in the more remote and rural districts of that extensive diocese. And in that connexion it may be stated, how warmly he lent his powerful patronage to the maintenance, on a magnificent scale, of the great educational establishment for boys, conducted by the presentation monks, and by that unrivalled body of teachers the Christian Brothers, so deservedly honoured wherever their efficient and noble system of instruction has been encouraged, throughout the kingdoms of continental Europe, and in many of the states of America. The second of those objects which claimed his fostering support, was the erection of new and commodious, if not splendid, edifices for public worship, which, in many instances too, owing to the munificence of the public and the spirit of the presiding clergyman, aspired to the character of architectural elegance and even of costly and tasteful decoration. Akin to these laudable efforts for the improvement of his flock, and for the perpetuation and purity of their faith and morals, was the encouragement he gave to the introduction of the orders of Sisters of Charity and Sisters of Mercy amongst the other religious and benevolent institutions for which the City of Cork is celebrated. These twin sisterhoods, aiming at the same sublime work of ministering to the physical sufferings and the moral maladies of the obscure, the contemned, the forgotten, and the destitute are peculiarly fitted for carrying on the divinest work of Christ's Gospel of love, in large and densely populous communities like the city of Cork, where even in ordinary circumstances, not to speak at all of the frequent visitation of famine and pestilence, so many objects must hourly be met with, on whom the heavenly influences of such an agency may be exerted with singular benefit to the individual and to society at large. It is superfluous to notice, what stands legibly recorded in the comptes rendus of the society itself, the lively, untiring, and most practical anxiety he felt and proved for the success and triumphant labours of the great ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Dr. Murphy's exertions in behalf of education were not confined to his own diocese. Ever since his appointment as one of the trustees of Maynooth College, he laboured incessantly and indeed successfully, in conjunction with the more liberal and enlightened members of that most respectable board, to introduce those gradual improvements into the course of studies pursued in that national seminary, which was imperatively demanded by the high state of scientific and literary culture, attained or aimed at by society at large—outside the walls of collegiate or academical institutions. Dr. Murphy's own proficiency in every branch of elegant literature and of general science, gave an authority and a weight to those suggestions and recommendations which from time to time he deemed it his duty to offer to his co-trustees, who were so well qualified to pronounce upon this claim to their respectful attention. He was also ardently devoted to the preservation of what still survives of the ancient language and literature of Ireland; and his erudite zeal in this respect is attested by numerous manuscripts, amounting to some hundreds, elegantly transcribed under his own direction, and still preserved among the other treasures of his great library—the labour of half a century, rich in most of the products of human learning, and probably the most varied and extensive private collection in the united kingdom. Though the worthy bishop made no specific bequest of them in his will, nor, indeed, gave any general direction to his executors as to the disposal of this library, it is to be hoped that the great object which would ennoble and consecrate the labour of collection, will not be altogether frustrated, and that his public spirited and pious relations will consult, by a judicious arrangement of the matter, for his fame and their own character for honour and independence.

During his long episcopate, he adhered with a vigorous punctuality to the laudable practice of a biennial visitation of his whole diocese; and this he never could be induced to relinquish by any considerations of mere personal inconvenience or hardship. In the administration of the sacrament of confirmation—that special function of the episcopal order—he was singularly assiduous and regular, and has left no arrears for his successor to discharge. In this, as in all other duties attached to his eminent station in the church, his conduct was most instructive and stimulating to the younger prelates, who might occasionally be brought into contact with his more experienced zeal and energy. In the support of all local as well as general charities, he was unostentatiously liberal, while his private beneficence knew no bounds. His hand was generally open, and his great practical wisdom was profuse of admirable counsels, sagacious hints, and encouraging suggestions, to the struggling shop-keeper, the needy but industrious artisan, the decayed man of business, the aspiring artist, whose genius he cheered and whose despondency he upheld; and the sensitive man of letters, whose sensitiveness he respected, whose honourable ambition he sustained, and whose hopes he cheered and brightened.

His intercourse with his clergy of every age and station, was characterised by the politeness of the gentleman; and the stateliness of official superiority was lowered and softened by an unaffected urbanity, which showed how frequently and how naturally the sternness of the BISHOP would relax into the affection of the FATHER. Mildness and forbearance were the leading features that distinguished his government of the clergy and the people of the diocese of Cork. And though his kindness of disposition, and his unwilllingness to interrupt the established order of things in any part of his jurisdiction, joined with his readiness to overlook venial errors in some among his clergy, tempted him to postponement of reforms that by some were deemed necessary, and to a dilatoriness that verged on the brink of a serious fault, yet no prelate knew better how to vindicate his authority or maintain his rights, whenever the case appeared, to his impartial judgment, to require a prompt and decisive interposition; he could be both steadfast and stern, when all gentle methods failed with some obstinate fool, or some incorrigible delinquent.

He was disinclined by his tastes, his habitual caution, and, perhaps, by his well-considered and settled convictions, to take any active or prominent part in the political struggles for the amelioration and freedom of his country. But he yielded to none, even of his more impassioned, more energetic, and more popular brethren of the Catholic hierarchy, in genuine, rational, and manly love of true Irish independence. He distrusted, or he pitied the boastful pretensions of some politicians, to a superior and purer attachment to their country's good than falls to the lot of the experienced, and therefore cautious, advocates for practicable improvement in the institutions of the country. He had little toleration for that exclusive political fanaticism which will not admit to a fellowship, in the spirit of patriotism, those who may conscientiously differ respecting the means whereby the cherished object, equally dear to both parties, may be surely and successfully accomplished. Governed by the same prudence and cautious discernment in his intercourse with the Irish bishops, when questions of serious import came before their lordships for examination or decision, he uniformly leaned, on debateable topics, to the side of calm and dispassionate good sense; and his views on some recent subjects that have excited a considerable share of the public attention, and some rather inconsiderate sallies of controversial heat, coincided in the main points, with those espoused, in mild and consistent firmness by the Primate of all Ireland, and by the venerable and honoured Archbishop of Dublin. And though many amongst the prelates, and great numbers amongst the clergy, entertain very different opinions on those subjects, yet their adhesion to them will suffer no discredit, by according to the venerable deceased and to the learned and illustrious living, the common justice of high-minded, pure, and disinterested motives, of long-tried devotedness to the great cause of Catholic Christianity, and of a profound love of their religion, tested, invigorated, and hallowed by toil, by endurance, by many sacrifices, and by nameless vicissitudes and trials.

Bishop Murphy had for some years past laboured under chronic disease of the chest. But owing to a careful and most abstemious regimen, he had frequently been able to subdue many a severe paroxysm which threatened a fatal result. He exposed himself, however, a few days before his death, to an aggravated attack of the constitutional disease, by excessive and imprudent exertion, on the occasion of a domestic affliction that befell a near and dear connexion of his own. The more alarming symptoms of dropsy of the chest showed themselves again and again, and by his own recuperative and elastic energies, aided by scientific medical skill, they were as frequently got under; so much so, indeed, that though he yielded to the wishes of his clergymen and friends in receiving the last sacraments, he yet entertained a conviction that he should evidently triumph over the force of the malady and the fears of his attached family and domestics, and again resume his episcopal functions with renovated health, for the edification of his beloved flock. This hope, amounting almost to a certainty on his part, expressed in no obscure terms, a few hours before his demise, to the writer of these recollections, on the night of Wednesday in Holy week, will serve in some measure to explain why he left after him so many unaccomplished purposes, and so many incomplete arrangements intimately connected with the proper government of his diocese, and the dearest interests of religion, a circumstance utterly inexplicable on any other supposition. To the last he retained the undiminished vigour of all his mental powers; and even his harmless playful humour abandoned him not, and, in presence of him who now pens these lines, its last flickering light gleamed over the couch of the dying prelate before it was finally quenched. He expired without a struggle, on Holy Thursday morning, 1st April, at half-past two o'clock, in the thirty-second year of his episcopate, and seventy-fifth of his age.

The newspapers tell the rest—the funeral pomp—the dirge for the dead—the funeral procession—the entombment—the monthly obsequies—the funeral oration, and the other solemn formalities that console and distract the survivors. But to the dead. Alas!

His character has been faintly yet honestly portrayed in the preceding pages; any further attempt at delineation would be superfluous to those who are capable of interpreting their import, and would be useless to those who require any additional helps to enable them to form an accurate and impartial opinion of the abilities and virtues of the Right Rev. Dr. John Murphy, Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork. We can afford room only to conclude our remarks, by reiterating the hopes expressed by the preacher of the funeral sermon, in presence of the prelates and clergy of Munster, that we may be enabled, the less to deplore the loss of the deceased Bishop of Cork, while contemplating the virtues and the accomplishments of his successor, whoever that may be, according to the permission of an over-ruling Providence.

OUR NATIONAL EXHIBITION

OF Fine Arts.

So we presume we are to call (by a figure of speech, rather than as an enunciation of a verity) the exhibition of the Royal Hibernian Academy for the present year. What pretensions it has to be considered a national exhibition, we shall soon see, but first we must premise a few words respecting the progress of the fine arts in Ireland in latter years.

We well remember the exhibition of the year 1838, and truly a disheartening display it was. The entire collection, including paintings in oil and water-colours, sculpture and architectural designs, did not amount to more than one hundred and ninety works. The exhibition of that year was not more miserable in its numbers than despicable in its character, consisting for the most part of wretchedly-painted portraits. All our artists of any note, Rothwell, Lover, and others, had left the country in despair, resigned their academicianships in disgust, and contributed nothing to our exhibitions. The following year there was no exhibition. Irish art, unaided, had made its last struggle in 1838. In 1840, the Royal Irish Art Union was established for the encouragement of the fine arts. The Hibernian Academy opened its exhibition, and the improvement in its character was most conspicuous. But, how was this improvement obtained? Was there a sudden impulse given to national art—had our eminent artists returned—or had those who remained made a miraculous effort—or, indeed, was the improvement national? No such thing. None of all these had occurred, nor have our resident artist much improved since; nor has one single impulse been given to art as a national thing. No effort has been made to create a school of artists “racy of the soil,” whose works would be illustrative of our country’s wondrous history—reflexes of our national habits, feelings, or traditions, and above and before all, visible embodiments of our national faith. The improvement in the exhibition was exotic, and in many respects purely representative of our social condition in latter years. It became generally known that the Royal Irish Art Union was up to the spirit of the age, as it is called, and fully recognized the principle of “Free Trade” in the arts. Irish art, as such, was to receive no especial mark of favour. It was allowed to struggle with foreign and stronger competitors, and the principle being recognized of getting the best value for the money given, no matter whence that value came, Irish art was overpowered by its stronger rival. So that in fact the exhibition of the Hibernian Academy was little better than the show-room of English and Scotch pictures which many seasons previously had been exhibited in London, and having failed in purchasers, took the round of the “provinces,” and finally came to the metropolis of this “province,” and were here purchased with Irish money. This practice of exhibiting unsold English and Scotch pictures in our Academy, has continued increasing since the formation of the Irish Art Union till the present year, notwithstanding the law of the Academy which expressly says that “no works which have already been publicly exhibited can be received.” The disorganized and distressed state of the country naturally suggested the idea, that the funds of the Irish Art Union would not be so large this year as during former years, and we consequently find a proportionate falling off in the contributions from English artists, and still greater from the Scotsmen—wise in their generation. If the “panic” continue, and be well founded, we may expect that next year our national exhibition will be similar to that of 1838.

Now we are not at all anxious to lay the blame of all this at the door of the Irish Art Union; far from it. We believe that that institution has done good service in exciting the taste for the fine arts—we do not say creating it, for we believe the taste existed long before, though dormant at the period of the society’s formation—but that is the full amount of its utility—we are not desirous to cause dissensions or murmurings against an institution, because it has failed in accomplishing all we could wish; we would rather respect and preserve it for the good it has conferred, while at the same time we desire to be outspoken as to its shortcomings. In time, we hope, the Irish Art Union will cease playing at eclecticism in the arts, and take a wider scope and safer standing. We mean that it will aid in the development of a truly national art, an art exclusively and intensely Irish. There is no illiberality or selfishness in this at which philanthropists may be frightened. Art, in every country, to be vigorous must be national; it must be the manifestation of the national mind, the exponent of the people's feelings, speaking to them of their glories, their wrongs, and woes, reflecting the past and shadawning forth the future. To bring about this vigour, the encouragement must be great and exclusive. The history of art in Italy and in all other countries proves this. What country made so great a fame in the fine arts as the single Republic of Florence? and we are assured by Lanzi and others, that not only were the subjects "exclusively national," but that the Florentines were jealous of the employment of foreign artists, who were seldom admitted except as instructors, when art was in its infancy in the Florentine state. And those foreigners did not import subjects with which the Florentines had no sympathy, but rather conformed themselves to the habits of their adopted country, and painted subjects congenial to its feelings. This is the cause of the distinction of "schools" which have existed with distinguishing peculiarities in all countries, since the commencement of civilization, and will exist till some system of universal imperialism reduces all mankind to one dead level, and gives them one habit of thought, feeling, and action, and one language of expression—an impossible event, truly. So we find in all western Europe, even till our own day, Italian, Flemish, Dutch, French, English and Scotch schools as different in their styles, as are the climates and customs of the people to whom they belong. Aye, even the Scotch have a school, and a living and promising thing it seems to be. Of its character, its cause, and its destiny, thus has spoken one perfectly competent to form a correct judgment in the matter.* "In Scotland the art is in a promising condition, and the Scottish school is in purer taste than the English. Living, as the artists do, in the most magnificent city in Europe, surrounded by a country pregnant with historical recollections, and guided by their own shrewd understandings, the school in Edinburgh will, before many years, take a very high rank in art." We wish we could say all this for Ireland. Truly we are surrounded by historical recollections, if we only pleased to reflect, but the best of our artists do not live amongst us, they are exiles or wanderers from their native land, seeking for subsistence by giving that talent to the service of strangers which should be adorning the land of their forefathers. Hence we have no Irish school, but our capital city affords a yearly mart for the sale of the refuse of foreign exhibitions.

The present is the worst exhibition we have seen since 1840, both in the number of works and in their character. We miss the works of some of our absent countrymen, whose names and productions (though of a foreign character) were becoming familiar to us, and used to cause us to cherish a hope that we might yet have them working for and amongst us. Maclise, Danby, Rothwell, Lover, and others contribute nothing. Crowley exhibits but one picture, Fisher one, Mac Manus one, Nicholl two. Of the English contributors in former years, Allen, Horsely, Redgrave and several others have fallen off; and from the Stacks, Jutsums, Bakers, Boddingtons, et hoc genus omne, we have just received as many as they think will sell. And, indeed, we sustain no great loss in the deficiency. We are sorry we cannot speak favourably of what has been done by resident Irish artists, but as we have already indicated, notwithstanding all the talk, and cant (it is the Irish for talk), and bluster about what was being done, and about to be done, for the fine arts in Ireland, during the last seven years, the native has not, in any sense, been cultivated; so that if the premium on the importation of foreign pictures was withdrawn, we would, left to ourselves, cut as ridiculous a figure on the artistic stage as ever. And so it will be while the present system is continued. Gentlemen of the Irish Art Union, you must, in your wisdom, devise some practicable plan for the encouragement of native art and resident artists, or in the event of another famine you will tumble to the ground, and the artists may be safely lodged under it, like several of their less distinguished countrymen.

Mr. Mulvany, who erewhile ambitioned high art, and was sometimes national, has this year sunk into portrait painting. Mr. Robert J. Kelly, who formerly gave promise of the imaginative, as a pupil of the Royal Dublin Society, now as a full-grown artist, affectionately exhibits a "Portrait of his mother," and some other portraits, of the verisimilitude of which we cannot speak, not having seen the originals, but of the style—we hope the artist will improve. By far the best portraits in the exhibition, and, indeed, the only works of that class, with few exceptions, which challenge attention by fidelity to nature and beauty of execution, are those by Mr. Catterson Smyth, R.H.A. Mr. Haverty exhibits portraits which must ever be interesting to us, as memorials of cherished names, and associations. No. 89, "The late Daniel O'Connell, reading the manuscript of his address to the electors of Clare (Tuesday, June the 24th, 1828), to P. Vincent Fitzpatrick and Frederick W. Conway." This is now a historical picture; and while standing before it, recollections crowded upon us sad and tumultuous: There stood before us the herculean frame which contained the master mind that wrung from the powerful oppressors of his creed and country the long denied right of religious liberty: there the demagogue, who, made strong by the English constitution, dared to incur the public denunciation of the sovereign head of that constitution, unable to inflict the slightest chastisement on the leader of a turbulent people, made peaceful by the magic of his unheard of power; the chief who could, by the raising of his hand marshal millions of passionate men in warlike array, vowing solemn vows to regenerate their father-land, and then disband them with a nod. He was, in the year '28, in the fulness of his intellectual and physical power. The following year saw the accomplishment of his greatest work, unless we except the sowing of the seeds of nationality which have already begun to fructify, and will yet bring forth fruit an hundred fold. The likenesses in Mr. Haverty's picture, we think, are good for the time—the scene most interesting—it was one of the grand political moves of our lost leader, and the move which check-mated Peel.

No. 310. Portrait of the late Gerald Griffin, a name which will be revered in Ireland so long as truth, purity, and genius shall be worshipped by mankind. We cannot say much for the fidelity of the likeness, not having seen the lamented original till within a year or two of his death, when sickness, care, and dead ambition had left their traces on his manly forehead and amiable face. Mr. Haverty's picture represents him before this time.

We recollect Mr. Harwood's early productions some few years since. They gave good promise which his present works realize. He has, we believe, been study-

* Encyclopædia Britannica. Art. Painting, by B. R. Haydon. Poor Haydon was an English man, rather hypercritical as a censor, a saturnine enemy of academies, and no great admirer of the Scotch generally, so that we may esteem his testimony impartial.

ing on the Continent—his pictures indicate so. He now resides in London. In No. 11, "Othello relating his adventures," he embodies one of the most generally interesting scenes of the great English Dramatist. The conception and composition of the subject are very pleasing, and the colouring harmonious. No. 27, "L'Amorosa," is a study of a head characterized by sweetness and mellow colouring.

No. 31. "Public breakfast on Carlisle bridge—winter's morning," by Mr. Collier, R.H.A., is certainly not a scene on Carlisle bridge, Dublin.

No. 32. "The Seven Churches, County of Wicklow," by R. L. West, R.H.A. We would not notice this production, but for the gross violation of truth contained in it. The picture shows a lake eastwards of the Round Tower, whereas both lakes are westwards. This is carrying the artistic licence too far. Deficiencies in drawing, colouring, &c., might be palliated, but such errors as this cannot be excused.

No. 70. "The blind Pilgrim," by Mr. Fisher, is one of the few gems of the exhibition. It consists of two figures very simply but masterly composed—an aged Pilgrim and a beautiful young girl, who guides the blind man while she describes objects of interest "arraying them in the soft radiance of her words." The expression of long confirmed blindness is admirably conveyed even by the position of the outstretched hands, as well as the character of the pilgrim by the staff and scallop shell, and habit with cowl. It is a creation of Shelly's, and well has the poet-painter shadowed it forth on canvass.

The "place of honour" is given to No. 88, "Sir Calidore entertained by the Shepherds." A subject from "sweet foreign Spencer's" Fairy Queen, by a foreign artist, Mr. J. Tennant. We should always desire to see this place occupied by some national subject by an Irish artist. So it is in all other countries, but we, "beggars," as we are called, must be content with the alms that fall from the tables of our betters, and hold our saucy tongues. This picture has, like others, been on its travels, and we suppose comes to us as a dernier resort, marked "for sale." The passage is from the ninth canto of the Sixth book. The knight in the midst of a pleasant country is entertained with "such homely what as serves the simple clowne," and "having fed his fill" first, secondly

"Saw a fair damzell, which did weare a crowne,
Of sundry flowres, with silken ribbands tyde
Y'clad in home-made green, which her own hands had dyde."

And that is the entire of it.

No. 165. "Invitation, Hesitation, and Persuasion," by Mr. N. J. Crowley, R.H.A., is an agreeable picture in this artist's manner. The story is well told, and the heads well drawn and coloured; but so great is the similarity between the heads in this picture and in "Cup-tossing," exhibited by the same artist some few years ago, and since engraved, that the shallowest observer will at once discover that the same individuals "sat" for both pictures, or that Mr. Crowley can only imagine and paint two heads. 'Tis not legitimate art to paint the same faces in different positions, and then strive to pass them off as new pictures by giving them new names.

No. 396. "The lonely Captive," by Mr. Charles Foley. This very young artist is brother of the celebrated sculptor Mr. John Foley, and promises to be as distinguished as a painter as his brother is as a sculptor. He aims at high art, and we hope he may be successful. The present work shows great boldness and firmness in design and execution, which we trust will ultimately develope themselves in artistic power. The style somewhat reminds us of the grand manner of Haydon.

No. 26. "Innis Cealtra Round Tower and Church, Lough Derg, River Shannon," is a picture of an Irish subject by an English artist, Mr. William Willis, and is admirably treated. The centre of the picture shows a ruined chancel, with its arch, of an old Irish church. A partially ruined Round Tower stands north east; in the foreground are kneeling figures. The entire composition, in feeling and treatment, is very meritorious. Such works we would wish to see adorning the walls of our national academy, and not pictures of the class to which belongs No. 247, "Irish reapers meeting their friends after harvest in England." This, as a work of art, ranks in the same class as those literary works, dramas, and novels, of the last generation or two, in which Irishmen and Irish subjects are drawn for the amusement of the reader, but without any regard to truth or nature: raving folly, blundering and brogue being, according to those authorities, the distinguishing characteristics of the Hibernian. In fact, as has been well said, the Irishman of those fictionists, "was to be found on the stage, but nowhere off it." In this picture Mr. Alfred D. Fripp has drawn largely on his imagination for his facts. Such a scene as here shown, the corporeal eye of Mr. Fripp never beheld, and if, by some strange freak of nature, he was favoured with the vision, it argues bad taste and worse judgment to paint the subject, and send it to an Irish exhibition where it cannot fail of being recognized as a gross libel and bitter satire. The two works by the Rev. J. Rooney, No. 184, "Sympathy," and No. 270, "Contentment," afford great promise, and so far as artistic treatment is to be considered, show considerable improvement by this artist since last year. His "May-day at Menloc" exhibited last year gave us hope, which we are glad to find has not been disappointed. There was room for improvement in composition and drawing, which we perceive is rapidly taking place. Notwithstanding its defects, the "May-day" was an excellent and truly Irish picture, and we have been more than once told by the greatest Irish fictionist living, that the scene was intensely Irish. We hope that Mr. Rooney will ere long supply a great desideratum for Irish literature. We mean an illustrator of our national writers, and so, perhaps, commence the formation of an Irish School of art. All readers of illustrated publications, serial or otherwise, relating to Ireland, must have marked the poverty of fancy and want of knowledge of the Irish character displayed in those illustrations.

In the Sculpture gallery are several excellent busts, by Mr. Christopher Moore, R.H.A.; also, a beautiful full length figure, No. 454, "Early sorrow," by P. McDowel, R.A.; and another, No. 456, "Innocence," by Mr. J. H. Foley. These artists are all Irishmen, now resident in London. The remainder of the sculpture consists principally of busts, which may be flattering to the originals and interesting to the possessor, but they contain little other merit. We cannot but observe that No. 471, "Sketch model of a monument to the memory of the late Lord Bishop of Kildare, now erecting in Christ's Church Cathedral," by Joseph R. Kirk, A.R.H.A., is a marked improvement in monumental sculpture. Indeed, few branches of the fine arts need more reform. Allegory, with its nonsense, inverted torches, urns, vases, obelisks, and other such Pagan trumpery had so run riot, that it would be impossible to tell whether the persons commemorated by these memorials were heathens or not, had we not previous information on the subject. In this monument a great deal of the spirit of mediæval Christianity is preserved. It consists of an altar tomb; the figure is recumbent, with the hands devoutly crossed on the breast. The front of the tomb is to be panelled and filled with armorial bearings. We do not like the black mural slab surrounded by the decorations of a Gothic niche, we prefer the fine old canopy belonging to this style of art, and so many examples of which are to be found in our ecclesiastical ruins in Ireland. But we suppose the slab is for the panegyric of his lordship, which, if it occupy the space shown, must be tolerably lengthy. May we remind those interested in the matter, that the epitaphs of ancient churchmen seldom exceeded twenty words—"the name, the date of departure, the prayer for mercy," generally couched in such simple phrase as "cujus animæ propicietur Deus. Amen." The phrase "to lie like an epitaph" could not then be used.

The architectural portion of the exhibition is truly contemptible. A few wretched drawings of the most common-place designs are huddled together in a dark passage, a sort of middle place between the Painting and Sculpture. Is it thus that the members of the Royal Institute of Irish Architects vindicate their national character, by permitting mere draftsmen and tyros with their puny productions, to take the place at our national exhibition which should be occupied by men of talent and their works, if we possess any. The "Institute" waxes wrathful indeed, when a foreigner is appointed for the execution of some public work, for which, perhaps, not one of their members is competent. But they do not strive to put themselves into that position which would enable them to complain justly. They rave insanely for the loaves and fishes, but they care not for their art. They come forward with quibbling apologies for the iconoclastic demolisher of holy places, and mouth something about their admiration of "growing taste," but what have they done for the encouragement of that taste? What Irish architect has ever published or written a line on the ancient art of his country or her architectural resources? Not one, although many of them have been extensively employed through the country, and had every facility for observation. As if to put them to shame for their ignorance or slothfulness, or both, an Englishman has set them an example. Mr. Wilkinson, the architect of the Poor Law Commissioners, was not more than five years employed in Ireland, when he published a work on "the Ancient Architecture and Geology of Ireland," in many respects an imperfect performance, but, nevertheless, the first of the kind.

To return from the architects, or the traders who so style themselves, to the exhibition. The competition for the Downshire testimonial appears to have given employment to a good many of our architects, young and old, great and small. The Corinthian order seems to have been deemed indispensable, so that there is no great variety in the designs, only that to which the second premium was awarded; No. 489, by Mr. William F. Caldbeck, is the most hideous. We are astonished that the Academy received No. 417, by the same pseudo architect; surely there is no art in designing a range of common two-story houses with red brick fronts.

No. 497. "Proposed interior of the new Roman Catholic Church, Chapelized," by Mr. John Bourke. When will the lath and plaster style, with all its sham work, hypocrisy, and abominations die out? Here we have a perspective view of an interior of a quasi Gothic church, divided into nave and aisles with groined ceilings which should be stone, but that the architect appears to be profoundly ignorant of the canons, that an inferior material should never be so treated as to represent a better, and that there should be no feature about a building that is not necessary for construction, convenience, or propriety, "and that there ought to be no construction of ornament, but that essential construction may be decorated to any extent." Now, Mr. Bourke has pleased to invert these canons in his picture. He has first constructed a capacious shell, whose external idea is a large, unbroken area within. The interior idea, according to the sketch in the exhibition, opposes the exterior by showing nave and aisles, composed of merely decorative, or, rather apparent construction. The architect's authority for this was doubtlessly the castle chapel, Dublin, but he should have known that that building is a thing of prettiness and not of reality, and that the labours of a few earnest men have, within a very few years, brought to light the long-hidden fact, that the Catholic principle of the architects of old was reality in all things, and that they generally permitted effect "to take care of itself." They maintained consistency in all things. If a church had nave and aisles in its interior arrangement, the exterior showed it. Amongst its other faults, Chapelized is not to have a vestige of a chancel. If Mr. Bourke is ambitious to become an ecclesiastical architect—and we hope he is—he must be a believer in two facts, first, that "church architects must be either exclusively so, or men at least capable of drawing a wide distinction between the purpose and the character of sacred and secular buildings, and of treating each accordingly;* secondly, that the information necessary is not to be obtained by any amount of "genius" solely, nor by the unauthorized exercise of private judgment, but by enthusiastic and humble study of the works of the old men, and by being ever learning, ever searching, ever examining, sketching, measuring, and analysing ancient examples."

No. 488. "Design for a Cemetery, or the Monument of Tombs." by Mr. George Papworth, R. H. A. A strange title to a stranger composition. We were simple enough to believe that there was an end to those vagaries, but we have been disappointed. What does Mr. Papworth mean by "a Monument of Tombs?" does he propose that this monument is to supersede all tomb-stones, to absorb them all, as well it might by its extravagant massiveness. Setting aside, however, the ridiculousness of the name, the design is monstrous. Conceive, if you can, a huge, square pile of solid masonry, with a semicircular aperture in the middle, flanked by dead walls on either side, containing two enormous gates, and guarded by bronze figures of winged genii or demons, and totally bereft of every Christian emblem, and you have an idea of this "evil design." Probably Mr. Papworth, knowing that this is a good year for the coffin-maker's trade thinks "a new cemetery company" would not be a bad "spec." If he ever succeed in getting this monstrosity erected, all the harm we wish him is that he may be safely embedded under it till the day of doom, in order to prevent his perpetrating such vagaries in future.

The Early Monasteries of Ireland.

"Quod faciunt Angeli in Cœlis, hoc Monachi in Terris." S. Hieron in Psal. 45.

GREAT as has been the change in the estimation of Irish history by Irishmen—valuable as have been the records, dissertations, memoirs, and ballads given to the public within the last few years—and strong and fruitful as is the determination to rescue from the past our annals, as well as to shape for the future our destiny, little has, as yet, been done towards the illustration of that period when Ireland was "the chief seat of learning in Christendom,"¹ which, as it was the most glorious, is the most perplexed of all our history; and few have been the attempts to make live and breathe before us, the men who were the "decora et tutamina" of that notable time. And not to Irishmen alone, or the rearing up of an Irish nationality, or the writing of a true history of Ireland, would a knowledge of those times and men be important, but to the acute student of general history—to him who would thoroughly understand the second great European revolution, which, having swept away—flood-like—ancient empire and ancient civilization, laid the foundation of the whole Teutonico-Romanic structure of institutions, manners, languages, and laws. As yet, almost everything to marshal, analyze, or estimate the disorderly agglomerate of facts and names, and dates, with which our authorities present us, remains to be done.

Pray we it be well done.

At present we purpose devoting a few pages to the consideration of an institution, the most potent and remarkable of the time. We purpose, in fact, to give some notion of the early monastic system of Ireland. All who have studied the history of the Irish church, see at once that it was essentially a monastic church, and that faith in the utility of monasteries was its most distinguishing feature; all who have paid attention to the general history of the period, remark that monachism was its premier institution. Let us come at some idea of what an Irish monastery was—what its external appearance—its government, objects, effects, means, and influence, and we will have no inconsiderable step taken towards the understanding of the great features of the time. For this it will be necessary to review briefly the origin and previous history of the monastic institution.

The monastic spirit is perceptible long before it framed for itself an institution. In fact, it existed always where true men existed. It was in the breast of Abel “praying on the hill-tops”—of Noah in the flood-riding ark—of Moses communing with the Lord in the desert—of David “praising Jehovah in the night-tune”—of the Baptist in the wilderness—of Jesus during his forty days of prayer and fast. But in the apostolic ascetics it showed itself most visibly, and indeed, was well nigh embodied into an institution. They practised all the monastic precepts, except seclusion. They were obedient to their ecclesiastical superiors, poor and mortified by choice and by necessity, and sufferant by desire and by obligation. But as the church was then but a little band of ascetics and Christian signified in all reality a follower of Christ, seclusion would have been equally unnecessary and inexpedient—community of suffering aided fervour and strengthened endurance. They helped each other up the rough path they so bravely trod, supported each other in want, exhorted each other from beneath the rod and the hissing iron, consoled each other in prison, made the rack a pulpit and the flame a proof, and embracing, they marched together to a death—which was their synonyme for the birth of a new life—and to torture which was their passport to never-ending bliss.

But those times passed away, and the memory of them became as that of a thrilling dream of the night. Christianity, first preached by an humble teacher, in an humble province, as much despised by his own countrymen as they were by the rest of the empire, had grown strong and popular, was hailed from the capitol, enthroned on Nero's chair, and embraced by soldier, slave, prince, and artizan, the titled and the humble, the strong and the weak, the thoughtful and the careless, the honest man and the knave. Then, with numbers, power, and wealth, persecution—in more dangerous guise of indifference, simony, lay-interference and the like—sought the stronghold of Christ.

It were needless, and beside our purpose, to tell how sternly those attacks were repulsed, or how successfully, God upholden, the church triumphed over man's passions and devil's wiles. Nevertheless, however, from the nature of things some matters changed. The church was not as in the apostles' days, “ark of the faithful only.” A Christian community was no longer an unsystematized monastery: now it was that seclusion became advisable, and now it was sought. Many earnest men, full of unearthly fervour, so spiritualized that the body seemed half forgot, fled from the din of cities and the turmoil of busy life to the silent hills and the great solitudes named “of God,” where, in prayer, austerity, and mortification, they attended solely to the business of their lives, and offered themselves living holocausts to the Deity. In the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, Egypt, Syria, and all the eastern deserts were crowded with such holy solitaires. They lived on what herbs they could collect, sometimes in caves, sometimes in hollows of the rock, sometimes in tents, and often with no abode but the forest trees.¹ Such were SS. Hilarion, Paul, Jude, Anthony, and the other “Fathers of the wilderness.” They were called anchorets, or monks, from the Greek “Monos,” a person living alone. This, in strictness, is the commencement of the monastic system.

Betimes, however, as the deserts became crowded, the anchorets found it convenient to draw near to each other, fix their habitations in the same place, meet at certain times for prayer, and subscribe to a few general rules, but in other respects live quite apart and unsocialized. Of this, nature were the “Lauras,” or little ecclesiastical towns, with which at one time the Thebais was plentifully dotted.² These “Lauras” soon, however, resolved themselves into communities, elected an abbot or archimandrito, whom all the members bound themselves to obey, established certain rules to which all subscribed, and a certain discipline which all followed. By these arrangements the institution was rendered far more wieldy and generally useful. Many of the cenobites—as they were called—did not now fear to leave the deserts, establish themselves in the midst of populous districts, and even in the hearts of great cities, where, while they retained their feature of seclusion, they were enabled by example and precept, and active missionary exertion, to take part with their brethren in fighting the great fight of the faith through troublous times, wherein every head was needed and every hand useful. They differed, it must be noted, in many and important features from the monastics of after times, being bound by no vow, under no obligation of residence, holding all except the rudest literary acquirements superfluous—being considered as mere lay men, having no chaplain, attending with the rest of their brethren the parish church, and quite under the control of the bishop of their diocese.³

This, the second, and as yet, greatest modification of the monastic system, had its origin in the East, and St. Basil was its chief apostle. It is said to have been introduced into Europe by St. Athanasius, during his stay in Rome, at the time of the Arian disputes. Under his direction, and the patronage of the Pontiff, a convent was established at Rome. The aptitude of the institution for the general wants of the age, as well as for satisfying the longings of individual minds, being at once appreciated, anxiety for similar establishments spread through Europe. Monachism spread to several Italian cities, and crossed the Alps in the person of St. Martin, who founded his monastery about 399. Cassian, a holy and learned provincial, who had spent many years in familiarizing himself with the institutions of Palestine and Egypt, soon after founded the Cenobium of Marseilles, after a more strictly oriental fashion. In 410, St. Honoratus erected the monastery of Lerius, after the rules of Cassian, with this important exception, that, designing to found an asylum and school of learning, as well as of piety, he ordained teaching and scholastic pursuits to supersede, to some extent, the manual of the Eastern monks, and attached to the monastery a school which soon became the most famous, crowded, and useful in the west. Henceforward almost all the founders of monasteries imitated this model, so much more adapted to the exigencies of a time when the church nobly undertook, and executed the duty of preserving all that was good of ancient civilization and learning, from the flood-tide of Teutonic barbarism. Of these imitators none were more illustrious than our own St. Patrick, who, having studied at its benches and resided in its cells, imbibed its spirit and carried out its plan in his Irish foundations.¹

Keeping this much in view, we shall now try to picture an Irish monastery of the seventh or eighth age, exteriorly and interiorly, by such feeble lights as we possess. The superior cultivation and irrigation of the soil—a broad and tolerably even highway—the neater and more comfortable appearance of the little skin-thatched wooden cottages around—the healthy figures and decent mantles of the peasantry—the crosses on the stones, door-posts, and gate-ways, and the cleanly, thriving aspect of the brugh or village yonder, with all its low-eaved shielings and sharp-buttressed houses, unprotected by any circumvallation, and open to all travellers, from its surrounding gardens to the stone cross in its market-place, show at once that the lords of the soil are no hard task-masters, or gripping landlords, or broiling war-mad chieftains—betoken that some beneficent presiding influence has been at work in the mental and physical condition of the inhabitants—tell us, in fact, that we are on the termon-lands of an abbey. Peasants could tell you that within the memory of man this smiling district was one of the most desert in the country; and so would have remained, perhaps, did not its lord confer it in fee for ever on the good brethren of the canahbas, and did they not, with all stout industry and gentle persuasion, and useful art, make it what you see. Since they got possession of it, war, with its rude train of ministers, and sad following of evils, has never approached the place, or dragged the peasant, while yet his crop was sowing or his harvest reaping, to fight for his life—or fired his cottage in the night, or murdered his children in the day, or trampled his young seedlings, or rendered useless his winter's toil and long summer days of labour. Occupation is permanent and remunerative, because property is secure. The restlessness of clan-life is unknown, because civil broils are banned. Trade flourishes, because peace is preserved. Here the deanaan ceanuighe, or merchant is certain of a market for the foreign stuffs he has brought from Atha-Cliath, Port-Sairge, or Inliher-Colpa;² and from hence he goes back with good store of well-wrought hose, mantles, and truis, grain, timber, and skins. Here the firbolgian artisan is sure of encouragement, if he can cunningly fashion farming implements, clasps, and covers for books, weights, measures, and such things. Here the descendant of Milesius, who has thrown by his cathbarr, and become a vender of books (a high profession in those times), or studied architecture or cementing, will find employment—for about the monastery and brugh there is much building to be done, and in the scriptorium or the cells of the students, he will sell his books. For the lords of those lands love not to lead the fray, or head the muster, or conduct the raid—understand far better the use of the pen or spade than of the sword—and would be as much at a loss to know how to wield a battle-axe as any cloistered maiden of Kil-dohir.¹ Nay, more, the law's vengeance, society's law, and the church's curse is on the chief, no matter how powerful, who would gallop his war-chariot² with evil intent inside those territories, or the freebooter, however reckless, who would venture to tread a crop, or burn a shieling, or rob a traveller. Instances of such intrusion are almost unknown—so few as scarce to form an exception. The great bell³ of your tower has not pealed an alarm, or summoned a muster for nigh a century. This, with the character of the brethren, is the secret of all the prosperity of the place—the secret too, as we shall hereafter see, of much of the civilization of the age.

Passing through the village, you see the Brughnible, inviting some poor strangers into the Beatach or house of gratuitous entertainment, supported from the funds of the monastery, and sharing with it the honour of supplying rest and refection to the pilgrim, or traveller, or scholar. You are now beyond the village, and yet see no monastery: follow that broad and even way to the verge of that grove of lordly oaks,⁴ through the grove, until you come suddenly upon a cleared spot, with a fine view of some hoary mountain or deep ravine, or smiling landscape—there is situated the monastery. It is surrounded on all sides by a stone circumvallation, called a cathair or cashel, about eight feet in height, and with two or more gateways.⁵ Approach the gate; a rude carving of some scriptural subject or motto surmounts it—Pulsa cloc-cam, with cheery "Benedicite"—brother Janitor admits you. A pleasant, busy scene bursts on your sight! The interior space is about three or four hundred feet in diameter.⁶ Here are gardens and miniature fields, where some of the monks and students, in their tunics and cucullas, are tilling the ground. There are stately rows of oaks, beneath which classes are being heard or lectured, and monks and students read their books or tablets.

Look at that venerable white-robed priest, lecturing a crowd of peasant youths from the pulpit-trunk of an ancient tree. See the assemblage of earnest-faced students in dialectic combat beneath that long shieling. In those booths, behold the monkish artisans who fabricate most of the manufactured articles used in the abbey. How brightly sparkles that stream, flowing with winding, lingering course through the gardens and meadows, on its way turning a mill of simple construction,⁷ which grinds corn for the community. About the centre of the inclosure is a group of buildings, most of them of stone; and around it in regular rows or streets, are vast numbers of wooden cells, small, oval-shaped, and covered with skins, resembling in everything but size the pellices of the peasantry.¹ The greater buildings consist of a proin-teach, or dining-house, which also serves as a lecture-hall.² Adjoining is the aregall or kitchen, also made use of as a laundry.³ That large quadrangular dome-roofed house, is the abode of the abbot, and probably contains the scriptorium and a small lecture-room.⁴ But the most remarkable edifice of all is the church or damliagh. It is, as its name imports, of stone,⁵ and consists of two oblong quadrangles, in a straight line, connected by a high triumphal arch. Of these, the first, about sixty feet in length, dimly lighted by two small windows, and approached by a simple door placed in the centre of the west end, is appropriated to the students and lay brethren.⁶ The other of much smaller dimensions, and well illuminated by several windows, is set apart for the sanctuary and choir.⁷ There is little of ornament in either division, save the gilt or golden tabernacle, the tomb of the founder, the embroidered veil of the sanctuary, and a few simple paintings; for it was a characteristic of the Irish church that even its proudest cathedrals partook of the simplicity of the catecombs.⁸ No thought-awakening pictures or magnificent statues—no thrilling artistic music, making the building vibrate—no flood of tinted light through stained windows—no gorgeous glistening of seivals, or gold, or silver, or pearls, or emeralds, did the Irish priests love. Give them, the rather, in that mystic house where God specially is, simplicity, order, sternness—nothing to draw eye, or ear, or mind, from the awful contemplation of a Deity present! Such was their notion, and though it is not ours, we cannot gainsay it.

See you at the altar, even now, are tuneful worshippers. Several monks stand around, and sing a choral chaunt, so solemnly harmonious, so thrilling, that you know their hearts to go with it. And never, night or day, morning or noon, or eventide, does that choral worship cease. In the still midnight, as the monks awake, it is heard gently pealing above the wind—in its melody, in its lesson—like a catch from Paradise. Amidst the labour of the day, the teaching, study, working, ever and anon it is heard above the din, murmuring to each one, like that solemn voice of Loyola in Xavier's ear, amidst his poor pleasures and hard labours, "Heaven! heaven!" Even outside the walls it sometimes reaches; and the peasant as he trots by on his car, the wood-feller as he labours in the forest, or the herdsman as he watches his flock, hearing it, thinks of the monks' oft repeated lessons, and pauses for an instant to add a prayer, that his occupation too might be sanctified and heaven rewarded.

Let us now come forth and enquire the business and working of the monastery.

It is, as we have said, on the model of St. Honoratus of Lerius. The greater number of those wooden cells are occupied by students, foreign and native; and the little Brugh yonder, like the modern Gottinger, owes its origin to the necessity of accommodating them. Here we can mark the broad Anglo-Saxon accent, mingling with the hard utterances of the Trans-Rhene student, and the sharp Frankish tongue with the incipient "brogue" of Illuinhean.⁹ Here young chiefs study with the children of their kerne and galloes-glachs; and the future ceameighe sits by the side of the high-born Italian ecclesiastic. At least, one or two thousand pupils attend the study hall.¹ Nevertheless, in many and important features it differs from the institution of Lerius. The one was considered a mere lay establishment; this holds the rank of an ecclesiastical corporation, its abbot being mitred, and many of its monks ordained. Missionary duty was not among the obligations and privileges of the former; the latter has the cure of souls for the district committed to its charge. Education was an incidental duty of the first—a primary one of the second. In many points it resembled the Basilian convent. The labour of scholasticism was merely substituted for manual labour; but the latter was by no means neglected. The monks tilled their own land, manufactured their own clothes, prepared their own food, erected their own dwellings, and transcribed their own books. Though much time was devoted to active occupations, the meditative and strictly cenobitical received a large portion of attention. Meditation, prayer, fast, and "the study of their souls" were among the monk's first obligations, in the performance of which, were spent many hours of each day and whole months of every year. The vast number of the community, and the alternation of duties, enabled this to be easily done. The Irish monasteries were subject to no general laws; the will of the lord abbot, modified by usage, and a few statutes, was the supreme rule from which there was no appeal. There was no vow or obligation of residence; all the monks slept within at night, wore the canabhas or tunic, and the cuculla or hood of their order, and were subject to discipline of confinement, stripes, and fasting. The morning devotions over, some went to the schools to lecture, some to the country to missionary labour, some to the church for a day of meditation, and some to the refectory to give alms and attend the visitors and travellers. Those skilled in psalmody succeeded each other in the choir. Good transcribers and illuminators had full occupation of the scriptorium. The infirmaries busied some, the hall of mendicants others, while, as we have seen, agricultural and manufacturing pursuits occupied no inconsiderable number. Thus revolved for centuries their sweet harmonious round of duties, so useful, peace-bringing, and solemn.

It would far exceed the limits we have proposed, to enter into detail concerning the minor peculiarities and observances, the more so as they differed in every particular monastery. Suffice it, that they enforced a degree of mortification to which, except in the order of De Rance, we have no modern parallel, and presupposed a fervour which should make us tremble for ourselves and our times, even what we have thus generally stated was often modified, but as we conceive it conveys a fair idea of an Irish monastery of the time.

The Irish, we have said, was a monastic church. Most of its prelates were abbots, and most of its priests monks. It was founded by monks, and it grew and flourished under them. It organized by monasteries, taught by monasteries, and worked by monasteries. St. Patrick—himself a monk—when the faith had ¹ We are convinced that this number is considerably under-rated. Benchoir (Bangor), during the life of its founder, had 4000 (A.A. SS. p. 192); Cluain-iniard (Clonard) 3000 (A.A. SS. to any extent taken root in the land, founded the great monastery of Ardmacha or Armagh,¹ and afterwards, according to one writer, erected ninety more.² It is certain, at least, that he patronized the institution; that many monasteries, such as Slane, in East Meath; Ril-Usil, near Kildare,³ Drumlias in Cabrigia, Downpatrick, &c., owe their foundation to him, and that he drew up a monastic rule, which for many years was observed universally throughout Ireland.⁴ His disciples adopted the same views and practice. The saints of the second and third classes in Usher are almost all monks.⁵ St. Columba founded, according to one biographer, 300 monasteries;⁶ and according to Dr. John Colgan (who esteems himself moderate in the calculation), one hundred.⁷ The syllable kill or cella was added to his name, on account of the number of monasteries he founded.⁸ Nearly all the saints of the second class are "Patres et fundatores Monasteriorum." In their lives, nearly the first thing we read after their education is—"Erexit monasterium"—"Erexit cenobium"—"Aperit scholas," &c. In fine, it has been calculated, that in the middle of the ninth century, there must have existed at least three or four hundred great monasteries in Ireland.

It would be unnecessary, as well as out of place, to enter here into formal demonstration of the vast religious and intellectual activity in Ireland, in the earlier of the mediæval centuries. A chapter from St. Bede, or a sentence from St. Aldhelm—a page from St. Bernard, or a paragraph from Aleuin—a review of Colgan's Lives, Usher's Primordia, Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History, or Camden's Britannia—a glance at the History of the Age, or that telling Martyrology of Acagres—nay, the mighty pregnant fact we have just stated, would of itself render the matter as indubitable as the fall of the empire or the conquest of England. Indeed, the fact acknowledged by foreign cotemporary authorities, so many various and respectable, and discerned among the moderns (despite the poor, purchased calumnies of Cambrensis, the malice of Ledwich, and the more mischievous exaggerations of Dr. Halloran), by Mabillon, the Bollandists, D'Orleans, Mosheim, and Gorres, Dr. Ray, Prideaux, Scaliger, Camden, Shuyd, and Samuel Johnson, few now feel disposed to question, and none will dare deny.

He is but a sorry seer of the past, who cannot discern that of this civilization, the monasteries were one of the most potent causes, and agents for, in truth; that three hundred such establishments as we have endeavoured to describe, existed in the island, is a most fecund fact. Dimly peering among the shadows of our history, it looms out upon us. Solid and tangible the most remarkable fact of the time—scarcely any consequence is too mighty to be inferred from such premises. We have seen one monastery, multiply it by four, three, two, or one hundred, and what an agency for good you have! Conceive its moral and religious value: remember they are all cenobitical establishments, founded expressly for the advancement of religion, and the diffusion of religious knowledge, principles, and practice. It is not strange, that with such a vast machinery at work, on the minds, affections, and physical condition of a nation, it should grow to be the nursery of missionaries, saints, and doctors for Europe, or that at a time when Christendom was deluged with scandic barbarism, a strong, vigorous and healthy religious and intellectual enthusiasm should spring up. That wild strange fact, our historians told us of, but which we could scarce believe, that Ireland, in three centuries, added 880 names to the calendar, seems now quite possible.¹ Think of its intellectual importance! Next to religion, which we need scarcely add, is itself the best stimulus to intellect, scholastic education was, as we have seen, the next great object of monachism. The monks, discerning the importance of nurturing the intellectual as well as the moral attributes of man, and the wisdom of preserving and increasing antique civilization, which past ages had produced, and having command of the youth of their own and foreign lands, exerted all their influence in creating a high-toned intellectual and scholastic movement. They resumed and renovated that Catholic philosophy which the Augustines and Ambroses had originated; and they trained such minds as Dungall, Clemuch, and Erigena, who, to this moment, and through the long series of mediæval philosophers, exercise a potent and appreciable sway. They encouraged the cultivation of the imaginative and artistic powers, and produced men like Sedulius and Alcuinus, whose glorious hymns are every day chanted in our churches.² They taught those languages which open the stores of ancient thought and learning; and we see in the sixth century, St. Columbanus writing in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, and showing by numerous quotations and criticisms, a profound and scholarly knowledge of the classics in each tongue;³ and in the ninth age, Dungall reviving the graces of style and the polish of polite literature, and combining with them still more extensive erudition.⁴ And they studied the exact sciences, and sent forward such men as Virgilius of Salzburg, who was the first modern that discovered the sphericity of the earth, and the existence of Antipodes.⁵

Undoubtedly, then, to this mighty religious and intellectual institution, spreading over the island, with its network of affiliations and connexions, alliances and weapons, studies, genius, and rewards—its myriad hands and heads and hearts—is to be attributed that civilization which made the "Insula sacra" loved of the Phœnician voyager, the "Insula doctorum et sanctorum" of mediæval Europe. Each of those monasteries was, in its own district, "a flame on the hill-top," sentinelling the province, startling the wicked, cheering the good, and beaconing the struggling—lighting up the gloom of ignorance, and preserving always around it a genial moral atmosphere of sanctity and learning. And, betimes, they grew to be "light-fountains," to which the holiest and wisest of Europe's sons came to kindle their lamps, from which a Willibroid, a Boniface, an Alfred, a Bede, a Dunstan, caught the enthusiasm for which true men bless their names on earth, and angels claim companionship with them in heaven.

"When we look into the ecclesiastical life of this people," writes Gorres, "we are almost tempted to believe that some potent spirit had transported over the sea, the cells of the valley of the Nile, with all their hermits—its monasteries with all their inmates, and settled them down in this western island; an island which, in three centuries, gave 880 saints to the church, won over to Christianity the North of Britain and a large part of Germany; and, while it devoted the utmost attention to the sciences, cultivated with especial care the mystical contemplation in her communities, as well as in the saints whom they produced.”

The monastic institute also materially affected external civilization. Indeed, physical prosperity is to some degree co-ordinate with moral and intellectual progress. As in the human creature, an enlarged, cultivated, and well-regulated mind never co-exists with an exterior disgraceful or disgusting, so, in the social body, a widely-spread religious influence and great intellectual advancement is incompatible with political barbarism and chaos. Men are in multitudes what they are in units. Independent of this influence, however, the Irish monasteries exercised a very powerful direct social sway. Intercourse with its brethren is the best school for a nation—wherein it learns larger views of things, has the advantage of the labour of other minds, and is enabled to direct its future by the experience of others past. In this way the monasteries were of vast importance to Ireland, for they attracted to it a vast concourse of foreigners from all parts of Europe. The Italian or Anglo-Saxon students, who dwelt at home in palaces, and walked beneath porticos, and refreshed themselves in baths, which their fathers had learned of ancient Rome to build, would not fail to impart their poor love—“regarding the body”—to the generous instructors who poured into their minds the “wealth of soul.” The Gaulish ecclesiastic—who amidst the clash of barbarian weapons, and the sound of rough-stammering barbarian dialect, cherished with fondest attachment that imperial civilization which was fast perishing for ever—would assuredly impart to his teachers some of that classical enthusiasm with which his breast was fired. Commerce and manufactures were also fostered by this intercourse. We read in the life of St. Columbanus of Irish ships in several of the ports of France.¹

We have seen how the monks encouraged trade and the useful arts, how their lands were always open to the artificer and trader—the coned and ceanuihe—and how they exercised trades themselves within their monasteries. We have shown how they advanced and protected agricultural pursuits, and made their districts model-farms to the neighbourhood. They paid great attention to the laws and civil polity of the country, and compiled several law books.² By preserving the large portions of territory under their control in perpetual peace, and by training together the scions of great families, they offered the most effectual resistance to faction-spirit. Communities so peaceful and so earnest, and munificent in promoting and rewarding the arts of peace, indulgent landlords, generous patrons, and easy masters, could not fail to attract around them quiet agriculturalists, content to live without wild relaxations of strife—skilful artizans, anxious to earn a peaceful subsistence, and unwarlike traders who feared the rapacity of other lords: and herein we have another very tangible social good the monasteries effected—the establishment of cities and city-states. “The monks,” says Mr. O’Connor, in a passage quoted by Leland,¹ “fixed their habitations in deserts, which they cultivated with their own hands, and rendered the most delightful spots in the country. Those deserts became well-policed cities; and it is remarkable, that to the monks we should owe so useful an institution in Ireland as bringing great numbers together into one civil community.” As a matter of fact, we find that Kildare owes its origin to St. Bridget,² Glendalough to St. Comegen,³ Tuam to St. Jarlath,⁴ Armagh to St. Patrick,⁵ Lismore to St. Carthach,⁶ Derry to St. Columba,⁷ Cork to St. Findbarr,⁸ and so with many others.

But it would be impossible to guess, and endless to enumerate, all the benefits Ireland owes to monachism. And grievous would be our mistake, if we dreamed that this country alone derived paramount advantages from its monasteries, or if we did not know of the mighty and manifold influence exerted by them on the general history of Europe and civilization. Our proposed space, already much exceeded, warns us that we must defer to a subsequent paper the consideration of this last most interesting and as yet untouched subject. Suffice it here to hint, first—That when the imperial institutions, and all that was perishable of the church, were gradually swept down by the torrent of invasion, and the Christian world was one wide battlefield, and the civilization of ancient times was buried and perishing, the Irish monasteries afforded to the church a quiet, wherein, as Gorres says, “she took up her winter quarters;” to the frightened spirit of antique learning, a home and a refuge, wherein she might stop and find shelter and peace; and to the wise and the learned, the heroic and the brave of distracted Europe, a friendly exile and a common place of council. Second—That when the first violence of invasion had ceased, and chaos had given way to a semblance of order, and the church had assumed to herself the Titanic task of conquering to religion and civilization the rude conquerors of Europe, the Irish monasteries sent forth missionaries who took the bravest and most effectual part in this mighty and all-important work. And thirdly—That as the Irish institutions were originally founded on a European model, so the mediæval institutions were to no inconsiderable extent modified by the Irish system.

That most disgraceful and shallow of all historic cant concerning monkish ignorance, superstition, and so forth, is now superannuated. Mediæval history, cleared of the rubbish heaped upon it by the ingenious infidels of the last century, now can be studied with tolerable precision by any acute and earnest enquirer. And tracing such a one from every page, is the great fact, that the ecclesiastics of whom the monks formed the most effective portion, were the originators and patrons of everything beneficent and noble, true and tender—the civilized and civilizers of the time—the preservers of past learning and the nurturers of a new—many of them, blessed vessels of election, into which God loved to pour his choicest graces: as a body, the stern opposers of the brute-force of the age, standing a saving power between princes and people, preserving, as well as they might, the poor from the

THE LETTERS OF THE MOST REV. JOHN MAC HALE, D.D.,
Archbishop of Tuam. One vol. 8vo. Duffy, Dublin.

WE regard with sincere pleasure the publication, in a complete form, of these admirable letters which make so valuable an addition to Irish Catholic literature. Extending over an eventful period in the history of Ireland of twenty-seven years, we find their illustrious author bringing to the advocacy of the civil and religious liberties of his country, an irresistible logic, a captivating eloquence, an untiring energy and ardent zeal, which justly entitle him to hold an exalted place among those to whom a grateful country shall direct the love and admiration of posterity. The early letters, bearing the signature of "Hierophilos," were written between the years 1820 and 1823, while their author was professor of Theology in Maynooth, previously to his elevation to the episcopacy which took place in 1825. They attracted much attention at the time of their appearance, and did good service in the cause for which they were written. Energy, dignity, and earnestness breathe in every line, and the results of the most profound theological knowledge, and the deepest political sagacity, are conveyed in a style of singular brilliancy, strength, and perspicuity. Truth is the object of his worship, the source of his inspiration, and the guiding spirit of his pen, powerful, as the wand of Ithuriel, to detect and expose duplicity and falsehood.

Simple and candid, earnest, yet almost unimpassioned, his letters to the English people,* under this signature, detail so clearly, yet with so much moderation, the grievances of the Irish Catholics, and establish so unanswerably the inexpediency and injustice of refusing their redress, that the future historian may refer to them as a text book for the illustration of almost every branch of that momentous question. Truly generous natures are ever trusting and confiding, and we cannot but admire the calm dignity with which he appealed to the justice of the English nation; but that sacred fountain was no longer accessible, six centuries of misrule and oppression had enclosed it in an impervious rock, which would only yield its healing waters to the stroke of another Moses. He at whose potent bidding the sealed up stream commenced to flow—our Liberator and our guide for a term longer than the patriarch delivered the children of Israel—found at the close of his long pilgrimage no Pisgah to give rest to his weary foot, or the security of success to his departing spirit. Yet surely we have not been led thus far in vain, nor, though now denied the guidance of a Joshua, shall we fail to reach the promised land. Our nation shall yet place the apex on the pyramid of her great champion's fame, and the glory shall be his—though its record must be his epitaph.

The letters of "Hierophilos," to George Canning, are truly admirable for their argumentative force, energy, and eloquence: he treats with becoming ridicule and indignation the monstrous idea, that the barbarous penal code should be perpetuated to restrain the vices which it had itself produced, and clearly traces to its unhallowed influence the misery and crimes of the Irish people. In the following beautiful passage he condenses the spirit of one of his ablest letters on this subject:

"If the object of laws be to impose a restraint on the worst propensities of our nature, calamitous must be their effect when our very passions are stimulated by their authority. What then must have been the malignant influence of that sanguinary code, which passed towards the commencement of the last century, of which the avowed object was, to whet all the hateful feelings of man, and thus dissolve the most sacred ties by which society is held together? If their tendency had been confined to the separation of our people into two distinct bodies, then, like the cantons of Switzerland, each might have endeavoured to enjoy within its own sphere all the kind intercourse of society. But no; the object of those laws was to generate division, and by division, annihilation—violating the sacred rights of conscience as well as the security of property—poisoning every spring of social and religious feeling—nay, invading the repose of the domestic circle, until society was thrown into a hideous and confused mass, and the virtues by which it was cemented, were exiled to the solitudes of the mountains. Thus every engine, which the ingenuity of man could devise, was employed for the destruction of our people. It is acknowledged, even by their enemies, that the peasantry are a noble ruin. What, then, can be more worthy of the labours of a statesman, than to collect the scattered materials, to refit the social edifice, and to restore it to that symmetry and form to which the massive qualities of the broken fragments show they were originally destined; unless it be intended that Ireland should remain an eternal theme to excite speculative admiration for her virtues, and barren sensibility for her wrongs."

Above all praise are the able letters to Earl Grey in 1831, on the wretchedness of the people, and the famine which was then desolating the country. Is it not most melancholy to reflect that the same fearful topic again forms the subjects of letters in 1834, again in 1842, and again in 1846, the harrowing details increasing in intensity, till we have now arrived at a period which threatens beggary to the landlord, bankruptcy to the merchant, death to the people, and destruction to our whole social system. The valuable suggestions offered in these letters, particularly those which refer to an equitable arrangement between landlord and tenant, were then unheeded, though we now feel that the very frame-work of society is shaken to its centre in consequence of the criminal neglect. The spirit of our author was not one which could rest content with simply asking for aid, without pointing out the means whereby future similar applications would be rendered unnecessary; he was too well acquainted with the resources of the country not to know that these periodical claims of mendicancy were owing to the grossest mismanagement and neglect on the part of the government. Hence these letters, while urging the necessity of immediate relief, not only called for measures which would render the people independent of eleemosynary aid, but indicated the means by which to attain so desirable a consummation. The following passages of a letter to Earl Grey are so applicable to the present state of the country, that we almost need to be assured it was written sixteen years ago:

"I should fear to contemplate once more the recurrence of a similar scene. I should fear it for the sake of the people, the government, and, above all, the interests of morality and religion. * * * The inhabitants of entire districts literally loosened from the soil, and flocking, like vultures, wherever the hope of food may lead them. * * * Landlords who were deaf and blind and callous to the wants of their tenantry while they alone were called on to relieve them, becoming suddenly and miraculously sensitive to their destitution while they hope to relieve it by the charity of others—the lofty feeling that could not brook eleemosynary aid, now so impaired, if not utterly broken down, as to depress a proud and high-minded peasantry into a mass of mendicants—an improvident hope of relief in similar cases, and consequent relaxation of industry. * * * These are but a few of the necessary consequences of famine in a fertile land—a foe which, if again suffered to ravage Ireland, will utterly demoralize the people, and destroy those virtues of which the wreck that yet remains could still, in the hands of an able statesman, form the foundation of one of the noblest social edifices that could be exhibited in any country."

* Letters xiii. to xviii.

Alas! alas! that the pen which traced these lines, should be called on, after so many years, to denounce another Whig minister for sacrificing to the idol of political economy the lives of a famishing people. The letters to Lord John Russell* are, perhaps, the most powerful in the entire collection, and it would excite unbounded astonishment that such appeals could have passed unheeded, did we not know how lightly valued are the lives of one portion of the empire, compared with anything likely to affect the commercial interests of another. The claims of a starving people were unheard, lest the overgrown profits of the merchant should be curtailed; and already have we almost realized the frightful anticipation with which he concludes these letters:

"Unless you adopt more enlarged measures than throwing the relief of the people on the landlords, who, whatever be their sins, should be corrected and reformed, rather than annihilated, your ministry will be memorable in Ireland; and if you are ambitious of a monument, the people's bones, 'slain with the sword of famine,' and piled into cairns more numerous than the ancient pyramids, shall tell posterity the ghastly triumphs of your brief but disastrous administration."

It has frequently been said that ecclesiastics should confine themselves to the discharge of their religious duties, and keep themselves clear of all political excitement; and we know there are many learned, pious, and zealous pastors who appear to be actuated by this feeling, and refrain from all polemical controversy except where the interests of religion are immediately concerned. Far be from us the presumptuous thought of dictating a different course of conduct to those who, deliberately, and conscientiously have arrived at such a conclusion—but if there be, as thank God there are, many others who reason differently, let no one presume to curtail their right to act according to the dictates of their consciences, or rashly to assume an office which belongs alone to the searcher of hearts, to whom only they must render an account of their awful ministry. It appears to us that there must exist in every country, an intimate connexion between the moral and physical condition of its inhabitants; the exertions of the people must be first directed to the supply of those bodily wants to which man is everywhere subject, and till the necessities of life have been supplied, we would seek in vain to direct their thoughts and energies to any nobler acquisition. If then we see a people at all times in the greatest extremity of want, and frequently, in large districts, subjected to the periodical ravages of famine, worse housed and worse fed than the beasts which man has taken under his protection, we cannot but feel that such a people are badly circumstanced to receive instruction; and as ignorance is the nurse of crime, and education the fosterer of morality and religion, it becomes the duty of the priest and teacher to remove, if possible, the causes which produce the misery, and which present an almost insuperable obstacle to their exertions. The present condition of this country proves, that on its political amelioration, the very existence of the bulk of its population depends, and that in the political arena we contend not only for all that makes life valuable, but for life itself. Such being the case, it is difficult to imagine what class of society here can exonerate itself from taking part in such a struggle. The Catholic hierarchy appear to be particularly called on, at this juncture, to stand between an injured people and the guilty cause of their sufferings; though it is neither to be expected nor desired that they will, at all times, be ready to protect a government from the consequences of its misdeeds involving the lives of thousands of its subjects. There can be no doubt, that the settlement of some, so called political questions, for instance, the relations between landlord and tenant, would tend greatly to the diminution of the awful crime of murder, and free our country from the stigma which ignorance and malevolence seek to fix on the national character. We cannot better conclude our observations on this subject than by a passage from one of the letters to Earl Grey:

"It is in vain, then, that your lordship, or any other member, would attempt to controul the legitimate influence of the Catholic priesthood. It is identified with the very nature of their office—the duties towards our country form a part of the code of our ethics—the duties of electors are written in every treatise of the obligations of different states; and until the course of our theology be compiled by deputies of the government, a measure which I should not be surprised to see in contemplation, this priestcraft, so much complained of, will not cease to be beneficially felt, and cheerfully endured by the faithful people of Ireland."

A considerable number of the letters are occupied in describing a journey to Rome, and certainly these will not be found the least interesting part of the collection. In every page we see traces of a cultivated mind, a luxurious imagination, and felicitous powers of description. Amidst all the charms of Continental scenery, dear Ireland was ever before his eyes, and her degraded and miserable condition, overshadowed with its gloom the sunny landscapes of the south. The contented and happy peasantry whom he saw in the enjoyment of comfort, denied to his countrymen at home, led his mind to the constant consideration of the causes which produced so striking a contrast, and all his investigations led to the same conclusion, that in bad laws and misgovernment we shall find the prolific source of almost all our misery. Amidst the gaieties of Paris, the solitude of the Alps, the classical reminiscences of Italy, and the glories of Rome, the condition of the Irish people is the subject from which his thoughts never wander, and his mind is constantly engaged in devising means for their amelioration. A peculiar charm pervades these letters; every place described becomes an object of interest, and the enquiring mind of the author has amassed a treasure of interesting facts and illustrations which he pours forth in a ceaseless flow of brilliant eloquence. Enthusiasm for religion, and love of country, give the pervading tone; yet to the mere tourist they will afford the highest pleasure, on account of the variety and extent of the information they contain, and the remarkable judgment which directs attention to every object worthy of notice. The first letter, written from Rome, gives ample evidence of the glorious enthusiasm with which he beheld the Eternal City:

"My pilgrimage is at length accomplished. I have reached the shrine of the Apostles. One of the first and fondest wishes of my life is gratified. Seated on the summit of Mount Palatine, the cradle and the grave of the Roman empire, the vastest and most varied picture that was ever held up to human contemplation, lies before me. What a panorama revolving before the historic eye! Whether you regard the time through which it stretches, the space over which it extends, the groups which crowd it, or the pencils which lent it their shade and colouring, it is, and will remain to the end of time, without example. * * * What a succession of mighty names crowd upon the view through this immense vista! What a number of nations, renowned in ancient and modern story, fix your attention as they pass! Tuscans, Greeks, Goths, Franks, Germans, Sarmatians, and Britons occupy, in turn, a large space of this moving picture. Philosophers, heroes, and consuls, on the one hand, saints, martyrs, and pontiffs on the other, as if vying with each other in prodigies of prowess, and the extent of their empire."

If anything could add to the interest and reverence attached to Rome, it would be these beautiful letters which no reader of taste or feeling will take up without delight, or conclude without regret at taking leave of a guide so religious, intellectual, observant, and eloquent.

Immediately on his return from the Continent, we find our author pouring forth a torrent of indignant eloquence against that monstrous anomaly, the Church Establishment. A social evil, whose injustice is so evident, that the weapons of argument are wielded against it in vain, and so oppressive, that it must excite astonishment that any people, however degraded, should consent to wear such a badge of slavery. The evils committed in the name of liberty, bear no proportion to those which religion is impiously called upon to sanction; and till we see a thorough cleansing of that Augean stable, its noisomeness will continue to poison our social atmosphere. No language can exaggerate the monstrous injustice of compelling the poorest people in Europe, to deprive themselves of the very necessities of life in order to support a church which designates their religion a blasphemous idolatry. Rent-charge is but another name for tithes; the pauper tenant feels the oppression fully as much, and the degradation is but little diminished. The landlord must have his pound of flesh, and will take care that while he nominally pays the odious impost, the miserable tenant shall do so in reality. No government could sanction such an iniquitous system but for the unholy purpose of disunion—and hellish ingenuity could not devise a more successful means of creating antagonistic interests, fostering religious enmity, and utterly crushing the growth of that enlarged and liberal feeling of mutual forbearance, which the members of a well regulated society should exercise towards each other. Whenever justice shall sway the councils which may hereafter preside over this nation, the sacrifice of the Irish Church Establishment shall be the first and most acceptable offering laid upon its altar. Let it be clearly understood, however, that our observations regard only the contributions and support wrested from the Catholic people; let those, whose religious feelings prompt them to do so, contribute whatever they may think amply sufficient for the maintenance of that becoming dignity with which religion and its ministers should always be invested. We would regard with horror, and oppose with energy, any legislative enactment against the religion of any portion of our fellow-countrymen. All we look for is, that the members of each religion should alone contribute to its support, and that every man should have perfect liberty to choose that form, in which he conscientiously believes he can best worship his Maker.

The important subject of education occupies a large proportion of the letters, and has evidently received that anxious attention and careful investigation to which it is entitled, not less upon its own merits, than because it has been regarded from different points of view, by those who are rarely found to differ in matters of consequence, particularly where the interests of religion are concerned. Without wishing to pronounce any opinion on the much agitated question of state education, we may say that no dispassionate reader can rise from the perusal of these letters, without a strong conviction that their gifted author has employed much time and learned research upon the subject, and that he has fully convinced himself, that he is bound to take a certain course, from which he cannot be won, at peril of his soul, by promised good or contingent advantage. So earnestly and truthfully is this impression conveyed in every page, that the man must be blind indeed who does not see it. It by no means follows, however, that the same investigation, pursued by others of equal learning and more matured judgment, should lead to the same result. It is, for instance, the unquestionable right of every prelate to exercise the fullest controul over the religious instruction of his own diocese, and he is invested with the most ample discretion as to the best and safest method of imparting it. One prelate may consider that his pastoral superintendence and the vigilance of his clergy afford sufficient protection to the religion of his flock while receiving state education, and another may be convinced that such safeguards would be ineffectual. Each is influenced by the same motives, and differs only in the application of a principle, the truth of which they equally acknowledge—yet one zealously adopts, the other strenuously opposes the same system. There is one part of the question, however, upon which all Irish Catholics must be agreed—that is, to regard with extreme distrust and apprehension any system of education for Ireland proposed by an English government, a large share of whose administration must always be in the hands of the English minister. There is no lover of his country or his religion, who, before embracing such a system, would not require the most ample guarantee that it could never become an engine in the hands of an unscrupulous government to undermine the religion of the people.

In conclusion, we must express an anxious hope to see the spirit which breathes through all these letters, influencing the tone of society in Ireland. We require a Mentor to teach us to detest expediency, to despise cant, to execrate falsehood, no matter how specious its mask, or how ingenious its disguise, to reverence religion and to love truth. The authorship of these letters alone, would, therefore, entitle the illustrious prelate to the gratitude of his country—to that distinction, however, he has far higher claims. A pious, zealous, and learned guardian of religion, an ardent and able assertor of these broad principles of liberty, the application of which would free, not only his own country, but the whole human family, a champion of truth, dignified and chivalrous, "sans peur et sans reproche," in the memory of the grateful Irish people shall long be embalmed the honoured name of JOHN MAC HALE, Archbishop of Tuam.

A MANUAL OF GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE. By F. A. PALEY, M.A., London: Van Voorst.

ABOUT twelve years ago, a volume entitled "Contrasts; or, a parallel between the noble edifices of the middle ages, and corresponding buildings of the present day," issued from the press. It was the work of Mr. A. W. Pugin, then a very young man, who had been recently received into the communion of the Catholic church. For many years previous, he had been an earnest student of all the remains of the fine arts of the middle ages; and, having been a pupil and assistant of his father, an eminent artist and illustrator of medieval edifices, he had become thoroughly acquainted with the various details of Christian art. He felt, however, that something was wanting; that the most intimate knowledge of forms was insufficient to the apt combination and adaptation of them, so as to produce new works, in any consistent degree, resembling those of the ages of faith. This feeling guided him to the study of the doctrines and liturgical writers of the Church; and it is easy to see how, while the examination of the former demonstrated their truthfulness, by the latter the intimate connexion between the Catholic religion and the fine arts was established in his mind. The "Contrasts" being the first work published in England containing any very marked allusions to this connexion, was assailed with considerable virulence by the Protestant press of England, while the Catholics, for a long time, received the opinions enunciated in it with comparative indifference. Mr. Pugin, with the fervour of a true apostle in a righteous cause, was not daunted by the violence of the former nor the coldness of the latter, but persevered till finally he triumphed amongst his own communion. He subsequently published his "True principles," and "Apology for the revival of Christian architecture," and two essays in the Dublin Review, which still farther developed the principles he had propounded, and which, we must here observe, are works indispensably necessary to any person wishing to obtain correct notions of ecclesiastical art. He must have been gratified by seeing his views adopted by a highly educated and influential portion of the Established church of England, about the year 1840. The tractarian movement had been proceeding with considerable energy for some years before, developing many true views of Catholic doctrine, discipline, and polity, and amongst others it was not to be wondered at, that a due regard for the solemnities of public worship, and the beauty and appropriateness of God's material temples should be manifested. Accordingly, we find about the period of which we speak, societies formed at the two great English Universities, Oxford and Cambridge, for the cultivation of ecclesiastical art. The Cambridge Camden Society was the more distinguished of these associations, and gave the first proofs of its vitality by the publication of small tracts under the modest titles of "A few words to church builders," "A few words to church restorers," and "A few words to churchwardens." The societies, particularly the Camden, were assailed by hosts of enemies. The newspapers teemed with charges of covert Popery, Puseyism, and various other high crimes and misdemeanors, while similar accusations were preached from the pulpit, and then published in neat pamphlets. One Cheltenham luminary made the Camdensians the subject of a "fifth of November" sermon, and endeavoured "to establish beyond controversy" that "the restoration of churches not only tends to, but actually is POPERY;" so that, according to this light, the peculiar genius of "pure Protestantism" is to condemn, neglect, and desecrate God's house, an equivocal compliment to our separated brethren, in which we are unwilling to join, seeing that the greatest minds which have existed in the Protestant church are of a different opinion. In fact, several evangelical ladies, and not a few "experienced" old gentlemen, did not require the aid of their spectacles, nor light of a supernatural kind, to enable them to see into the dark ways, the tortuous windings, and "ulterior views" of the Camdenists. Should any churchman declare his opinion to be with old Richard Hooker, that "even then was the Lord as acceptably honoured of his people as ever, when the stateliest places and things in the whole world were sought out to adorn his temple," he was instantly anathematized as a Jesuit of the "third vow," whose aim could be none other than the restoration of the "creature-worship" of old Popery, and the blindness and slavery of the "dark ages," on the ruins of the "spiritual" Protestantism and ultra enlightenment and freedom of opinion and action of the nineteenth century.

The societies, however, little heeded these assaults. Occasionally they broke lances with some half-witted knight-errant of low church, high pews, whitewashed walls, and broken windows. They gradually gained strength, pursued their studies vigorously, explored old churches, old books, and old half-worn manuscripts, collected important facts, eschewed mere archeology and antiquarianism, and finally, laid the foundation of a new science of practical importance, namely, "Ecclesiology," or the knowledge of building and restoring churches on Catholic principles. During all this time some important works issued from their press, and after a few years' existence, the Camden Society was enabled to publish a periodical as the organ of their views, and a medium of communicating their progress to their brother members scattered over the country. At first this periodical, the Ecclesiologist, appeared at irregular intervals, it then became a two-monthly, and, finally, a monthly magazine, which it still continues to be. One of the most active members of the Camden Society was Mr. F. A. Paley, who contributed a good deal to the Ecclesiologist, beside publishing "The Church restorers, a tale treating of ancient and modern architecture and church decorations," and a most scientific and useful "Manual of Gothic mouldings." His last publication is that before us, and has appeared since the author's reception into the Catholic church, although some portions of it were in print for many months previously.

We know of no book better adapted for the present state of our knowledge (or ignorance we should rather say) of ecclesiastical architecture in Ireland than Mr. Paley's manual, which, in the words of the preface, "is designed to assist the student in the distinction, classification, and analysis of architectural details." 'Tis true this work treats exclusively of Christian architecture as developed in England, and it is also unquestionable that in Ireland there was a peculiar development of Christian art; but as some time may pass before we shall be in a condition to fully investigate the ecclesiology of Ireland, we must at present take all the aid we can obtain from foreign resources.

After tracing the "humble beginnings" of English church architecture, and deducing its origin from Rome, the centre of Catholic art as of Catholic unity, the writer thus feelingly describes its decay:

"Such then were the humble beginnings of English Church architecture, which, for many centuries afterwards, may be said to have run a career of undying splendour, occasionally changing, yet never becoming deteriorated while the spirit of religious faith and liberality remained unimpaired. Its final decline or debasement, in respect of principles, as well as of detail, commenced with the reign of Henry VIII. The troubles of this and the succeeding reigns gave, in England, a death blow to its yet lingering and occasionally energetic and beautiful efforts. It was most unhappily and unworthily succeeded by what we may call the classic or pagan age, for which the revival of literature, as it is called, and the extended use of the art of printing, prepared the way. Then, the great and chivalrous associations of the middle ages being lost, as well as the piety and taste which had eminently characterized them, heathenism was once more invited to lend its aid in forming for newly enlightened Christians a worse than brazen era of architecture. Henceforth nothing was admired but Grecian and Roman structures and ornaments—nothing was appreciated but the designs and emblems of idolatry. So perverted and infatuated was the taste of that time, that the once Catholic and beautiful England, the land of mighty abbeys, cathedrals, and churches without number, was everywhere disfigured with ugly and unchristian piles, in burlesque imitation of the foreign shrines of heathen gods. Then it was that the ancient and national style of architecture was called in ignorance and derision the gothic. The term is in itself absurd and calumnious; but it has now become so general, that it avails little to endeavour to supersede it by another."

The second chapter of "the Manual" treats of Anglo Romanesque and its characteristics, and while recommending its perusal to such of our readers as may take an interest in ecclesiology, we also wish to direct their careful attention to Dr. Petrie's invaluable observations on the early architecture of Ireland, in his work on the "Round Towers." By an examination of both works, they will perceive many points of remarkable difference between the "Romanesque" of England and the Romanesque style (or Byzantine if they will so have it) of this country.

The great merit of Mr. Paley's work, in our opinion, is a more scientific classification of styles, and a more appropriate and Catholic nomenclature, than has been hitherto suggested by any author. They have been partly adopted from the Ecclesiologist, but amplified in the "Manual." For the better understanding of this part of the subject, it is necessary to mention that no satisfactory classification of the gothic or pointed styles of architecture existed till the publication of Bishop Milner's works. That good and learned man divided them into three "orders," which he named respectively "first, second, and third." The styles which existed anteriorly to the gothic, he left in the undisturbed possession of the names which had been given to them by older antiquaries, "Saxon and Norman." Subsequently Mr. Rickman, upon not very intelligible grounds, adopted the nomenclature of "Early English," "Decorated English," and "Perpendicular English," corresponding in distinction of times of duration, with the "first, second, and third orders" of Bishop Milner. This terminology was generally used by authors and architects, till the publication of a very ingenious paper in the Ecclesiologist for March, 1845, which suggested the terms "first, middle, and third pointed." This nomenclature has since been invariably used by the writers of the Ecclesiologist, and we believe that many architects now use it. Taking it as the basis of his new scheme, Mr. Paley "ventures to propose a more explicit nomenclature of the styles by the following table, accompanied by dates:"

"1ST.—ANGLO ROMANESQUE.

1. Early British or Anglo Saxon.
2. Ante Norman, from about 950 to the Conquest.
3. Norman, 1066 to 1170.
4. Transition, 1170 to 1200.

2ND.—GOTHIC.

5. First Pointed, 1200 to 1240.
6. Late, or Florid First Pointed, 1240 to 1270.
7. Geometric Middle Pointed, 1270 to 1330.
8. Complete Middle Pointed, 1330 to 1380.
9. Third Pointed, 1380 to 1485.
10. Florid Third Pointed, 1485 to 1546.
11. Debased or semiclastic, 1546 to 1650.

"To which might be added (to complete the cycle, by bringing church architecture round again nearly to the point whence it started), 12. Revived Pagan, 1650 to 1840."

We confess ourselves very much pleased with this classification, although if we were to insist on an æsthetically Catholic nomenclature, we might prefer the omission of the dates, inasmuch as in some countries, Spain for instance, there are many examples of a later development than obtained in England, so that we sometimes find buildings in those countries, which would be assigned by an English ecclesiologist to the thirteenth century, to be in fact of a century subsequent. And in Ireland there are buildings which the same ecclesiologist, judging from English examples, would assign to the latter end of the eleventh century, while, on the excellent authorities cited by Dr. Petrie, we have good reasons for believing that they belong to the beginning of the tenth century. We would also wish for other names for the subdivisions of the "Romanesque" class than those given by Mr. Paley. He has avoided the exclusive nationality, as irreconcilable with Catholicity, in the "Gothic" classes, and it were also desirable that he could have effected the same for "Romanesque." The term "Anglo Saxon" doorway in Ireland, is as inconsistent as "Early English" window in France or Belgium. We are aware of the obstacles that exist to the permanent settlement of a nomenclature for Romanesque architecture. The difficulties referred to in the article of the "Ecclesiologist" which we have mentioned, have due weight with us, and we confess that increased study of the subject does not diminish our sense of these difficulties. At present we must say, with the Ecclesiologist, "we trust that in time, as greater experience, wider research, and deeper religious feeling, will have made men more competent judges of the worth of other days, they may find order where now they see only confusion—discriminating what now they confuse, and connecting what now they esteem disjointed. In fine, the classification of ascetic (Romanesque) architecture is one of the agenda of future ecclesiologists. Ascetic architecture is a by-gone thing, it has developed itself in spiritual, and therefore its study is not by any means so important as that of its more perfect successor; but still it is very important, if it were merely as a record of a mighty fact, as the living monument of long ages of the Christian church, the exponent of the deepest feelings of men immeasurably holier and better than we, who venture to criticise with architectural tongue their costly works of love."

The third chapter of the manual is devoted to an examination of the "pointed or gothic styles." The fourth chapter investigates the characteristics of windows. The fifth, those of doorways. In the investigation of the latter, Mr. Paley receives very important aid from Ireland, which he thus acknowledges:

"In that extremely interesting work, the Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland by Dr. Petrie, a great number of doorways are engraved, which the author gives the strongest reasons for supposing to belong to the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries. Many of these are of a form hitherto undiscovered in England, namely, of Egyptian or Greek outline, with sloping sides and a flat lintel above. Others approach much more closely to the opus Romanum of our Saxon examples. Although in some respects these doorways have peculiarities of their own, yet they generally much resemble what we have called ante Norman remains. Many of them have the chevron moulding and other ornaments, which are generally called Norman. A perusal of Dr. Petrie's work will probably establish the important fact, that a large class of buildings, now considered (from their style) necessarily of later date than the Conquest, may, in all probability, be safely referred to a period very long before that event. And if this can be predicated of Irish ecclesiastical remains, there can be no valid reason adduced why it should not be allowed in the architecture of the sister Isle."

We really think there are "valid reasons" why such an assumption for the architecture of the "sister Isle" should not be allowed. Surely Mr. Paley ought to know while England was sunk in comparative ignorance and barbarism at the remote period of which he speaks, Ireland was the "prime seat of learning in Christendom."* He also might have learned from his own countryman, the Venerable Bede, that at that time "many of the noble and middle classes of England left their own country, and passed into Ireland, and some, within the monasteries, others going about from cell to cell, delighted in receiving instructions from masters, all of whom the Irish liberally received, giving them daily food without price, as also books and instructions gratuitously." Such being the superior state of civilization in Ireland in that period, it is highly probable, nay, almost certain, that the arts, which always progress with it, were in a much more advanced state here than in the "sister Isle."

The principles of Gothic composition, construction, and effect, are ably treated in the seventh chapter. The author truly says:

"These points may be said to involve the whole theory of Gothic architecture; decoration, however prominent a part, being entirely a subordinate, and by no means a necessary accessory, even to a perfect building. Thus the amount of enrichment bestowed upon it does not essentially affect that correct and pleasing ideality of a Gothic structure, which is really due to outline, proportion, and harmony of parts."

From the foregoing premises Mr. Paley deduces the following "principal canons of Gothic composition," and then describes the principles which have guided modern pretenders to architectural knowledge. Their transcription here needs no apology:

"I.—To make uniformity of design entirely subservient and secondary to utility. For instance, never to insert a useless window or an unnecessary buttress in one place, solely to fill up or relieve a blank space, or because it occurs in another corresponding place; but to pile together, to insert, to add, with any degree of fearless irregularity whatever. Ignorance of this leading principle has been the cause of half the failures of modern designs.

"II.—To use decoration only as a means of relieving necessary constructive features, and never to add any detail adventitiously, for its own sake, solely for effect, and irrespectively of position, meaning, and propriety. Thus, to make a blank window or doorway, to set up an unmeaning niche without a statue in it, to erect sham gables, block off buttresses midway, because the lower part is not seen, as at the Pitt Press, Cambridge, or insert canopies with nothing for them to enshrine, are examples of false principles. Almost all architects of the last generation committed these errors. They saw niches and turrets, and odd-looking excrescences in old churches, without ever knowing what they once contained, or why they were erected.

"Hence we may deduce two further rules—first, to make construction and propriety of composition the primary, decoration, the secondary object, and not to decorate at all until a substantial and durable fabric shall have been fully provided for; secondly, to regard reality and truthfulness before mere show, and to conceal nothing from a fancied impropriety of appearance.

"III.—To attend exclusively to utility, and to let effect take care of itself. Thus, if there is any reason for part of a window to be encroached upon, as at Hawton, Notts, or one pinnacle to be larger than another, as in the tower of Grantham, or one angle of a tower to be propped with a larger buttress, as at Horningsea, near Cambridge, or an arch to be contracted or widened to any extent—to obey the demand fearlessly and without hesitation. Modern men often adopt the most awkward expedients to avoid what is really a great beauty instead of a blemish.

"IV.—To create ideal extent by multiplicity of parts, by distribution of thrusts, division vertically and horizontally by buttresses and string courses, repetition of features and compartments of continuous vaults and roofs; and ideal heights by narrowness, combined with length, which are the conditions of the most efficient perspective.

"V.—To attain infinite variety, both of details and arrangements, even to the extravagant indulgence of caprice, by combining, adapting, and diversifying given elements, as mouldings, arches, shafts, pannellings, tracery, &c.

"VI.—To make extreme simplicity and extreme richness of workmanship compatible with the same true principles, by always regarding the latter as merely the luxury of art, and the legitimate scope for ingenuity, expenditure, and gradual execution.

"VII.—To regulate the exterior plan solely by the internal requirements.

* Prideaux.

"VIII.—To aim at apparent lightness, combined with actual strength, and at the same time to satisfy the eye by giving the idea of security from each part having its own peculiar support.

"Let us now observe how completely every one of these principles has been INVERTED in modern practice, and we shall have obtained some clue in tracing the cause of modern failures.

"Modern principles are

"I.—To make buildings uniform by equal and similar wings, corresponding doorways, windows of the same size and kind, level and regular elevations, not broken up into parts of greater or less prominence and height. Every gothic new building in Cambridge exhibits these faults, which are the certain result of the same hand composing in two contradictory styles, classic and gothic.

"II.—To add unnecessary and unmeaning ornaments in conspicuous positions to attract the eye and produce a showy appearance, leaving the less exposed parts bare and naked in the contrast.

"III.—To place effect before utility, as by building an inconvenient or unnecessary feature, because it is supposed to look well. Hence we have doors which afford no entrance, turrets with no available interior, and chimneys which do not emit smoke.

"IV.—To erect buildings whose primary idea is that of a large unbroken area, without columns and arches, with wide roofs, and without distinct component parts. Such were the great majority of the modern churches, which often had neither buttress, nor string course, nor arch in the whole design; in short, nothing gothic about them except the minor details.

"V.—To use usque ad nauseam a few hackneyed gothic details, copied from celebrated churches or cathedrals, or borrowed from books; and to apply these without sufficient regard to difference in the kinds and character of buildings.

"VI.—To sacrifice solidity and strength to unnecessary and adventitious ornament, and to impoverish the fabric to obtain the greatest possible amount of conspicuous but needless decoration.

"VII.—To arrange exterior elevations without regard to the nature of the interior, or to force the latter to suit the former; as to give the outward appearance of nave and aisles where there are no columns or arches inside: of three gabled roofs where there is but one flat ceiling within; of pinnacles or gable crosses which are but chimneys. Hence the custom of building masks either to hide necessary parts which do exist, or to give the idea of those which do not.

"VIII.—To be satisfied with actual weakness without even apparent lightness, as by the use of plastered timber to imitate stone, and by the omission of essential constructive details, such as shafts, mouldings, and the visible resistance of lateral thrusts."

There is not one of the faults here enumerated by Mr. Paley, which has not been perpetrated over and over in the new churches and other edifices erected in Ireland in modern times. Without going ten miles beyond the boundaries of Dublin, and in the City itself, we could point out examples of every one of the blemishes alluded to.

The volume is concluded by an essay on "Monumental Brasses," from the pen of C. R. Manning, Esq., of Benet College, Cambridge, which is the first complete treatise on the history and characteristics of these interesting memorials of the departed faithful that has been published. We think the work would have been more complete, had the author added another chapter on the arrangements of a church. Perhaps that subject would form another very interesting book.

We earnestly recommend an attentive perusal of Mr. Paley's "Manual" to all persons who feel an interest in Church building, and what Catholic or Irishman is there who should not? Ecclesiastical architecture is a subject both of religious and national importance, if we are desirous to prove, on the one hand, that we are anxious to show our respect for the solemnities of Divine worship, and to make our churches something more characteristic of their destination, than of secular buildings or of conventicles; or, if on the other hand, we wish not "to prove and confirm the fact that we have little art, learning, or imagination." Laymen, as well as clerics, should interest themselves in this matter, for as things are managed in Ireland, few churches are built without the intervention of a committee of laymen, who often esteem themselves all wise, and are frequently all potent. Architectural knowledge and taste do not come spontaneously, they must be cultivated; and surely it is not unreasonable to expect that buildings directed by ignorant men, must of necessity be abortions. Therefore, those who undertake to act on committees for church building, should at least be acquainted with the first principles of church architecture. Modern architects are too frequently "good, easy men," who receive any directions of committee men as canons, no matter how opposed to sound principles. They esteem themselves (not through humility, we fear) merely as servants who should do the bidding of their masters, and not presume to act as counsellors and guides, readily adopting all good suggestions, and promptly rejecting those which they know (or ought to know) would compromise the principles of their art. It is one of the objects of our PERIODICAL to aid in elevating the character of our national art. We have great difficulties to surmount, but their magnitude will not deter us, or turn us aside from a purpose which we believe to be righteous.

THE PURGATORY OF ST. PATRICK.

[Translated from the Spanish of Calderon.]

Andò verso l' Irlanda,
E vide Ibernìa fabulosa, dove
Il santo nechievel fece la cava
In che tanta merce par che si trove,
Che l'uom vi purga ogni sua colpa prava.

ARIOSO. Orl. Fur. canto x., sts. 91, 92.

"——— He next for Ireland shaped his course,
And saw the fabulous Hibernia, where
The goodly, sainted elder made the cave
In which men cleansed from all offences are,
Such mercy there, it seems, is found to save :—" Rose.

ACT III. SCENE—a Street.

Enter JUAN PAUL, fantastically dressed as a soldier, and LUDOVICO very pensive.

Paul. Some day I knew 'twould happen so,
And that the day has come, is plain,
When I should ask you to explain
What I so much desire to know :
You will remember, in the dark,
How, from my cabin I did start,
To point you out the nearest part
Where you, with safety, might embark
Another time, pray recollect,
You said, or come with me, or die—
Of two such evils how that I
The greater evil did select,
Which was to follow in your train—
How as a shadow, at thy side,
With thee I've wander'd far and wide,
Throughout fair Italy, and Spain,
France, Scotland, England, all have been Explored by us, and we, in fact,
Have left no strange and distant tract
Unvisited : At length we're seen,
Thus having pass'd o'er land and sea,
Upon the Irish coast again :
I, Juan Paul, with 'wilder'd brain,
Confused, amazed at what I see—
Your hair, and beard of monstrous size—
Your counterfeited voice—your dress
So changed—implore you to confess
Why thou dost wear such strange disguise ?—
By day you never leave the inn,
But in the frosty, midnight air
A thousand wild exploits you dare,
Without remembering we are in
A land where everything has chang'd—
Where nothing can be heard or seen
As we remember they had been,

When formerly this land we ranged :
Egerio the King is dead,
Killed by despair's unceasing pains,
And Lesbia, his daughter, reigns,
Queen of this kingdom in his stead,
Because Polonia——

Lud. Oh ! proceed,
But name me not Polonia's name ;
Do not destroy my trembling frame,
Nor terrify me with a deed
For which so many tears I shed !—
I know at length Polonia died.

Paul. Our host, with whom we here abide,
Told me, as how they found her dead,
And——

Lud. Cease, I do not wish that thou
The manner of her death should state—
Enough for me to mourn her fate.

Paul. He also said, the people now
Are all good Christians here ; they know
The sinful state from which they fled,
Because one Patrick, who is dead——
Is Patrick dead ?

Lud. Our host says so.
Paul. Badly have I fulfilled my vow—
Lud. Proceed :

[Aside.

Paul. The faith of Christ did preach,
And, as a proof that he did teach
The truth about the soul, and how
It seeks in death some other clime,
A wondrous cave, discovered here,
And what a cave ! He shakes with fear
Who hears it named !

Lud. Another time
I heard the same miraculous tale,
Which made my hair in terror stand.
They say the dwellers in this land
See sights that make the boldest quail.

Paul. Since thou, in melancholy mood,
In mingled terror and affright,
Nor use thy tongue, nor use thy sight,
But hide as if by foes pursued :
Since this is so, Senor, 'tis clear
You have not come to hear or see
These things, how wondrous they may be.
Say then, at once, what brings us here ?—
Nor think my doubts impertinent.

Lud. I'll answer all—from out your cot
I took you—in some lonely spot
To slay you was my first intent—
But then it better did appear
To take you where my steps might wend,
As my companion and my friend—
Throwing aside the dreadful fear
That made me shun the sight of man,
In fine, that you being with me, Paul,
I might find solace after all ;
Through many, various lands we ran
Nor didst thou, as we roamed along,
Feel need of aught. But now I'll say
Why we are here—it is to slay
A man who did me grievous wrong,
It is on this account I go,
Concealing country, dress, and name,
It is at this I ever aim
Throughout the night, because my foe
Is the most powerful person here !
And that I may to you confide
Why you to-day are at my side :
Listen, the cause shall soon appear—
Three days have passed away since I
Came to this city in disguise,
And twice beneath the midnight skies,
Here have I sought my enemy,
In his own street, at his own door ;
Each time a figure passed me by,
Disguised, and so contrived that I
Had to postpone the death I swore.
He called me in the lonely street,
And when I sought to reach him near,
To me he seemed to disappear,
As if the wind were in his feet—
To-night I thought it best that you
Should come along with me, that so

The figure we might surely know—
Caught as it were between us two.
Who are the two?

Why, you and I.

I am not one.

Not one?

Oh! no,

Senor, whenever you will go
On such exploits as now you try,
I am not one, nor half a one—
With my Lord Shadow's fearful stories,
Or with my Lady Purgatory's,
I am determined to have done:
In all my life, by day or night,
The other world's strange affairs
Were never known among my cares;
Methinks in this I acted right—
But place me 'gainst a thousand men,
And if I quickly do not run
From the whole thousand—nay, from one,
Call me the maddest mortal then.
For who would rather choose to die,
Who for a little race at most—
A thing of such a trifling cost—
Could his own life and safety buy?
My life I value very high—
Here leave me till you've done, and then,
Senor, come back for me again.

Lud. This is the house: Phillip must die
To-night beneath my vengeful hand—
We soon shall see if Heaven defends
His life, or only but pretends—
Here in this place you best can stand.

[Enter a figure disguised in a cloak.]

Paul. That I doubt, but some one cometh.
Lud. Fortune doth this night befriend me,
Since it gives me the occasion
Now to take a double vengeance:
Nothing shall disturb my fury,
Nothing shall prevent my slaying,
First, this strange, mysterious figure,
Phillip's death shall follow after.
'Tis the person that I spoke of,
By his gait and dress I know him:
But what terror makes me tremble
To behold him?

Fig. Ludovico!

Lud. Cavalier, two nights already
Have I met you here: inform me,
If you call me, why thus fly me?
If you seek me, why depart thus?
Follow me, you then shall know me!
Fig. Pardon me, I have some business
Lud. In this street that makes it needful
Here to be without a witness;
And in killing you I'll fancy
That I kill another person:
Draw or not your sword, this moment
I shall take a double vengeance:

[Draws his sword and strikes at the figure, but only cuts the air.]

Heavens! 'tis but the air I strike at!
Intercept him, Paul, beside thee.

Paul. I don't practise intercepting:
Lud. Through the city I shall track thee,
Up and down, till I discover
Who and what you are. Ah! vainly
Does my sword flash out its lightnings
To destroy him—they are powerless,
Either to offend or touch him.

[Aside.]

[They go out, Enio striking at the figure without touching it.]

Enter PHILLIP.

Paul. God be with them! One has vanished
Lud. From the street, and now another
Comes to me I am bewildered—
Like St. Antony, I'm tempted,
Both by figures and by phantoms:
I must hide me in this doorway,
Till the other passes by me.
Phil. Love—aspiring, wild, and daring—
With the favours of a kingdom—
Makes me now a happy lover,
For Polonia, in the desert

[Aside.]

Living among trees and brambles,
Citizen of lonely mountains—
Islander of lake-bound islets,
Has removed unto her sister,
Lesbia, the throne and kingdom.
I, through interest, not affection,
Pay unceasing court to Lesbia,
Worshipping her rank and station:
Now I come from sweetest converse
With her at her grated window:
But what's this?—each night a stranger
Here I meet upon my threshold!
Paul. Ah! this way it is approaching—
Why to me comes every phantom?
Phil. Cavalier!

I do not answer

To that name: he is addressing
Some one else.

Phil. This is my dwelling,
Paul. Well, thank God! I'm not your tenant:

For a thousand years enjoy it,
Without courtiers for your lodgers.

Phil. If you here are forced to tarry,
It concerns me not. Allow me
Room to pass you in the entrance.

Paul. What a civil-spoken phantom!
Ah! these ghosts are arrant cowards!
Whether here, Sir, I have business,
Or have not, it makes no matter;
Here to enter you are welcome—
I would be the last to hinder
Any gentleman from going
Home to bed.

[Aside]

Phil. You much oblige me!
Truly very valiant shadows
Haunt this street, 'tis somewhat curious
That for several nights a stranger
Here I've met, who, when I seek him,
Fades among these darksome doorways:
But this matter nought concerns me.

[Aside.]

[Exit.]

[PAUL draws his sword and affects to follow PHILLIP.]

Paul. Now he's gone, I may be valiant.
Good Mr. Shadow stop, I pray thee,
Or, if not Mr.—Miss, or Madam:
Ah! I cannot overtake him—
Heavens! 'tis but the air I strike at!—
Well if this the cavalier is Whom we have so long expected,
He is a most lucky fellow
To have got to bed so safely:
But another sound approaches—
Sword-strokes mix'd with angry voices;
Here they come—but thus I leave them.

[Exit.]

Enter the disguised figure and LUDOVICO.

Lud. Cavalier! we have departed
From the street: if there was in it
Aught to interrupt our combat:
Here, at length, we two are standing
Face to face, to end the quarrel—
Since my sword cannot offend you
I must learn, upon you rushing,
Who and what you are? Acknowledge
Are you phantom, man, or demon?
Are you silent? then 'tis needful
That your dark disguise I open,
And discover—

[He tears open the cloak and discovers a skeleton underneath.]

Heaven defend me!

What is this? Oh! Lord Almighty!
What a spectacle of terror!—
Horrid vision! Grisly phantom!
Stiff and fleshless corse, who are you—
Ashes feigning life and motion.
Fig. Mortal, do you not then know me?
Here you see your truest picture—
I am Ludovico Enio!

[Disappears.]

Lud. Aid me Heaven! what dismal tidings!
Aid me Heaven! what fearful vision!
Shadows, sorrows crowd around me,
And my wretched life is over! [He falls on the ground.]

Enter PAUL.

Paul. 'Tis my master's voice that calleth—

See, my lord, that succour cometh
Now in me :

Lud. Oh! horrid monster!
Why return again? Thy accents
Overwhelm my soul!

Paul. He's frantic—
I am not a horrid monster,
But poor Juan Paul—that ninny—
Who too faithfully attends thee,
Without knowing why or wherefore.

Lud. Paul, excuse me, that my terror
Made me first not recognize thee,
That indeed is little wonder
When my very self I know not.
Did you see, as here you enter'd,
A dread shape—a grisly spectre?—
One by fleshless bones supported—
One with fingers cold and rigid—
One with eyeless sockets staring—
Where is he?

Paul. Indeed, I know not:

Had I seen him, on the instant,
I, more dead than he, had fallen.

Lud. And so would every human being:
Thus I fell, with stifled accents,
All my senses scared or frozen—
All my limbs with cold lead fetter'd—
While, above me, seemed descending
Of two poles, the wondrous structure,
By my strength alone supported;
And from everything around me
There did start some hidden terror:
Mighty rocks from gentle flowers—
Giants from the midst of roses,
For the earth, from out its centre,
Flung its grisly host of shadows,
And I saw myself among them!
From that sight, in pity, hide me,
Gracious Heaven! O Earth conceal me
In your darkest, central caverns,
That I ne'er again may see me!
Or, if that sad sight be needful,
Let me see myself the monster
That I was—the daring rebel,
Proud, insane, and disobedient,
Who God's law so violated—
He, for whom, if God would punish Crimes as they deserve, the torments
Even of Hell were insufficient—
Which he must endure for ever,
While God reigns or Hell existeth—
But this truth I treasure also,
That these crimes have been committed
'Gainst a God so full of mercy,
That I yet can gain their pardon,
If, with bitter tears, I weep them:
Such repentance now doth seize me,
And that I, even from this moment,
May become a new-born creature:
In His saving hands I place me:
Not according to thy justice,
Judge me, O Eternal Father!
But according to thy mercy,
For thy attributes are blended
Both of mercy and of justice:
Deign to let me know some method
Of repentance, which may truly
Be somewhat a satisfaction
For my life—

[Music within.]

Music. The Purgatory!
Lud. Heavens! what sonorous accents
Breathe around! A revelation
Do they seem, for Heaven assisteth
The repentant, humbled sinner
In its own mysterious manner:
And since comes the inspiration
From on high, I wish to enter Into Patrick's Purgatory:
Humbly and devoutly keeping
Thus the promise that I gave him,
If indeed it be my fortune
There to meet with holy Patrick:
If the trial have its dangers,

Since all human strength is powerless
Either to resist its terrors,
Or to bear the awful torments
Which the vengeful demons fashion;
Still I should remember likewise
That my crimes were just as dreadful,
And that in the same proportion
I must suffer—as physicians,
Curing desperate diseases,
Act on desperate prescriptions—
Paul, come with me, you shall see me
At the Bishop's feet laid prostrate
With repentance and with terror;
All my dreadful sins confessing.

Paul. No, Sir—you must take this journey
By yourself—a man so valiant
Surely needeth no companion—
And it seems an innovation
That a gentleman should visit
Hell attended by his valet:
To my village I shall saunter,
Where I'll live without vexation,
If I needs must have hobgoblins
Lucy will be quite sufficient.

Lud. As my many crimes were public
So shall be my deep repentance—
Like a man possess'd I'll wander
Through the world, my sins proclaiming:
Men, wild beasts, deserted mountains,
Starry globes, dim wildernesses,
Tender plants, dry, sapless elm-trees
I am Ludovico Enio!
At my name with horror tremble!
I, who lately was the proudest,
Now confess myself the humblest;
I have faith and firm reliance
That you yet shall see me happy,
If in God's name, blessed Patrick,
Aid me in the Purgatory.

[Exit.]

[Exit.]

SCENE. A wild, mountain district, a lake in the distance.

POLONIA appears upon a mountain; she descends slowly to the stage.

Polon. To thee, O Lord! my spirit climbs,
To Thee from every lonely hill
I burn to sacrifice my will
A thousand and a thousand times.
And such my boundless love to Thee,
I wish each will of mine a living soul could be—
Would that my love I could have shown
By bearing for thy sake, instead
Of that poor crown that press'd my head,
Some proud, imperial, golden crown—
Some empire which the sun surveys
Through all its daily course and gilds with constant rays.
This humble home, 'neath rocks uphurl'd,
In which I dwell, though poor and small,
Compared to this great mountain wall,
Is the eighth wonder of the world—
The smallest cave that in it lies
Exceeds the halls of kings in majesty and size.
Far better, on some natural lawn,
To see the morn its gems bestrew,
Or watch it weeping pearls of dew
Within the white arms of the dawn;
Or view, before the sun, the stars
Drive o'er the brighten'd plain their swiftly fading cars.
Far better to behold, when free,
Through Heaven, the shades of evening play—
The shining chariot of the day
Go down amid the western sea—
Better in darkness and in light,
My voice should speak thy praise, O Lord! by day and
Than to endure the inner strife—
The specious glare, but real weight
Of pomp, and power, and pride, and state,
And all the vanities of life:
How would we shudder could we deem
That life itself, in truth, is but a fleeting dream!

Enter LUDOVICO.

Lud. True to my purpose, on I go,

[Aside.]

With footsteps strong, and bosom brave,
 Looking for that mysterious cave
 Where the pitying Heavens will show
 How my salvation I may gain
 By bearing in this life the Purgatorial pain :
 Divinest woman ! if you be [To Polonia.
 A dweller in this lonely ground,
 Or in the neighbouring hills around,
 The shortest way, point out to me,
 That leads unto the wondrous cave,
 Where penitential man his living soul may save.

Polon. Fortunate traveller, to whom
 This boon was granted at thy birth,
 To seek that treasure which the earth
 Conceals within its richest womb—
 Well can I guide thee on thy way,
 For this, and this alone, amid these wilds I stay.
 This mountain, do you see ?

Lud. I see [Aside.
 My death in it.

Polon. Oh ! wo and fear ! [Aside.
 My soul ! what man is this that's here ?
 I cannot think that it is she !

Lud. Can it be he whom now I scan ?
 Polon. It is that hapless maid !
 Polon. It is that wretched man !

Lud. It may be only an illusion,
 Sent to dazzle and mislead,
 My intent to change—Proceed : [To Polonia.
 Can it be for my confusion [Aside.
 That man's dread enemy doth send
 This spectre in my path ?

Lud. You do not speak.
 Polon. Attend :
 This monstrous hill, with rocks bestrown,
 Full well the dreaded secret knows,
 But no one to its centre goes
 By walking o'er the land alone.
 He who would see this wondrous cave
 Must in a bark put forth and tempt the lake's dark wave :
 Revenge doth seek to burst its chain, [Aside.
 But pity doth its rage subdue.

Lud. My days their darksome hours renew, [Aside.
 Since I behold her once again.

Polon. What feelings in my bosom blend ! [Aside.
 Lud. I feel as I were dead !—You do not speak,
 Polon. Attend !
 This darksome lake doth all surround
 Yon hill that cleaves the Heavens' deep blue—
 Across whose level wave, by you,
 An easy pathway may be found ;
 And in the middle of the isle
 A convent's sacred walls beneath the sunlight smile,
 Some holy monks inhabit there,
 And for this task alone they live,
 With pious zeal to freely give
 The helping hand, the word of prayer—
 Confession, and the Sacred Mass,
 And ev'ry pious aid to all who thither pass,
 Telling them what they first must do
 Before they dare presume to go,
 Alive, within the realm of wo—
 Let not this enemy subdue [Aside.
 My soul, O Lord !

Lud. My hopes are fair, [Aside.
 Let me not feel, O Lord ! the anguish of despair !
 Seeing before my startled sight
 My greatest, deepest crime arise :
 Let not the fiend, my soul, that tries,
 Subdue me in the dreadful fight.

Polon. What greater foe could vengeance lend [Aside.
 Than he who standeth here ?

Lud. You do not speak :
 Polon. Attend :
 Lud. With quicker words your story tell,
 For well I know my soul doth need
 That I should go with swifter speed !

Polon. And me it doth import as well
 That you should go away.

Lud. Agreed !
 Now, woman, point the way to where my path doth lead.

Polon. No one accompanied can pass
 Across the bosom of this lake.
 But each a little bark must take

And try alone, the rippling glass,
 Being in that most trying strait,
 The lord of his own deeds—the master of his fate.

Come, where within a secret cave,
 Beside the shore the boat doth lie,
 And trusting in the Lord on high,
 Embark upon the crystal wave,
 Of this remote and lonely sea,

Lud. My life and all I have, O bark ! I trust to thee,
 And thus confide me to thy care :
 But, O my soul ! I shake with fear,
 For it a coffin doth appear,

In which, presumptuously I dare
 To try this dark and icy tide ! [He enters within.
 Polon. Do not return, proceed, and in the Lord confide !

Lud. Victory ! victory is mine, [Within.
 Polonia, for before thy sight
 My spirit has not quailed.

Polon. To flight
 Have I too made my wrath resign
 Here in this Babylonian realm.

Lud. The seeming shape you wear doth not my soul o'erwhelm,
 Although you take a well-known form
 To turn me from my path astray,
 And make me falter on my way.

Polon. Badly thy fear doth thee inform,
 Poor trembler !—only rich in fear ;
 For I, Polonia's self, alone am standing here :

The same your murderous dagger slew,
 Who by the Heavens' mysterious grace
 Live in this wild and desert place,
 And feel more peace than e'er I knew.

Lud. Since I confess, with sorrowing heart,
 The many sinful scenes in which I've play'd my part,
 Do thou pronounce my pardon too.

Polon. You have my pardon and my prayers.
 Lud. Nought from my breast my firm faith scares.
 Polon. Even confide in it.

Lud. Adieu !

Polon. Adieu !

Lud. May God his wrath restrain !
 Polon. And may he bring you back victorious once again ! [Exit.

SCENE—The Island.

Enter two Canons Regular.

1st Can. There's not the faintest zephyr blowing,
 And yet the lake's calm waves are rippled,
 Doubtless, o'er its bosom, pilgrims
 To the island are approaching.

2nd Can. Let us, to the shore descending,
 Learn who are the daring mortals
 Who are bold enough to visit
 Our obscure and distant dwelling.

Enter LUDOVICO.

Lud. To the waves I have confided
 My strange bark or rather coffin :
 Who, through fire and snow, e'er ventured
 In his sepulchre before me ?
 What a pleasant prospect opens !
 Here methinks the Spring has summon'd
 To her gay and varied Cortes
 The noble and plebeian flower :
 There a dismal mountain riseth,
 And the two so greatly differ,
 That their very opposition
 Binds them in a closer friendship :
 There are mournful night-birds wailing,
 With their screams awak'ning terror ;
 Here are joyful song-birds warbling
 Notes that fill the heart with gladness :
 There the angry torrent rusheth
 Headlong down the frowning mountain ;
 Here the gentle streamlet glideth,
 Giving mirrors to the sunshine :
 Half-way 'twixt these different regions,
 One so fair and one so ugly,
 Riseth up a stately building,
 Which awakes my love and terror !

1st Can. Happy traveller, who hither
 Has to-day thy courage brought thee
 To my arms approach.

Lud. 'Twere better
That before thy feet I throw me,
But conduct me now in pity
To the grave and reverend Prior
Who this sacred convent governs.

1st Can. I am he, although unworthy,
Speak, proceed, what interrupts thee?

Lud. Father, if my name I mention,
Much I fear that you will fly me,
Fright'ned at the sound; for truly
All my actions are so wicked
That the shining air around us,
Not to see them, would be cover'd
With a cloudy veil of mourning.
I am an abyss of horror,
And a stormy sea of fury;
I a map am of transgression,
And the world's most awful sinner—
In a word, lest breath should fail me,
I am Ludovico Enio:
I have come the cave to enter,
Where, if any satisfaction
Can be made for crimes so deadly,
My repentance there shall make it.
I have been absolved—confessing
To the Bishop of Hibernia
All my sins; who being acquainted
With my wish and my intention
Here to come, with love and council
Strengthen'd my weak resolution,
And for thee these letters gave me.

1st Can. Ludovico, do not venture
On so great an undertaking
In one day, it is a subject
That requires deliberation—
Stay with us our guest a short time,
And reflect more calmly on it.

Lud. Oh! my father, I shall never Rise from where I now am kneeling
Till you grant me this great favour—
It was God's own inspiration,
That did drive me longing hither,
And not vanity, ambition,
Nor desire to know the secrets
Hidden here: do not, I pray thee
Interrupt my good intention,
For it is a true vocation;
Oh! my father, yield in pity,
Grant this favour to my suff'ring,
Grant my grief this consolation,
Grant this soothing to my sorrow.

1st Can. Little think'st thou, Ludovico,
What is the great boon thou'rt asking,
For it is through Hell's dread torment
That you seek to pass: your valour
Will not bear you through the ordeal!
Many are there, Ludovico,
Enter here, but few come backward.

Lud. Fear doth not at all affright me,
For once more I do protest me,
That my only wish or object
Is to purge my crimes—whose number
Far exceeds the sands of ocean,
Or the atoms of the sunbeam:
I have hope and firm reliance
In the Lord, whose name shall conquer
All the powers of Hell.

1st Can. The fervour
Of the words you speak compel me
Now the awful doors to open:
This the cave is, Ludovico!
[Opens the mouth of the Cave.]

Lud. Heaven preserve me?

1st Can. Art thou frightened?

Lud. No; and yet it makes me tremble.

1st Can. Once again, I now implore you
For no other cause to enter
Here, except to ask for pardon
For your sins.

Lud. I now am standing,
Father, in the cave's dark entrance;
Listen to my protestation—
Men and beasts, and skies and mountains,
Day and night, and ye bright planets,

[Gives them.

Sun and moon—all, all things listen
To my thousand protestations:
'Tis alone to suffer torments
For the sins that I've committed
That I enter here; my penance
Can be little satisfaction
For my crimes; but something tells me
I shall find my soul's salvation.

1st Can. Enter then; and ever with thee
In thy mouth and in thy bosom
Bear the sacred name of Jesus!

Lud. Lord! Oh Lord! be ever with me,
In thy faith, as in strong armour,
In the open field I struggle
With my enemy, victorious
From the fight may Thy name draw me!
Many times the sacred symbol
Of my faith upon my forehead
Shall I make. Oh Heaven preserve me!

[Here he enters the Cave, the entrance of which closes after him.]

1st Can. In all the persons who have entered
Here, I never saw such valour:
Grant him, gracious Lord, thy favour,
That he may resist the demons
And their strong temptation, trusting
To thy name and presence only.

[Exeunt.

SCENE—The Island.

Enter LESBIA, PHILLIP, LAOGHAIRE, the CAPTAIN, and POLONIA.

Lesb. While along the road we stray,
Following where you guide us, let us say,
Why we have come hither now:
It was to see you, and to you avow
All the plans that we have made.

Polon. Say on, to speak your thought be not afraid;
While my footsteps you pursue,
Because a sight I bring you now to view
Such as mortal eyes ne'er saw.

Lesb. Thus from before my thoughts the veil I draw—
You, Polonia, hither came
To feed, among these wilds, religion's flame,
Leaving me the splendid care
Of a crown: 'tis right I share
With you the secrets of my heart,
And so the whole I will to thee impart:
My will being sacrificed demands
Not advice, my sister, but commands:
Woman needs a stronger head
Than is her own, for council—she must wed.
Yes: and much I shall rejoice
If for a bridegroom Phillip is your choice,
For a double joy 'twill be
To give a husband and a crown to thee—
That my love may be the source
Whence all your blessings flow.

Lesb. For many a course
Of the sun—which lives and dies
Daily and nightly 'mid the changing skies—
That glorious Phoenix which doth give
New life in its refulgence—may'st thou live!

Polon. Now that you have said so much
On what concerns your marriage, let us touch
On the matter that doth send
You hither after me, and so attend:
In a penitential glow,
A man came hither whom we all do know,
Seeking out for Patrick's cave,
To enter there, and so his soul to save:
He did enter, and to-day
Again comes forth: to show you that dismay
Than wonder cannot greater be,
Here I have brought you all this miracle to see:
What his name I have not said
Lest you, perchance, disturbed by inward dread,
Should not see the end I sought,
And so along with me I have ye brought.

Lesb. Oh! my sister, it is right
That I should mingle terror with delight!

Phil. All of us who hither go,
Desire the truth of all these things to know.

Polon. If, through want of courage, he
Is doomed for ever in the cave to be,

We, at least, shall know his fate;
But if he comes forth from the cave elate
Then from him, at length, we'll hear
What these strange things may be: I only fear
That, through awe, he may not speak,
And, flying from us, he, perchance, may seek
Some wild solitude alone.

Lesb. In wondrous ways the power of God is shown!
Capt. At the proper time we're here,
For see, the monks in lengthened file appear:
Shedding tears!—with footsteps slow—
On to the cave in silent thought they go,
That they may the entrance ope.

Enter, in the habit of Canons, as many Religious as possible, they reach the cave, from which LUDOVICO issues like one amazed.

1st Can. O Lord of Heaven! in whom is all our hope
Some day to behold thy realm,
Let not this dungeon cave this soul overwhelm:
Let him back his footsteps trace
From out the pit that knows not of thy face!
See!

Polon. What joy to us is given!
1st Can. It is Ludovico!
Phil. Aid me, Heaven!

Lud. Is it possible that I,
After so many years, behold the sky?
And enjoy its golden light?
Capt. How confused!

Laogh. How blinded with affright!
1st Can. Embrace me, thou hast acted well!
Lud. My arms were chains, my bosom were a cell:
Since, Polonia, thou art here,
I, to obtain my pardon, do not fear:
Phillip, ever bless the Lord!
For twice an angel saved thee from my sword,
As I watched for thee by night—
Pardon I ask of all: and now in flight
I shall seek some desert place,
Where, unseen by any human face,
I, in pain, some hope may glean:
He who could see the things that I have seen
Would to live in suffering seek.

1st Can. In the name of God, I bid thee speak,
Lud. Enio, of the things you've seen.
To so sacred a command I lean
Submissive, and that earth may be Started from its fearful apathy;
And that man may now begin
To rise from out the darksome death of sin,
Waken'd by the words I send,
To the grave story of this cave attend:
After solemn preparation,
Which so great a venture needed,
And of all a tender farewell
Having taken, I departed,
Firm in faith and strong in valour,
This most wondrous cave to enter,
Placing in my God reliance,
And a thousand times repeating
Those mysterious words that even
Hell itself doth hear with trembling,
Slowly entering by the threshold,
There a little while I waited
For the closing of the portal:
When it closed at length I found me
In such thick and pitchy darkness—
In a night so black and mournful—
That I closed my eyes, and, blinded
In this way, proceeded onward
Till I reached, with hands outstretch'd,
A vast wall that rose before me:
Following the dark wall's windings
For about some twenty paces,
I approached some rocks, where gleaming
Through a chink, a light so dubious
Enter'd that 'twas scarcely light,
As when we beheld the coming
Of the dawn amid the orient,
We are doubtful if the twilight
Be the light of morn or not;
Still along the left hand keeping
Soon I entered on a pathway,

Where the earth began to tremble
Underneath my frightened footsteps.
As if it would sink in ruin
Almost lifeless, there I tarried,
Till a dreadful clap of thunder,
With its horrid clangour, woke me
From my trance and my oblivion;
And the earth, where I was standing,
Opening in its centre, hurled me
Headlong down the dark abyss,
Where the stones and earth that followed
Made a sepulchre around me:
In a spacious hall of jasper
Then I found me, where the chisel
Round about had left its traces
In the wondrous architecture.
From a door of bronze there issued
Twelve grave men, in snow-white garments,
Who, respectfully approaching,
Gave me courteous salutation;
One of them, who seemed superior
To the others, said: remember
That you place your faith in God;
Be not frightened at beholding
Demon bands your course opposing,
For if you should be so wretched
As to wish to turn back, wrought on
By their promises or threat'nings—
You in Hell must ever tarry,
Suff'ring everlasting torments:
These twelve men were bless'd angels,
Who thus raised my drooping spirits,
And renewed my sinking courage.
Soon the spacious hall was peopled
With a host of demon shadows—
Hellish visions—rebel spirits—
Bearing shapes so dark and hideous
That the earth has not a monster
That these demons doth resemble,
And one said: O foolish mortal,
Madman, idiot, thou who seekest
Ere thy time the pain that waits thee,
And the wo that thou dost merit.
If thy crimes are great, 'tis proper
That thy own heart doth condemn thee,
For thou need'st not hope for mercy
In the eye of God for ever:
For what reason comest thou hither?
Back again to earth returning
Let your whole life there be finished,
Dying as you have been living:
Then indeed you may come see us,
And ascend the seat predestined
For thee in this darksome region
Which must be thy place for ever:
Giving to these words no answer,
Then with blows they fell upon me,
Bound my hands and feet together,
Pierced me with sharp hooks of metal,
And along the chambers drew me,
Till they reached a raging bonfire.
In the midst of which they threw me;
All I said was: Saviour! aid me!
When the hideous demons vanished,
And the flames were all extinguish'd!
After this I was conducted
To a field, whose blackened surface
Only bore wild thorns and brambles
In the place of pinks and roses:
Here the cold wind penetrated
With its subtle breath each member
Deeper than the sharpest weapon:
Here, in darksome caverns under,
Were the souls of many guarded,
And such mournful wailings issued—
Such dread cries—such imprecations
Heaped on parents and relations—
Such forlorn, despairing voices—
Such wild blasphemies and curses,
O'er and o'er again repeated—
That the very demons trembled:
Passing onward, then I found me
In a meadow which was cover'd
O'er with flames instead of grasses,

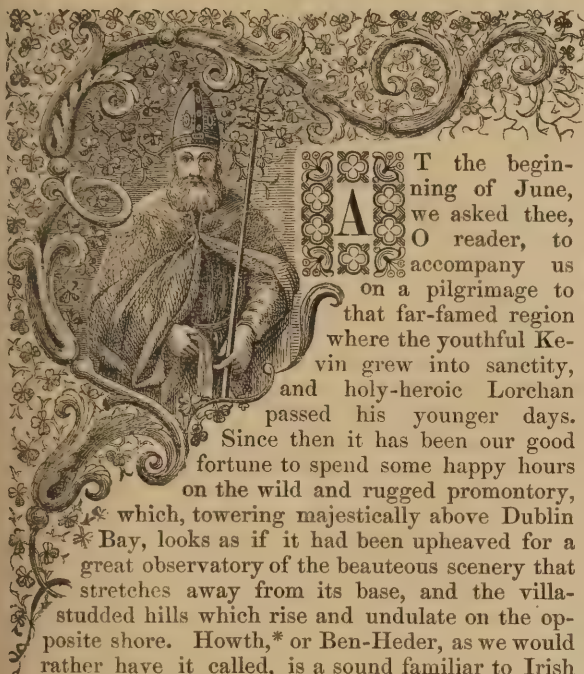

Which before the wind were swaying,
 Just, as in the burning August,
 Bend the ripe ears of the harvest ;
 So vast the burning plain extended
 That no eye could reach its limits :
 In the midst of it were lying,
 In the flames unnumber'd people,
 Through whose hands and feet were driven
 Stakes and pins of burning iron,
 Nailing them unto the earth ;
 On their entrails, fiery serpents
 Gnawed for ever, and the wretches,
 In their agonizing torments,
 Bit the ground, and then expiring,
 Woke again to life and suffering ;
 Then the vengeful demons threw me
 In the flames, which quickly vanished
 At the sacred name I called on.
 Then, I came where they were healing
 These same wounds with potent caustic,
 Pouring o'er the hideous ulcers
 Melted lead and burning rosin ;—
 Who at this will not afflict him ?
 Who at this will not uplift him ?
 Who at this will feel no sorrow ?
 Who will not despair and tremble ?
 Then I saw, from out a mansion,
 Issuing from its walls and doorway,
 Flames arise, as when fire seizes
 On an earthly house, it bursts forth
 By whatever vent it findeth,
 This, they told me, was the Villa
 Of Enjoyment—recreation's
 Bath—where women who indulged in Unguents, odours, rouge, and washes
 In the other life, were punished ;
 There I entered, and saw in it,
 Bathing in a snow-filled basin,
 Many fair and lovely women,
 In the water were they standing,
 Circled round by snakes and serpents—
 Which, of these cold, icy billows,
 Were the sirens and the dolphins—
 There their limbs were stiff and frozen,
 In the clear, transparent crystal,
 And their hair on end was standing,
 And their teeth together striking ;—
 Then they led me to a mountain
 Which upraised its lofty forehead
 Through the Heaven's blue veil of crystal
 On its summit, a volcano
 Blazed afar, from out whose crater
 Flames burst forth, and burning lava
 In whose slow and blazing current
 I saw many souls descending,
 When they reached the base, returning
 Once again they climbed the mountain,
 Thus for many times repeating
 Their descending and ascending ;
 Then a burning vapour blowing,
 Made me quickly seek an exit
 From this wild volcanic region :
 Forth I issued, and experienced
 A new wind upon the outside,
 On whose wing came many legions.
 Then, with blows and many insults,
 I approached another quarter.
 There it seemed that many spirits,
 I had known elsewhere, were gathered
 Into one vast congregation,
 Where, although 'twas plain they suffered,
 Still they looked with joyous faces,
 Wore a peaceable appearance,
 Uttered no impatient accents,
 But with moisten'd eyes uplifted
 Towards the heavens, appeared imploring
 Pity, and their sins lamenting.
 This, in truth, was Purgatory,
 Where the sins that are more venial
 Are purged out ; the angry demons,
 Seeing that I did not tremble,
 Rather that I waxed in courage,
 Tried upon me greater horrors ;
 To a river did they lead me,

Flowers of fire were on its margin,
 Liquid sulphur was its current,
 Many-headed hydras—serpents—
 Monsters of the deep were in it,
 It was very broad, and o'er it
 Lay a bridge, so slight and narrow
 That it seemed a thin line only,
 It appeared so weak and fragile
 That the slightest weight would sink it :
 Here thy pathway lies, they told me,
 O'er this bridge so weak and narrow.
 And, for thy still greater horror,
 Look at those who've pass'd before thee :
 I look'd and then beheld the wretches,
 Who the passage were attempting,
 Fall amid the sulphur current,
 Where the snakes with teeth and talons
 Tore them in a thousand pieces ;
 Notwithstanding all these horrors,
 I, the name of God invoking,
 Undertook the dreadful passage,
 And undaunted by the billows,
 Or the winds that blew around me,
 Reached the other side in safety ;
 Here within a wood I found me,
 So delightful and so fertile,
 That the past was all forgotten ;
 On my path rose stately cedars,
 Laurels—all the trees of Eden,
 While the ground, with rose-leaves scattered,
 Spread its white and verdant carpet ;
 Tender birds in all the branches
 Told their amorous complainings
 To the many murmuring streamlets,
 To the thousand crystal fountains.
 Then I saw a stately city,
 Which amid the heaven's uplifted
 Many pinnacles and turrets,
 Precious gold composed its portals
 All with flashing diamonds garnish'd
 Topaz, emerald, and ruby,
 Intermix'd their varied lustre ;
 E'er I reached the gates, they open'd
 And the Saints in long procession
 Came to meet me, men and women,
 Young and old, and youths and maidens,
 All approached serene and happy ;
 Choirs of Seraphim and angels,
 Breathing Heaven's delicious music,
 Sweetly sung divinest anthems.
 After these at length approached me,
 The resplendant—the most glorious—
 The great Patrick—the Apostle.
 Much that dazzling sight rejoiced me,
 For by it I was enabled
 To fulfil my early promise,
 In my lifetime to behold him.
 He and all the rest embraced me,
 Pleased at my extreme good fortune,
 Bidding me farewell, he told me
 That no living man could enter
 That most glorious, happy city ;
 But that I, to earth returning,
 Should await God's time and pleasure.
 Back the proper way I wandered
 Unobstructed by the demons,
 And at length approached the entrance,
 When you came to seek and see me.
 Since I have escaped this danger,
 Holy fathers, all I covet
 Is to live and die among ye.*

THE END.

* In the original there are sixteen additional lines which I have not translated, as they consist merely of a confused list of writers who have mentioned the Purgatory, from the time of Henry of Saltery to that of Archbishop Usher, all of whom are quoted by the hero himself. The same list, with a few additional names, is to be found in Bouillon's Vie de S. Patrice, pp. 82, 83, 84. The entire account which Enio gives of the interior of the Purgatory, is also to be found in the same little book, somewhat more in detail, indeed, but in many places with a closeness of resemblance which includes even the poetical embellishment. Bouillon, as I have mentioned in the introduction, was only the translator of the original Spanish "Life of St. Patrick," written by Montalvan (the disciple and imitator of Lope de Vega), and this again, so far as the Purgatory was concerned, was taken from the early Latin legends of Henry of Saltery and others.

HOWTH.

Since then it has been our good fortune to spend some happy hours on the wild and rugged promontory, which, towering majestically above Dublin Bay, looks as if it had been upheaved for a great observatory of the beauteous scenery that stretches away from its base, and the villa-studded hills which rise and undulate on the opposite shore. Howth,* or Ben-Heder, as we would rather have it called, is a sound familiar to Irish ears—there is not an Irishman, in or out of Ireland, who has not heard of it—those who have never seen it, form something like a dreamy notion of it—emigrants and exiles salute it from the gunwale of the ships that bear them away to American free-ground, or the penal settlements of England; the wanderer who pines for the old land, and longs to lay his bones where his fathers' graves have been, thinks of it by the Tiber and the Mississippi, and prays God for the advent of that day when the mariner, hailing from the mast-head, descries its storm-beaten cliffs looming on his vision. Howth! who has not heard of thee? what speech-maker, for the last thirty years, has not emphasised his facts and periods with thy name? what word-painter has not made thee the foreground and background in his imaginative picture? Was the land oppressed by misrule?—indignation and resolve should rise in every breast, from Howth to Cape Clear! in the struggle against the alienation of just rights. Were justice to triumph—How would not the land ring out, till every mountain “had found a tongue,” and old Ben-Heder joined in chorus with the Golden Spears?† But, ah, well-a-day, promises are not always to be realized, and we have nothing to do with the politics of the hour.

Come with us now, poor son of toil, thy sweated brow and blistered hands too well betoken the hardships of the week. Taking it for granted that thou hast knelt early on the Sabbath morning before the altar, we would invite thee forth from the reeking atmosphere of the fetid city—the panorama of vice, hypocrisy, and stunning turmoil—to breathe the pure air of heaven, to sit thee down on some jutting rock above the waters, making music on the strand, thence to behold the glories unfolding themselves to thy view, that so thou mayest return home more grateful to God, more buoyant in spirit, and, if our poor pains be worth remembering, somewhat thankful to us for whatever information we have provided thee. Nor is our invitation intended for thee alone, poor child of labour; we would fain ask to accompany us the pale and brain-sick student, who, giving his nights to study, has risen from books to learn that the sleepless vigil has enriched his soul and left the body poor. Oh! thrice happy is he who, duly appreciating the beneficence of the Deity, hies him forth to seek invigorating freshness far from the beaten thoroughfares of life, by the lonely shore, and in the sunny glen.

What perfect masters of the human heart were they, “those monks of old,” who built their abodes in these secluded sites, where the storms on the hill-side, or the hoarse rustling of the waves, were the only sounds which recalled the noise and distracting tumult they had left! And thou, too, oh man of care and sorrow, would fain find some such cloister, even for a few fleeting hours, wherein thou couldst find repose and comfort for thy spirit; thy shattered frame, too, needs to be tended by great nature, our best infirmarian. Give us then thy companionship, and as we muse and walk along the pebbly beach, while the sea breeze and the spray come with cooling balm athwart thy brow, and the ever-restless blue-green wave flings out its odour, acknowledge that here thou dost experience sensations purer and more health-giving than may be found amid sickly ephemeral exotics, be they never so rare. God is great in all his works—diffusive of blessings in all that he has created—blessed and benignant in the uprooting wind and in every zephyr that hardly bends the tenderest flower-stem—the humming of the bee, and fling of the lark uprising from its dewy nest, proclaim his praise, and fill man's soul with gladness. The lily is richer in its dyes than Solomon in the apparel of his glory; and yonder field, gemmed with the daisy and primrose, and here and there the yellow flowers of the furze, is a more beauteous object than aught which the painter or mosaicist can produce. Amid such objects as these, the teeming seed-plain and the fragrant garden where abundance groweth, and the varied tints of heaven are reflected, we become more and more impressed with a sense of the Creator's love; but when we would form even a shadowy notion of his might and majesty, we must betake ourselves to the mountain and look down from some height upon “the glorious mirror where he glasses himself;” for there is ever heaving the great element which submerged the world of yore, and there he walks forth on wings of the storm, scattering and overwhelming in the yeast of waves these mighty armaments, which, appearing to man invincible, stagger and go down before the bolt that flashes from the bosom of a cloud.

How truly hath bard and moralist remarked, that scenes where nature has lavished the chiefest beauties but ill accord with the egotist and the voluptuary. An oppressive sense of loneliness seizes and troubles, like a devil, the soul of the sensualist,* when left to himself in presence of the great works which bear not the impress of man, and are now as untainted as at the moment when they sprung fresh from the Creator's hands; go where we will, we are sure to find some delicious spot unmarred by the intrusive utilitarianism of the age, looking like what the Italians term “a piece of heaven lapsed to earth;” but be sure that, though it were fifty times as fair, it has no charm or attraction for the irreligious and corrupt. If the mouth would speak from out the heart of such, you would not fail to learn that the crowded street afforded them more pleasure than the sea-beech or mountain slopes—the musk of the civet, a fragrance more delicious than the odours of the wild thyme—and the glancings of the wanton a more exquisite delight than the varied beauties with which God has embellished hill and valley, creating a new emotion at every devious winding, furnishing the imagination with shapes of loveliness and beauty, of which it had not dreamed, till the soul overflows with gratitude at the sight of God's blessed works, and perfection seems stamped on every object, save sinful, erring man. No canting, rhapsodic philosophy this; 'tis truth which no one will contest, whose experiences are worth mentioning; for those who would gainsay it, there are other scenes more agreeable to their tastes. Not far off there, is a spot sacred to foppery and folly; the scenery was once charming to our eyes, but the mountain has been disembowelled, its granite bones torn out, and the unhealthy skin barely covers deformity. Nevertheless, a great purpose has been effected—the waters have been imprisoned, English steam frigates and liners find safe anchorage between walls of felspar and mica; a promenade is there, too, grassless as lava, and from time to time there is martial music, a jingling of spurs, flaunting finery, and winsome attraction for the lovers of the mazourka, "Rule Britannia," with a variety of other such foreign importations, for which we have neither eyes nor ears. But we have lingered too long, though we hope not uselessly, in our moralizings, and now will lay before thee all that we have been able to collect concerning Ben-Heder, its battlemented abbey, baronial hall, and the grey ruins which sit "like a moulting bird" on Inis-Mac-Nessan.

Starting by an early train, we would advise all whom it concerns to stop at the Baldoyle station, and walk to Kilbarrock, to visit the ruins which are not a bow-shot from the road side. A more neglected or mournful scene of desolation there is not in Ireland, and the history of the old rifted sanctuary is as apocryphal as that of many who are mouldering in its graves. From Alan's Register we learn, that it was dedicated to our Lady long before the English invasion. If it be allowed us to indulge in imagination, and question why an oratory should have been erected on such a bleak spot, almost so near the shore that skaw and spray could quench the lamp burning in the sanctuary, may we not suppose that these pointed arches supported a roof, beneath which some lordly sea-chief offered thanks for success in an enterprise of moment, or rescue from shipwreck, dedicating the shrine to her whom the early sea-farer saluted "Stella Maris?" Be that as it may, early in the thirteenth century, the lands pertaining to this church passed into the hands of the Barons of Howth, who, like other of the Anglo-Norman sword-men, deemed it no sacrilege to seize the old termon possessions which the chieftains of the Irish bestowed on their ecclesiastical foundations. From that period down to the time of the dissolution, nothing worth recording is known of its history; for it would appear that it was soon dismantled, its altar and relics desecrated, its priests scared away, and chant and psalmody for ever hushed. But, reader, or companion, these old walls saw a scene of carnage of which they may not speak. In 1641, when Parsons and Borlase were Lords Justices, Sir Charles Coote, a most sanguinary monster, led a posse of halberdiers and musquetiers from Dublin, and falling upon the poor

Catholic inhabitants of the vicinity, slew them in cold blood, burnt their boats, and flung the corpses into that grave-yard, where no monument records the fact. The sequel is easily told—the Anglo Catholics of the Pale were obliged to join the Kilkenny confederacy, not for any love of the Irish, but in self-defence—hope and triumph were of short duration; dissensions, somewhat analogous to those which now distract us, ensued—the spirit of union was broken, and in the end English fraud and violence rained miseries on the land. Quousque, quousque Domine? One broken monument is still there, remarkable, as that of the first proprietor of the Freeman's Journal,* an eccentric man, noted in his time as the sham squire, and of whom, we believe, there is a notice in a pleasant little volume, by Herbert, the painter, entitled "Irish Varieties." Before taking leave of Kilbarrock, we call the attention of our friend Dr. Gray to the neglected state of the shattered tombstone.

From Kilbarrock it is but a gentle walk to Baldoyle, a neat fishing village, remarkable in Irish annals as an early settlement of the Danes. "So early as 1040, Sitric, the Danish king of Dublin, gave towards the founding of Christ Church the land, mannor, villeins, cows, and corn of Baldoyle." "A century afterwards," says the erudite historian, D'Alton,† "M'Murrough, on founding the priory of All Saints (where Trinity College now stands), assigned to Bishop Edan O'Killedy, for its use, the lands of Baldoyle, with the farmers and serfs thereon." In 1184, Dermot's grant was confirmed by King Henry, and in 1200, King John ratified to Christ's Church the endowments of King Sitric. In the year 1369, a parliament was held here by William de Windsor, then lord deputy; and long afterwards the inhabitants espoused the cause of Silken Thomas, reeking with the Primate's blood, whereon the grange of Baldoyle, with many acres of arable and pasture land, were granted to the Corporation of Dublin, in reward of their opposition to the impetuous and misguided Fitzgerald. This village has a commodious Catholic Church, without pretensions to architecture of any order, save that which its builder designed and carried out. There is also a school, connected with the National Board—and, lest it may slip our memory, we trust that when the youthful scholars shall have learned something of their country's history from better sources than the fragmentary pieces given in their reading books, they will faithfully guard whatever of that history is chronicled in stone, nor allow any sacrilegious hand to meddle with the remains which it is the duty of priest and people to protect from outrage. Alas! that we should be obliged to make the remark.

Let us now leave Baldoyle, and, if not weary of foot, continue our walk along the high-road which leads direct to the ancient residence of the lords of Howth. Of that stronghold little now remains, save a square tower on the race-ground; the present residence, however—the keep and towers of which we take to have been built early in the sixteenth century—affords to the visitor an interesting sight, half feudal, half modern. A flight of steps leads to the grand hall, which contains many objects of antiquity, and amongst others, the great sword of Sir Tristram, with which he won for his posterity, the splendid domain which has owned them its lords nearly seven centuries. Ere you descend that flight of steps, look around thee, and acknowledge that lovelier sight has never met thine eyes—ancient trees with their green foliage—luxuriant fields teeming with fruits and flowers—broken and precipitous rocks here and there clad with verdure, or rearing their bald heads half a thousand feet above the waters—crystal streams channelling their course beneath heath and fern—warbling birds occasionally startled by some errant seamew, slowly sailing through the air, as if dubious of his whereabouts, and listening for the scream of his mate, calling him back to the treeless waste near which he chipped the shell; and yonder, down in that glen, overshadowed by jagged rock-piles, the blank altar of the early Celt, stern and unchanged as when the last rite was done. Oh! friend, was not this a spot worth fighting for? But let us learn who this Sir Tristram was, and how his posterity came by so fair a heritage. Let us sit down and briefly tell the tale.

This wild promontory, crowned with lofty oaks, from which it took its name, could not fail to attract the attention of Phœnician and Milesian, when roaming the seas in quest of settlements. That they landed and established themselves here, there can be little doubt, for as early as the ninth century, we are informed that the sea kings visited and devastated it. That the Norwegians eventually became its masters is almost certain, for in 1038, Sitric, the baptised Dane, granted a considerable portion of its lands to his ecclesiastical structures. Many a legend is there still preserved of those roving pirates; how they became converts to Christianity, ransacked the bowels of these hills for ore, and how they fled thither on the day that great Brian overthrew them at Clontarf. Right joyous times were these, when vikings in their many-oared galleys pulled hard for the land, and encountered stern resistance on the beach; but it is a theme for poets, and chronicled in the Sagas.

What time King Henry of England meditated the conquest of Ireland, many a knight hearing of its fertility and beauty came to his standard. Amongst others was one Sir Armoricus Tristram, who had bravely won his spurs, and he, too, volunteered to follow the invader's fortunes. In St. Mary's Church of Rouen—that same church from whose belfry Norman William heard the chimes calling the monks to matin service, on the morning he gave up the ghost*—two knights met, and, according to usage, made solemn vow before the altar that they would be true to each other in tented field, and make fair division of all the lands their good swords won them; these two were Sir Armoricus Tristram and Sir John De Courcy.† They sailed together, anchored and landed in the immediate vicinity of this castle, and attacked their opposers at the stream of Evora, which falls into the sea opposite Ireland's Eye. Sir Armoricus won the day, but Sir John De Courcy, being seized with illness, watched the battle from his boat. Yet it was a day of sad remembrances to Sir Armoricus, for seven of his sons, uncles, and nephews found a red burial on the memorable occasion. In excavating the foundations of the church, whose belfry, seen above the trees, looks so very like a four-legged stool turned upside down, many a memorial of the day's slaughter was disinterred—bridle-bits, swords, spurs, and other warlike gear attested that fierce battle had been there; and the stream is even now called "the bloody," either from its vicinity to the scene of action, or the mineralogical properties which give it a reddish tinge. The victory conferred the Lordship of Howth on Sir Armoricus, who soon afterwards marched into Connaught to aid Sir John De Courcy, then plundering in the north and west. Cathal O'Connor being informed of their intentions, resolved to strike a vigorous blow, and met the Anglo-Normans at Knockmoy, in the county Galway. Panic-struck by the martial array of the Irish, their enemies were about to quit the field, when Sir Armoricus called his men to stand, kneeled, kissed the cross of his sword, and ran his horse through, saying, "thou shalt never serve against me that so worthily hast served with me." "The like," says Lodge, "did all the rest." But this time the fortune of war was not with them; Cathal and his Celts made brief work with the mailed march-men. Celtic valour never won prouder laurels. Sir Armoricus and his troops were cut to pieces, and the heroic Cathal, to give glory to God, erected the monastery and church of Knockmoy—in perpetuam rei memoriam.* Oh! if all had acted thus. But let us not pause over the ruin which dissensions have entailed.

Sir Nicholas, the eldest son of Sir Armoricus, who had gone to England to inform the king how ill it fared with the early "planters" on Irish soil, returned soon after his father had been slain, and was quite satisfied with his possession of Howth, deeming it unsafe to think of conquest in the west or north. Sir Armoricus, it would appear, assumed the name of St. Lawrence, in honour of the Saint on whose day he had come off victorious in a conflict with the Danes, either at Howth or in its neighbourhood, and from that period to this the votive designation has been retained by his descendants. In 1216, king John confirmed to the son of Nicholas all the possessions of his father in the land of Howth, which are thus described in the Royal Charter—"Terram de Houde in bosco et in plano, in vîs et in semitis, in pratis, et in pascuis, in moris et mariscis, in aquis et molendinis, in stagnis, et vivariis et cum omnibus consuetudinibus suis." Truly a blessed spot was this, even at that remote period, with its mills, woods, venison, and fisheries.

Right well they served the English interests in Ireland, those lords of Howth, and amply were they remunerated by its sovereigns for successive generations. Of the other invaders, the Geraldines and Butlers, it has been said with truth, they became "more Irish than the Irishrie;" but without troubling ourselves much with the annals of the family, we may fearlessly assert of the St. Lawrences, that they ever were "Ip-sis Anglis Angliores." Whenever an opportunity of supporting anti-Irish imperialism, either by enlarging the territory of the pale or doing sore damage to the native population, presented itself, then be sure you will find a St. Lawrence most over-busily engaged serving the English monarch; and at no period of their history is this fact so conspicuous as in the year 1504. For some centuries anterior to this memorable year, they do not seem to have been otherwise engaged than discharging the functions of chancellors, members of the Privy Council, and other high offices—right royal tokens of England's good-will and behest. Protected by their position, almost insular, and their security still further guaranteed by reason of their vicinity to the head quarters of the Pale, little need had they for the sword of Sir Armoricus. The occasion, however, which roused them from unchivalrous ease, must be briefly described, not so much for the sake of the story, as for the light it throws on that characteristic of their race to which we have already alluded. The Earl of Kildare had given a daughter of his in marriage to Mac William of Clanrickard, in Connaught, between whom and his father-in-law sore dissensions soon sprang up. Kildare, being bent on revenge, summoned the whole strength of the Pale to his standard, and forthwith marched to Knocktow, a short distance from Galway. In this expedition the Earl was accompanied by the Lord Gormanston, the Baron of Delvin, and the Lord of Howth; and sooth to say, the forces led by the respective captains, were made up of Irish from the plains of Leinster, together with auxiliaries from the province of Clanrickard. After mature deliberation—melo-dramatically recounted in the book of Howth—they determined to give their enemies battle on the 19th of August of that memorable year. Kildare told his followers that they had little to fear from the Irish, "as a great number of them had but one spear and a knife, and marched to battle as drunken as swine to a trough." In the middle of his oration, Kildare was disturbed by loud vociferations from the Irish host, whereon one Hollywood swore, "by the holy St. Nicholas, that blesses Artain, the Irish should find them men ere they departed." The adverse hosts had little time for parley, and a battle ensued. The Pale troubadour, who in all probability has left us the account of this action, states that "the English archers lent the Irish gallowglasses such a shower of arrows, that their weapons and hands were fastened together." Exaggerated or otherwise as the narrative may be, Mac William's forces were routed, and Kildare had his revenge. Soon after the battle, the Lord of Gormanston observed to the Earl, "we have done one good work, and if we do the other we shall do well." Being asked what he meant, said he, "wee have for the most number killed our enemies; and if wee do the like with all the Irishmen that wee have with us, it were a good deed."* It does not, however, appear that Gormanston's counsel was acted on, but certain it is that the St. Lawrence's did not gainsay the advice. An early indication this, of that wily policy with which the English have invariably treated the people of this country in every emergency—first using them as their merest instruments, and, when their work was done, setting them against each other.

† "So old," says Rev. Dr. Todd, in his learned notes to the Book of Obits of the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, published by the A. S., "was the custom of making bargains in churches, and continued to so late a period, that we find from an entry in the Chapter Books of St. Patrick's Cathedral, dated 1697, an agreement between the Dean and Chapter and Renatus Harris, 'to pay at Strongbow's tomb, in Christ Church, in the countie of Dublin, the sum of £350.'"

During the wars of York and Lancaster, the St. Lawrences espoused king Henry's quarrel, and supported him against Simnel and the Lord Deputy Kildare, when the organ-maker's son was crowned with the crown of our Lady of St. Mary's Abbey† For this good service the king presented to Sir Nicholas St. Lawrence, sixteenth lord, the sum of 300 pieces of gold, and confirmed to him the lands of Howth and Artane.

In the year 1532, at the general hosting, Lord Howth did military service for his manors, and two years afterwards the young and fiery Silken Thomas flung down the sword of state in St. Mary's Abbey, Dublin, devastated a considerable portion of Fingall, chased away the St. Lawrences from Howth, and planting his guns on the promontory, battered the English ships that were dispatched to reduce him.

In 1541 the seventeenth lord of Howth signed the announcement to Henry VIII., "that he had been proclaimed king of Ireland," and at the same time sent over the names of such of the Irish chiefs as "consented thereto." Of the dissentients, the most remarkable was the O'Neill, concerning whom thus wrote the Lord of Howth—"But for O'Neill, we cannot perceive that ever he will come to any honest conformity, but judge him to be the only poison and gall of this your realm." In strong contrast to the descendant of the great Niall was the O'Reilly of Cavan, who basely sold his birthright, and looks like the first of the Irish beggars at the doors of an English king. "The O'Reilly," wrote Howth to Henry, "was at your grace's Parliament, and wore the apparel which your highness sent unto him of your grace's gift, wherefore we think it convenient that he have honour of a viscount, and be called the Viscount of the Cavan, which is the chief town in his county."

Towards the year 1575, a circumstance occurred here which has lent a romantic charm to a heroine, of whom almost every tyro in Irish history has heard something. Grana-weal (Grace O'Maley), wife of William Oughter, on her homeward voyage to her castle of Carrig-a-Uile, from the court of Elizabeth, anchored near Howth, and proceeded to this castle to demand the rights of hospitality. 'Twas the hour of dinner, and the gates were closed. Indignant at the churlishness of the "Sassenach lord," she seized the young heir of Howth and carried him away to her stronghold; nor would she consent to restore him till his father solemnly promised that the gates should never be closed again at dinner time.* The stipulation was readily acceded to, and has ever since been faithfully observed.†

Nor was the zeal of the St. Lawrences in the cause of English tyranny and oppression less remarkable during the reign of Elizabeth. When Desmond rose in the south, and Hugh O'Neill‡ was crimsoning Beal-an-atha-Buidhe with the best blood of Bagenal, and the choice troops furnished him for the destruction of the Irish, a scion of Sir Armoricus's race may be found in the van of poor Ireland's foemen. When Elizabeth's minion, Essex, was besieging Cahir, foremost in the ranks of England was the Lord of Howth. When Mountjoy wasted Tullagh-oge, and burnt the most blessed relics of our saints—yea, the staff of holy Patrick—the most pliant of his creatures was the re-

* According to Hardiman, this celebrated woman was married twice. Her first husband was Donel O'Flahertie, by whom she had two sons, who were named as contracting, though not consenting parties in the composition with Queen Elizabeth; her second husband was Mac William an Iaran, who is described by Sir John Perrot (ten years after the event told in the text) "as verie sensible, though wantinge the Englishe tongue, yet understandinge the Latin." Strange fact, for the year 1585, an Irish chieftain so near England and ignorant of its language, so far from Rome and yet able to write to a Pope!—Vid. O'Flahertie's West Connaught, p. 302.

representative of Sir Armoricus. The state letters, published in the Hibernia Pacata, bear ample testimony to the prowess of the St. Lawrences when Aodh O'Neill was obliged to retire from Kinsale; and a few years afterwards, Christopher, commonly called the one-eyed Baron of Howth, entered into a compact with artful Cecil, to entrap both Tyrone and Tyrconnell. The story is too well known to need many words of ours. This baron of Howth invited the glorious chieftains of the north to a secret conference, in which he informed them that the English government had determined to exterminate, root and branch, the professors of the Catholic religion in Ireland. It was therefore incumbent on them to arm for their own protection and the dignity of their creed. The Earls, however, were not easily moved, and vowed to stand firm in their allegiance. Meantime, this one-eyed, non-conscience baron sent information to the crown, that the chieftains of the north were about to rally round the standard of the red hand, and proclaim war against England, whereon they received orders to present themselves before the Privy Council. When the Earls appeared, to their astonishment, the first witness against them was this St. Lawrence; the artifice, however, being too transparent, they were not placed under arrest; but scarcely had they left that thrice accursed inquisition, when some false friend forwarded a letter, exhorting them to fly, as their lives and lands were to be forfeited to the English crown. The Earls, well convinced of the bloody intentions of King James's court, fled at once, sailed away from Lough Swilly, lived many years, as the inscription on their honoured tomb in St. Peter's of the mountain tells us, "in the asylum of Catholicity," and dying in exile, left their fated country bereaved and inconsolable. Six entire counties in Ulster were forfeited by this ingenious device, the honour of which is shared by the departed spirits of Cecil and St. Lawrence.*

In 1634, we find that Nicholas, the twenty-third lord of Howth, played a conspicuous part in the pageant of tiger-jawed Strafford, when he proceeded to St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, previous to opening the sessions of Parliament, in which he took effectual measures for the destruction of the Irish woollen trade. In 1641, when the pent up fire blazed out in the north, "Silken Howth" would fain give his poor services to Parsons and Borlase, taking measures for the protection of the port of Dublin; but little did the gallant Sir Phelim "heed their father's sons—the marchmen of the Pale"—and 'tis likely enough he gave himself little concern about the six scurvy "archers on horseback from Howth, and one from Killester," these lords were wont to lead to a hosting. What they did at the time of the Kilkenny confederation does not appear. De Burgo, however, mentions one St. Lawrence of Cruisestown, as signing a declaration in council at Kilkenny, in the year 1647, but he is not otherwise distinguished, nor does his name, appear in the Nuncio's correspondence; quite enough had he to do chronicling the fame of Owen Roe, who, with his native Ulstermen, achieved all the glory of that short period of our independence. Passing over many and less interesting portions of the history of the family, a Lord of Howth is recorded as having sat in King James's Parliament; and in the year 1697, the same

Baron signed the declaration in favour of King William. Since then, little of any note occurs worth mentioning, save that Swift, one of the greatest and most thoroughly practical Irishmen this country ever saw, was a frequent visitor to the castle of Howth, in the hope of getting rid of "the cruel fit of giddiness which hath pursued me from my youth."*

We have now briefly narrated some of the more remarkable facts connected with this ancient family. Of late years they have not taken any conspicuous part in Irish politics, and we do but justice to the representatives of Sir Armoricus, when we state that, unlike other Irish landed proprietors, they have resided almost perpetually on their estate, and done much good to their tenantry and dependants. When Lodge was writing, he described the St. Lawrences as holding this interesting locality fully 600 years, "without improvement or alteration;" but neither he nor Sir Armoricus, were they to rise from their graves, would make such an assertion now. The present Earl is the twenty-ninth representative of the baronial line, and had he lived when the Four Masters were compiling their annals, it is likely they would have dubbed him "Thomas of the fleet-steeds." There never was an attainder in the family, a proof, if such were wanting, of their devotion to the English interests in Ireland.

But it is time that we betake ourselves to the battle-mented church, whose grey old walls and arched belfry make us pause in reverential respect as we approach the village. Let us enter, not by gate or stile, but through the cloister, which was once the abode of monastic piety. Move gently, however, for in the corner lies a helpless old man, bent by years, and almost side by side with the dead of ages. Remove that heap of rotting sea tackle from the window, which in days long gone looked out on the porch of our Lady's Church, and make your way through the rank grave-weeds into the aisle. Here, indeed, is ruin—here, indeed, is desolation! The altar has been torn down, stone by stone—of the stained-glass, storied with blessed emblems, through which the rising and setting sun streamed many-coloured upon the chancel, there is not a single fragment—rafter and holy-rood have disappeared—the bells that rang out sweetly over the water, waking the echoes in lone Inis-mac-Nessan shall never sound through these aisles again (they are now curiosities preserved in my lord's hall); and instead of prayer and psalmody, you have the gurgling of the mountain stream and the wild shriek of the sea bird. Ah! but times have been misnomered as well as men; the age that saw this double-roofed shrine raised in honour of our blessed Lady, fresh from the hands of its builders, it is fashionable to call dark; the period of its demolition, when the iconoclast vented his rage on all that was holy in religion and sacred in art, has been termed enlightened, and now, in the nineteenth century, societies are formed for the preservation of these mouldering relics which fanaticism has barely spared. Sancta Maria! but the ways of men are wondrous strange.

As yet we have no positive certainty of the year in which this venerable edifice was erected. By many it has been attributed to the time when king Sitricus, embracing Christianity, set about proving his love for the creed of his adoption, by raising this church in honour of our Lady. Lodge inclines to think that it was built and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, early in the thirteenth century, by Sir Armoricus

* 'Twas a favourite maxim of this Lord Howth, "that in England he should be esteemed an Englishman, and in Ireland an Irishman."

Tristram; and what surprises us most is, that we have not been able to find any mention of it either in Ware or Archdall's Monasticon. The embattled wall, protecting it on the sea side, and as you approach the village, may be evidence of its having been built at a time when such defences were needed against the unbelievers who sailed off our coasts; but it is not, however, a conclusive argument, for we find the same characteristics accompanying many of the sacred structures erected by the Anglo-Normans at Bective and elsewhere. Much light has yet to be thrown on this subject by the learned Petrie, the guardian angel of our antiquities, when he gives us the third part of his great work on the ancient architecture of Ireland.

Ever since the coming of the St. Lawrences, this has been their place of sepulture. That old monument in the south aisle, with the effigy of the recumbent baron and baroness, was erected by Christopher, Lord of Howth, in the year 1589. It would appear that the altar which stood here was removed to make room for the monument, as the space it occupies must have seriously interfered with the celebration of the divine mysteries. The arms of the St. Lawrences, Plunkets, Cusacks, and Butlers are richly carved in shields on either side of the tomb, and at its ends are groups of saints, with a Gothic inscription now quite illegible. Lodge asserts that a monument was erected here in 1430; the inscription ran thus: "Christopher, Baron Howth, alias De St. Laurencio, and Lord of Parliament, and Anne Plunket, daughter of Plunket of Rathmore, county of Meath." William, the twenty-fourth lord, who died 1671, desired in his will "that a new vault might be made in Howth church, in regard the old vault was well nigh full." It is not long since this narrow house received its latest tenant in all that was mortal of the present Earl's Countess. Blessed and revered by the recipients of her bounty, her memory is still fondly cherished in every hut and homestead. Would she had been spared! But as regrets are unavailing, let us pray that she rests in peace. Now, as to the history of this old fane, whether it was built by King Sitricus or Archbishop Luke, when the latter, in 1235, caused the original prebendal church to be removed from Ireland's Eye to the mainland, we will not take on us to determine. That it was a place of considerable importance in the year 1200, is evidenced by the fact, that Archbishop Comyn raised it to the dignity of one of the thirteen incorporated canonries.

The monastic mansion through which we have passed, now crammed with squalid misery and infirmity, presents ample evidence of early architectural taste, solidity and strength being its main characteristics. The kitchen chimney-place is still visible, and Grose's work on our antiquities states, that in his time seven cells were traceable within these precincts. This may give us some idea of the number of the priests who served our Lady's church. How the residence of the abbot and his clergy came to be denominated "the college," we have not ascertained, and we take it to be a misnomer. Many and entertaining, however, are the facts connected with it. Here rested Primate Jorse in 1313, when, with crozier erect, he came to Howth by night, asserting the precedence of Armagh over the see of Dublin. Here, too, many of the old barons and their retainers came to be assailed by my lord abbot and his monks. Here some seanachie from the castle came at even-tide to tell how his master swore "by our Lady that is blessed in the north church of Howth," on the day that he defeated M^cWilliam Eytragh at Knocktow; and here was penned that miscellaneous compilation of the sixteenth century, entitled "The Book of Howth."* When Mr. D'Alton published his valuable history of the county Dublin, he was right in supposing that this work was extant; and the Irish people are indebted to the genius, research, and learning of John O'Donovan, who has since discovered it among the Carew manuscripts in the library of the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth. But it is long since the last monk ascended the bell tower to call the community and the fisherman to mass and matin song. The reformation has swept fiercely over these old walls, and, alas! left them desolate. The house of prayer is full of putrefaction, and the asylum where sweet charity dwelt, teems with wretchedness and mendicancy.

Older by five centuries than the advent of the Norman peers, are the memories connected with yonder island, whose modern appellation is derived from the similarity of its outline to the human eye. Imaginative as were our forefathers, they did not heed the resemblance, and preferred calling it by the name of the blessed Nessian, "who was frequent in watching, fasting, and prayer."† Nessian was a prince of Leinster, who had seven sons, honoured as saints in the Irish church, and noticed in the martyrology of Aengus, at the ides of March, as the "sons of Nessian of the island."‡ There is some difference of opinion as to the time at which the chapel on the island was built. De Burgo says in the sixth century, and Petrie about the middle of the seventh. A more secluded spot, holy, solitary, never sought for a contemplative life, not even excepting blessed Fintan, whose ruined oratory is to be seen a short distance west of Howth castle. St. Nessian's chapel was remarkable for a portico and bell-tower at its east end, and the main part of the building was composed of calpe, which must have been brought from the main-land. A brief of Pope Alexander III. to St. Lawrence O'Tuathail, published by Usher,§ makes special mention of this Insula Sti Nessiani, and tells us that in the year 1179 it was granted to the see of Dublin. In this ancient chapel was preserved the copy of the Four Gospels, far famed as "the garland of Howth." Of this relic of the olden time, Archbishop Alan in his Black Register (compiled in the good city of Dublin, in the reign of Henry VIII.) states "that it was held in so much esteem and veneration, that good men scarcely dare take an oath on it, for fear of the judgments of God being immediately shown on those who should forswear themselves." Many a legend is still told of the holy recluses who made yonder island their Thebais, what miracles they performed, what cures they effected, and how their fame went abroad from the Wicklow mountains to Clogher Head, which we see even now looming in the distance. Scandinavian pirates and plundering Nor-

* This book, says Hardiman (notes to O'Flahertie's West Connaught), is supposed to have been made for Christopher, the blind Baron of Howth, who died A.D. 1589, and who was grandson of that Lord of Howth who performed so conspicuous a part in the battle Cnoc-Tuadh (the hill of hatchets). The recovery of this book, states the same learned authority, may be useful, if only to expose the origin of these fables, which Hammer, Stanihurst, Cox, Leland, and other writers have advanced as true historical facts. This book was consulted by Usher.

mans respected St. Nesson's shrine in ages long gone, and it grieves us to say, that it has been well nigh demolished by a man who should have laid down his life to preserve it. Some years ago, a Catholic clergyman who held a temporary appointment in the village of Howth, proceeded to the island and carried away the mullions and coins of this time-hallowed oratory, to build a belfry for a chapel then recently erected. This barbarous act was done without the knowledge of his grace the Most Rev. Archbishop Murray, and we presume, without the sanction of Lord Howth. Had the outrage been committed by some fanatical puritan, we might well suppress our indignation; but what are we to think when we find a Catholic priest, in a frenzy of blind zeal, uprooting the earliest evidences of our religion and civilization? What, but that such a man, void of taste and heart, would not scruple to destroy the Moses of Michael Angelo for the sake of the marble. Carrying off a handful of clay, an oxidised nail, or the fragment of a phial from the catacombs of Rome, subjects the offender to the penalty of the church; and are the relics of our creed and history to be desecrated in Ireland at every man's caprice with impunity? But, thank heaven, the press has now determined to keep watch over these venerated ruins throughout the country, and henceforth no sacrilegious hands of ecclesiastical commissioners shall venture to wreck whatever still proclaims,

"In chronicles of clay and stone, how true, how deep,
Was Eire's fame."

So now having said all that is necessary concerning the olden time, let us enter the village. The modern church, from whose facade, we regret to say, a granite cross has been removed to make room for one of cast iron, is in the parlance of the guide books what may be termed "neat." But after feasting our eyes on the old Gothic fabric there below, we cannot discover any characteristic of the modern structure worthy attention. The model was doubtless furnished to the architect by some of his children; who built houses of the cards with which papa and his guests had amused themselves after dinner; and we can only pity the presumption of those who, with the most exquisite designs under their eyes, prefer their own perverted ingenuity to the teaching of truly able masters. Happily, however, better taste is growing up, and the ancient models are being studied and carried out in detail; witness, for example, the church of St. John at Blackrock, which reflects so much credit on the learned and amiable pastor, Dr. Ennis. St. Kevin's, too, in the county Wicklow, will be a beauteous revival of our ancient architecture, for M'Carthy, who follows Pugin, understands his art, and will not lend himself to rearing edifices whose exterior would not be distinguished from a conventicle, were it not for a cross or some other emblem of Catholicity.

Supposing that this ramble has whetted thy appetite, we may safely recommend thee to the care of mine host of the Royal Hotel, and a kindly good man is he, rubicund as Bardolph, and though not quite two yards in girth, fast falling into the proportions of "Sir John." From those who were capable of forming a very proper notion of his wines and ale, much have we heard right commendable and praiseworthy; and as for ourselves, who have often tried his larder, we want words to describe its excellence; but if you be of those who, with John Eliot, take especial care to remember "that water was made before wine," you are sure to be refreshed by a cooling draught from the identical well which long ago supplied my lord abbot's table. If we may venture to suggest an improvement, we would advise our worthy host to enlarge his premises, for the sake of many who are anxious to bide under his roof.

From the garden of the Royal Hotel, there is a magnificent view of Slieve Martin with its cairn, and Carrick-mor with its signal-staff. A few paces in the direction of the sand-choked harbour, see what a panorama of beauty opens itself to thine eyes; the old abbey—the towers of Howth Castle—Inis Mac Nesson, and Lambay, look as if they were within bowshot of thee. Far away, in the dim distance, where the level line of Fingall ceases to be visible, Clogher Head and the mountains of Mourne rise majestically from the sea, stirring thy heart with glorious memories, and convincing thee, if needs be, that this island has as good earth, air, and water as any other spot on the globe. O, friend, shall we not struggle for her as good men ought? But there is another point from which we would have thee behold scenery of a grander character. Let us make our way, not by the dusty road, but through one of the many glens which leads to the old lighthouse, and look down on Dublin bay. Yonder, where the modern Faro flings out its light on the mariner's path, once stood the ballium* of some sea-chief, who watched with eager eye the approaching barque, and then swooped down upon his prey. Over-topping Killiney and the Dublin hills, rise the Wicklow mountains, along which the eye may range till the least of them looks like a speck in the sea. Kingstown and its villas glisten right before you, and under that murky pall, sent up from a hundred thousand chimnies, you may behold the domes and spires of a noble city, ruined and beggared by alien legislation. Nearer, if some truant sea gull whirling in the sunlight does not intercept thy view, lies the island of Dalkey, with its oratory sacred to St. Begnet, virgin; and yonder, where the white foam laves the shore, rise the towers of a splendid convent, from whose cloisters have gone forth even to the uttermost ends of earth, blessed and accomplished dames to diffuse the blessings of religion and education. How, when the foundress of that noble institution lies buried in Loretto Abbey, will not good men honour her memory! for verily has she rekindled the embers of charity fast going out in this egotistical age, and raised glorious monuments to the honour of the living God.† On the right, where the promontory looks over against Clontarf, is Sutton, famed for the salubrity of its climate, promising ere long to become as thickly inhabited as the opposite shore. But see, the sun has shed its last rays upon the rocks—the fishing smacks with their brown sails wooing the breeze from the land, are creeping out sea-wards—half an hour hence, and the steam engine will be panting and snorting at the terminus, and it is time that we depart. Some other day and we will ramble over this promontory again, and with Mr. D'Alton and Sir Robert Kane's book in hand, take special note of its mineralogical and floral character. [Meanwhile, we would suggest that those who have an interest in Howth would correct a sad abuse, we mean the system of imposition practised by the boatmen who ferry visitors to Inis-Mac-Nessan. Nothing can be worse than the conduct of these men, who might earn an easy livelihood during the summer months, if an opinion, too well founded, had not gone abroad of their rude demeanour and exorbitant charges.—Ed.]

Father Klaus of Unterwolden.

A SWISS TRADITION.

[The incident upon which the following poem is founded will be found narrated, considerably in detail, in Müller's History of Switzerland. Of the hero of the poem, the Blessed Nicholas Vander Flue, there are few who have not either heard or read something. He was born at Unterwolden, in Stance, in the year 1417, and from his childhood upwards exhibited a strong inclination towards the monastic life. By the advice, however, of his parents, he married—and even subsequently took up arms in the unhappy war waged against Zurich and Thurgau. It was not until he had attained his fiftieth year that, responding to what he believed to be a divine impulse, he forsook his family and the world, and retired into an adjacent solitude; and here, according to all testimonies, he spent the last twenty years of his life in total abstinence from food and drink. He died in the year 1487, at the age of seventy, after having wrought numerous miracles. His beatification took place at Rome in 1669; and the memory of his extraordinary life and virtues is still preserved with pious reverence throughout the Cantons of Switzerland. His biography, I believe, has been translated into English, though I have never been so fortunate as to meet with it.]

I.

THRICE had the hosts of Charles the Bold
 Been overthrown in Freedom's fight,
 Thrice haughty Burgundy been humbled.
 The spirit of the Brave of old
 Seemed born anew in giant might Amid Helvetia's heathless hills,
 And Serfdom's gyves and shackles crumbled;
 And proud Oppression, all-too-long
 Uncurbed in its career of Wrong,
 At length was taught to feel and fear
 The strong, stern Will that fires and fills
 The free soul of the Mountaineer!

II.

How throbbed with exultation then
 The bosoms of the gallant men
 Of Murten, Grandenson, and Nancy!
 Their triumphs had, in sooth, surpassed
 Aught painted in Romance by Fancy.
 Each fresh-fought field eclipsed the last,
 Till France gazed marvelling and aghast!
 'Twere well if, with such untranscended
 Success to vaunt, their strifes had ended;
 But, Good and Ill, and Heaven and Earth,
 Are blent in human souls from birth,
 And Storm tracks golden Sunshine fast!

III.

Fierce feuds and jealousies ere long
 Sprang up amid the Victor-host;
 The Weak, unshielded by the laws,
 Were trampled by the rampant Strong;
 And Switzerland's great Patriot Cause
 Then first indeed seemed all but lost!
 Accursed greed of Gain! they quarrelled,
 They, the Heroic, they, the Laurelled!—
 Anent the parcelling of the spoil;
 For, wo-the-day! with France's banners
 Had come, to curse the Helvetian soil,
 The blighting taint of France's manners.
 The Pious could but mourn and pray;
 The Noble-souled, in tones of thunder,
 Denounced the Factious day by day;
 But, ere one fleeting moon rolled round
 The bonds that mutually had bound
 So many a year in joint communion
 The Cantons of the Federal Union
 Were torn in thousand shreds asunder!

IV.

The shadows of the Impending Danger
 Loomed hourly larger on the advance,
 When, on one dark-red Autumn even,
 There stood within the Hall of Stance
 A tall, pale, aged man—a stranger,
 Attired in bearskins. One slight glance
 At his translucent features showed

The unearthly Anchorite, who trod
 Alone, aloft, his path to Heaven—
 The rapt Recluse whose bosom glowed
 With holiest love of Man and God.
 A thrill ran through the Council-hall,
 The gravest there seemed awe-surprised,
 For, well the assembly recognised
 The blessed Saint of Unterwolden.
 His marvellous life was known to all!
 The slanting sun beamed forth in golden
 Resplendence on his half-bowed head,
 As, with a rich-toned voice, that shed
 A music like angelic song
 Throughout the spacious Hall, and woke
 Deep feeling in the spell-bound throng,
 He raised his arms on high, and spoke.

V.

"My countrymen!—my friends!—my brothers!
 I fain would wake you to a sense
 Of all you owe yourselves—and others!
 Oh! if bad passions domineer
 Within your hearts expel them thence!
 For, Freedom's flame will never burn
 In their polluted atmosphere!
 Why should the unholy thirst of gold
 So far debase your loftier nature?
 Oh! by your hopes of Heaven, return
 To that high grade you filled of old—
 Your immemorial moral stature!
 Live, Switzers, live, as lived your fathers,
 Remembering this, that Peace and Love
 Still bloom among the starriest flowers
 That hand of Man or Angel gathers
 In Liberty's perennial bowers
 On Earth aneath, in Heaven above!
 Of other matters let me speak:—
 You, who are strong, sustain the Weak!
 Be liberal to the Wandering Poor!
 If Want strike down but one of those
 His death, his blood, lie at your door!
 Forgive your own, your private foes,
 But where your country needs your swords
 To save her from the brand of Slavery,
 Prove on the battle-ground your bravery,
 And chase afar the Invader's hordes!
 And hear your Priests! The delegate lords
 Of Heaven are they! Heed well their words—
 These hear, these heed; but heed not whether Themselves live well or ill: a draught
 Of milk alike refreshes, quaffed
 From golden bowl or skin of leather.
 My friends! disastrous days will come—
 And Evil, as a sweeping flood,
 Will deluge even our mountain-home!
 Be therefore warned, and take your stand
 On the broad base of Brotherhood
 And Union for your Fatherland!
 So shall each man of you recline
 In peace beneath his own green vine,
 And God Himself shall guard your fame,
 And make you worthy of the Name
 You inherit from your sires and mothers.
 And now, my countrymen, my brothers,
 Farewell! My words and work are ended!
 And may we all re-meet one day
 Amid the realms of Love Immortal!"—
 So saying, the holy Hermit wended
 With slow and silent steps his way
 Adown the Hall and past the portal.

VI.

All they who heard this warning presage
 Felt new sensations as they listened:
 To them 'twas Heaven's especial message!
 Their hearts were moved; their moist eyes glistened
 With tears! And who was He whose tongue
 Had power to wake their feelings thus?
 'Twas Vander Flue of Unterwolden!
 'Twas Father Klaus! a man among Those wondrous men of ages olden
 Unknown in these drear days to us!
 Through twice ten years within his lone
 Sepulchral cell he had watched and prayed,
 And mortified his frame to stone.

In twice ten years no mortal food
 Had passed his lips! While yet a boy
 He looked to Heaven, not Earth, for aid!
 His youth was Holiness and Joy—
 They formed his daily livelihood!
 At first he embraced the wedded life,
 And reared up sons to serve the State,
 And, in dark days, when feuds grew rife,
 Bore arms himself, too, as their mate.
 But, when Mid-age at length was come
 He wearied of this world of strife,
 And sighed for some far bourne, some home,
 Wherein himself and God might dwell.
 With many a tear he therefore bade
 To all he loved a last farewell,
 And reared in Unterwolden's shade
 His lonely little chapel-cell.
 And thither many a suffering soul,
 Long down-bowed by despairful dole,
 And many a stricken sinner, came,
 And found through him relief and rest.
 Disease oft fled at his behest;
 His touch oft healed the palsied frame.
 Oft prophesied he; yea, he knew
 The Spirit's inmost mysteries;
 And Life's Apocrypha, so dim
 To common eyes, shone in his view
 Sun-bright: all these, and more than these,
 Heaven's INFANT-GOD had shown to him.
 Yet, always dwelt he in the sight
 Of his own deep unworthiness,
 And prayed but thus: "Oh, SAVIOUR! sever
 Me from Myself! Let Death and Night
 Give place to Life and Blessedness,
 And take me to Thyself for ever!"

VII.

Could aught but signal blessings follow
 The homily of this God-sent preacher?
 Could brave men, who, with all their faults
 Cherished that frankness which exalts
 Almost even Crime, and scorned the hollow
 Resources of Deceit and Craft,
 Turn with hard hearts from such a teacher?
 Oh, no! from that bright period forth
 A Heaven-wrought change came over all.
 The willing winds were quick to waft
 From east to west, from south to north,
 The story of the Scene of Scenes
 In Stance's ancient Council-hall.
 The proudest then forgot their pride,
 And jealousies, and secret spleens,
 And rival feuds, were flung aside.
 And long the Senate bless'd the name
 Of him, the Holy Man who came Among them thus that Autumn-even
 To awaken Hope, and banish Wrath,
 And clear the Patriot's thorn-choked path;
 And oft they longed once more to see
 That Bearskin Mantle, which Tradition
 Affirmed was willed of God to be
 His floating vehicle into Heaven
 When Death should close his earthly mission.*

J. C. M.

* The popular belief was that he had received this mantle from the hands of an angel, with the assurance that at the hour of his death it should be converted into a winged basket (or pannier), for the conveyance of his soul into Paradise.

"SOME NOTICES OF MANUSCRIPTS RELATING TO IRELAND, IN VARIOUS LANGUAGES, NOW TO BE FOUND IN THE BURGUNDIAN LIBRARY, AT BRUSSELS, WITH FAC-SIMILE ILLUSTRATIONS." By S. BINDON. M'Glashan and Duffy, Dublin.

"TRAVELLING," says Emerson, "is a fool's paradise;" and admitting that there is much truth in the assertion, we object to it only as a general principle, for it does not follow that every traveller is a fool, nor is it quite certain that many travellers are not the very reverse of wise and thinking men. Go where you will, this truth meets you—read the books every speculating scoundrel places in the hands of tourists and sight-seers, and it is ten to one you will find the traveller befooled by their contents, or the writer befooling himself for the sake of gain. How true this is with regard to Catholic countries, none need be told. Your gentleman traveller would not give a pinch of snuff for any "guide" that did not amuse him with quaint stories about the Pope and friars, with here and there a piece of romance in which some nun was the heroine. Were one to collect all the trash written about Rome and Naples, it would fill no inconsiderable space in a large library; but what are we to think of these "travellers," who come back full of the information supplied them by lying books, and the dishonest ciceroni who lounge about in every city, from the Piazza di Spagna at Rome to the Piazza of St. Marco at Venice? Why verily, that they are fools, and that travelling is their paradise. Who has not heard of the fanatic, who, some time ago, set all the old women in England agog about letters posted in heaven, and delivered—we should say, postage free—in Messina, if we recollect aright? Now when this news spread abroad, there was any money for the particulars which the letters conveyed; and when some persons, rather sceptical, began to question the truth of the statement, why, the man—we beg his pardon, the baronet—who brought the news to Exeter Hall, protested upon his honor he heard it from the cicerone who misled and humbugged him in Messina, and therefore it must be true! The Times newspaper, the Evangelical Magazines, the Tract societies, and all the rueful conclaves, male and female, set up a howl and marvelled much at the superstition of the people of Messina, who pretended to be in receipt of the most recent intelligence from heaven, while they, the elect, had never been favoured by a single line! Now we would submit that the baronet in question was befooled—that half the pious ladies of England were befooled—that the evangelical newspapers, which thought of establishing a correspondent in heaven, were befooled, and consequently, that there is real sound sense in Mr. Emerson's assertion that travelling is a fool's paradise, seeing how one traveller, like Sir somebody Smith, could befooled himself and Exeter Hall on his return from Italy.

But there is another class of travellers who now and again taste a little of the sweets of this fool's paradise. There is, for example, your young gentleman who crosses the channel, and gets something of an English accent; passes Dover Straits, and with the aid of his "traveller's friend," picks up as much French as puzzles the natives, and returns home with—what? a moustache, a few irreligious phrases, a few choice cant expressions, a set of drawled-out reflections on the dirty Irish, a jibe at his father's creed, with a careful suppression of the letter "r" which he deems quite vulgar; and travelling, as you may perceive, has made this hero a greater fool than he was when setting out. Argal, Mr. Emerson is quite correct. How many and how various are the ramifications of this great travelling class? A short time ago we met a youth who had made his way into the Mosque of Omar, at Jerusalem, and danced with a Dervish till his head reeled; another, who came to fisty cuffs with a Bedouin in a lane at Pera, and pulled a Pacha by the beard in Galata, one side of Constantinople; and we have listened to these travellers telling their adventures with all the gravity of an Anacharsis, and the ready mendacity of a Münchhausen. Thinking of this, and much more, we consoled ourselves with Mr. Emerson's apothegm, and took care not to be befooled by such exquisite Wag-horns.

But as the facilities of travelling increase, the fools multiply in proportion. As for the Rhine, he who has not visited every one of its castles and falls, is a mere nonentity. Were you to ask one of these Rhine-goers had he seen the Shannon, the Blackwater, or the Inny, he would, in all probability, answer by asking, had you seen the Rhine. In fact, a man's reputation is half made by travelling now-a-days, and the uninitiated have no idea of the sensation produced at a dinner party by the appearance of a gentleman, who, with the stubble of a moustache above his lip, and a profusion of Maccasarised hair over his coat collar, is spoken of as "Mr. —, just returned from the Rhine, and is to go to Rome and Naples next summer"—which, by the way, is just the time he ought not to go. When this gentleman condescends to speak, how wonderfully interesting is he! "Drachenfel's a charming place, pretty good waterfall—Frankfort rather good society—Cologne, handsome old church, by Jove! they did not think it large enough, and are building an addition to it—the German language deucedly jaw-breaking at first, but after all easily acquired." So speaketh the traveller, who, be it observed, returns home as ignorant of the history of the places he has visited as he is of the king of Congo's court, and as unacquainted with the language "so readily acquired" as he is with the beauties of the "Walpurgisnachtstraum." And here, O friend, you have another of the fools who have been revelling in Paradise. To be sure there are Englishmen enough as ridiculous as you will find in any other part of the globe, but we have only to do with Irishmen, and we will not hesitate to assert, that from Lake Lucerne to the Lago di Nemi, you will find Irishmen of the character we have endeavoured to pourtray. How incontestably true this is, is best known to any observant man who has resided for any time at Rome. Just turn out into the Corso, or ascend Monte Pincio, where the aristocratic English are performing their endless girations; there be sure you will find some good, well-dressed Hibernian, all agape for the recognition of some English loungers on whom he stumbled yesterday-night, at Duke Torlonia's soiree (for, good friend, Torlonia is a banker, and inviteth all who do business with him, and a wise man in sooth is he). Should the day be wet, go to the Capitoline or Vatican museum, and only listen to the sage remarks on pictures and statues. It is told of a poor peasant woman who came from a village some twenty miles to Rome, that on seeing Michael Angelo's Moses, she exclaimed, "Santa Maria! but Moses must have been taller than a grenadier." The remark of the poor simple creature made many a virtuoso laugh; but, in the name of heaven, what would be thought of us if the criticisms of some of our own countrymen were translated for the benefit of the Italians? What, for example, if they were told of the Irishman, who, on seeing the bronze statue of Hercules, gravely remarked, "he must have been a very able lump of a fellow!" or of another, who on visiting the Coliseum, and not knowing for what uses it had been raised, nor by whom, and, need we say, in cimerian darkness as to the time of its erection, allowed himself to be persuaded that it had been used by the old Romans for a pound, till a new doubt arising, dissipated his first conclusion—and what was the doubt? Why, that the act of parliament provides there must be a running stream in every pound for the benefit of the cattle; and as there was no appearance of water on the floor of this mighty queer building, argal, it could not have been a pound. Oh! shade of Pomponius Letus, how you would have wept over such a Goth as this! We have heard, too, of a rich Irishman, who being brought into the Piazza of St. Peter's, and seeing the travertine of which the facade is built somewhat discoloured, offered the following artistic observation on the great structure: "See, my friend, before ten years are about, the whole front of that building will be as black as Kilkenny marble, and 'tis a burning shame for the Pope that owns it, if, instead of botherin' his head about them old pillars t'other side of the water, he doesn't get a couple dozen of handy fellows to whitewash the whole of it inside and out, and then I'd venture to say 'twould be as purty a chapel as any from this to Belmullet." When we were young, and in the happy time of life, these criticisms made many a knot of youngsters laugh till their sides were ready to split, and many of us marvelled that some old and grave ones of our companions did not share the sport with ourselves. Since then we have found a key for the solution of the difficulty. Any Irishman who valued the reputation of his fatherland, would as soon see Genseric entering the Porta del Popolo, as block-heads of this sort, who, utterly ignorant of their own and every other country's history, determined on enjoying somewhat of the fool's paradise, and consequently proceeded straightway to Rome.

Nor were these mirth-moving remarks confined to the seven-hilled city's structures—the manners and habits of the people were subjects of strictures as absurd as these we have already given. One man would have the entire population of Italy a set of lazy drones, because they lay down at mid-day to avoid tertian fever; another could not eat meat of their cooking, because it was not done in the Cossack cuisine, that is, between the saddle skirts, as if every Italian had the bowels and digestion of an ostrich like himself. As for the wine, small beer was better, and, miracle of miracles, go where you would, from Pons Milvius to the Palatine, you could not find a single tumbler of Kinahan's LL. Verily, Rome is the worst place in the world for the lovers of under-done meat; and as for those who cannot do without the juice of John Barley-corn, we would advise them to go to the Dwina, to the Danube—anywhere, in fact, but to the Tiber.

Ad infinitum usque might we prove our position, to wit, the folly of this travel-mania, as far as certain individuals are concerned, were we only to consign to paper the recollections with which our memory teems at the present moment. We have heard of an Irish alderman who thought it fashionable to spend some time at Baden-Baden, and straightway went, with plenty of red gold and a huge pair of red whiskers. Arrived at his destination, he commenced drinking over much of the waters; but as the Brunnen did not agree with him, he soon afterwards sought refuge in Moselle, and addicted himself to smoking. Now it so happened, that this alderman had made the acquaintance of a certain Herr Koenig before leaving home, and in order to remember the name of the German, whom he expected to meet at Baden, the worthy civic dignitary wrote Koenig's name on his own card, and in his hurry joined Koenig to the two first syllables of his title, so that the two words made "Alder-Koenig." One evening the good alderman returned to his lodgings somewhat excited by smoking, beer, and Moselle; his face bore no marks of that healthy hue which results from the Brunnen, and his whiskers appeared phlegthontic red. In jollifying good humour, he called for the "jungfrau," the only word of German he had learned; and when she appeared, he staggered forward and seized her round the waist, for he had an anxiety to try a pas he had just seen admirably executed in a valse—but the jungfrau fled, alarmed the house, and in a fit of horror told her master to look out for another servant, as she had no notion of staying any longer under the same roof with the red-wiskered, fiery-faced gentleman who was nothing less than the Alder-King. "Der Teufel!" said the astonished Boniface, "how knowest thou that?" "Mein Herr," replied the girl, "none but the Alder-König* could drink so much beer, smoke so many pipes, speak such outlandish gibberish, sing such boisterous songs—and, to remove all doubt, I saw his card on his dressing-table yesterday morning"—the proofs were convincing. The landlord called an interpreter to his aid—the worthy alderman was made aware of his incognito—he protested, swore, vociferated, but all to no purpose—Boniface was inflexible—"he would not keep such a guest in his house"—"he had children whom he would not see spirited away, and he would alarm the whole frontier if the Alder-König did not instantly depart." Nor was he slow in keeping his word—half Baden collected before the hotel windows to see the devil incarnate—old women prayed fervently for their children, and, after two nights close siege, the great civic dignitary effected his escape, vowing never again to visit Baden-Baden; and need we say that the vow has been faithfully kept? Now, this story is not without its moral. Had this alderman remained at home, spent the money he had made at home, in his own country, and taken the trouble of going to Mallow, Golden-bridge, or Lucan, he would have got mineral waters more than he wanted, saved his own and his country's character from ridicule, and ourselves from the necessity of penning his misadventure; but no, he should see the world, we should have said life, and, to be sure, he should get into the fool's paradise!

'Tis not in a spirit of drollery we record these anecdotes, or, if you like to call them so, facts; 'tis rather in a spirit of unaffected pity for the travellers themselves, and also to warn the dear ladies of our acquaintance against the monstrous fabricated stories which these gentlemen bring back with them. For our own part, we would not give a German sausage for all their hacknied legends about the Rhine, nor would we presume to dissuade our fair readers from accepting a mosaic brooch, or a respectable cameo from the holy city, if the travellers should bring them such, for of a verity they are the only things valuable they occasionally bring back. At the same time, however, we, being most incredulous ourselves, would fain warn all our readers against the nonsense of adventures with brigands, dining with the late Pope, and all such Münchhausenisms, so exceedingly delectable to a small tea party. There is no Irishman of sensitiveness or cultivated mind who will not feel disgusted with wonderful stories of this sort, which, though perhaps well meant, are eminently calculated to bring ridicule on us, and confirm a most wrongly-founded notion that we are a people only half-witted, and fit subject for raillery, and jest. There is too a frankness indigenous to the Irish character which makes the mouth speak out of the abundance of the heart—above all, there is great want of foresight and reflection, and this trait is peculiarly Celtic. We well remember many instances of this, and one in particular. Once on a time, it was our lot to be domiciled for a couple of months in the city of Tivoli, concerning which we had read much in Horace, and the local histories. Now it so happened that some half dozen youngsters, all Irish, with one exception, and that one a Greek, from Cephalonia, had walked into the villa of Adrian on a fine evening to witness the result of a day's excavating. Having satisfied ourselves on the subject, we sat down in the shade of the Prytaneum while our Greek friend sang us these fine old verses in which the Falernian bard up-sums the dearest of his hopes, and the most ardent longings of his heart:

"Tibur Argeo positum colono
Sit mea sedes utinam senectæ,
Sit modus lasso maris et viarum."

MILITIAEQUE.

The song scarcely ended, we found ourselves surrounded by a group whom the music had attracted; nor was it difficult to conjecture whence the parties came. 'Tis the easiest thing in the world to know an Englishman or woman when endeavouring to speak Italian; for after all, if they were to be shot for it they cannot speak it properly; there is a hardness about their pronunciation which no practice can soften; as for aspiring, it seems an insuperable difficulty, so that every syllable comes from between their teeth fast-locked, till you think they are endeavouring to translate the sonorous periods of the South into a cockney drawl—a vain effort truly, of which nothing can give you a more vivid notion than an attempt to grind the rich harmony of an organ out of the harsh wires of a hurdy-gurdy. But we are digressing. Anxious to anticipate the anti-melodious English-Italian, one of us addressed the travellers in their own tongue, when we were agreeably surprised on finding that there was a genuine Irishman of their party, who seemed to create considerable fun for his companions, male and female. Our conversation naturally turned on the subject immediately before us, the ruins, the epitome of the world-wonders, which Adrian caused to be built after his many peregrinations. But little were we prepared for the hypercriticisms of our countryman, when in reply to our question—what he thought of them?—something like the following burst streamed forth with marvellous rapidity: "Think of them! why, by the table of war, after looking at Holy Cross in the County of Tipperary, or the Rock of Cashel, or the fine old monasteries in the County of Kilkenny, I would'nt give a fippenny-bit for all the old rubbish from this to St. Peter's! A pretty day's scorching I've got by these darlings here, who would'nt stay quiet till they should lead me over twenty miles of a country where you would'nt get as much green grass as would sod a lark! but what puzzles me most is, how they stood that infernal brimstone pool there below (the "aquæ albulæ" of Pliny), which I suppose must give fever to half the side of the country! A nice government, that would'nt drain it! Why don't some of you get up a petition respectably signed, and banish it to the devil from whose region it must have come?" and then there's as much talk about that waterfall there below as if it was equal, or to be compared to Powerscourt or Phul-a-phooka—and the round building over it (the temple of the Sibyl).—Oh! you

* To those who have not read Goethe's poem, translated by Mangin, we beg leave to say the Alder-König, or Alder-King, is a demon, said to spirit away young children, and is greatly feared by superstitious mothers in Germany—much more than the Pooka in Ireland.

hint I can't fellow it. Well, I can very quietly meet you there—were you ever at Clontarf? If you were not, I fancy you heard something about it; well, the next time you're in Ireland just step down there—go into Lord Charlemont's demesne, and I'll wager you'll find something there that will take the shine out of anything you have here." Most agreeable, no doubt, were the classic observations of our voluble countryman to his companions of the sister isle, nor did they fail to express themselves highly delighted with the anti-Winklemann comments which fell from his lips; but, heaven knows, though he afforded them fair sport, he deeply mortified us. A fine blonde English girl by his side, who was evidently bent on collecting matter for her scrap book, artfully drew him out, and now and again introduced by way of fioritura to the presto movement of his tongue, such delicious morceaux as the following—"La Henrietta, isn't Mr. — charmingly droll! did you ever hear such apt remarks? Oh, but the Irish are the most amusing people in the wo-old." Text and comment were no easy matters to translate to the young Greek; in fact, Polyglot Mezzofanti, that man on whom some lingering spark of the Pentecost fire seems to have fallen, could not give them a literal version; but at length, when we got the substance of them into our friend's head, we were for the first time convinced that Tasso had something more in his eye than mere poetical detail, when describing the Irish who marched to Palestine:

"Questi dell' alte selve irsuti mahda,
La divisa dal mondo ultima Irlanda."

Now fair ladies, who spell your way through the pages of Petrarca, the Notti Romane, Promessi Sposi, and Metastasio, we beg to assure you that often, and often since, have we met many of this class of "hirsute" Irish travelling gentlemen, who had done much better remaining at home, and who must have found out to their cost that big whiskers and rude boisterous episodes, like that of which we have given you a specimen, cannot exempt them from all the inconveniences attending wayfarers on their road to paradise.

But, pray heaven we be not misunderstood; none of our remarks have reference to the prelacy or clergy. As to the former, need we say, that they are the accredited ambassadors of that great dynasty which rules to the limits of creation? Matters of weight have brought them to their spiritual monarch's court, from the days of our conversion to Christianity, and shall bring them throughout all time. As for the clergy of the second order, we would wish that every one of them would visit the Holy City to behold the splendour of religion, the monuments of the Roman empire, and the works and wisdom of him who stands proudly pre-eminent the great and anointed reformer. Quite irrespective of these considerations, Rome must ever be to the artist and scholar "the city of the soul." So, thither let them flock and congregate even as thick as leaves in Valombrosa. Christianity and mythology are their grand subjects, and lo! the church is there with the trophies of the Cæsars, and the glories of Greece and Palestine, to attest her triumph. But as for the gentlemen travellers concerning whom we have already spoken—a plague on them; we had as lief see a vagabond ranter holding forth from the last pillar of the rostra, or a Birmingham hardware-man speculating on what the equestrian statue of Aurelius would bring, if broken up and sold for most excellent bronze. A few words more, and we must close our remarks on modern travellers. 'Tis a great mistake to imagine that the Irish are the most distinguished people who go to the Continent. Some have allowed this overweening vanity to seize such fast hold of them as to think the Irish are everywhere recognized as a people quite distinct from the English and Scotch. Not at all, gentlemen; your passport is English, your money is English, the very coat on your back—and we are sorry to say it—is English; your language, too, is English, and the post-boy who drives you calls you "Ingresi," while the hotel-keeper more grammatical euphonises you "Inglesi." Perhaps nothing has occurred for the last two centuries more calculated to give us a national character at Rome, however miserable it may be, than the splendid obsequies of our departed tribune. But we are most anxious to be rid of all absurd delusions. Let no travelling Irish gentleman then be disappointed, if, when his trunk is opened at the Dogana, and the police scan his passport—the city be not illuminated. True it is, the Irish Catholics have suffered dreadfully for their adherence to the one, true, holy, and apostolic church, but so have other lands. Ireland, too, has produced many and most learned men, famed in the annals of the church, and so have many other countries. Were we to look for extraordinary reward conferred on us for our learning or our piety, need we say, we have had no cardinal—the only one for whom the Irish people sought that high dignity, was the great annalist, Wadding, who preferred the coarse habit of St. Francis to the purple of the sacred college. England in this respect has been far more fortunate, and can point to a Pope and many cardinals. Since the time of the most Rev. Oliver Plunket, whom the English murdered, we have had but one professor of eminence filling a chair in any of the schools of Rome, and that one is the actual president of the Irish College. These facts may not be calculated to humble us, if not there are others. Let us never forget, that in the aristocracy of art we are considerably inferior to almost every other country at Rome. At the present moment, out of forty-one sculptors, native, Saxons, Danes, English, and Scotch, we have but one man of celebrity—need we mention, Hogan? Out of sixty painters from almost every country under heaven, we have not a single Irishman of mediocrity,* and as for engravers and mosaicists, we have none. But why dwell on this? Why, but to disabuse our people of crude prejudices, and to warn, above all others, our dear travellers against any disappointment they may experience, when they are set down in the Piazza di Spagna.

But what has all this to do anent Mr. Bindon and his book? Why, marry, much it hath. Were it not for Mr. Bindon and "his notices of manuscripts relating to Ireland," we would not have favoured you with the foregoing remarks, nor would we have been justified in taking exception to Emerson's principle, that travelling is a fool's paradise, and consequently all travellers must be fools. How very clearly the exception may be found in the person of Mr. Bindon, none who know him or what he has done will doubt. A couple of years ago, this gentleman set out on his travels with a profound knowledge of his own country's history, a familiarity with almost every ruin throughout Ireland, and an intimate acquaintance with the old annals which still survive war, persecution, and the accidents of time—add to all this, a knowledge of Latin, Greek, and some of the Continental languages, and surely you might calculate on some good result from his peregrinations. Nor was the result slow in coming; the learned gentleman, combining study with pleasure, came back to Ireland, and, after much labour, compiled his most interesting notices of the Irish Colleges of Louvain, prefixed to Dr. French's works. With what assiduity he laboured, is evident to the readers of the "Library of Ireland;" and for these grand old epitaphs marking the burial places of our chieftains who distinguished themselves at home and abroad, and the memoirs of our expatriated patriarchs and priests who sought refuge far from their own land, the rising generation is deeply indebted to him.

But still there remained much to be done; every one knows that the Archives of the Continental Libraries abound with the works of our mediæval and seventeenth century writers; but, with the exception of St. Isidore's at Rome, we have not anything like a catalogue of their contents. Belgium, thought Mr. Bindon, must contain many of these relics, so thitherward went he again to accomplish his love-labour. The result is now before us, and truly gratifying is it—an evidence of genuine patriotism and learned research. Cardinal Maj has earned world-wide celebrity for his unequalled perseverance in searching after the works of Tully and Terence, but we do not believe that his heart ever beat more rapturously, when successfully deciphering the esoteric characters of the palimpsests, than did Mr. Bindon's on finding the fragments of our hagiologist, Colgan, or the old log which St. Brendan kept when he sailed the seas. No less than forty-three biographies of our early saints lie in these archives as yet unedited—glorious monuments of that zeal with which our predecessors in the faith laboured to rescue the memory of their great men from ruin and oblivion, and these proud old records are catalogued, and so marked by Mr. Bindon, that whenever an Irishman of taste and learning visits Brussels for pleasure or study, he may be able to lay his hand upon them. Along with most learned notes, you have fac-similes of the handwriting of O'Clery—of him whose fame is imperishable in Irish annals, and of "Malachy, Archbishop of Tuam," that splendid mitred swordsman, whose obsequies Rinuccini officiated at in St. Mary's Cathedral, Limerick; add to this, the signatures of Protestant Daniel O'Bryen, Catholic Mountgarret, Preston, Belling, and Fleming, Archbishop of Dublin (the same whose portrait adorns the study hall in St. Isidore's), all illustrious names in the days of the Kilkenny Confederation, and you have "beads on memory's rosary" which no Irishman of taste will refuse to count over and over again. The portrait of St. Malachy, which for aught we know, may represent him as he appeared when sojourning with St. Bernard, is a quaint old gem, and we recommend it to the consideration of all who make ecclesiastical costume their study and delight. We have not words to thank Mr. Bindon for his valuable catalogue, which makes in all thirty-two pages; and we earnestly hope that he will soon again betake him to the Continent, search every old monastery from St. Gall's to Bobio, and spend many a happy hour in the Vatican, pleasurably to himself and usefully to his country, for, in good truth, he is of that class of travellers who do not make their trips a "fool's paradise." The typography of this little book is in the style of excellence which characterizes M'Glashan and Duffy's publications.

REFUTATION OF THE REV. MR. M'ILWAINE'S SIX CHARGES AGAINST THE CHURCH OF ROME. By N. M'DEVITT, Esq., Editor of the Belfast Vindicator.

SUCH is the title of a controversial work with which we have been favoured by the author. For our own parts, we have a holy horror of noisy blustering polemics, out of which very little good rarely comes. Were one to investigate with what guide books in hand the Oxford and Cambridge professors sought the right road to the one holy Catholic and Apostolic church, we are firmly persuaded that they never consulted a single one of the many productions of that period, when angry divines met each other face to face in the Rotundo and elsewhere. Of all subjects in the world, there is none so sacred as religion, and we abhor the idea of this great, this most important of all concerns, being converted into a weapon for every fool to smite withal. In our notion, there never can be again anything like the contest between Bossuet and Claude; it was of a certainty the end of all controversy, to which all the disputes since arisen are but the echoes, or if you will, the merest rehearsals. Certainly, since that memorable time the church has never seen such a glorious champion as the Bishop of Meaux, nor one so able to wield the weapons of her armoury. But, what matter? The church has stood, and shall stand, though no other should ever arise, for Christ has sworn to be with her throughout all time, even to the consummation of the world. Indeed, we thought the time for "discussions" had gone by, and that whosoever would embrace truth would be led to its adoption by the grace of God enlightening the understanding, and the mild persuasion of true Christian philosophy by such works, for example, as Manzoni's "Morale Cattolica," M'Cabe's "Catholic History of England," and above and before all, the "Discussion Amicale." But there are times when men are called on to defend the faith that is in them, and the holy institutions against which impious rage can effect far less than the storm and breakers on our rock-bound shores. The occasion which took Mr. M'Devitt from his occupation of a journalist, was one of no ordinary character, and learnedly and well has he vindicated the church and doctrines of his fathers. The time when every man calling himself God's minister should have been actively engaged, harmonizing conflicting elements, and invoking the benignant spirit of Christian charity—emulously working for the alleviation of sorrows, and unparalleled sufferings—this surely was not the time for Mr. M'Ilwaine to light the torch of demoniacal discord in his pulpit, and then hurl it into the cabins and ditches of dying Catholics. God forgive him all his misrepresentations, and may the salutary lesson he has learned teach him not to come again in collision with such a master of spiritual fence as the editor of the Belfast Vindicator. Need we say more than that we heartily recommend his book to all those who are anxious to be instructed and edified?

"SKETCHES OF IRELAND SIXTY YEARS AGO." M'Glashan, Dublin. To us, Catholics, the very title of this book suggests the most painful memories, and looking back over half a century, how are we not struck by the remarkable contrast between what we are and have been. Confining ourselves to the city of Dublin, let some of our readers throw himself in the way of an intelligent octogenarian, and learn of him how it then fared with the Catholic inhabitants. Of their civil disabilities almost every boy is fully aware—the political teachings of the last thirty years—parliamentary debates and popular harangues have made him better acquainted with this than any other period of Irish history. But of the persecution for religion's sake which our fathers had to endure, from the day of the Boyne to the viceroyalty of Lord Chesterfield, we as yet lack the description, and record in any portable or rather popular shape. Whosoever undertakes to give us such a work, will easily find materials abundant as needs be; but if he treats his subject well, he will not allow a single rancorous feeling to motive him—well and nobly will he perform his task, if he clearly shows how virtue and perseverance triumphed over mighty obstacles, and how good men struggled and prayed to God for the diffusion of knowledge amongst their fellow men. For of all the horrors of man's invention, nothing so pales before the true light of science as the demon torch of religious bigotry.

There is a point of time to which our thoughts have been wont to recur, ever since childhood, and to which grey-haired old men often turn their waning eyes, with the same sort of complacency that an enlarged prisoner reverts to the moment when a friendly voice spoke words of hope and assurance of liberation—need we say we allude to “sixty years ago,” when our prospects were dim and drear? Freed from shame and sorrow, the true heart will never forget its comforter in the hour of affliction, but will keep the image before him like an altar-piece, whither memory will not fail to bring its choicest and most hallowed offerings. The learned, kind-hearted, old village priest, who shared the humiliations of our fathers, gave them hope and consolation and was sustained out of their poor pittance, is still a familiar object to us; nor do we forget the caresses he heaped on us, the instructions he imparted, or the tearful anxiety with which he watched over our young mind's development. But he, good soul, has passed away, leaving nothing behind save the recollection of his virtues, and a few heedful hearts to pray for his repose. Alas! but what of those who lived sixty years ago? Could we recall them, what stories could they tell of the difficulties they had to contend with, in order to compass the rudiments of the Latin tongue—how they chattered with the master of some hooker or wine-boat to procure a passage to friendly Spain or chivalrous France, and then trudged, sore of foot, to the outcast's refuge, Rome! Oh! but these were pleasant tales and reminiscences, worth more than their weight in gold; and who knows but some manuscript may turn up to tell how they lived and thought? But there is one of them whose very features, powdered wig, and half-stooped, thoughtful, attitude, are more deeply impressed on our soul than the painter's art could make them. In the cellar of the dirty street, surrounded by a group of poor half-naked urchins, see you the reverend pastor teaching his obedient pupils the rudiments of their religion, guiding some poor young artizan's hand in the formation of letters, or cracking in twain some “subtle nut of science” for the puzzled aspirant to the ministry? Track him from the cellar to the sick bed-side of his parishioner, and watch how the spirit of God lights up the sufferer's death-dewed features, as the good priest speaks of the instability of life, the certainty of death, and the blissfulness of heaven. On Sunday, the cellar school-master ascends the altar of the little chapel in the noisome lane, where a Lord Lieutenant, moved by a fearful calamity, had allowed him to officiate, and there the venerable old man preaches piety and hope to a congregation, one-half of whom are not able to get kneeling place within the walls. Tired, no doubt, by the morning's labour, the homely breakfast awaits him in a dingy two pair back, and the evening closes at the frugal board of some kind parishioner, who that morning contributed a penny to his pastor's fund for the week. And that good old priest, whose days sped thus, has left an honoured name—his picture decks the little holding of those whose grandsires were his parishioners, and his memory is still revered, nor is it likely to be forgotten. Need we say we have been recalling Father Betagh, who lived in this city “sixty years ago?”

And a queer city was it at that period, as must appear to the readers of the volume before us. Much, in good truth, do we rejoice at some of the changes it has undergone, and sorely do we lament many that have come. Were the option ours, we would reject all the measures that England could give, if they came accompanied with the immorality, drunkenness, duelling, gambling upon cofins, and all the other barbarities which disfigured society sixty years ago. In fact, we would rather have Ireland as she is, sunk in misery and starvation, than splendid as she was in wealth and commercial enterprise, when “Liberty boys” and “Ormond boys” could enlist the sympathies of an entire city in their brawls, and suspend the occupations of the inhabitants to witness their truculent barbarities. Truly and faithfully has the author described these heart-rending scenes, and we know many still alive who will bear witness to the graphic illustrations he has given us. “Fighting Fitzgerald” was a character already known to us from the pages of the University Magazine, but we must thank the author for the history of the career of “Tiger Roche,” and many more of those aristocratic ruffians who made Dublin what the Italians term “Una casa del Diavolo.” Nevertheless, it is sad to think, that in getting rid of such scoundrels as the “Pinkindies,” “Sweaters,” and “Chalkers,” we should also sacrifice all that constitute the greatness of a city, its manufactures, and its marts. Who is there, on reading the description of the Liberties “sixty years ago,” will not agree with us?

“The Liberties,” says our anonymous author, “contained formerly a population of 40,000 souls, who had obtained a high degree of opulence by the establishment of the silk and woollen manufacture among them. About seventy years ago they had 3,400 looms in active employment; and in 1791 there were 1200 silk looms alone.”

Most unquestionably, a reform of public morals did not, and could not, involve the sacrifice of so much prosperity, and we would not ascribe it to any other than one, now universally admitted to be the sole cause of all our evils—the absence of consumers—the want of a fostering domestic legislature, and the ruinous spirit of absenteeism, which was then so uncommon. The contrast between the present state of this quondam region of wealth and manufacture, and its present aspect, is painfully true:

“Of this famous and flourishing community, nothing remains at the present day but large houses, with stone fronts and architectural ornaments, in ruins, in remote and obscure streets; and a small branch of the poplin and tabinet manufacture, almost exclusively confined to them, and whose beauty and excellence are well known.”

We would the author had given us a sketch of the haggard wretches who now tenant these famed emporiums; but no; it was not necessary, for everybody is aware that no city in the world contains a greater amount of pestilence and misery. From the noise of looms and shuttles, we gladly turn to a more amusing scene, the "riding of the fringes," graphically described with all its nonsense and mummery—even so, it was an evidence of the wealth of Dublin at that period, and we are prone to believe the remnant of such festivities will soon see their termination; albeit, we would not regret much the total abolition of such useless appendages as sword bearer and marshal, who derive salaries from an impoverished corporation, daily devising means to meet their liabilities.

Gambling, lotteries, statutory shoe-blacks, Ringsend cars, noddies, and jingles, are likewise graphically described; and he men of to-day will wonder much on reading, that "sixty years ago" it took no inconsiderable time to get as far as Dunleary, the "ultima Thule of citizens;" but as for Dalkey, we are rather astonished to find that the author did not notice the error into which Mr. D'Alton has fallen, calling the oratory on the island St. Benedict's, whereas Rev. Dr. Todd has clearly proved it to have been dedicated to St. Begnet. Touching the festivities and kingly court of Dalkey, we have learned as much, if not more than our author has given us, from Herbert's "Irish Varieties;" but as that book is rare, we rejoice to find the record so faithfully preserved in the present volume.

The chapter on abductions is painfully romantic—an evidence of a very sad state of society which happily can never be revived—we wonder much that the untimely fate of Miss Knox, and the subsequent death of M'Naghten, have not been made the subject of a ballad by one of our most distinguished lyrical writers, Ferguson. Pleased and delighted as we are with this amusing volume, we will not do ourselves the injustice of suppressing our opinion on what we think to be highly objectionable. In page 95, in a note to "Lord Altham's Bull," we are gravely informed "that holy poker," a miserable slang phrase, is "an implement of purgatory held in much awe." To use another slang phrase, may we ask the author was he "hard up" for a definition when he hit upon this, with which we hope he has not blistered his fingers? Absurd nonsense! there is no such thing known to Catholics; and as to the doctrine of purgatory, they seek to believe no more than great Augustin believed, when he prayed at the altar erected at his mother's grave-side, and carried out her pious wish that she would be remembered in the "sacrifice." The book of the Confessions is at hand, and we cannot forbear transcribing the passage:

"Namque illa imminente die resolutionis suæ, non cogitavit suum corpus sumptuose contegi, aut condiri aromatibus: aut monumentum electum concupivit, aut curavit sepulchrum patrum. Non ista mandavit nobis, sed tantummodo memoriam sui, ad altare tuum fieri desideravit, unde sciret dispensari victimam sanctam."

Such is and has been Catholic doctrine on this subject, collected from pure sources, and not from the heathenish orgies so well, and alas! so truly, described in the chapter on "executions." We drop the question, however, in the most anxious hope that both author and publisher will entitle themselves to a place in purgatory, and find out that they were somewhat deceived while in these upper regions. There is also another passage at page 155, which we could have wished suppressed altogether; we allude to the narrative describing the infamous Farrell's "emancipation from the bonds of superstition"—in other words, his adoption of Tom Paine's tenets. It would be idle to speak of this impure ruffian's change of religion, for religion he had none; and while on this subject, we are not a little surprised at the omission of Arthur O'Leary's name from among those who flourished "sixty years ago." Of all men who fought hard to crush the philosophisms of the French school, none did more valuable service than this Rev. Divine, whose attic salt effectually destroyed whatever of these grovelling reptiles had got into the hearts of our countrymen. Such, however, are the only blemishes in these pages, to which, as Catholics, we can justly take exception; and as we hope to see "sixty years ago" passing through a second edition, we would fain have them expunged, for of a certainty, a book that should be in everybody's hands, ought not contain a single syllable reflecting on the religion of the masses, even though such reflection be not intended.

The chapter on Wicklow insurgents, and the career of Corbett, is bald enough, but we would not, perhaps, make the observation, if we were not in possession of all the information which Dr. Madden has given us on these interesting subjects; but we leave the whole matter, including Lord Clare's funeral, in the hands of the newspaper editors. As a specimen of our author's style, and a description of a procession day in Dublin "sixty years ago," we extract the following passage; and before doing so, we must bear testimony to the beautiful typography of the volume, printed in Dublin, and reflecting much credit on the publisher, who gives considerable employment to artists and printers, who else might be begging in our streets.

"Every one of the twenty-five corporations was preceded by a large vehicle, drawn by the most splendid horses that could be bought or borrowed; indeed all were eager to lend the best they had. On these carriages were borne the implements of the respective trades at which the artisans worked as they advanced. The weavers fabricated ribbons of various gay colours, which were sent floating among the crowd; the printers struck off hand-bills, with songs and odes prepared for the occasion, which were also thrown about in the same manner; the smiths blew their bellows, hammered on their anvils, and forged various implements; and every corporation, as it passed, was seen in the exercise of its peculiar trade. They were accompanied by persons representing the various natures and personages of their crafts. Thus, the shoemakers had a person representing St. Crispin, with his last; the brewers, St. Andrew with his cross; * * * the merchants, who exist under the patronage of the Trinity, could not without profanation attempt any personal representation; but they exhibited a large shamrock as the emblem furnished by St. Patrick himself, while they were also accompanied by a large ship on wheels, navigated by real sailors" (pp. 52, 53).

Oh! Dublin, Dublin, quantum mutata! thy merchants and quays present a sorry spectacle now, and the ware-rooms of thy traders are the receptacles of swarming misery, unvisited, save by the ministers of religion, the sisters of charity, and that most overlooked of all hard-working men, the dispensary doctor.

Our English Vice-Kings.

THE first chief governor of "the English interest" in Ireland was John, Earl of Moreton (afterwards king John), who was entitled by his father, Henry II., "Lord of Ireland," in 1177. Before him various knights of the Invaders had commanded their fellows here, under the titles of Lord Wardens, Lord Justices, and Procurators. Prince John retained the title for seventeen years, De Lacy, De Courcy, and other noblemen serving as his deputies.

In John's reign, Meiler Fitzhenry, a bastard of Henry II., John De Gray, Bishop of Norwich, and Henry De Loundre ("the Londoner"), Archbishop of Dublin, were the chief governors.

In the long reign of Henry III., there were twenty-three chief governors in Ireland. On the removal or death of one, the Irish Privy Council elected his successor. Maurice Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, the first native baron so elected, was chosen in 1272—just one hundred years after "the Invasion."

Under Edward I., there were eighteen governors, of whom Stephen De Fulburn, a Norman, Bishop of Waterford, was the most distinguished. In Edward II.'s reign the lord lieutenantancy seems to have first been conferred on the Mortimers, Earls of March, who were descended on the female side from the M'Murroghs; of this family seven held the office of lord lieutenant at various periods, from 1317 to 1423.

In 1328, Roger Outlaw, prior of Kilmainham, was lord justice for Edward III., and his salary was £500 per annum. In this reign, Lionel, Duke of Clarence, being lord lieutenant, summoned the parliament at Kilkenny in 1367, which passed the famous anti-Irish statute. It is to be supposed that Edward regretted Clarence's act, as Ormond, Kildare, and Desmond, though "degenerate English," governed under him in the latter part of his reign.

The chief governors under Richard II. were the Mortimers, the favorite De Vere, and the royal Dukes Gloucester and Surrey. Richard, in his folly, created De Vere Marquis of Dublin and Duke of Ireland, and made him a grant, for him and his heirs for ever, of the entire island.

Under Henry IV., V., and VI. the Butlers and Talbots were the two families that most frequently governed. Two or three dukes of the blood royal are scattered among their names, but these were only nominal ones.

Under Edward VI., and Richard III., the Geraldines of Kildare and Desmond were most frequently in power. In these reigns, this family grew to such importance, that neither Henry VII., nor at first Henry VIII., dared to depose them. After "Silken Thomas's" rebellion in 1534, however, no native was lord justice or lord lieutenant until 1639, in the reign of Charles I., when Robert, Lord Dillon of Kilkenny west, was sworn into the first named office.

It was in 1494, and Henry VII.'th's reign, that Sir Edward Poynings, an English lawyer, as deputy, summoned the parliament at Drogheda, where it was decided that no act should be passed through the legislature of "the Pale" without first having been submitted to the English Privy Council.

It was in 1541 that Henry VIII., through the instrumentality of Sir Anthony St. Leger, was elected king of Ireland "with all jurisdiction, power, and royal authority." Sir Anthony is, therefore, properly the first English vice-king in Ireland.

Under the four Tudor sovereigns, the chief nobles of England, Sidneys, Sussex's, and Essex's were lord lieutenants of Ireland.

Under the two first Stuarts, the Planters and Pacificators, were most frequently raised to this dignity, as—Chichester, Strafford, Parsons, and Borlase.

During the first twelve years of Charles II.'s reign, there were governors under the parliament and governors under the king. Cromwell himself, Ireton, Lambert, Fleetwood, and Henry Cromwell for the one, Ormond and Clanrickarde for the other. After the restoration, Monek and Ormond, Berkely and Essex, were the most noted viceroys.

Under James II., the longest vice-reign is that of Talbot, Earl of Tyrconnell, a brave soldier, but without genius.

Under William and Mary, with one exception (Murrough Boyle, Viscount Blessington, lord justice in 1696), our chief governors were all Englishmen—Porters and Paulets. In Queen Anne's reign, with the exception of the Duke of Ormond, lord lieutenant in 1702–3–4, and again in 1710, the case was the same.

From Anne's death to the union, we had seventy-nine governors of all sorts, lieutenant-justices, and deputies. Of these, in every case, the lieutenants were English, and in a very few the deputies Irish. The Duke of Portland was viceroy in 1782, and Lord Cornwallis in 1800. It was under these four score governors that Dublin was baptized with that litany of foreign names which speaks from every corner of our streets and squares, the reality of our provincialism. A local parliament gave the capital vitality, but the foreign court gave it titles. The Dorset's, Cavendish's, Grafton's, Sackville's, Richmond's, what propriety have they as divisional titles for an Irish metropolis? It was surely bad enough to have had the men who bore them among us for a time, but thus to perpetuate their good for-nothing names, is unbearable. How soon will the pride of the citizens of Dublin revolt against this anomaly?

In the half century that has elapsed since "the union" of the two countries, the office of lord lieutenant of Ireland has been upheld, although it is easy to see, very much against the will of our centralizing rulers. Indeed, it is but a couple of years back that its demolition was seriously advocated by English politicians, especially those of the economic school. Irishmen, however, do not complain of it as an incumbrance—on the contrary, they look upon it, and rightly, as a British recognition of our separate nationality. Neither Scotland nor the principality know any such institution. There is not even a resemblance of royalty on the thrones once filled by Bruce and Llewellyn. Here it is different. Haddington's and Mulgrave's, De Grey's and Ponsonby's, the commission of each is a confession that we are not one people with the English, and are not to be.

The dangers to be dreaded from viceregal influence in a city without a large resident upper class, and a country without a senate, are manifold. But at the same time it is to be considered, that an Irish vice-royalty at the head of a resident nobility, or an English one with an independent Irish Privy Council, would be the very best form of aristocratic government, short of native kingship. The institution, therefore, is most desirable in our state, not so much for the paltry patronage it may afford to the artisans of the capital, its fetes, or its fashions, as for the use which could be made of it, by a patriotic gentry and an unpurchaseable parliament. It must, therefore, be watched and guarded for the future uses of the nation.

Three Chroniclers of Eri.

I.—CORMAC MAC CUILLENAN, ARCHBISHOP OF CASHEL.

In the first year of the tenth century, that is, in 901, Cormac M'Cullenan, Archbishop of Cashel, and the heir of the Munster kings, found himself upon the throne of that important principedom. He was then advanced beyond life's middle stage; he was homaged for his power by the chiefs, praised for his learning by the bards, and respected by all classes for his munificence and his charities. The son of a long famous hire, the descendant of the Olcobars, Cenfelads, and Anguses, possessed, moreover, of real personal merit, every omen seemed to conspire in promising him a long, prosperous, and peaceful reign. The general state of Ireland at the time of his accession, shows, however, on a clear scrutiny, many elements threatening conflict and disadvantage.

Very early in the preceding century the Danes had commenced their persevering invasions on this kingdom. Nursed in the land of the Pine Tree and the Frith, that people might be said to have been by nature adventurers on the seas. Unlike their historic predecessors, the eastern voyagers, their delight was not in traffic but in plunder, their pleasure not in discovering new lands and knowing strange people, but in rifling the one and subjugating the other. Ireland (so placed by the All-wise) was on their route to rapine and piracy in the west and south, and peculiarly exposed to their indomitable warfare; hence the ninth century had been one long day of battle, between the Irish people and those barbarians. The effects of this centennial struggle, are clear. The able-bodied were constantly in harness, the women and the helpless constantly in terror. The schools were desolate, the scholars exiles. Strabo, the biographer of Saint Gall, a writer of that time, says, that migration had become "a second nature to the Scots," and his cotemporary, Erriek of Auxerre, "that almost all Ireland, with a vast train of philosophers, moved to France in the ninth century."* Religion suffered in the overthrow of letters and peace. The sacred places of the land no longer knew themselves, and the will of every man was set up in opposition to the laws and obligations of society. Yet the tradition of a more Christian time survived through this chaos, possessed in a few fervent souls for the salvation of many.

When Cormac began to reign in Munster, Flan Sinan was monarch of Ireland, and Reginald M'Yvor king of the Danes of Dublin. The monarch had already sat on the throne twenty years, a reign which was protracted the longest of any recorded in our annals. Between him and the immediate ancestors of Cormac there had been disagreement and strife respecting the tribute which Munster was to pay into the national treasury. The kings of the south considering themselves, perhaps, to be over taxed, or thinking that subsidies levied for emergencies had been placed on them as imposts, resolved, at the earliest opportunity, to throw them off. Cormac was heir to this controversy as well as to the crown, and as it proved the great obstacle to the prosperity of his reign, so it occasioned its fatal termination.

A churchman king will have churchmen courtiers. Among those of Cormac, Flaherty, abbot of Iniscathy, is represented as the most influential. He was a man of a moving spirit, intrepid, and martial. The Danish wars, as well as the Crusades, were productive of such natures—for they identified battle and duty to ecclesiastics—made friaries so many fortresses, and the great stake in the struggle the security of worship and the preservation of the faith. But the ambition which, rightly directed, might have made abbot Flaherty a hero or a martyr, when degraded to the design of a provincial revolt, renders him only a vulgar disturber of the peace of his country. In the year 906, Cormac (it is thought mainly through his advice) refused totally the Munster tribute to the monarch, which act was the signal for civil war. Both parties, therefore, prepared themselves for the issue.

Before coming to the throne, Cormac had been engaged in the composition of those historical annals known as the "Psalter of Cashel."* This work has never been published as a whole, though extracts from it are given in most of our historical books.† It is founded chiefly on a much more ancient compilation known as the "Psalter of Tara." In the mundian ages, it is feared the author has leaned too much on legends and traditions. He is charged with receiving the accounts of the Gadhelians meeting Moses in Egypt, and the Scots serving under a Polycornus in Greece. Bishop Stillingfleet following the theory of Usher as to the heterodoxy of the ancient Christians of this island as well as of Britain, has thought proper to devote the Fifth Book of his "Antiquities" to damaging in this the authenticity of the "Psalter," so that by showing it an unstaple authority in the Pagan times, he may pass it over contemptuously as an authority on church antiquities. So illogical an inference as this was perhaps never before drawn. After instituting a comparison between Geoffry of Monmouth and our Cormac, he "leaves the reader to judge whether Geoffry hath not been hardly dealt with, when such authors are preferred so much before him."‡ In this train of assumption and scepticism he has been followed by Pinkerton§ and Ledwich,|| the latter basing his unbelief in Cormac's works on the ground that they had never been published. That ground for doubt has been partly removed since his days.

That Utilitarian theorists and French philosophers should reject all tradition as futile, perplexing, and unprofitable, is not to be wondered at. But that men who have made history their study, and Christianity their vocation, should follow so ill an example, is altogether extraordinary. They, of all men, should feel and remember that there was a time before stiles and vellum were used; events, which though never written by the hand of man on the page of papyrus, are yet written in the book of nature, and vouched for in the book of Revelation. They should have remembered that the art of chronicling things done was not always in use, nor known to every people; that paper and the printing press are modern inventions. If they think deeply they will find human society subsisting on a basis of tradition; the tradition of the unity of the origin of the human race common to every people, savage and civilized, is the main bond of universal order; the tradition of the dissemination of Christianity by apostles, whose names alone are known for certainty, has been long the corner-stone of faith in many a Christian country. The tradition of ancient alliances and mutual benefaction has done much to preserve nations in peace with one another. The tradition of a future state, in which the good shall be known to, and dwell for ever with each other, is as a pillar of fire guiding us on in the desert of this weary, worldly life. Tradition is the inseparable servant of faith, and the elder brother of history. It is the Ishmael of our world of antiquities—a rover in solitary places, speaking with strange voices, and browned and clad after the fashion of its life. Whenever it speaks to you distinctly hearken to it reverently, not that all tradition is venerable, nor yet respectable. Wild tales of former ages, with the aspect of a theory, are always to be suspected, and of this class, perhaps, are most or all of king Cormac's statements about the eastern peregrinations of our earliest predecessors in this island. But as an authority on the historic ages nearer to his own time, the learned do not only put him above Geoffry, as Stillingfleet complains, but they place him beside Bede, the first annalist of the Anglo-Saxons, for accuracy of research. In the comparison, Cormac at present will be disadvantaged, his "Psalter" being still in Irish—but this impediment to his vindication may ere long be removed.

* The use of the word "Psalter" in this sense is supposed to have originated in the habits of the old clerical authors, of binding up their MSS. with their Psalters for greater security.

† Bishop Nicholson—Historical Libraries—mentions a defective copy of 272 pages, in the Bodleian Collection at Oxford. Sir James Ware had a copy in his possession, which he considered three hundred years old, that is, a transcript of the fourteenth century.

The only other work of our prince-bishop which has been preserved, is the Glossary explanatory of the obscurities of the "Psalter," and the words of the early Irish language which had become obsolete in his time. This is a work of the greatest interest to the student of the etomological monuments of antiquity, and looking upon it we cannot but exclaim, how ancient must be that language which a thousand years ago was so old as to need such elaborate elucidations!

This work will soon be rendered accessible to the public by the enterprize of our indefatigable "Archeological Society."

Of the manner of Cormac's death there is difference among the authorities, some saying he fell in battle against the Danes, and some that he was slain at Moy Albe, in the campaign against Flan in 906. But the more propable account is that he was slain at Bealach Muchna in 908.* Caradoc of Lhancarvan, a Welsh annalist of the same century, favours this version, and our native annalists chiefly concur with him. They add, that the Abbot Flaherty having escaped from the custody of the monarch Falan, by whom he had been captured, tamed the warlike passions of his nature, and lived a life full of atoning virtues, thereby cancelling in part the evils he had caused to Munster.

If we recall Europe of the tenth century to our minds, the sunken state of its rulers, and the apparent declension of the church, we will not fail to assign a conspicuous place to this royal prelate. Whether all the works which tradition assigns to him were really his, or whether in some cases he has been confounded with his successor, Cormac M'Carthy, quite enough of positive evidence remains to warrant us in regarding him as an extensive linguist, a zealous bishop, and a real patron of learning.† His legacies to several churches, of vestments, chalices, and ounces of silver, enumerated in our native annals, show a spirit of true princely munificence. That he was brave as a Celtic king should be, the manner of his reign and death attest. No single charge of oppression, no assertion of tyranny has been recorded against him, an exemption which belongs to few indeed of his class, in those ages or in our own.

II.—MARIANUS SCOTUS.

"Without comparison he was the most learned man of his age, an excellent historian, a famous man at calculations, and a solid divine."—Sigebert of Glembores.

MARIANUS, called Scotus from his nation, was born in the year 1028, in this country. He has himself given us the fact and the date, which are confirmed by his continuator, Florence of Worcester, but neither go into any particulars of his family or his early years.*

He studied in the school of Clonard, under the Regent, Tighernach, to whom he confesses himself greatly indebted for his historical lore.†

At the age of twenty-four, he tells us he "retired from the world"—in other words, entered on a monastic life.

But still communicating with his former instructor, he became so animated by the adventures of Irishmen abroad, as related to him by Tighernach, that he resolved to imitate their example, and accordingly set out on his travels with the double purpose of learning and of teaching. This was in the year 1056, while he was yet in his twenty-eighth year.

On the first day of August (being the Feast of St. Peter in chains), in that same year, he sailed up the Rhine and landed at Cologne. There was then there a convent of his countrymen, under the invocation of St. Martin, with whom he took up his abode. In this grand old German city he continued with these monks, probably, perfecting himself in his studies, for as yet he had not received priests' orders. It is not unlikely that some faults of temper or flaws in his belief prevented his ordination, which did not take place until seven years after the date he assigns for his farewell to the world. But over the cause of his long probation there lies an irremovable lapse of ages.

In 1058, the town and monastery of Panderborn being destroyed by a conflagration, Paternus, one of the religious, whose vows forbid him to leave his cell, had refused to retreat before the flames, and was consumed in their advance, though the mat on which he lay escaped unscorched. The story of his devotion soon spread through France and Germany, and hundreds hastened to the spot where the martyrdom had taken place. Amongst the rest Marianus, whose curiosity seems to have been ever active, visited the ruins. There he met with many eminent personages, and amongst others with the Abbot of Fulda, who, pleased with his deportment and learning, invited him to become one of his subjects. This he agreed to; but first he went to Wurtzburg, where, in 1059, he received holy orders: from thence he proceeded to fulfil his promise to the Abbot.

Fulda, "one of the most famous seminaries in Germany,"‡ owed its institution to the munificence of Charlemagne; it was conspicuous among the "Universities" which that monarch gloried so much to rear. Early distinguished by his especial favour, and continuing to receive the countenance of his successors, it became to the Germans what Paris was to the Gauls, and Bologna to the Italians. Like these, it was also from the beginning an abode of Irish learning and religion. Here Marianus spent ten years, the busiest of his life.

‡ Harton's Hist. Poetry. Passim.

To these years of seclusion we owe the valuable chronicle which bears his name. In chronological order it proceeds from the formation of the Christian era until the author's own time (1083). It is unquestionably the most minute and authoritative work of its class ever accomplished by a single hand. A late learned historian has pronounced it as his opinion, that it "exceeds anything of the kind which the middle ages have produced, and would appear still more respectable were it published entire."* "During his long continued leisure," says William of Malmesbury, "he examined the writers on chronology, and discovered the disagreement of the Cycles of Dionysius the little with the evangelical computation."† This chronicle received slight additions from the hand of Florence of Worcester, who survived Marianus thirty-two years, and it is not unfrequently quoted as his work, whereas he is author only of a moiety towards the end.‡

In the year 1069, Marianus was "removed" from Fulda to Mentz, on the Friday before Palm Sunday, and at Mentz "was again shut up on the tenth of July." It appears that he, like Paternus, had taken a vow of strict seclusion from the world, and that at the latter place as at the former, an inclusorium or penitential cell had been prepared for him. These constructions were not uncommon in the feudal ages, and usually consisted of an isolated cell, surrounded by a high wall. Often monastic recusants were condemned to them for offences against the brotherhood or religion, but not unfrequently they were voluntarily chosen abodes of such as wished in the midst of life to be in death. In his solitude at Mentz, Marianus continued seventeen years, until he died.

These seventeen solitary years he devoted after the completion of his chronicle, to translations and transcriptions of the sacred Scriptures. "He has also left notes," says Lanigan, "on all the Epistles of St. Paul, annexed to a copy of them translated by himself in the year 1079, which is extant in the Imperial Library of Vienna."§ These copies of the sacred writings were then of great value and great service in the city of Mentz, and doubtless its good church-going people often paused before the wall of the inclusorium and blessed its tenant in their hearts with awe and wonder.

In 1086 the recluse expired. His body was then taken from its lonely tenement, and borne to the churchyard of St. Martin, without the city, where it was solemnly interred. Saving the funeral of the father of printing in 1466, Mentz has not seen the burial of a man more devoted to letters.

In truth, this seems but a sad story enough. Yet should not my readers suppose that the chronicler's life was joyless because he lived alone, or pity his loneliness lest they overlook the nature of his temper. Doubtless there are men whose constitution fits them for solitude, and whose reason, unlike the instinct of vegetables, turns for vitality to the shade; men to whom society would be slavery, and the conversation of the world a goading vexation. It was one of the wise provisions of mediæval society to provide cells for such men, and to respect their unsociality. It would be cruelty, the worst cruelty, to enforce them to live in the crowded atmosphere of common life. One of this class of beings, we opine, was MARIANUS SCOTUS.

III.—TIGERNAC O'BRIEN.

IN the eleventh century Irish mind first took that strong historic tendency in which it has ever since indulged. The institution of sir-names in the tenth gave genealogy a place in the land, while the wars against the Danes, and the traditions of travellers, from the Continent, introduced military and ecclesiastical recollections, of such a gratifying character, that they necessarily entered into the very core of the Irish race.

Of the writings of this century which—besides those of the two illustrious authors last described—has descended to us in an unquestionable shape, is the annals that, from their author, bear the name of Tigernac. Of this Tigernac and his work, the authors who have treated on his times afford us these particles of information :

He was of the family of the O'Brien's, of "the sept of Muiredhaigh" (of Roscommon).* His birth was probably in the first quarter of this century. About the middle of the century, he was chosen erenach or keeper of the church lands. This office was open to laymen and sub-deacons irrespectively, and was elective in the gift of the sept in whose territory the lands lay. These lands were the support of the clergy, the maintenance of such as fled for refuge, and the supply of the hospitalities of the foundation to which they were granted. The erenach was bound to live on them and cultivate them—he was forbidden to rent them under any pretence—and was bound on his appointment to their charge to pay a subsidy to the bishop of the diocese, and to repair the churches. The office seems to have been peculiar to Ireland, though glimpses of it are obtained in Wales and Scotland, doubtless introduced there by the Irish missionaries.†

Among the many princely foundations of Christian origin in Ireland, Clonmacnoise was one of the most magnificent. Its ruins still stand a few miles from Athlone on the Shannon. Its site was on and between a range of small hills, flanked by extensive morasses, and fronted by the river. St. Kieran, "the carpenter," one of the most eminent of early saints, first designed its erection, and the greatest nobles of Ireland vied with each other in contributing to its completion. O'Melaghlin, Prince of Meath, founded Temple Righ; the O'Connor Don founded the Temple called from his name; Temple O'Kelly bears the name of another chief; Temple Finian was built by M'Carthy More, and Temple M'Dermott by M'Dermott. Besides these were four or five other churches, and not far off a capacious nunnery. Two Round Towers and a large cemetery, and a circle of crosses to which pilgrims resorted on the ninth of September, to perform their devotions, and the dwellings of the religious and the students completed this famous seat of piety and learning. The erenach, on whom as we have seen devolved the three-fold duties of steward, entertainer of strangers, and repairer of churches, must have had quite enough to do in his office.

From his office as erenach of Clonmacnoise, Tigernac was chosen abbot of Roscommon. If he had not previously been in minor orders, he must have been then ordained. This removal was probably in 1052, as in that year Eachtlan, the abbot set down as his predecessor, departed from this life. In his person this abbacy was united with Clonmacnoise, as it had been once before, in the person of the Abbot of Murchoe, who died in 979. The abbey was very rich and ancient, being founded by St. Coeman about the middle of the sixth century.

It was evidently while abbot of Roscommon that our author wrote his annals. He commences them three centuries and a-half before the Christian era, writing them, it is stated, partly in Latin and partly in Irish. He continued them to his own time—the last entry being in the year of his own death. Various continuations were afterwards put to them, and when, in lapse of ages, some of the sheets became illegible or lost, the learned restored them. They were first published entire in a Latin translation, by the younger O'Connor, in the second tome of his "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores." They occupy over 300 pages of that quarto. All our best modern historians warmly approve of them for their accuracy and research. The compliments they have received on these heads would fill many pages if reproduced. They display not only a sound knowledge of Irish history, but a good acquaintance with the cotemporary events in Roman and British history. They are accompanied by learned chronological and encyclical notes, which show the industry and skill of the author in such calculations.

In 1087, Tigernac succeeded the abbot Cormac as comarbh (successor) of St. Kieran in the government of Clonmacnoise. This great office he did not long retain, for, say the Four Masters :

"Anno 1088. Tigernac O'Brion (Comarbh of Kieran of Clonmacnoise and of St. Coeman), a very learned man, and well skilled in history, died."

So passed away a true scholar, and one of the true Chroniclers of Eri.

Vesper Hymn.

TO THE GUARDIAN ANGELS OF IRELAND.

I.

SINKING afar o'er the deep's mighty fountains,
While the sun's rayless brow upon night's bosom faints;
Descend Guardian Spirits! encamp on our mounfains
And lovingly watch o'er the Island of Saints.

II.

And while to His ear rise your "thrice holy" numbers,*
May an aura divine thro' night's solitudes blow,
Fill with strange music our many-dreamed slumbers,
And wrap the full heart in oblivion of woe.

III.

When sleep, sorrow's tomb with her flow'ry wand sealing,
The soft pall of silence o'er Life's battle flings,
Then glimpses of Eden in visions revealing,
O'ersadow our rest with your sheltering wings.

IV.

And let us in dreams of the soul's native regions,
Behold—what saint only or poet may say—
Spear, banner, and falchion of cherubim legions
Proudly waved in the blaze of angelic array!

V.

From the rill-gushing mountains, the thrones of your glory,
The tow'rs of your watching, the homes of your love,
Look down on our slavery's tear-blotted story,
And rush to our rescue with strength from above.

* The Trisagion.

VI.

Ere the black steed of Famine,* in tempest descending,
The young harvest trample still greenly that springs,
Oh! yet o'er the vales' precious fruitfulness bending,
Expand the vast shields of your emerald wings.

VII.

And ere shroud-mantled Pestilence' noisome breath wither
The flow'rs thro' which lately young Health, smiling, trod,
Whence the tree of Life blossoms, Raphaël! oh hither,
On balm-dropping pinion, come, "Healing of God!"

VIII.

Till from Famine and Plague and worse Thraldom emerging,
More purified, chainless and chaste'n'd we stand:
All hearts to one centre, united, converging,
And Love, Peace, and Plenty, replenish the land.

IX.

Come! come! to us Angels of Hope and of Healing,
With chaplet of snowdrop† and plumes of the dove—
And like rainbow-clad show'rs to the fainting earth stealing,
Come! green-winged Mercy and fire-arrow'd Love!

A SHORT

History of the Irish Franciscans.

XVIII. DOWN.—The convent of Down was built in the episcopal and maritime city of Down, in Ulster, and was placed in the Custody of Drogheda by the General Chapter of Narbonne, in 1260. From its first foundation it was always a nursery of piety. It was here that John Duns Scotus, the subtle doctor, assumed the habit of the Franciscan order, and he was called Duns from the name of his native city, Down, which was thus abbreviated. The friars were first expelled from this convent by John Brittan, an English Protestant, who, with a number of wicked followers, invaded the place in the year 1569. The friars were apprised of his approach, and saved themselves by flight, but returned again; and in the following year, 1570, he made another attack on the convent, hanged all the friars he caught, and almost totally destroyed the establishment, with the exception of the church, which was kept as a court-house for the English judges of assize. It remained desolate from the time of its suppression till 1627, when Father Francis Matthew being provincial, a residence was erected in the vicinity. Father Henry Melan, a theologian and excellent preacher, was appointed superior of the new establishment; he having discharged the offices of vicar, provincial, diffinitor, and custos, continues to labour strenuously in the salvation of souls. The foundation of this convent is attributed by some to Africa, the daughter of the king of Man (Godred), and widow of John De Courcy, Earl of Ulster, but I rather think that the founder was M'Ginnis, whose posterity now inherit the lordship of Iveagh, and are branched out into several noble families. M'Ginnis erected a family sepulchre in this monastery. I find that a chapter was held here in the year 1313.

XIX. MULTIFARNAM.—The convent of Multifarnam is built in a village of that name, in a solitary place surrounded with lakes, in Meath,* and in the Meath diocese. It is supposed to have been founded in the year 1270, or according to others, in 1672, and was formerly placed under the Custody of Drogheda. It passed into the possession of the Observants in the first year of the reformation of the order, that is, in 1460; but it never was more flourishing than since the beginning of the persecution and the spread of heresy, for not only was it a place of refuge to the old and infirm friars of the province, but was as it were an ark in the deluge of persecution, for from its first foundation it never was deserted for any length of time by the religious. We are not, however, to suppose that it escaped the English persecution; it was twice burned, twice plundered, and many of the friars were taken and imprisoned in the years 1590, 1601, 1604, 1613, 1614, and 1617. Those who escaped, however, always returned immediately, and there never were wanting to the present day, many to labour strenuously for the salvation of the faithful. The first founder of this convent was William Herbert, alias De la Mare; and when that family became almost extinct, they were succeeded as patrons by the illustrious family of the Nugents, which is now branched out with the families of the Earls of Westmeath and several other noble families likewise. Their tombs, as well as those of the nobility of the neighbouring counties, are placed in the convent since the days of old. Provincial chapters were held here in the years 1472, 1527, and 1626.†

XX. TRIM.—The convent of Trim is built in the town of that name, on the river Boyne, in the diocese of Meath. The building was a very beautiful one. It was placed under the Custody of Drogheda, by the general chapter of Narbonne, and passed into the hands of the Observants in 1525. It was suppressed and laid desolate in the third year of the reign of Elizabeth, by the heretics, and all the buildings destroyed, with the exception of the church, which was converted into a court-house. It remained vacant from the time of the suppression till the year 1629, when, by order of the chapter held in Limerick, a residence was built in the town, and Father Paul Brenan, a preacher, appointed superior. The first founder of this convent is supposed to have been William Rufus de Burgo. This event took place while he was engaged in warfare with Hugh de Lacy, whom, with the assistance of the king's troops, he conquered about the year 1228. Some writers attribute the foundation of this house to King John of England, but this cannot be the case, as he left Ireland for England in the year 1210, that is, four years before the Friars Minors arrived in Ireland. A chapter was held here in 1524.

XXI. ELPHIN.—The convent of Elphin was founded in the episcopal see of that name in Connaught, but there is no record existing to show who the founder was. It was placed in the Custody of Nenagh by the general chapter of Narbonne, in 1260. In the reign of Elizabeth, in 1563, the Protestant bishop of that see drove out the friars, and did not leave one stone of the convent standing, and with the materials built a residence for himself on the site. It remains vacant ever since.

XXII. ENNIS.—The convent of Inish Clanrauda was built in a town of that name, in the diocese of Killaloe, in Munster, about the year 1247, and was placed under the Custody of Nenagh in 1260. It passed into the hands of the Observants in 1460, the first year of the reformation of the order. In the reign of Elizabeth, the persecution raged fiercely, and the friars were expelled from the convent, and the buildings were converted into a court-house and a parish church, and thus it remains vacant from the time of the suppression. The building itself, however, is preserved entire, under the protection of Donal O'Brian, Earl of Thomond. The first founder of this convent was the Prince O'Brien, whose posterity afterwards became Earls of Thomond, Barons of Inchiquin, and was divided into several other noble families. These have selected this convent for their burial place; and many other nobles of Thomond also sleep there. Chapters were held here in the years 1507 and 1543.*

XXIII. BUTTEVANT.—The convent of Buttevant was built in a town of the same name, in the diocese of Cork (now in Cloyne), in Munster, in the year 1251, and was placed under the Custody of Cork in 1260. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the friars were several times driven away from it, and some of them taken and imprisoned. All the buildings, with the exception of the church, were ruined, and that was preserved on account of the tombs of the nobility there buried, but all the images were broken. Still some of the friars continued to reside there, partly in the conventual buildings or their ruins, and partly in the neighbourhood. The first founder of this convent was Barry, Viscount of Buttevant, whose posterity is now branched out into the families of the Viscounts of Barrymore and many other noble families, whose tombs are placed in the convent. The chieftain M'Donagh also, and many others of the nobility of the neighbouring territory, are buried there from the times of old.

XXIV. ARDFERT.—The convent of Ardfert was built in the episcopal see of that name in Munster, in the year 1253, and was placed under the Custody of Cork in 1260. It passed into the hands of the Observants in the year 1517, but in the beginning of the persecution in 1584, it was occupied by the heretics and destroyed, and has remained so ever since, though some of the friars have always resided in the neighbourhood as far as the persecution would allow them. One of them was trampled to death by horses and slept in the Lord. The first founder of this convent was the Lord M'Morris Kiary of the Geraldines. His descendants are now Barons of Lixnaw, and their tombs as well as those of many more of the nobility of Clanmorish and the neighbouring territory, are in the convent.

XXV. DUNDALK.—The convent of Dundalk was

* The beautiful ruins of this convent still form the greatest ornament of the town of Ennis. The Protestant church is formed out of a part of the nave, but the chancel with its beautiful window remains in ruins. A small conventual establishment of Franciscans was formed here in the year 1830. A portion of the suburbs of the town is still called Clonrode, and a fair of Clonrode held, the only remembrance I believe of the ancient name of the town, Inish Clanrauda.

* Now in the County of Westmeath.

† A Franciscan establishment still exists in Multifarnam, and a new residence for the religious has been lately built. The ancient church, in part, is used for the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice. "This religious establishment," says the compiler of Lewis's Dictionary, "is remarkable for having been maintained in its early splendour until a later period than any other, for though dissolved by Henry VIII., those to whom it was granted did not dispossess the monks, who, in 1622, even attempted the establishment of a branch of their society at Mullingar; and here they preserved all the images, pictures, relics, &c., which had previously belonged to their church, and their full choir and hospitable household."

built in the maritime town of that name in the diocese of Armagh, in Ulster, but we have no record of the founder. It was placed under the Custody of Drogheda in the year 1260, and passed into possession of the Observantines in the year 1556. In seven years after the reformation, the friars were expelled by the heretics and the convent seized on and ruined. It remained vacant till the year 1626, when Father Francis Matthew being provincial, a residence was erected, and Father Peter Taaffe, a theologian and preacher, was appointed superior. A Chapter was held in the convent in 1232. In the year 1315 the Scots invaded Ulster, and took and burned the town of Dundalk, plundered the convent of its books, chalices, ornaments, and everything of value, and cruelly put to death twenty-three of the inmates.

XXVI. CASTLEDERMOT.—The convent of Castledermot was built in a town of that name in the diocese of Dublin, in Leinster, but we have no record of the name of the founder.* It was placed under the Custody of Dublin in the year 1260. It was seized on by the heretics, towards the close of the reign of Henry VIII., and it remain desolate and in ruins at the present day.

XXVII. CLARE GALWAY.—The convent of Clare, De Claro, or as Pisanus calls it, Clarowy, Vulgo Clare Galway, in a village of that name in the diocese of Anaghdown, in Connaught, now united to the diocese of Tuam, was built before the year 1260, but the name of the founder is unknown. It was placed under the Custody of Nenagh in the year 1260. About the year 1589 it was occupied by the heretics and ruined, and thus remains to the present day.†

XXVIII. CLANE.—The convent of Clane, called also the Garden of the English, was built in the year 1258, in a village of that name in the diocese of Kildare, in Leinster, and was placed under the Custody of Dublin in 1260. In the invasion of heresy in the third year of Edward VI., king of England, it was first suppressed and afterwards ruined, and so remains to the present day. The first founders of this house are supposed to have been the illustrious family of the Shertons;‡ and when they were extinct, the noble family of the Wogans became its protectors, and after them the noble family of the Rochfords. Fourteen knights of that family in succession were buried in this convent, and it was not only the burial place of that family, but of many more of the nobility of the neighbouring country. A provincial chapter was held here in the year 1345.

XXIX. WICKLOW.—The convent of Wicklow, in a maritime town of that name, in the diocese of Dublin, in Leinster, is supposed to have been founded about the year 1260, by O'Bruinne (O'Byrne), chief of Brenagh Toracham, as it was placed in the Custody of Dublin in that year. When heresy and the destruction of churches were the order of the day, it was laid in ruins, and so remains to the present. In the year 1598 the body of one of the friars was found whole and entire in this convent.

XXX. FEORE.—The convent of Feore, which Pisanus calls Mortoal Totmoy, but is now called Feore, from the name of the founder, is situated in the diocese of Kildare, in Leinster, and is supposed to have been built before 1260, as it was placed in the Custody of Dublin in that year by the general chapter of Narbonne. It was ruined by the heretics at the time of the suppression of the convents, and remains so to the present day. The illustrious family of Birmingham, otherwise called M'Meomrus, laid the foundation of this convent. This family has since branched out into several other noble families, and their tombs are in this convent.

XXXI. ROSS.—The convent of Ross was built in a maritime town of that name, on the River Barrow, in the diocese of Ferns, in Leinster. It was built some time previous to the year 1300. It was at first placed under the Custody of Cashel, but was afterwards transferred to that of Dublin in 1345. It was endowed with many privileges by several kings of England; Edward I. granted privileges to it in 1306, Edward II. in 1309, and Henry VI. in 1429. When the time of persecution came, the friars were expelled and the buildings ruined. It remained in this state till the year 1615, when Father Daniel Mooney being provincial, a residence was built in the town, and from that to this the friars labour diligently there for the salvation of souls. This place was formerly remarkable for the tomb of a certain friar who was considered a saint, also for various miraculous appearances of persons in the habit of St. Francis, who would not allow the heretics residing there to keep undisturbed possession of it. The first founder of this convent was Sir John Devereux, and he built a tomb for himself and his family there, but it is now destroyed. A chapter was held here in the year 1308.

XXXII. KINALAGHEN.—The convent of Kinalaghen, or as Pisanus calls it, Leighlin, was built in a solitary place in the diocese of Clonfert, in Connaught, and belonged to the Custody of Nenagh. It was destroyed in the time of the late wars, and so remained till the year 1615, when a residence was built there, and the friars began to restore it as far as the persecution permitted them. The house was first founded by the Burkes of Cloghine, and the tombs of that noble family, as well as of many other nobles, are situated in this convent. A chapter was held here in 1609.

XXXIII. ROSCOMMON.—The convent of Roscommon, in a town of the same name in Connaught, was first occupied by the friars in the year 1268, but the following year was burned down, and thus perished in its very infancy, for the founder died soon after, and there was no one to restore it.

XXXIV. CAVAN.—This convent was built in the town of Cavan, in the diocese of Kilmore, in Ulster, in the year 1300, and was given to the Observants in 1502. Notwithstanding the wars and persecutions, the friars held on by the convent till the year 1609, when it was occupied by the English and burned soon after, so that the walls alone remained standing. It was afterwards totally ruined, and remained desolate till 1616, when a residence was built in the neighbourhood, and Father John Gaffry, an excellent preacher and holy man, was appointed superior. His life and labours were of great advantage to the Catholic cause in these parts. The first founder of this convent was John O'Reilly, the chief of Breffny. He erected a sepulchre for himself and his posterity in this convent, and his example was followed by many more of the nobility of the country. It was in this convent that formerly dwelt the celebrated Father Eugene O'Dubhay, an apostolic preacher, a most strenuous defender

* The founder is supposed to have been Thomas, Lord of Offaly.

† The founder is supposed to have been John De Cogan. A Franciscan establishment is nestled amidst the ruins at the present day.

‡ Others say that the founder was Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice. The Jesuits' College of Clongowes is in the vicinity. of the faith against heretics, and a man of most holy life. A chapter was held here in 1557.

XXXV. CARRICK-ON-SUIR.—The Convent of Carrick was built contiguous to that town in the diocese of Lismore, and on the banks of the Suir, in the year 1336. When the persecution began it was destroyed and ruined, and remains so still. The founder was James Butler, Earl of Ormond, who “converted a castle of his in Carrick into a convent of Friars Minors.” His descendants subsequently became Earls of Ormond, Barons of Dunsany, of Cahir, and branched out into many other noble families.*

XXXVI. BANTRY.—The building of the convent of Bantry, in the diocese of Ross, was begun about the year 1320, and it was reformed by Father David Harly in the year 1432. When wars and persecution arose, it was seized on by the English in the year 1508—two of the friars being killed and the rest obliged to fly for their lives. Subsequently, in the year 1602, Daniel O’Sullivan, Earl of Beerhaven, having driven out the English in the year 1602, partially destroyed it, lest it should again become a stronghold of the enemy, promising, at the same time, to rebuild it as soon as possible. This, however, he never was able to accomplish, for he was obliged to fly into Spain and there met an early death. The founder was O’Sullivan, who built a tomb in it for himself and his posterity. O’Mathgansan, Fiorin, and many other families of the neighbourhood were also buried there.

XXXVII. IRLAGH.—The convent of Iralagh (Muckruss, Killarney), was built in a solitary place in the diocese of Ardfert, in Munster, about the year 1340, and the friars held possession of it till the year 1589, when it was occupied by the heretics, partially ruined, and some of the friars put to death. It remained uninhabited till the year 1612, when, under the provincialate of Father Maurice Ultan, it was once more occupied by the friars, and Father Thadeus Howlan appointed superior; but the persecution being violent, they were again obliged to fly in the year 1629, leaving the church in part and the dormitory entirely repaired. The first founder of this convent was Donald Thadeus M’Carthy More, Prince of Desmond, whose posterity, divided into many noble families, were buried, some here, and some in other convents of Franciscans. O’Sullivan Mor was also buried here, as well as both the O’Donohoes and many other noble men.

XXXVIII. ROSRIEL.—The convent of Rosriel was built in a retired and solitary place on the banks of a river in the diocese of Tuam, in Connaught, about the year 1351, but the name of the founder is unknown. It passed into the hands of the Observants in the year 1470. It was not destroyed in the persecution like the rest, and though the friars were several times obliged to fly from it, they always returned, and inhabited it at the present day. Chapters were held here in 1474 and 1618.†

XXXIX. KILLISH.—The convent of Killish, in the

* The first guardian of this convent was the annalist, John Clyn, who left Kilkenny in 1336, to undertake this office. He returned soon after to his own convent of Kilkenny, and died of the plague, it is supposed, in 1349. A beautiful church of the Franciscan order, built by the present Bishop of Newfoundland, Right Rev. Dr. Fleming, is one of the principal ornaments of the town of Carrick at the present day.

† In the year 1687, a Chapter was held in this convent, in which a code of new statutes was promulgated for the organization of the province. Conventual life was established, the habit was to be publicly worn, and, in fact, everything put on the same footing as in the Catholic countries of Europe.

diocese of Kildare, in Leinster, was built about the year 1393. It was suppressed in the reign of Elizabeth, and remains so to the present day. The founder of this convent was O’Cnochorir Faigly, whose descendants subsequently branched out into many noble families, were buried there. Many chieftains of the name of O’Doijin, as well as other noble personages from that neighbourhood are also buried there.

XL. KILCONNEL.—The convent of Kilconnel, in a village of that name in the diocese of Clonfert, in Connaught, was founded about the year 1353, at the instance of Malachy O’Reilly. It was transferred to the Observantines in the year 1467; and notwithstanding that heresy raged around, was always preserved entire, so that although for a time it was turned into a stronghold by the Protestants, and the friars were obliged many times to hide in the neighbourhood, still they always returned soon after to the convent, and under the protection of God, remain there to the present day, labouring diligently in the salvation of souls. The first founder of this convent was William O’Kelly O’Mayne, who there built a tomb for himself and for his posterity, and many more of the nobility of that neighbourhood did so likewise.

XLI. QUIN.—The convent of Quin, in a village of that name, in the diocese of Killaloe, in Munster, was built about the year 1402 or a little earlier. In the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth, while the persecution was raging, it was suppressed, and remained so till the year 1626, when under the provincialate of Father Francis Matthew, it was again occupied and repaired. Father Francis Gorman, a preacher, was appointed superior. Some years previous to this, the friars were in the habit of visiting this place and preaching there. The founder of this convent was R. M’Namara, chief of Clancolain, who built a tomb there for himself and his family, as did many other nobles of that neighbourhood.

XLII. MONAGHAN.—The convent of Monaghan was built in a village of that name in the diocese of Clogher, in Ulster, in the year 1407. It was constantly inhabited by the fathers till the year 1589, when in the midst of war and persecution it was taken by the heretics and laid in ruins, and the guardian and five of the friars cruelly put to death. A few years afterwards an English Protestant of the name of Edward Blany, built a hall for himself out of the ruins of the convent. M’Mahon, chief of Uriel, was the founder of this convent. His posterity was divided into many noble families, and many other nobles of the neighbouring country are buried there.

XLIII. ASKEATON.—The convent of Askeaton, in the diocese of Limerick, in Munster, near the banks of the Shannon, was built about the year 1420, and was a sumptuous edifice. It was given up to the Observants under the provincialate of Father Patrick Healy, in the year 1513. It was ruined in the day of persecution in 1575, and some of the friars were caught and put to death. It remained desolate till the year 1627, when Father Francis Mathew being provincial, some friars, at the instance of many of the nobility, went to live amidst the ruins of the convent, and repaired it as far as the persecution would allow them to do so. The founder of this convent was the Earl of Desmond, who erected a tomb for himself and his family in it. M’Namara of Thomond, and many other noblemen of both families, as well as of the neighbouring county, made this convent their burial place.

[To be continued.]

The Battle of Benburb.

Give glory all to the Lord of Hosts ! O'Neill is at Benburb,
The high-souled chief, who ever scorned the Saxon yoke and curb.
Atween two hills his camp is pitched—a goodly sight and a stern !
And his own fair tent gleams in the midst as afar ye may discern.
Behind him rise the dense, dark woods ; while on his flank, anear him.
The great Blackwater sweeps along, and seems to greet and cheer him.

'Tis a glorious morn in glowing June, the bright sun beameth high,
The banners of either army flout in defiance the sapphire sky.
O Scotland ! thou hast chosen the side of our unrelenting foe—
Now prove thy prowess, as best thou mayest, in the person of Lord Munroe,
For a dauntless host, and a mighty Leader stand in array against him,
And he needs all panoply of help and hope wherewith his gods have fenced him.

Ho, so ! look yonder ! hither he comes : he crosses the crested wave,
How many who leave Kinard this morn ere night shall find a grave !
But such thoughts trouble his warriors not—the hell-engendered gloom
Of a fierce and frenzied zealot-hate hath blinded all to their doom.
They march to o'erthrow the "idols of Gath," "the accurst confederate legion."
And they vow to redder in Irish blood "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

But, Owen Roe ! proud Owen Roe ! a nobler task is thine—
To wrest from a two-fold alien foe the dominion of hearth and shrine,
Thy name is a spell-word in the ranks of thy country's gallant youth ;
Thou combatest, thou for Fatherland, for Freedom, and for Truth
Lead onward now thy marshalled bands, and pray them to help each other.
The victory lies in the mighty hands of God and His holy Mother !

What myriad interests crowd this hour—what fear—what hope—what hate ?
What dread results lie poised upon the balances of Fate !
Another day, and this long-trampled land may still redeem
That name of NATION ! now erased from History's page and theme ;
Or heavier chains may gird, and darker dungeon-bars environ
Her whose transpierced soul hath drooped for ages under the iron !

The trumpets' peal an inspiriting charge, but the shout of "O'NEILL, AROO"
Rose even above their clangorous tones, and rang through the welkin blue.
"On, Cunningham, on !" Lord Ardes cried, "let not thy valour be vain,"
And the flower of the Scottish cavaliers came swooping down amain ;
'Twas a moment like to that when lightning cleaves the heavens asunder,
And ye wait in awed suspense to hear the crash of the coming thunder.

Now, Owen Roe, thy kernes—thy bushmen !—whither have they fled ?
Hurrah ! that shower of shot from out the thicket ! well it sped !
The startled cavalry rear up—fall back—wheel round—retire ;
And the volleying cannon vomit forth their sulphury smoke and fire.
But, praise to the All-protecting God, who guards His chosen in danger,
Of the Catholic host but one man falls by the engines of the Stranger !

Again to the charge, Munroe, bold Chief !—nay, fear not the "bushes and scrogs.*

Faint not though the river lies to thy right, and thy left is flanked by bogs !
And, in sooth, he cometh gallantly on ; but the Fabius of the West
Well skilled in strategy, still reserves his troops for the worst or best.
The red artillery flasheth in vain, or standeth spent and idle,
And the war-steeds prance around the plain, and foamingly champ the bridle.

The long day wanes—the westerling sun descends the empurpled skies—
And the smoke and glare no longer blind the Catholic champions' eyes ;
The Scotsmen, baffled and balked all day, they scarce wist why or how,
Gaze with misgiving hearts upon their enemies' columns now ;
And Munroe, astounded and appalled, beholds O'Neill preparing
To bear down on him with horse and foot ! Hurrah for Irish darling !

It is even so ! the Hero rides at the head of those glittering ranks :
"Brave brothers-in-arms," he cries aloud, "give God and the Vii gen thanks !
The hour has come to strike the blow that shall rive your country's chain,
And make her, with Heaven's help and yours, a free-souled NATION again !
Your foes have already spent their strength, while you are scatheless and scarless !
And your swords may now make day dawn burn through Erin's midnight starless !

"Remember all the wrongs and fame of your stalwart sires of old !
Remember, too, that you play for a stake more precious than gems and gold,
And strike in the holy name of God for your land's redemption and weal !
I lead you on, as well I ought, for I bear the name of O'Neill ;
And may remorse, as a fanged asp, for ever prey on the hollow,
The coward heart of the traitor loon who fears or fails to follow !"

A wild shout rends the azure air, and at once from van to rear
Of the Irish host each soldier grasps his matchlock, sword, or spear ;
The colonels hast their steeds away, and spring upon their feet,
That every chance be thus cut off of an ignoble retreat,

And, "Onward ! Forward !" swells the cry in one tumultuous chorus :
"By God's all-powerful help we'll drive these hireling Scots before us !"

'Tis "body to body, with push of pike," 'tis foe confronting foe—
'Tis glaive to glaive, and gun to gun—'tis blow returning blow.
But the arm of Heaven is bared against the proud Oppressor at length,
In vain the enemy's lines put forth the very soul of their strength ;
They are forced to fly, pell-mell ; and the mass, to escape from bloodier slaughter,
Plunge headlong, frenziedly to death in the waves of the deep Blackwater !

And they who survive—what fate is theirs ?—to gasp for a brief hour's breath,
And then in the woods from spear and skein to meet the stroke of death.
Three thousand and two hundred forty-three lay corpses on the plain,
And the Scots bewailed, of their cherished chiefs, Lord Blaney among the slain ;

While of patriot Catholic men that day there fell some twice three dozen,
So wondrously the Almighty Lord sustains and saves His chosen !

What great rejoicings followed this brilliant and famous fight—
What glee and gladness filled the land—what overflowing delight—
What hymns were chanted unto God—what masses in His praise—
The historian's pages well describe, nor less the poet's lays.
All felt that to triumph in such miraculous wise, their own best bravery
Had bootied nought, and that He alone had broken their bonds of slavery !

And truly Heaven hath not been backward many a golden time
To aid our land to retrieve the glory that marked her palmy prime ;
But, alas ! the fiercer passions boiling within the Irish breast
For ever mar their gracious aims, and our struggles are aye unblest.
Man curseth man in the name of God ; and, for love and a meek reliance
On Him, we nourish but mutual wrath, and a spirit of demon defiance !

Shall the bitter ashes of the Past, then, never find an urn ?
Shall the ancient heart-wounds never close ?—the old jealousies ever burn ?
Forefend such fate, oh pitying Heaven !—we must, we will combine,
Through union alone can we hope to make our cause entirely thine.
O cradle within our breasts the dove, and banish thence the adder ;
Soon then shall rise, on the land of our love, a brighter day and a gladder !

Saint Columbanus.

"Quidnam dulcius quam majorum recensere gratiam, ut eorum acta cognos-cas, a quibus acceperis et rudimenta fidei et incitamenta bene vivendi."— William of Malmesbury.

SOMETIME in the year of our Lord 575, a youth, of noble mein and rich apparel, asked admittance as a cloister-student into the monastery of Cluan-inis, in the lake of Erne. Though, evidently, of high rank, no relative or friend introduced him, and no corbude (carriage) or troop of Gallowglachs attended him to the shore. The lord abbot, a venerable man in the decline of life—who, indeed, was no other than St.
Lindlus, the founder of the abbey—charmed with his personal beauty, and interested by his eagerness, gave him a long audience.

"Pater Abbas non nega me propter Jesum Christum et Mariam dicit puer."
But the circumstances are peculiar, and holy pater
Abbas having no easy part to play with those rough-handed neighbouring chiefs must be cautious and considerate.

The young man was born heir to a small chieftancy in west Laighean, is now about 16 years of age, has made considerable progress in classical and theological learning, and earnestly desires to devote the remainder of his life to God, as "Monachus," very earnestly—for his eye fires, and his cheek flushes when he speaks of it. Very earnestly—for having already experienced some of the dangers of the world "because of his personal beauty," he has resolved, by the advice of a holy woman, to fly them ; relinquishing, at the same time, all his bright hopes of power and fame. Very earnestly, indeed—for he has persevered despite his mother's wish, and presents himself to us now, cursed by her, though, as he hopes, blessed by God. Had the lord abbot guessed the temptations stoutly com-batted and overcome before he came there that day, he would not have hesitated; but he could not guess, nor could we either but for good Abbot Jonas, who, ninety years after, wrote, in his far-away Appenine Monastery, the history of this same youth.

Nevertheless, St. Lindlus admitted his claims and led him into the cloister.

Perhaps the monks deemed it well-omened that their new pupil and companion was called Columbanus, or Columba, a name then in every one's mind, as that of the wonderful northern Abbot who, after colonizing Leath Cuinne with saintly ecclesiastics and planting it with flourishing monasteries, changed the field of his labours to Scotia Minor, and was now hailed on all sides its great Apostle. At any rate they must have seen very early that this was no ordinary youth whom God had intrusted to their care.

And here, in this sequestered retreat, under the guidance of those holy men, young Columbanus spent the quiet, studious years of his youth, concerning which, as a matter of course, giddy history tells us scarcely anything. The chief fact about them is, that by God's grace he discerned the true "reality of things," and learned to act as one so discerning—that religion became to him a life-thought—so to speak—its truths the facts, its obligations the duties, its counsels the guide, its consolations the aid, and the ends it proposes the aim of his existence. In short, during those years he became a saint. He pursued his studies also with the vigour and success of a great and deep soul, contriving not only to master, in a short time, the Latin tongue, the Psalter, and the mysteries of the Trivium and Quadrivium, but to attain a remarkable proficiency in the Greek and Hebrew languages, and the Aristotelian Philosophy. And he was a POET, nay, a fresh, earnest, and loved one! His vernacular songs and anthems were preserved for ages; not in mere clasped books, but vivid in human memory, and musical in human ears—chanted by those brave monks in recreation-time, by maidens in sunny shielings, and festive peillice, and by warrior Mac Guire and O'Donnell, in halls and merry-makings. We believe they have without exception, perished, but this fact is the proof and commentary of their merit. Columbanus wrote more learned compositions, in learned tongues—Latin, and Greek and Hebrew—some of which have been preserved and lie before us now. With much trying, and no little faith, we can discern in them some corroboration of biographical accounts, and catch some glimpse of this gentle, sunny, genius of the olden time; but written as they evidently are, for scholastic exercises, or scholarly recreation, they are far too scholastic and learned. They, indeed, evidence the poet-spirit; but they show it shackled and paralyzed in the Nessus-garb of foreign language and learning. When first produced they attracted some notice on the continent. It was a strange, pleasant thing, for men struggling to preserve a perishing literature and a moribund civilization, to see proofs of the revival of both in the cells of this western island. Strange, too, it seemed to Mr. Moore, and other modern enquirers, that the prize-verses of Eton or Trinity should be so far surpassed in grace and polish, at a time and in a place, like this; and it is, if we think of it, a pregnant fact, that towards the close of the sixth century, a young man could be taught the languages and sciences of the ancients in an islet of Lough Erne, yet it is clear—undeniable—one of the many corroborations of which analogous enquiry so often presents in confirmation of a truth of history or science. Could we exchange the "Apostle of the Teutonic race" for ANY poet, we might regret that Columbanus, did not write more studiously and frequently. As it was, he wisely preferred, according to the expression of Göthe, acting to writing, an epic. And a noble, varied and thrilling one, he did enact, as we shall see! True to his poet-nature he loved David's Psalms, and wrote a commentary on them, praised by judicious critics. He also wrote about the same time, a tract on the commandments, with many other useful essays and discourses. That mind must have been no shallow one which could, in so short a time, acquire and dispense so much knowledge.

Thus studying, praying, and writing, Columbanus might have perhaps remained his life-long, did not another purpose take possession of his soul and urge him to rougher labours. To explain the reason of this determination we must glance for a moment at the condition of Ireland and of Europe, and the comparative necessity for missionary or monastic exertions.

In Ireland, from Doire-Galgaich (Derry) in the north, where Columba had reformed a province, to Corca-leigh (Cork), where St. Findbarr had just founded a great monastery, Christianity was almost everywhere quickly gaining ground, advancing the social conditions, penetrating the private life, influencing the public polity, and taking deep root in the affections and sympathies of the people. The sacred isle of the Phœnicians had, already, nigh become the metropolis of western Christendom. Of course the Devil, though worsted, was not defeated, and the field was vast and the difficulties numerous and mighty that yet lay before the bold missionary; but there were thousands in every nook and corner of the land, trained and training, armed with knowledge and fired with zeal, already in the encounter or preparing to enter it. True saints were swaying crook and crozier throughout the country, and rearing, by word and example, the young generation; all things bade fair for a progressive present and a glorious future.

Not so in Europe—there, amidst confusion and ruin, din and war, rough uprooting of old institutions, and rude attempts to order new; one of the most serious and weighty struggles in the history of the world was going forward. It is past twelve hundred years, and even we can see THAT. Christianity, after an existence of five centuries, seemed about to die out in the shock and whirl of invasion and was only saved by the heroism of some of its children, who stoutly upreared its falling standard, preached its divine authority to the conquerors themselves, and made them its bounden servants. Since twelve fishermen assembled under our Lord's cross, and vowed to preach to all nations the doctrines he was crucified for announcing to a provincial peasantry, never was there made a resolve more bold and fraught with danger. Yet this, nevertheless, they bravely attempted, and this, thank God, they nobly effected. Even now, when so long done, and we of the nineteenth century look upon it, as it lies dim and mysterious in the back-ground of European history, it seems incomprehensible. But in Columbanus' time, when only half done, and difficulties hydra-headed stared the workers in the face, and obstacles, mountain-high, towered in their path, it must have appeared to many nearly hopeless. A comparatively small body of priests, monks, and laics of the vanquished race were weakly battling here and there, throughout the length and breadth of distracted Europe, against the sympathies and convictions, the venerated prejudices, and cherished hopes, the loved customs and apparent interest of barbarians, intoxicated by success and rampant in the possession of supreme dominion. Nevertheless, impeded by whatever obstacles, guarded by whatever dangers, the path of duty did lie there stretching out into the future, clearly and unmistakably, for all Christian men to walk.

In the mean time, vague rumour was bringing the stirring incidents and sad details of the contest to the little far-away monastery of Erne, and, at length, aroused the energy and shaped the destiny of that one of its inmates in whose fortunes we have an interest. Surely, surely in this emergency, when Christianity and civilization were alike imperilled, and the church was trembling to its extremities, and its children were everywhere fighting, almost, a life-battle; the pursuits of dilettante scholarship, or even the quietude of ascetic retirement, did not befit a true monk; no, in God's high name, and with Mary's invocation, he will fling himself into the contest and give what aid he can, and be of what service he may. With some such thought it must have been, assuredly, that the young Laighean chief, the poet-student of Cluain-inis, became the Saint Columbanus of history. Every attentive reader of his biography must see that this was not what, under other circumstances, he would have chosen. Throughout the bustle and labour of a more than ordinarily eventful career, we can always discern by some trifling incident, in some scarce-describable way, the gentle, studious monk; as perceptibly in the stern missionary demanding "monastic peace" from abashed King Theoderik, as in the friendless youth seeking a retreat in the monastery of the western lake.

In furtherance of his project, we find Columbanus, towards the close of the year 585, receiving the priestly tonsure—of course the Irish tonsure, "a semi-circle shaved all round the forehead, but not reaching to the hinder part"—at the hands of St. Comgall, the founder, abbot, and bishop of Ban-choir, or, as we call it, Bangor. A busy, remarkable place that Ban-choir must have been then! Founded, if we mistake not, the very year of Columbanus's birth, it was already what it continued for four or five centuries, Regina of eastern Irish cells; its children were thus early known in France and Germany, and its fame had spread throughout Europe. We are told, by the great St. Bernard, that Ban-choir and its friaries contained no less than 3000 monks and students; so that in Columbanus' time their number must have been very great. St. Comgall was a noble Dalriadan, who, after studying at Clononagh and Cluain-mac-nois, returned to his native province and established this great institution. It was the dream of his boyhood the labour of manhood, and the dear and glorious reality that blessed his declining years. Perhaps one of the choicest favours God conferred upon it was the power of claiming as its child the earnest, noble-looking young man, who, in his twenty-fifth year now entered it.

After four or five years of student, monastic life, during which he became endeared, in a surprising way, to the monks and the venerable lord Abbot, he deemed it full time to take the missionary cross. A great work needs a great preparation; but life is short, and preparation must at length give way to accomplishment. The monks, at first, tried hard to induce him to remain with them, but, seeing his resolution, desisted at length; nay, some of them, inflamed by his example and urged by his motives, resolved to accompany him. A chapter met—a sorrowful chapter—with eyes tearful and lips stern-compressed, Columbanus bade them all farewell. And Comgall, having blessed him, gave leave to any so bold or zealous who would leave country and friends to meet, with him, in the chaos-contest of Franks—Gallic society, certain danger and possible death. Lo! outstepped twelve, by name, Gallus, Deicola, Legisbertus, Columbanus, junr., Cummin, Eunoe, Ecconan, Culian, Domitialis, Neemias, Lua, and Florentinus, and proclaimed their readiness. The abbot gave them all his benediction, the monks embraced them, and the chapter separated.

The missionaries were soon in a Bordeaux skiff, on their way to France, and soon after in the ancient city of Rouen.

Perhaps there is no period in the history of France, so interesting to the historian and philosopher as this; and there is certainly none concerning which vaguer opinions and more mistaken notions are current. Looking at its condition about this time (590) you would think, at the first glance, that the antagonism we have described as agitating Europe, had nearly ceased, and that the church had completely triumphed—that she was more influential in councils, more popular with the masses, and more respected by power, than in any country in Europe; but a closer examination will prove this estimate false. It is true that religion was professed by all classes and every grade, but it is also a fact that such profession was in general a known and acknowledged farce, and that from the seraglio of the monarch to the hut of the peasant, its precepts were openly violated and its punishments notoriously contemned. Churches were in every city, crowded by worshippers and attended by holy priests, but it is sadly apparent in all, there was the spirit of a heathen formalism, rather than the earnestness of new belief. The clergy, though in general of Romanic birth, were universally respected—already saluted as "Patres," permitted to sit in the councils of the nation, entrusted with the government of cities, allowed to hold civil courts of their own, chosen umpires between princes, and acknowledged representatives of the poor; but they held not only those immunities, but their very lives and fortunes at the will and by the favour of the temporal prince. The right of Sanctuary, the most effective safeguard of the humble in those rough and dangerous times, was, at first, pompously conceded, and then daringly violated. The church of France was strong in the holiness of the great body of her clergy and prelates; reckoning amongst them some of the sublimest instances of sanctity which history records; but about this time it was sensibly weakened and even fearfully endangered by the induction among its members of the younger sons and nominees of princes, men with barbarian blood yet boiling hotly in their veins, dazzled by the splendour of the priestly and prelatic power, and resolved to grasp them irrespective of the obligations of the state and the ordinances of the body they would enter. More than once, in the pictured pages of St. Gregory of Tours, we are presented with that most melancholy anomaly, a profligate and slavish barbarian sitting on the throne, and swaying the crozier of one of the ancient saints of the land. The matter is almost too frightful and hideous to think of, but it proves, in conjunction with the rest of what I have stated, that so much of the churchman's work was not done, as would at first sight appear.

To give some notion of the time and its necessities, it is also necessary to remark that, independent of this antagonism of the church and the world—which, after all, though prominent here in a rougher form and promising a sterner encounter, is co-existent and will be co-eval with the church itself—another antagonism distracted the social and political state, I mean the antagonism of race. This was still maintained with vigour and destruction. The distinctions of Romanic and Teutonic birth were yet retained, and yet almost synonymous with those of conquerors and conquered. The barbarians, as those who longed for the olden civilization loved to call their masters, were the lords, the rulers, and the defenders of the soil. The ancient population, except such as were exalted through the church, or by literary or consummate military talents, were its enslaved tillers, or, as the charters of the period had it, its “live clothing;” they were also employed in the trades and manufactures which their lords deemed unworthy of their attention. It may be imagined to what innumerable broils and unceasing turmoils this vicious relation gave rise.

Perhaps no analization or description could convey a more vivid idea of the condition of the church and the country, than a brief resume of a story burning on every lip in Rouen, when the Irish missionaries entered it, and which Augustine Thierry has given in a detailed form from St. Gregory of Tours, in his “Recits des Temps Merovingiens.”

THE STORY OF SAINT PRÆTEXTATUS.

WHEN Sighebert, king of Austrasia, was assassinated on his triumphal march to take possession of the crown of Neustria, his beautiful but vicious queen, Brunchilda, was placed in imminent peril by the approach of her brother-in-law, Hilperic, the rightful heir of Neustria. But by the exertion of her arts, which were in those days unrivalled, she not only, to some extent, disarmed the brutal rage of the king, but captivated his young and self-willed son, Merowig. She was sent immediately under close confinement to Rouen, and he was despatched with an army towards Austrasia, to follow up the successes of his father. The wily Brunchilda, seeing of what advantage this circumstance might be to her, fanned the young man's flame so well, by letters and messages, that he deserted his army on the banks of the Loire, and fled to make her his bride at Rouen. But this was not to be effected easily. Such an union was, of course, prohibited by the church, and Prætextatus, the Archbishop of Rouen, steadily refused to grant a dispensation. It so happened, however, that the young prince was his god-child, and loved by him with all the affection of a parent. Whether out of weak compliance with his wishes or to avoid a greater scandal, he at length consented to unite them. This act, as may be supposed, brought on him the anger of the king; but for some cause, of which we are not told, it was, for a while, suspended.

In the meantime Brunchilda escaped, and Merowig pursued by the vengeance of his father, and prohibited Austrasia by the council of Regency, wandered an outcast among the heaths and forests of Champagne. In his misfortunes none had the courage or the love to aid him but the bishop of Rouen. He openly proclaimed himself his friend, sent him assistance, interceded for him at court, published his reverses on all sides, and distributed presents in his name. A malicious and exaggerated account of these proceedings reaching the king, threw him into one of those fearful paroxysms of rage and passion to which his family were subject, and confirmed in his cruel queen, Fredegonda, the hatred with which an old grudge had inspired her. At first they thought of assassination—no unusual instrument of royal vengeance in those days—and at length determined on an equally certain but more legal proceeding. They summoned a synod of Neustrian bishops, and accused Prætextatus before it. It is a pregnant “sign of the times” that by a series of mean subterfuges and bare-faced falsehoods, too numerous and tedious to detail, and notwithstanding the bold and determined resistance offered by St. Gregory and others, Helperik succeeded in procuring his being solemnly censured, deprived of his bishopric, and soon after hurried away secretly to an island on the coast.

After an exile of more than seven years, during which, taught by misfortune and solitude, he became a true saint, and purified himself from the stains that disfigured his otherwise zealous and loving character, the exiled bishop was summoned to retake possession of his see. Changes had taken place in many things. “Dear son,” Merowig, had been assassinated by command of his father; that father had perished by the poison of his queen; and that queen had been deprived of almost all power since the accession of her son Clothar, or Clotaire. This young prince wisely placed himself under the guidance of St. Gontramm, king of Burgundy, his uncle, and by his advice, probably, had acceded to the prayer of the Neustrian prelates, that their sentence should be reversed, and their brother recalled. Prætextatus, accordingly, resumed his old position, and swayed the crozier of Rouen with all saintliness, until the year 587, when Fredegonda, his implacable enemy, came to reside in that city. The Bishop and the Queen soon came in contact. She publicly insulted him, he publicly rebuked her. She resolved on vengeance, and, before long, found an instrument and an opportunity.

On Sunday, the 24th day of February, while the Saint was bent in prayer at his desk, before the high altar of his cathedral, he received a mortal wound in the back, and was scarcely able to stagger up the steps, grasp and drain the sacred chalice, when he fell back, reeling and bloody, among the priests, amidst the cries of the people and the suppressed rage of the “Lendes.” He was conveyed to his pallet. Here the queen had the almost incredible effrontery and malice to visit him, and here she received a rebuke so solemn and fearful, that she fled dismayed from the place, and let her victim die in all the rapture of anticipated glory. Notwithstanding the rage and grief of the people, and the magnitude of the crime, the royal culprit was suffered to pursue her ways unpunished. A magnificent shrine was erected to Prætextatus, and his memory was venerated as it deserved. All might have passed away thus, had not Fredegonda the hardihood, two years after the occurrence and just before the visit of Columbanus, to deliver to the authorities, to be beaten to death, the wretch who had executed her orders. He, of course, revealed the transaction and renewed the public excitement. The queen, nevertheless, after some threats and some danger, passed with impunity a second time.

This strange story, meeting Columbanus on the very threshold of the country, and demonstrating at once the existence of a state of things, of whose reality he could scarce assure himself in his quiet cell at home, must have had a startling effect. Perhaps, knelling at Prætextatus' shrine, he received new light to guide his efforts, and new enthusiasm to pursue them.

Having viewed, steadily and carefully, this condition of things, and weighed attentively its various causes and components, Columbanus determined it should be his work to introduce therein the new element of monachism. Now, I say, for though there were a good many monasteries in France, which, a century ago, were powerful and famous; the monastic spirit, proscribed and neglected, had lost much of its early vitality, and ceased to exercise any great influence in the country—needed being animated by a higher example and quickened by a fresher spirit. We have seen, in another paper, that it was almost invariably the policy of the Irish missionaries to introduce or revive this saving institution, and that to them is ascribable, in good part, the wide-spread monachism of the middle ages. In no country was this policy more applicable and beneficial than in France, and in none did it meet a fitter or more zealous advocate and exponent than Columbanus. He was the father of French, if not of Gallic monachism. And let us keep in mind that this was his mission.

Whether by chance or direction, the monks, leaving Rouen, proceeded slowly, preaching and confessing as they went, visiting, on their way, Chlodowig's Paris of "the triple hill," and spending some time with holy King Gontram, at Challons, across the whole breadth of France to the wild forest tract, east of Alsace, called "Les Vosges." And here, in the bosom of this solitude, in the silence unbroken by the city's din or the castle's bustle, but musical with nature's harmonies, the bird's song, and the stream's ripple, the tree's murmuring rustle, and the insect's hum—here, away from man and man's strife, they commenced their work, determining to go back, as much as possible, to the ancient oriental model of monastic life. On the ruins of an old Roman fortification, called Anegrates or Anegrays, near the ancient border-lands of Alsace, they erected a few huts, agreed to the rudiments of a monastic rule, made Columbanus Abbot, and laid the foundation of the great Vosgian Institution.

At first they suffered some privations—being at one time nine days living on the herbs of the forest, and only rescued from starvation by Carantochus, abbot of Salic, a monastery not very distant—but they quickly surmounted these difficulties, and, having made arrangements, they published through France that they had opened a monastery, where they would receive any anxious to embrace the strict monastic life, a retreat where they could afford to ecclesiastics, busy with the world, a brief interval wherein they might study "Mary's better part," and a seminary, where they would teach all the learning of the Scotie schools.

And Columbanus could, not only boldly conceive a project, but vigorously execute it.

Before twelve months had passed away, crowds of each class broke the solitude of the forest, crowned the experiment with success, and made it, already, a great practical utility. From the most distant part of the country, holy men came to the solitude of the Vosges, and the instruction of its saintly abbot; scholars arrived to be guided to "learning and science," by so experienced and able a conductor; and even tradesmen and agriculturists came to learn the improvements of the laborious missionaries. So flourishing did the institution, in a short time become, that Co-lumbanus was obliged to found another monastery, at a place about eight miles distant—since famous in the history of the church, as Luxeu. To this he afterwards removed his principal school and primate seat. Nor was this sufficient. Two years after he founded the abbey, or, as it was at first, the priory of Fontaines—another name remarkable in monastic annals. Almost every succeeding year of history, an abbey, priory, or cell, more or less celebrated, arose under his auspices and by his directions, in some part of France. The influence of the institution spread through the land on all sides and made the desert as it were "a great heart" to the whole of France. Missionaries went from it to towns and cities—scholars spread the learning taught there in distant lands—clergy, who had retired there, went forth animated with warmer zeal and stouter courage—agriculturists, instructed in its farms, spread cultivation over bleak hills and barren morasses—and men who had never visited it, and princes, to whom its name was not familiar, were guided by its counsels and acted on its principles. The writers, who treat of the period are lavish in its praise.

"Les grandes hommes" (write the cautious Benedictines), "qui en sortirent en bon nombre tant pour gouverner des Eglises entières que de simples monastères répandirent en tant d'endroits les maximes salutaires de ce sacré désert que plusieurs des nos provinces parurent avoir changé de face."

M. Mezeray contends, that it was to these "Missionaires Irlandois" we must attribute the great advance in civilization, made about this time. But no historian, nay, no observer, ungifted with an angel's ken, could appreciate the practical value of their labours. In the midst of busy, smoking cities, in the gloom of mountain ravines, on smiling village uplands, and in quiet country nooks far away, churches and cells, schools and hospitals, the appliances and adjuncts of religion sprung up because of their teaching: and no one thought of them. Lives were well spent and deaths happily met by men unknown to their pupils. Through troublous years, stout battle was done for the Right, by men made strong and hopeful by their instruction: and their names were unmentioned. In truth, none can tell or guess the good effected by a great Missionary. Rivers or seas do not bound it. It grows with time, and spreads on through long, long ages, wide and far, until, before the judgment-throne, myriads arise and bless it's great originator.

And Lord Abbot Columbanus, to suit so vast and remarkable an institution, framed a monastic rule, that it might be permanent. This is, altogether, a remarkable document, and quite a convincing proof of the vigorous, practical, constructive genius of the man. It was the crowning of his great work. It was approved by the Council of Macon—at one time followed by a vast number of French and Italian monasteries—praised by St. Bernard, and St. Benedict Anian, and considered worthy of being incorporated with, and modifying the Benedictine rule.

And now, dear reader, that we have tracked the footsteps of our holy countryman of ancient times, thus far, say, do you not love and honour him? do you not honour him as a true saint? do you not love him for all his high practical labours in God's vineyard? was not that store of learning, so vast that it brought the scholars of Europe around him, a great achievement for ten years' study at Cluin-inis and Bangor? was not this wonderful Vosgian Institution a surprising attainment for ten other years in France?

Some other time you shall hear more of him.

Pope Celestine the Fifth.

CONSPIRACIES AT ROME.

IN the year of our Redemption, 1291, and in the pontificate of Nicholas IV., Rome beheld a spectacle which was calculated to recall the memory of those days when her Forum resounded with the clang of arms, and the plaudits of myriads echoed in a hundred temples, smote the ear of the vine-dresser on Monte Mario. Grand and spirit-stirring was the scene. From beyond the arch of Titus, and along the Via Sacra, a gorgeous procession moved majestically towards the Capitol, to confer on Prince Jacopo Colonna all the honours and insignia of Senatorship. The old columns of the Thunderer's temple, and the solitary pillar of Phocas, were gaily festooned with laurels; out at the balconies of the citizens were suspended rich embroideries and storied tapestries, and so still and breezeless was the day, that the arras and the laurel leaves stirred not till the voices of the mighty multitude pealed out in one great chorus. Cardinals in their purple robes, bishops with cope and mitre, friars in their motley habits, and men-at-arms glittering in burnished steel, crowded round the Colonna's triumphal chariot; and ere the last man had passed under the arch of Septimius Severus, the chanting of the priests was succeeded by one simultaneous burst of enthusiasm, of which the only intelligible burden was, "Lo! Cæsar! lo! Cæsar!"

One heart of all that then beat in Rome was insensible to the shouting of the multitude and the splendour of this pageant. Other thoughts occupied the mind of the aged Pontiff, Nicholas, and little did he trouble himself with the internecine contests of the Ghibellines and Guelphs—one of those parties claimed him as their patron, while the other rejected him because he did not hurl the censures, with which he was armed, against their antagonists, but little did he heed the mischievous policy of either. One all-absorbing passion swayed and ruled him—from his earliest youth he dreamed of nothing but the delivery of the Holy Land. By every means within his power did he seek to keep alive the old chivalric spirit in the hearts of the European potentates, and for nothing did he yearn save the ransom of Jerusalem, won by Christian valour from the infidel, and then again snatched from their grasp, as though the "crucified" waxed wrath at the sins and excesses of his degenerate followers. Sorely did that old man mourn over these disasters—bitterly did he lament the corruption of those, who, unlike the single-hearted swordsmen of St. Bernard's day, took the cross, not for the purpose of doing it honour, but of making it subservient to their sordid interest and passions. But hearken, O holy father, at thy chamber door stands an impatient herald, he brings thee bitter tidings from Palestine, and the last of a long series of griefs and disappointments must crush thy old fervent heart, more efficaciously than the bloody struggles of Guelph and Ghibelline. Hear the messenger in meek resignation, and then commend thy broken spirit to the Christ whose vicar thou art.

"Alas! Pope Nicholas, I bring thee news of sorrow and disaster, Acre has fallen—miserably fallen! and long before the scimitar of the infidel struck down the cross, Christianity abode not with those who fought under its ensign. Lust and rapine fired and motived the Crusader, and the viciousness of the Christian was only equalled by that of the Mahomedan. Not the conquest of the Holy Land, O blessed Father of the faithful, did these mailed marauders ambition—covetous as the Hebrew, wanton and lascivious as the followers of the Koran, was it not meet that the son of God should withdraw the shield of his protection, and leave these apostate Christians to perish in the walled towns and on the sandy desert? Witness it Acre, where Saladin, on the eighteenth of April, with sixty thousand cavaliers and a hundred and sixty thousand fantassins smote more than sixty thousand Christians with the edge of the sword—arise in thy bloody shroud, O Nicholas, patriarch of Jerusalem, slain in that day's indiscriminate carnage, and bear witness to the sins of the false Christians cut off in their iniquity by the sword of the infidel. Tyre and Sidon, too, O holy father, have fallen! the curse of the prophets has twice lowered and burst upon these guilty cities, and the men who dreamed of exalting the one, and making the other a mighty emporium for their argosies and merchandize—these men of the cross have perished—their strong places are level with the dust, and henceforth the fisherman may spread his nets upon the rock, and point to the grey ruins as monuments of God's unspeakable vengeance. The blood, the treasures, the chivalry of a hundred years, have gone for nought; and of all Palestine the Christians do not now possess a rood—nay, not as much as Gabriel pressed under his feet when he saluted our blessed Mother, 'Gratia plena.'"

Bitter tidings, these, for good Pope Nicholas, and alas! too true. The long cherished dream thus soon to vanish, and for ever—the cross trampled under foot, and the crescent-moon displayed even above the sacred hill of Calvary! But there is a hope. May not the Christian princes rally their serfs, and wipe out this foul disgrace? Alas! no. The spirit of chivalry wanes—internecine feuds are wasting energies and resources—the eloquence of Bernard could not rekindle the spirit of old—Guelph and Ghibelline are tearing Italy to pieces, Germany, too, shares their fiendish policy. The king of England, not content with the slaughter of the Cambrian bards, is whetting his sword's edge against his brother of France; and in the whirl of human passions, there is no thought for the land where Christ was born and crucified. Close thine eyes upon this recreancy, holy father, a year ago thou didst flatter thyself that ere 1292 came to its close, thou might see Palestine in the hands of the faithful; but the hope that fed thy brave old heart has gone, and life no longer has an object worth the living for. Need we wonder if the termination of a year so fraught with disasters witnessed the funeral obsequies of one whose sole thought was the conquest of the Holy Land? * Laid in his grave, and all the funeral honours over, active are the intrigues, and energetic the councils of the Ghibelline and Guelph factions to influence the cardinals in the election of Pope Nicholas's successor. One would think that his death and obsequies should have made the rival hosts sheath their swords for a brief space; but no, both parties lived in an atmosphere of blood, and had resolved to hunt and worry each other to the death. Meantime twelve cardinals held conclave at Rome, and of these purpled dignitaries six were Romans, four from various parts of Italy, and two from France. Pending the interregnum, two senators were elected, one a Colonna, the other an Orsini, both representing the two great factions. During their first days of office they came to blows, and the partizans of both met hourly in sanguinary feud. Blood flowed in torrents, the cultivated lands were laid waste, and after a few days sitting, the cardinals came forth to astonish the Christian world with the announcement that they could not decide who was to wear the vacant honours and dignities of the Papacy. In fact, they were sadly divided amongst themselves, and like the princes and barons without, swayed and influenced by the same passions which worked so fearfully in the breasts of the laity.

At no former period* was Italian society in more marked transition. The very language was fast undergoing a marvellous change, and then, as at all other times, the arts themselves were flourishing despite the shock of conflicting opinions and jarring elements. Great occasions have ever brought forth great men—in the darkest and dreariest times great intellects have arisen, and fixed themselves like radiant stars above the gloom which the bad passions of ignoble minds evoked. Some men there have been whom circumstances have made great and renowned, but there are others, who in making circumstances their creatures, stand out in bold relief independent of them, and theirs is a glory which shall not decay. Amongst the latter might we name many to whom even at this distance of time fair Italy can point as amongst her most honoured sons. Arnolfo di Lapo, the far-famed architect, Cimabue the painter, Brunetto Latini the rhetorician, and Casella, whose viol accompanied the grandest strain that ever fell from the lips of man. But towering high above these master minds, there was one pale, melancholy youth, on whose temperament and mysterious soul a sudden bereavement had wrought a wondrous effect, as though the stroke had freed his intellect from its clayey prison, and sent it to soar into the empyreum or roam the realms of everlasting night. That youth was he whose immortal verse has been writ in characters of flame, and she the fountain-source of his inspiration, the daughter of Folco Portinari, canonized by her lover "Beatrice," and swathed by him in an effluence of glory only excelled by that of the blessed in heaven.

In the year of our Redemption, 1274, Dante Alighis-Christians who assisted the Saracens to take St. John D'Acre, thus expresses his regret for that great loss (l. vii. c. 144)—"From this event Christendom suffered the greatest detriment: for, by the loss of Acre, there no longer remained in the Holy Land any footing for the Christians; and all our good maritime places of trade never afterwards derived half the advantage from their merchandize and manufactures. So favourable was the city of Acre, in the very front of our sea, in the middle of Syria, and as it were in the middle of the world, seventy miles from Jerusalem, source and receptacle of every kind of merchandize, as well from the east as from the west, the resort of all people from all countries, and of the eastern nations of every different tongue, so that it might be considered as the aliment of the world."—Cary's notes to the Inferno.

hier had attained his ninth year, and the daughter of Portinari her eighth. It is said that the first meeting of this unparalleled pair occurred at a banquet given by Folco to Ugolino Della Gherardesca, at which were present some of the most celebrated men of their day. From that hour Folco Portinari's daughter became the day-star of the young poet's existence, and she, the young and beautiful, listed his deep mysterious strain, as though he were one of the celestial choir exiled to earth, and weeping for the day when God would call them both to heaven. It was at this festive meeting that Dante being asked to sing to the accompaniment of Casella's viol, poured out that immortal strain in praise of Beatrice, which has since been echoed by posterity as unrivalled even by the genius of Petrarca.

"Tanto gentile e tanto onesta pare
La donna mia quand ella altrui saluta,
Ch'ogni lingua divien tremando muta,
E gli occhi non si sazian di guardare."

At this banquet, too, Count Ugolino, seized with admiration of the poet, and as if prescient of his dreadful fate, addressed the melancholy boy, "O Dante, whatsoever be my lot, be thou not unmindful of me in thy verse!" "throughout all times shall thy memory be sacred," was the reply, and till Dante's strain is forgotten shall hapless Ugolino's memory survive. In the pontificate of Pope Nicholas, Beatrice died, but the mysterious influence of her spirit and form still worked and wrought in the poet's soul, nor came there a vision of glory to his imagination wherein Beatrice was not the blesseddest of angelic visitants; ten years did his spirit "thirst" for her, and whether fighting on the plains of Campaldino, or yearning for that ungrateful Florence, which banished him, she was never forgotten, for

"As wax by seal, that changeth not
Its impress, now was stamp'd his brain by her."†

But those ten years of sorrow and thirst were amply assuaged, and he, the great master-mind of Italy, would have lived over again those days of anguish and frustrated hopes, could they have brought him such another revelation as this:

"A virgin in my view appeared, beneath
Green mantle, rob'd in hue of living flame,
And o'er my spirit, that so long a time
Had from her presence felt no shuddering drear,
Albeit mine eyes discerned her not, there mov'd
A hidden virtue from her, at whose touch
The power of ancient love was strong within me."‡

But, along with the loss of Beatrice, Dante had to mourn the departure of another order of spirits, and the cruel destiny to which Italy had been consigned. Thomas, "the angelic teacher," had been poisoned when going to the council of Lyons;* and Albertus Magnus, resigning his bishopric of Ratisbon, died, † "Si come cera da sugello,

Che la figura impressa non trasmuta,
Segnato è ôr da voi lo mio cervello."

Purg. c. xxxiii.

‡ Purg. c. xxx. Cary's translation.
Villani, l. ix, c. 218. Bucer, writing of the angelic Doctor, said, "take away Thomas, and I will overturn the Church of Rome." St. Thomas was poisoned by a physician, who thought thus to ingratiate himself with Charles I., king of Sicily. Dante thus describes this great and holy man:—

"I then was of the lambs, that Dominic
Leads, for his saintly flock, along the way
Where well they thrive, nor swollen with vanity."

Parad., c. x.

as it became the disciple of St. Dominic, in his humble cell. But of all, the most mourned and lamented was he whom the poet had vowed to immortalize at Portinari's convito. The Ghibelline, Archbishop Ruggieri, having charged Count Ugolino with betraying Pisa to the Florentines, caused Dante's early friend to be arrested and cast into the tower, called "La Muda," and when reminded that a Bishop shedding blood incurred a canonical censure, coldly remarked, "si muore ancor senza Spargerlo;" and dreadfully did he carry out his cruel evasion. Ugolino, with his two sons and grandsons were nailed up in a living sepulchre, the keys cast into the Arno, and the five, having been starved to death, were then dragged forth and committed to the burial place of malefactors; the dark and dreadful hours of their famished existence escaped all but the poet's eye, and no matter what the misdeeds of Ugolino may have been, we may well ask him who weeps not over his sad story:

"E se non piangi di che pianger suoli?"

The greatest effort of the poet's genius is clearly visible in the delineation of this terrible scene. The struggling light piercing the narrow grate of the "mew," where the victims crouched together—the dream of Ugolino, awaking before dawn, and hearing his children crying to him for bread—the strokes of the hammer, barring up the living charnel house—the agonized parent gnawing his flesh, and the appeal of the sons and grandsons:

——"Father, we should grieve
Far less, if thou wouldst eat of us; thou gav'st
These weeds of miserable flesh we wear,
And do thou strip them off from us again."*

Such a picture of despair and agony hath never pencil of poet painted since or before, and as long as Dante's verse remains, so long shall men revert to that moment, when in Folco's house, and in hearing of Beatrice, he vowed to eternalize the name of Ugolino.

But let it not be imagined we have strayed away from our subject. It has been our desire to lay these facts before our readers, in order to throw some light on the state of Italian society and Italian parties a short time antecedent to the demise of Pope Nicholas. We, too, thought it expedient to dwell at some length on the history of one man, who was a living witness of the times we would fain depict. So now return we to our theme.

We have said, already, that the Cardinals left the conclave without electing a Pope, and this scandalous conduct of theirs is to be attributed to the rabid spirit of the factions who then literally preyed on each other. During 1293 Rome was the battle-ground for innumerable parties, who violated all laws of God and man in their sanguinary quarrels; for six months the citizens could not agree on any one worthy of being senator, and this one fact is demonstrative evidence of the lawlessness and brigandage which then reigned paramount.† The Cardinals, scared away from St. Peter's capital, betook them to Perugia, towards the end of the year, and the Christian world anxiously looked to the new conclave for the head of the church. What rendered the election certain was the state of the Pisans and Florentines, who growing weary of slaughtering each other, agreed to peace. The poorer orders of Florence begun to discover that the aristocracy traded on their blood and sweat, but to no peace would they consent, till the Pisans consented to dis-card Guido da Montefeltro, the great leader of the Ghibellines, anent whom thus writeth Dante.

"When I was numbered with the dead then came Saint Francis for me; but a cherub dark
He met, who cried: wrong me not; he is mine,
And must below to join the wretched crew,
For the deceitful counsel which he gave.
E'er since I watch'd him, hov'ring at his hair.
No power can the impenitent absolve;
Nor to repent, and will, at once consist,
By contradiction absolute forbid.
Oh! mis'ry! how I shook myself, when he Seiz'd me, and cried, 'thou haply thought'st me not
A disputant in logic so exact.'

Hence, perdition-doom'd, I rove
A prey to rankling sorrow in this garb."

At the beginning of the year 1294, Charles II., of Naples, accompanied by his son, Charles Martel, king of Hungary, arrived at Perugia, where the Cardinals received them with great pomp. Anxious for the election of a pontiff who would be identified with his own interests, the king rebuked the cardinals for their neglect—when one of them uprose, and, with a boldness that characterized his after life, peremptorily protested against kindly interference in the spiritual concerns of the church. He who had the manhood to beard royalty thus was Benedict Gaetani, afterwards Boniface VIII. King Charles interfered no farther, and left the Sacred College to mind their own affairs.

Now, a short time before the arrival of the king, a youth, who was brother of Cardinal Napoleon Orsini, had met a sudden death, on which commenting, the Cardinal Boccamazza remarked, "if fate warps the web thus rapidly for the young, how should not we, who are grey in years, provide against contingencies? may not this be a warning to us not to defer, any longer, the election of a supreme pastor, that the sheep, so long without a shepherd, be properly tended?" "thou hast spoken with good reason," said Cardinal Latinus Malabranca, Bishop of Ostia, "for it hath been revealed to a holy solitary, that if we elect not a pontiff before All-Saints' festival, the anger of God will, of a certainty, wither us;" "and is this, think you," asked Benedict Gaetani, "one of the revelations of Pietro da Morrone?" "yea, my lord," replied the Bishop of Ostia, "and here is a letter from him, in which he says, Heaven will not fail to visit our remissness."

Now, this Pietro da Morrone was a man of austere life and great virtues, and dwelt in the mountain territory of Sulmona, a province of the kingdom of Naples. Without the experience or learning of Saint Peter Damian Dante's description of the latter in many respects was applicable to Pietro da Morrone, for he, too, like the other who bore the same Christian name, inhabited a lonely cell;

"And there so firmly to God's service he adher'd
That with no costlier viands than the juice
Of Olives, easily he passed the heats
Of summer and the winter frosts; content
In Heav'n-ward musings."—Parad. xxi.

The cardinals proceeded immediately to an election, and early in July, 1294, Pietro da Morrone was declared Pope. Three bishops were sent to make the announcement to the anchorite, and after some time he consented to take on him the great, and high office. "By what name shall we call thee Holy Father?" asked the ambassadors. "I will be called," answered the Pontiff, "Celestine the Fifth."

† Muratori, ad an. 1293.

Scarcely was the news spread abroad, when every man, from the puissant baron to the miserablest villain, was struck with wonder at such an unprecedented election. Surprise was succeeded by curiosity, and thousands, who hitherto would not venture beyond their own borders, hurried away to Sulmona, to see the anchorite who had been chosen to govern the Christian republic. The cardinals pressed him by repeated messages and supplications to come at once to Perugia, to be invested with all the dignities and emblems of the Popedom. But he preferred remaining where he was; and, by mandatory letters, ordered them to journey to the city of Aquila, where he resolved to be consecrated. King Charles, with his son of Hungary, repaired to the cell a few days before the solemnities were to take place, and when all was in readiness they took the reins of the mule, which the Pope rode, between their hands, and entered Aquila with a concourse of two hundred thousand persons.

Right glad was King Charles at this election of one who was not only his liege subject, but of such great simplicity as to be moulded according to his caprice. Many appointments of great moment were to be made, and many vacancies to be filled up. In the management of all such matters Celestine proved himself the instrument of the king, and gave little heed to the suggestions of the cardinals;* thus, on the 18th of September following his elevation, he created twelve cardinals, all of whom, with the exception of one, the nephew of Benedict Gaetani, were the slaves and creatures of his Sicilian Majesty. The inexperience of the Pontiff brought with it its own troubles, for he daily found that he had thought too charitably and too highly of those who surrounded and fawned on him; so much so that Jacopo da Varagine, a living witness, remarked, Pope Celestine had done much "de plenitudine potestatis, but more de plenitudine simplicitatis." To make matters worse, the simple Pontiff resolved to take up his abode at Naples, and abandon Rome to the factious barons. Insensible as the cardinals had been during the two years' vacant see, they were now stung to the heart and begun to dream of undoing their appointment. But all too late; their dissensions had brought about a state of things which could be remedied only by the deliberate abdication of Celestine, and much indeed did they desiderate that he, who was the slave of a despot, would retire from an eminence for which he lacked all and every requisite save sanctity. Writers of fabulous legends, says Muratori (annal. d' Italia), assert that Benedict Gaetani caused trumpets to be sounded in the night-time to impress the simple Pontiff with the notion that the day of judgment was nigh—and thus induce him to give up such a great responsibility. Such, however is not the fact, though tis certain that the cardinals never ceased to preach to his Holiness his utter incapacity for so great a trust. At all times remarkable for humility, and candid conscience, Celestine did not turn a deaf ear to the hints which were given him, and resolved to abdicate in favour of some one who, with steadier eye and hand more skilled, could steer St. Peter's barque. In vain did King Charles remonstrate against the waverings of his Holiness—in vain did he call together the entire population of Naples, who, on bended knees under the Pope's windows, cried aloud, "Hearken not to the advice of your cardinals—resign not, O Holy Father!" His resolution was fixed—he called a consistory and on the 13th of December stripped himself of the Tiara and other insignia of the popedom, and then resuming the hermit's habit with staff in hand returned to that lonely cell, where he communed with God, far away from the cares and troubles of power till death closed his career of solitude and humility. An example, says Muratori, to be admired by all, yet, rarely imitated by the great-ones of the world. A great man succeeded him in the person of Benedict Gaetano of Anagni, and thus closed the reign of CELESTINE V.*

We were induced to lay before you, good reader, this brief narrative of a brief reign, on reading some statements which the antipapal Austrian papers have been circulating, concerning our Holy Father Pius IX., feliciter regnans.

It has been at one time stated that his Holiness was about to resign, and at another that he was mad. Vilifications of this sort are not without their object. Thank heaven, they are false, sinful, and slanderous. Were his Holiness the creature of any crowned despot, no matter what his policy might be, he would find prompt support from German swords, and Muscovite savages. But he who is intent on liberalising institutions, and granting constitutional freedom to his subjects, can be little less than an abomination in the eyes of continental tyrants. His recent acts are calculated to disturb them not a little. A national flag, and a national guard are great guarantees for a people's freedom, nor in this do we detect any symptoms of lunacy. He who has made himself conversant with the policy of two hemispheres lacks not the experience and enlightenment, so visibly deficient in the character of Pope Celestine. Yet, but a short time at the head of the church, he has acquired more fame than any of his predecessors, and though false friends desert him, and imperialists mutter threats, the God of Freedom will stand by him in the evil day, and those who owe their lives and liberties to his magnanimous and enlarged policy, will cover him with an impenetrable shield.

Surely, if all the statements which we read in the papers of last month, describing the plans and failure of a band of conspirators who meditated effecting a reaction, be true, the heart of the wise and liberty-loving pontiff must have been sorely distressed. For our own part we have a thorough contempt for the word conspiracy†—a familiarity of eight years with that meaningless sound engendered that contempt—nor would we now waste ink writing it, if we had not ample evidence that Austrian intrigue and duplicity had given it a value. Hitherto the word congiura was stereotyped in the vocabulary of the Carbonari, and to that grim fraternity exclusively appertained. More heartless scoundrels than these did not blacken society in any part of the globe; ever ripe and ready for the most truculent misdeeds, whether by the cowardly agency of the stiletto or the poison-bowl, there was no atrocity which they were not capable of committing. We were beginning to believe that the race was extinct, that the stiletto and coltello were going to rust in ignoble obscurity, but we now think that Austria has flung open the doors of Spielberg and Milan's dungeons, to patronize and foster the very men who so

* The allusion in the third Canto of the Inferno "e vidi l'ombra di colui che fece per viltate il gran rifiuto, (And saw the shade of him who to base fear yielding, abjured his high estate)," cannot be understood of Pope Celestine V., whose act was if anything too magnanimous to be ascribed to base motives.

† There is a volume of truth in the pithy sentence of Nicolini: "Un popol non congiura."

long retarded the march of liberty. O'Connell was wont to say that the midnight assassin and incendiary marred many of his early struggles—nor will we ever forget his scathing denunciation of the remorseless villain who coolly awaited his victim, behind some hedge, and sent a bullet through his brain. The figure of the tribune, execrating these blood-shedders, is even now before us in all its impassioned majesty, and the tones in which he invoked the red arm of God's vengeance to smite the murderer, are still ringing in our ears. That such agents have done sore evil to this wretched land, we are firmly convinced, and that similar agencies will do lasting evil to Italy we are not the less certain. 'Tis enough to make one shudder to contemplate the fearful loss which must have resulted, had the late attempt succeeded in Rome. How, in the name of God, of liberty, and right reason, can Italians lend themselves to the satellites of Austria, if a shred of remembrance be left them? Do they forget that Lombardy has to sustain 100,000 Austrian troops? can they shut their eyes on the history of the Bandieras, fusilladed by the sbirri of Vienna? do they remember the fate of Cracow, the massacres in Galicia, and the fiendish treachery practised on the brave Poles, the damnedest and eddest stain on the annals of Hapsburg tyranny? Oh! if they be insensible to all this, they are unfit for liberty, and should be excommunicated from its blessings; slaves and hirelings of despotism—parricides, with whom love of country is a cant word, or a sale word—may you soon receive fitting retribution in the drear caverns of Silesia, and the living charnel houses of Venice. We have to thank an ever-watchful Providence that these machinators of evil did not succeed—and we blush for Ireland when we read that the name of Nugent† was soiled by a participation with those mercenaries who were ready to stab Italy to the heart. We are justly proud of the Irishmen who, going into foreign services, have done honour to their country at Fontenoy or Valmy, but for those modern Dalgettys, serving every one save the Turk, and ready to serve even him if offered a good bounty, we have only to avow our heartiest contempt and scorn. Now, however insignificant our advice may be, we would fain give the inhabitants of the pontifical states the benefit of it; our words will reach them, and some friend will translate them. If they be wise they will shun, as a pest, all foul conspiracies and hearken to the voice of their monarch. The citizen-soldier will be jealous of his country's honour, turn a deaf ear to the Austrian tempter, and, when the occasion offers, be ready to seal with his blood the charter of his independence. Pius the Ninth is too great a treasure to be sacrificed in an emeute, and young liberty will grow up stunted and ricketed if unwholesomely nursed. By all the memories of your glories, wrongs, and oppression. By all the sacred and sainted remembrances with which your annals teem, cherish religion, guard the pontifical throne, even as you would the bones of your Prince-Martyrs, and be assured that you will be a glorious people—the heart-centre of the world, and the saviours of Italy. 'Tis not by internecine feuds of parties or factions that you will ever get rid of the "pellegrine spada," which have stained your soil with the blood of thousands of your countrymen—division and mutual antagonism have perpetuated centuries of misrule and damning bondage—your pulpit-orators have told you, that when the devil would thrall you in his service, he teaches you to rebel against the dogma, and ordinances of religion. This same devil, the author and promoter of discord and brotherly hate, will prompt you to shed each others blood, and then employ German agencies to rivet your chains. Be united, and renounce him—be resolved and resist him, and now or never be counselled by the words of one in whom you glory

"La mansueta vostra e gentil agna
Abbatte i fieri lupi; e così vada
Chiunque amor legittimo scompagna.
Consolate lei dunque, ch' ancor bada,
E per Gesù cingete omai la spada."

The Closing Scene.

I shall pass from the glorious earth—
I shall rest on the fatal bier;
My life is of little worth—
And none will regret me here.
What, if within my breast
A world of love is burning;
Silent and unconfessed,
It meeteth no blest returning.
Here, in my lonely room,
No friends are around me trying
To snatch from the silent tomb
The few last thoughts of the dying.
Perhaps it is better so;
Yet were it at my choice,
I'd look on the friendly brow,
I'd list to the friendly voice.
Oh, for the by-gone day,
Oh, for the life departed,
Oh, for a hopeful ray
To the weary and broken-hearted!
Oh, for one hour of rest;
Fruitless and sick endeavour,
How should the life be blest
That soon is to close for ever.
Can I not look on Death
As on some calmer morrow?
Can I not yield a breath
Held with so much of sorrow?
Where is the joy of life—
Here in this chamber lying?
Fool! there is pain and strife,
And struggle and fear in dying.
Oh, could my heart be still—
Feel its past sins forgiven—
Then might I change my will,
And fix it on right and Heaven.
But the heart clings below,
Do what I will to cheer it;
And it is cold to know
Death is so early near it.
"Raise up my thoughts," in vain:
'Twere a too wild endeavour;
Earth hath a mighty chain
Binding them down for ever.
As I have lived, to die—
Such is the doom before me;
And my despairing eye
Reads the dark judgment o'er me.
Say not that Heaven is bright—
Set not my heart lamenting:
Never shall dawn its light
On the eyes of the unrepenting!
Not of God's mercy preach;
I were a late beginner—
Would you such lessons teach,
Wait not the dying sinner.
Well I have known God's love—
Much has my life abused it;
Dare I ask grace above,
I who so oft refused it.
Death is upon my brow,
Who shall resist his power;
Why have I ne'er till now
Thought of this closing hour!

* July 16. Nugent, at the head of 1600 Austrians, marched into Ferrara.

O'Connell.

ON the 3rd of August the mortal remains of IRELAND'S LIBERATOR reached their natal soil. Had he been a crowned monarch, greater honour could not have been done by the faithful and devoted people, who, during the preceding night, kept anxious vigil for the arrival of the sea-chapel, and stirred not from the quays till they accompanied the body of their chieftain to the cathedral, in the afternoon of the following day. No greater Irishman, since the days of King Dathi, gave up the ghost in a foreign land, and of all our illustrious countrymen not one has gone down to the grave, accompanied with such intense sorrow and bursting hearts as the great and all-but-worshipped Tribune. When the O'Donnell died in Valadolid, a king on whose dominions the sun never set was a mourner in the funeral train—when Hugh O'Neill surrendered his soul to God, in the city of Rome, a pope marked out his place of sepulture and wept the loss of him whose right hand wielded sword for the Ancient Faith—but neither Rome nor Spain could honour the memory and mortality of departed chief, as did the faithful and enthusiastic people of Ireland the remains of DANIEL O'CONNELL. Hierarchy, clergy, gentry, and people gathered round his bier, praying for the repose of the mighty soul summoned to its final account; but we miss the names of those who ought to have been there, as in duty bound. Where were you, ye Catholic aristocrats, for whom he opened the way to place, power, and high station? where would ye be to-day were it not for that immortal spirit which has taken flight, and that giant voice which thundered on your oppressors and tyrants? We know right well you were not where you ought to have been—outside the chancel, with uplifted hands and streaming eyes, when the prelacy and priesthood chanted over him who unshackled you, “Dies irae dies illa!

Qua resurget ex favilla
Judicandus homo reus.
Huic ergo parce Deus.”

Was it by your absence from this dread solemnity you honoured the memory of him whose grand spirit the Lord of heaven and earth “clothed with skin and flesh,” that he might rive your chains and set you free? Ah! verily you have filled up the measure of your ingratitude, nor shall it be forgotten. Whoso is anxious to know your whereabouts, needs but look into the Court Circular, or Gazette, and find you fawning on every serene highness and imperial despot who visits London to forget the scenes of desolation he has made, and the cries of agony and execration he has wrung from Catholic people upstanding for the liberty of their altars and homesteads. But we fearlessly tell you, were it not for him who is gone “to a land that is dark, and covered with the mists of death,” you would, even now, be whining at the castle gates, or stretching out your delicate arms, pinched and galled with penal manacles, to excite the compassion of your masters. But there is no generosity in your hearts, there are no memories in your souls, and henceforth the people—the masses—the remnant of our decimated peasantry, will know how to appreciate you and your devotion. Shame upon your ingratitude, and may it be long remembered by those, to whose blood and sweat you owe whatever of this world's luxuries and dignities you possess. After all, perhaps we have not acted wisely in thus exposing your want of common feeling: the man, on whom death has laid his leaden hand, was never loved by you, although he raised you up; and it was fitting that he who in life received no laurel at your hands, should go down to his last resting-place without a cypress-wreath from your parterres. And well have the people done their duty without your intervention; they sought not a maravedi from your coffers, nor your presence at the bier: without a contribution from your hoarded wealth, or the glitter of your worthless coronets, a few honest, earnest men of the trading class—of that class you affect to despise—the companions of the illustrious deceased in his early campaigns, and the tried friends of his chequered life—these honest, earnest, and pious representatives of the people honoured O'CONNELL's remains with more than regal splendour, and assembled round his coffin such an array of piety, intelligence, and integrity, as all your dead ancestors, risen from the grave, could not bring together. From that cold and studied neglect, which characterized the Catholic aristocracy of Ireland on the occasion of O'CONNELL's obsequies, we turn to give a brief outline of what was done by better citizens, and more patriotic Irishmen.

When the announcement of O'CONNELL's decease was made public, the committee of the Catholic cemeteries—which owe their existence mainly to the indefatigable zeal of the Liberator—unanimously resolved that no expense should be spared in conveying his remains to the city. For some time 'twas a question where they should be entombed, till the O'Connell family, yielding to the earnest solicitations of the Committee, complied with the desires of many of his old friends, and signified their assent that they should be interred in Glasnevin Burial-ground. Owing to the illness of O'CONNELL's youngest son, the remains did not arrive for a considerable time after they had been expected, and when certain intelligence of their approach was published, the Cemeteries' Committee took prompt measures to fit and furnish the Cathedral, according to the rubrics, for the mournful and solemn ceremonies with which the Church honours and blesses her deceased, ere she gives back to earth the bodies sanctified in the waters of baptism. Everything that art could do was scientifically accomplished; the columns of the Cathedral swathed in mourning—the altar attired in the sombre vesture prescribed by the ritual—and the light of day carefully excluded, while the glare of funereal torches glistened on the catafalque which sustained the sarcophagus of him who emancipated prelacy and priesthood. A sight more solemn, ceremonies more princely we have not witnessed even under the dome of St. Peter's, and, as we have already said, had O'CONNELL been a crowned monarch, greater honour could not have been done his mortal remains. And well did he deserve and earn them; never did the lustral water asperge the coffin of a greater Catholic—and never did more earnest aspiration stir within the hearts of men than at the moment when the officiating prelate looked down, with tearful eyes, on the “Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world,” and implored our Lord Christ to be mindful of his servant DANIEL. That memento shall be perpetual; in ages to come it shall dwell in the hearts of the Catholic priesthood, and generations yet unborn, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof, shall implore “eternal light and rest” for him who, Onias-like, defended the sanctuary, and scattered its oppressors. No former age hath witnessed the departure out of this world of a greater man: who like him was so CATHOLIC in genius, influence, and ability? truly, none. From Kenmare river to the most distant regions of earth, the name of O'CONNELL has gone abroad, and along with it the memory of wrongs redressed, prejudices trampled in the dust, and the outraged honour of religion avenged and vindicated. The sympathies of Irishmen have been sadly awakened from the Alps to the Himalayah mountains—nor of Irishmen only, but of every human being who revolts at oppression and injustice. In every creek, islet, and roadstead of this habitable globe, that man's ingenuity can reach, the account of his death will be received as that of one preeminently great, who leaves none like behind him—a pleiade gone from the political firmament, whose re-appearance none may witness. The Irish outcast, who acts pioneer to civilization where immemorial forests overshadow hill and plain, shall read of his decease and obsequies with tearful eyes; and well he may, for who now can stand so boldly between the tyrant landlord and the kin and companions of his early years? In Canton and Hindostan, the Irish soldier, whose necessities have compelled him to follow the unholy career of arms, contributing to the aggrandizement of the British nation, will muse on all this as he paces his lonely round, and many a brave peasant, who listened enraptured to the voice now hushed in death, will lean upon his musket and murmur, "Lord have mercy upon his soul." And you, ye representatives of the Apostles, who carry the light of the faith where ignorance and error have reduced fallen nature to the level of the brute—you, ye true philosophers of Christianity, chivalrous crusaders, who, disregarding the carpet comforts of home and its associations, have gone abroad on the glorious mission of life and love, you will not fail to pray for him by the rushing river and "in the grand old woods," where you have been the harbingers of truth and religion. The obsequies commenced in Rome, suspended till the mortal remains reached this city, will be resumed wherever Catholicism has a habitation, for the heavens over-arch no spot in which O'CONNELL'S name is not revered and revered. As in duty bound, we pay this feeble tribute of our respect to the illustrious dead—and without presuming to criticise the panegyric pronounced in the Cathedral, we assert, without hesitation, that no place could have been more properly selected for the entombment than Glasnevin. A man so passionately fond, and so eminently master of classic antiquity as is the Rev. Dr. Miley, must certainly know that Athens and Rome raised the monuments of their great men, almost invariably in the city, or at least not far from it. Augustus and Hadrian had their mausoleums in Rome, and the Greeks erected the statue of Demosthenes in the centre of Athens. Here it may be remarked, that the latter died when the women of Greece were keeping the feast of the Thesmophoria, and fasted all day in the temple of Ceres—O'CONNELL died when this country was famine stricken, and thousands fasted in their hovels, making bitter lamentation over the unburied dead. Irrespective of any hints we may borrow from pagan antiquities, 'twill be at all times remembered that Dublin was the centre and focus of O'CONNELL'S life, agitation, and fame. Dublin was to him what Paris was to Napoleon; if the latter was content to sleep by the banks of the Seine, we do not see how we honour the remains of O'CONNELL less, by depositing them near the banks of the Liffey. Without assuming any right to dictate on the subject, we would as lief see the statue of the Liberator carried away from our deserted Exchange, as the mortal spoils from the Campo Santo, whither they were followed by myriads of the Irish people, and where Irish Pontiffs prayed to Him, who is "the resurrection and life," that "Angels would lead to paradise, and crowned martyrs would welcome in holy Jerusalem" the great and illustrious Leader of the Irish people. Were our own wishes carried out, we would gather the bones of all our great men who have received sepulture in foreign lands, and deposit them within the same precincts; we would not allow Grattan to moulder in Westminster, nor Hugh O'Neill on the Janiculum; we would do for them what the Cemeteries' Committee have already done for Curran, and that reflects honour on their piety and patriotism.

We will not conclude before adjuring our countrymen to forget and forego the dissensions which have so long, and alas! so fatally, doomed this land—for which O'CONNELL lived and would have died. Now more than two hundred years ago, Nicholas French, Bishop of Ferns, dying in exile, implored our ancestors to cast away all bickerings and antagonisms, that they might rally for the rescue of Ireland; the lesson was unheeded—justice triumphed, and blood, rapine, and desolation swept their homesteads. From-out that tomb where O'CONNELL lies, comes forth a voice of dread warning, to chide our disagreements and allay the storm of our passions. 'Twould well become us to hearken to it and act like men who feel the truth of Seneca's maxim, "Stultum est somno delectari, mortem horrere: cum somnos asiduus sit mortis mutatio." This land demands our union, our love, our conjoint efforts to save her from perdition; if we go down to our graves bequeathing an inheritance of hate and animosity to our offspring, they will curse us; let us not lend truth to the beautiful fiction of the ancient poets, which tells how the flames, kindled to consume the bodies of Eteocles and Polynices, would not unite on the same pyre. Oh! rather let us bury our feuds and anger in O'CONNELL'S grave, and thus rear to his departed spirit the grandest monument man's genius can design—a monument testifying our reverence for the holy inculcations of charity and love of country.

A STORY OF IRELAND IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER XII.—FIONUALA.

THE Earl of Kildare, now deeply involved in the plot for reviving the wars of the Roses, according to the impetuosity of his nature, neglected almost every other concern, and, especially, the daughters of his house; to them Thomas-court was daily becoming a less agreeable abode, on this account, and from the number of military guests arriving daily, and the clamour they occasioned. Sir Morrogh M'David and Sir James Fleming were seldom suffered to escape employment by the earl; and much to the chagrin of one of the recluses, nothing had been heard or seen of Sir Piers Barnwall. To inquire openly she durst not venture, and in the present bustle of preparation, the absence of a single knight was not remarked on by others.

To add to her other anxieties, Sir Gibbon, the fop, was untiring in his attentions to Fionuala.

It was a June evening, and the three friends sat in the arbour of the earl's garden, looking and talking very gravely.

"In a few days, as I have heard, they are to sail for England," said the gentle Alison. "First, they are to hold their tournament, to show us, bide-at-homes, what manner of thing war is—the volts and demivolts, the tricks and the artifices by which our friends are to be slain."

"It will be a glorious show," said Eustacia, "the lists and the pavilions—the knights in armour with shield and spear—and the archers in russet or in green—the trumpeters shining in gold, and you, Alison reigning queen of beauty over all."

"I do not long for such sovereignty; for ye know the day of my accession would be the last of that noble host in Ireland—God guard them in their adventures elsewhere."

"I do heartily wish this young king had never landed on our shore," said Eustace, "he will take from it, and spend afar, I fear, some of its noblest blood."

"God forfend it."

"How brave and beautiful is a host, dight and bound for battle. Like summer trees they spread their arms and rustle their bravery. How high they hold their heads, as wooing the storm that is to come. And lo! it comes, sharp and breem. The tall comrades are parted, rent, and laid low—naked and helpless they fall upon one another, never to be replanted on the earth."

"Eustace! 'tis a woful picture. Eustace [to Sir Gibbon, who now entered] has been talking of this new war, impending, for your valours, in the realm of England."

"Perdie! a murky theme enough. But you look pale, madam; do not fear; he will not be there."

"Who will not? Sir Gibbon."

"The Knight of Drimnagh—that is, he of the fine feathers—has flown away."

"Sir Gibbon, speak me true—whither has he flown?"

"By're lady, lady, how should I reckon of that. Into the land of Offally, perhaps."

"Knight, you do not look like a true man. Your lip quivers and your eye is not at rest; you know more of him than you care to tell."

"Gads, so! we young fellows all know more of each other than it would be wise our lady-loves should have a knowledge of. Thus I, in a sense, know Barnwall."

"I beseech you, Sir Gibbon—come this way, a little farther; now—if ever you do hope to have my love, answer me uprightly: where is Sir Piers Barnwall?"

"He is safe."

"But where?"

"In a castle, that, in a sense, he may call his own, for he has taken possession of it."

"Come, come, you play with me."

"Play with you, lady Nuala. I would fainly, but—"

"Go on."

"I would I could go on in my wooing. Fionuala, you are very fair."

"Now, Sir Knight, this is not the news I asked of you."

"And all the warriors of the court are pining to have a sight of your grace's loveliness. I am envied of all, that I can approach the divinity."

"Sir, my question—do answer me my question."

"I have heard wagers waged that you would be queen of the lists; you have cost their worships, our knight's guests, much gold for adornments, I apprise you."

"Yet, you, Sir Gibbon, will outshine them all."

"Perdie! think you so!"

"Who can sing with the lark, or run with the deer of the mountains, and—who can vie with Sir Gibbon Fitzgerald for grace and air?"

"Fionuala!"

"In all but courtesy you are a matchless gentleman; and in that, until this hour, I never knew how unhappily you lacked."

"I do not remember me—pardon me, I do not, how I have failed."

"Oh! I asked after a poor gallant of mine—one that I had seen for a week or more in the court, and who had fled without so much as 'God's blessing,' and you balk my woman's curiosity, and will not answer me."

"Well, then, I will."

"Speak, sweet Sir Gibbon."

"If—if I may kiss your dear—hand."

"Both, courteous knight, both; now, out with it."

"He is in the castle!"

Fionuala heard this announcement with wonder and fear, for, in her mind, and that of all her nation, the castle sounded as in latter times did the Bastille in the ears of the French. Yet she did not scream, and scarcely started. Her hands dropped by her side, and her eyes fell, yet her fortitude did not fail her.

"Rise up, Sir Knight," she said, "and farewell—I will see you in the lists."

"Certes yes! since you desire it. Oh! yes, I will be there."

"Do not fail—farewell."

She turned into another walk, now covered over with summer foliage, and advanced lost in thought. At that moment she was the slave of love, and yet she felt not the nature of the power that ruled her mind. A vague and harrowing fear agitated her breast and darkened her brow. The danger of Barnwall, threefold magnified, frowned in her face. Then arose the woman's question to her lips—what can I do to save him? Yea! lady, what? You are beautiful, Fionuala, beautiful as the morning, as your own island, as a penitent painter's image of the Madonna, but beauty, I fear me much, will not draw the dungeon bolt, or turn the fetterlock. Yet lady, fear nothing. The power of beauty, and still more of courage and purity, has wrought marvels in other ages, and why not again.

"I will go to the Lord Deputy," exclaimed the Irish maiden; "I will know from his own lips the cause of this poor captive's durance; and if he does not set him free I will stir him up enmity in Offally."

She entered Thomas-court, and winding through many corridors came at last to the earl's apartments. The door to his ante-room at which she stood was not the same by which guests usually entered, but was reserved for the owner of the mansion and his family. She knocked gently and the door opened.

Long accustomed to mix with grave and powerful men—chiefs of lineage old as the oaks, and brehons learned in the laws as the magii of the east—it was less the greatness of him she approached, than the nature of her errand which excited alternately the fears and the blushes of our heroine, as Kildare himself stood before her. Handing her a seat, he motioned her to sit, and walked up and down, anxious and curious to hear the subject of her errand. There was a long pause, and at last the earl himself broke silence.

"I am glad, madame, to see you here. My little girls and you must have been of late very lonely and comfortless in this hostlerie of a court."

"Very, my lord."

"Well, I regret it. I was about to propose that they should go to Maynooth, taking you with them, if my old friend, your father, will do them that advantage."

"My lord, you are too kind."

"No, no, girl, no. You must know I have my designs upon you; you are to wed my kinsman, Gibbon."

"I! my lord."

"You lady! Is't not a good plot?"

"My lord, it may be well drawn, but it will never come to a head."

"By Earl Richard's soul! Is not the knight a good man and a peaceable. Would you wed a broiling chieftain, always in war and strife, to have your marriage bed spread in a camp—your nuptial torch a brand snatched from the fire of some sacked castle—to lie down with armed men and swords around your pillow, and wake up only to see days of bloodshed and havoc?"

"No! no, no, my lord!"

"Would you wed a ruler in the state, and pine away your life like my dame of Kildare, while your lord was deep in plots and stratagems, to be disturbed at midnight by feverish dreams of conspiracies exploded, risings quelled, the dungeon, and the headsmen's axe?"

"Still less than the other, my lord."

"Well then, fair maid of Offally, my cousin Gibbon is not a warrior—though, being a Geraldine, he is no coward—neither is he like to be disturbed at nights with remorse for working revolutions in the state. He is fair and trim in his attire—a true carpet-knight, and, therefore, the very manner of man for your hand and home.”

“My lord, we will talk of this another time——”

“No, no; no time like to-day.”

“My lord, you but lose time; and I also, for I come to you an humble suitor.”

“Say your suit, fair Fionuala.”

“My lord, you are a father, and have been a lover. If you were in captivity, as in the hands of King Henry, from which God shield you, would you think it wrong of Alison, or your wife, to petition, even as I now do, on my knees, the liberation of one they—they—loved?”

“No, lady.”

“Then, my lord, will you send forth, free of your castle of Dublin, Piers Barn——”

The earl’s face grew darker than a thunder cloud, as he muttered forth, “Piers Barnwall! the traitor Barnwall! By Earl Richard’s soul——”

“Ah! do not swear, my lord, it is an evil habit, abhorred in heaven. And do not be wroth, that, too, is forbidden to us. Good, my Lord Deputy, my father and our sept have done you service—if I may say it—in other days, and would again, I know, at the risk of life and limb. If this great enterprize that now engages you fails—as what human device may not fail; if your fleet is scattered by the storm in crossing the sea. If, landing in England, you are beaten by Henry, or by fortune; if you are endangered—the forests of Offally are broad and dense—its castles are strong and many, and its people, my kins——”

“Stay!” shouted the choleric earl, “I will hear no more. Your traitor-minion, shall never leave the castle alive.”

“My lord, do not look so angrily——”

“Rise up, I have sworn.”

“I will arise, Earl of Kildare. I will go and remember that I knelt at your feet craving a boon, and that you spurned me. Me! the child of your best friend, without whose aid you could not for an hour lord it over your rivals of “the Pale.” Me! the friend of your dear daughters, who hath walked and lived with them so long, sleeping, as one might say, on the same pillow. It is stern usage, but, mayhap, I deserved it. Adieu.”

“Stay!” said the earl, still chafing with anger, but with a more emphatic and determined intonation, “you love this prying gallant?”

Fionuala half turned round, her face glowing with indignation, and slightly bent her head.

“Bethink you what you do. He is but lord of a few ploughlands—his household stuffs have been mortgaged to Dublin merchants—his——”

“My Lord Deputy, I do not come to counsel with you as to my choice of a lover. When that is needful, I will first go to my father; but, I came to ask you a boon. You have denied me—I am gone.”

“Do not go!” replied the earl, as if the sight of the proud bearing of the offended girl gave him pleasure. “Promise me, if he is liberated, you shall not speak to him within the English Pale, should you chance to meet with him.”

“Will you then set him free?”

“And that if you do, it shall be with the knowledge of either Sir Gibbon Fitzgerald, or me!”

“Will you free him, then?”

“Do you promise me on your word and faith?”

“My lord, though it is a strange provision you make, I will promise, provided you at once perform your part.”

“He shall be free this very night, adieu—be true.”

With a sigh, and a slower step than when she entered it, Fionuala left the chamber of the earl, and took her way to her own. Her dissatisfaction rose chiefly from her wounded pride, bent by the exacting and ungracious reception she had met. However, after a few moments’ thought, this cleared away, and she reflected only that she had accomplished her object, and set her dear friend at liberty. With a smoother brow and a more assured step, she entered her own chamber, where she found her father awaiting her.

The O’Connor Faily was a pious and wise man, worthy to co-mingle the blood of Murrough of the victories and Margaret O’Carroll. In earlier life he had been a fierce and, indeed, a reckless warrior, but years, that fetter the foot and cramp the knee, force many thoughts, not of this world, on the souls of men. Now the only care of this prosperous chief of Offally was to fit his own soul for the judgment, and to leave his daughter happily wedded—as to his two sons, they he knew would provide for their own safety.

As Fionuala entered he rose from his seat, and, walking over, kissed her on both cheeks, according to the fashion of his people, and then drew her to his side.

“My child,” he said, while his right hand rested on her head, “in a few days it will be the feast of the blessed St. Kevin of the valley. Earl Geritt is going to war with the Ard-righ of the Saxons, and ’twere time we had returned into Offally. Will you come to the holy valley, and celebrate with me the feast of the saint.”

“My father, as you will, I act. I long to leave this crowded, babbling court, and to be again in the open country.”

“You are a wise girl, oh! daughter, and I must match you with the best man in Ireland. He will have a cunning tongue who can coax you from me.”

Fionuala hung her head, and then began to talk of their pilgrimage to Glendalough.

CHAPTER XIII.—THE TOURNAMENT.

WHILE the Lord Deputy was busied at Thomas-court, completing the arrangements for the invasion of England, and the German troopers and men-at-arms were carousing in that portion of the castle in which they were lodged, the knights and cavaliers of England and “the Pale,” as also those of Germany and France, were anxiously preparing themselves for the passage of arms. The armorers in Neve-street, at Thomas-court, and around the Coombe, were plying their difficult trades, from evening, through midnight, till the grey hours of morning. And many a fair lady, engaged in a gentler craft, had forgotten her pillow, in the promise of the pleasure to come. There was a strange scene, whoever could have beheld it, in the long hall of the castle, where the Germans had spent their night. On the low, broad tables, from which they had feasted, lay stretched the hardy followers of Martin Swaart, some bare-headed and uncovered, others wrapped up in woollen cloaks. Trenchers and bowls, in great confusion, were scattered around, swords that had fallen from loose scabbards, mingled with helmets and pieces of armour. This hall, lighted at the top with a row of loops, was now shrouded, for it was near day, in an almost perfect darkness. Two doors, one at either end, gave entrance and egress, and through these, usually, was the passage to the cells of the prisoners. Near one of them lay the friendly German who had been the companion of Captain Myrtle, and another German, warmly muffled, with their swords by their sides.

The gray light of the morning fell upon the floor, and against the low door, which led to the department of the captives, like the light of mercy struggling into a tyrant's soul. The heavy breathing of all around spoke their profound repose, when the door towards the court-yard opened, and Captain Kenelbreck softly entered. Proceeding through the sleeping ranks, he came to the second door, undid its fastening, and entered, leaving it ajar. He had no sooner passed than the companion of the German, we have already noticed, rose to his feet, and gave his fellow a hearty shake, which failing to awake him he threw the contents of a water-jug, that stood near, upon his face. The trooper, with a "mine Got," leaped up, and followed his comrade through the open door, in pursuit of the captain of the Earl's Guard.

Through many dark and devious passages, they reached the base of a stone staircase, at the head of which they heard this conversation.

"You are ordered to remove privily?"

"This dungeon is dark and hard enough, and worse service has seldom been rendered to a captive, but I will go with you if you tell me three things. Is Sir Murrough M'David still at the court?"

"He is, but he is about to sail for England."

"False friend!" said the knight bitterly, "if he were in prison, I would wind my horn at every fortress gate in Christendom, or find him out. But, mayhap, he knows nothing of the matter. Is the O'Connor Faily and his daughter at Thomas-court?"

"Yea, both."

"And how doth the lady Fionuala pass her time?"

"Very cheerfully—'tis said Sir Gibbon of the Valley wears her favour."

The knight smiled—"is it so said? Well then lead the way to my new dungeon."

The Captain of the Guard, taking the end of the chain by which the fettered and manacled knight was bound, requested him to descend the stairs, while he followed, holding fast by the chain. The passage beneath was, fortunately, entirely dark, so that the two Germans could not be seen. As soon then as Sir Piers reached the ground, the stouter of the two troopers grasped Kenelbreck in his arms and threw him on the ground, while the other snatching from his hand the fetter key, proceeded to liberate the knight.

"No more scruples, now," said a well-known voice in Barnwall's ear, "put on this trooper's dress, and follow me. But stay."

The prostrate Kenelbreck was making many desperate attempts to rise. "Mine friend," said the German, "have some patience—we are all but things of clay and subject to manifold falls and fortunes." Then taking up the manacles, fetters, and chain, he fastened them upon the discomfited captain, turned him round upon his face, so that he could not cry out, and left him to his reflections. The knight and his two companions passed into the castle-yard. The guards at the gate, seeing them dressed as Germans, did not question them, neither were they stopped at the walls, through which they also passed. When they were at a good distance beyond them, one of his liberators, letting down his cloak, revealed to the eyes of the knight the brave Captain of the Bachelors.

"Fly," said the friendly Myrtle, "we must take care of ourselves; do you keep wide of Kildare."

"Gallant Bachelor and friend," said Barnwall, "you have done me good service—may the saints reward you now, and I will hereafter."

"Got's beard!" said the German, "no, do you reward him here, and the saints will attend to him in the hereafter."

"Truly; I believe that were the better way," said the knight, "Will you come to me at Drimnagh, when these wars have blown over?"

The Bachelor promised faithfully to do so, and the knight, shaking them both heartily by the hand, walked briskly away in the direction of his own castle.

It was his first thought to return to his home, to follow Ormond to Kilkenny, and await in arms the issue of the war. But the sight of the lawns and woods of Priors' Park turned his thought to another object; recollections of the hawking party, and of the glorious maiden whom he had then in charge, and he resolved to retrace his steps into Dublin, and to see her, even at the risk of life. But, he would not put his friend the Bachelor in further peril, for him—so, skirting the verge of the Park, he returned by way of Oxmantown, and stood at the gate of St. Mary's Abbey.

The porter, a hip-shot, stooped, and sour-looking fellow, enquired his errand.

"I seek the Infirmarius," said the knight.

"If you are one of the Germans, you speak English glibly enough," said the porter, eyeing him suspiciously.

"Oh! I learned that in the wars of King Edward, whom Got rest," replied Barnwall.

"And what may be your business with brother Celestine?"

"I have heard of his skill in leech craft," said the knight, "and would fain have his advice on an old wound that troubles me very much at night."

"You do not look as one who was mortally taken," said the inquisitor, "albeit, enter. Cross the court, turn into the arch yonder, and follow the way you will find there—it leads to Celestine's cell, and the place of the sick."

The knight did as directed, heartily rejoiced to escape from the questioning of the gate-keeper, and observations of the passers-by. In a few moments he found himself at the cell of the infirmarius, at which he knocked, and was bid to enter.

Entering, the knight beheld the venerable man, who had just risen, preparing some medicaments, in a rude mortar. The furniture of his room consisted of a pallet, a small altar, a fire-place, and shelves covered with vessels containing various drugs and medicines, and a few old, soiled books, a table, and two rude chairs. The good father scarcely raised his head from his work to give the intruder his blessing, but Barnwell, after closing the door of his cell, approached him, and letting down his cloak, said, "father, do you not know me?"

"My dear son! Sir Piers Barnwall! What chance has brought you here, and in this disguise? I pray God you have met with no hurt; though if you have, you have happened to come to the right place for a cure."

"Good father, you behold before you a perplexed and troubled man. One fettered in love, escaped from fetters. Whose heart and idol are at the court, among his enemies, and who slept last night in irons, in the castle."

"And, my son, how can I serve you, in this strait."

"To-day there is to be a tournament without the city, and I desire to be there. Can you aid me?"

The Infirmarius paused. "'Tis a rash undertaking," he said, at length, "consider, knight, I beseech of you, whether I could not serve you without endangering your safety."

"No, father, no! I will be at the tournament in some guise or other."

"Well," said the leech, "young blood and mountain torrents will not be stayed. There is here in my charge a sick knight of the Almain, whose horse and armour may serve you for the nonce."

"Thanks, excellent father. Hear you not the crowing of the cock? Does not that presage victory?"

"The cock," said the Infirmarius, "is a bird renowned from antiquity for courage, watchfulness, and nobility. It is an especial favourite with Pliny, whose history, this book, I hold to be my richest possession on earth, saving God's grace. It is here set down that there is no bird looks up so often to the sun and the sky; and that even the lion, the bravest of the beasts, is awed by him, and will run amaine from his noise. The best breeds were from Rhodes—now happily possessed by the knights of the hospital—Tenagra, and Chalcis. Indeed, Pliny hath set down some things of cocks hard to be believed by a Christian, as that, when Marcus Lepidus was consul, the cock of one Galerius spoke. What cocks may have done before Christ's birth 'tis hard to say, but I know of none that hath spoken in our age."

The knight smiled at the volubility of the aged scholar, and added, "if this one lies not, I will have a solemn cock fight yearly at Drimnagh, as they had of old at Pergamus."

"Ha!" said the leech, "you have read Pliny."

"Somewhat, at Oxford, where I was almost his sole disciple."

"'Tis a sorry university enough," said the Infirmarius, "yet it hath bred good scholars, as Duns Scotus, and Ockham."

Sir Piers, fearing that the Infirmarius having got on his hobby would ride out of sight of the tournament, asked to see the horse and trappings of the sick knight. The Infirmarius consented, and, telling him not to walk so erectly, he led him to the stall.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE LATE

Right Rev. John England, D.D.,

BISHOP OF CHARLESTON, UNITED STATES.

THE subject of our consideration in the following pages once wrote:

"More than forty-five years have passed away since a man, then about sixty years of age, led me into a prison, and showed me the room in which he had been confined during upwards of four years, in consequence of the injustice to which the Catholics of Ireland were subjected in those days of persecution. On the day that he was immured his wife was seized by fever, the result of terror; whilst she lay upon her bed of sickness she and her family were dispossessed of the last remnant of their land and furniture: she was removed to the house of a neighbour to breathe her last under a stranger's roof. Her eldest child had completed his seventeenth year a few days before he closed her grave. Two younger brothers and two younger sisters looked to him as their only support. He endeavoured to turn his education to account. It was discovered that he was a Papist, as the law contumeliously designated a Roman Catholic, and that he was guilty of teaching some propositions of the sixth book of Euclid to a few scholars that he might be able to aid his father and support his family. Informations were lodged against him for this violation of the law, which rendered him liable to transportation. Compassion was taken upon his youth and misfortunes, and, instead of proceeding immediately to the prosecution, an opportunity was given him of swearing before the Protestant bishop that he did not believe in the doctrines of transubstantiation, of penance, and of the invocation of saints; and the certificate of the prelate would have raised a bar to his prosecution. The youth knew no principle of his church which could excuse his perjury. He escaped and fled into the mountains, where he remained for more than a year. Subsisting upon the charity of those to whose children he still communicated the rudiments of learning, but in the most painful anxiety as to the state of his father, brothers, and sisters.

"The declaration of American independence, and the successful resistance of the colonists, having produced some mitigation of of the persecutions which the Catholics endured, this fugitive returned by stealth to the city, and was enabled to undertake the duties of a land surveyor, to have his parent liberated, his family settled—and he became prosperous."

This brave man was the father of John England. The latter was born in the northern part of the city of Cork, on the 23rd of September, 1786.

Another existence, very important to Ireland and remarkable to the world, commenced not long before, at a place not very many miles distant. Somewhere about this time, a large-limbed merry-hearted boy sat in an ancient Elizabethian chair, in an old Kerry mansion, listening to a conversation in which the political movements of the time were vehemently discussed, and the character of Grattan dilated upon with the warmth of Ciaran enthusiasm. Awakening from a long fit of abstraction, the child exclaimed—"Uncle Maurice! Uncle Maurice! perhaps even I, little Dan O'Connell, will be a great man, and serve Ireland yet." Soon after—boyish ambition defining for itself a purpose—he was sent to St. Omer's.

The son of the fugitive scholar had all the advantages of a religious education, and was early trained to the practice, and instructed in the principles of the church, whose champion and ornament he became. His teachers were the most moving of all instructors, a fond and pious mother, and a father who well knew the importance of inculcating the faith for which he had suffered. Such instruction was not lost. If matters of more importance were not lying before us, we might fill some pages with anecdotes of the first fervour of young John England's piety, and the early dawn of his great intelligence. It is sufficient to let you know that his life but realized the promise of his boyhood. Notwithstanding the petty tyranny of a pedagogue in whose school he was the only "Papist," and the effects of a disease in the throat which rendered the removal of one of the tonsils necessary, he was singularly successful in his first studies, and grew to be a robust, hardy youth, with a peculiar keen grey eye, a winning and prepossessing, though not handsome countenance, and a manner that gained the affection of every one. He was early devoted to God. The state of life to which his parents wished inclined, and his own desire emphatically pointed, was that of the holy ministry. In his fifteenth year he was placed, by the venerable Dr. Moylan, under the special care of one of the most saintly and enlightened priests that ever ministered at an Irish altar, the Very Reverend Dean Robert Mac Carthy. The guidance and example of such a man had, no doubt, much to do in forming the character of his pupil.

On the 31st of August, 1803, in the seventeenth year of his age, Mr. England entered the College of Carlow. Here his great qualities first became matured and first made him remarkable. Touched in his youth with the fire of zeal, he was chastened and aroused. Even at College he was a vessel of election, strengthened with the bread of life, anointed with the chrism of suffering, signed with the sign of the cross. Even in those days he set out bravely, and with a high heart, to do his work on earth. No diletante was he to be, but a rough fighter. No sleepy respectable man, but one burning with heavenly ardour, and combatting with all his might, in every place, at every risk, the devil and his works and ways. John England was to be of the leaders rather than the led—one of the great ones of God, vouchsafed us in those times—a member of that band which He has always sent from the commencement of the covenant for his own glory, man's weal, and the church's benefit. Even in College, as we have said, our young Cork man was remarkable, and a leader. Some of his fellow-students live yet, who love to tell of that extraordinary youth, "dux" in the class, first in the chapel, merriest in the playground, with piety profound, as his talents were brilliant, winning the respect of those who saw, and the deep love of those who knew him; and who not content with the performance of the ordinary duties of collegiate life, imposed upon himself others, quite without the bounds of custom. It not being very interesting to detail the successes of study, we shall glance at these latter more characteristic exertions. The people of Carlow and the neighbourhood were, from peculiar circumstances, at this time, remarkably uninstructed and even vicious. To their reformation and enlightenment, Mr. England applied his mind, and contrived to devote a good deal of time. True; it was not his province—he had nothing to do with them—he was engaged in other and important avocations. None of those excuses answered him. Those people were his brethren. They were redeemed by Christ's blood. They shall not perish if he can help it. He can do very little for them, the ordinary easy-going man would say. Yes, but he can do a little, and he will. So, student though he was, he flung himself with hearty good intention into the matter, and, like most practical hard-working people, did, by God's grace, a great deal. First he instituted catechetical instructions in the parish chapel, which, aided by his ready talent and prepossessing way, prospered, and in time were attended by old and young. Then seeing that this after all was but poor help, he besought, wrote, toiled, begged, threatened, until he had the inexpressible joy of seeing extensive male and female poor schools established, mainly by his exertions. Well, this was not half; Carlow was somewhat famous—infamous, rather—as an abode of that wretched class of the community against whom, the Angel's curse is levelled. Our young apostle resolved that should not be. With a charity daring as it was intense, he braved calumny, encountered suspicion, suffered contumely, and succeeded in forming a female penitentiary. Still more; there was in Carlow a body of militia, as degraded and ignorant as well might be, and to whom were attributable many of the moral evils of the place. Mr. England threw himself in their way, won their confidence, gained their respect, and very gradually but very certainly effected a considerable reformation in a great part of the troop. His success was so great that it drew upon him the enmity of the fanatics of the town. Thinking to touch him at the sorest point, they prevailed upon Colonel Longfield to bring to court-martial some of the men who attended him. The anxiety of Mr. England may be conceived, but fortunately the officers were not corrupt. The soldiers were acquitted, and the exertions of their teacher sanctioned. Mr. England, it is said, used to congratulate himself, that like St. Francis de Sales, his first mission was among the military. These things, surely, with a very successful and laborious collegiate course, were no ordinary attainments for a young man leaving College at two-and-twenty—a meet first act of a life-drama like his.

He did leave College at two-and-twenty. In the October of 1808, Dr. Moylan, his diocesan, having been intimately acquainted by report and observation with the character of his young subject, procured a dispensation for his immediate ordination, and summoned him to Cork. The grief of students, professors, and town's-people on his departure was great and vehement, as in fact, well it might. On the ninth day of the month we have mentioned, he was admitted to the order of deacon, and on the following day ordained priest.

Now he was indeed enrolled a professed soldier of Christ. The mystic character imparted—the mystic words repeated—the mystic power bestowed, he was bound by a triple covenant to the service of Him who was the joy of his youth. We may be sure the student of Carlow did not surpass the priest of Cork. Having paid a valedictory visit to the latter place, he applied himself with more than accustomed heartiness and unwavering zeal to the labours of the mission in his native city. The bishop discerning his talent for conveying instruction, appointed the young priest lecturer at his cathedral. This post the Rev. Mr. England retained for many years. He was always remarkable as a preacher. His exertions in the pulpit of the "North Chapel" (the cathedral) of Cork, were not among the least successful of his labours in this way. Old men yet refer to them with tearful eyes and thoughtful mien as they sit among their children, as the proximate cause of their conversion to God. Holy people of fewer years think of them as the most impressive lessons of their youth. Worldlings remember them, and sigh as they compare the present with the brightness and innocence of the past, when kneeling with young, joyful hearts, at the holy table they promised, with youthful fervour to obey the injunctions of the pulpit. Newspapers tell us how they were attended by crowds—what a "sensation" some caused, what a change others—and how flocked to many of them, the high and lowly, rich and poor, learned and uninstructed, the Protestant merchant, and the "Papist" tradesmen. This is the proof of their value. Mr. England was a truly apostolic preacher. He combined strict logical accuracy with a diction simple as ordinary conversation, and lucid as the wording of an axiom. He had a singular facility of stripping a question of all encumbering details, and placing it before the audience in the strongest light and in the most impressive way. Disclaiming entirely the tricks of a spurious rhetoric, neglecting even the legitimate ornaments of eloquent composition, depending solely on the justice of his appeal and the resources of his own mind, aided by a noble sonorous voice, a tall and dignified appearance, a bold and distinct enunciation, he plunged into his subject with the earnestness of alarmed friendship and the impressiveness of inspired fervour, poured forth in rich profusion, solid thoughts, striking arguments, thrilling entreaties, and at length, absolutely forced conviction. Listening to him, you saw at once that an extraordinary man stood before you, and marking that he thought not of himself but of you—you were obliged, also, perforce, to think of yourself and not of him. The thought or fact, not the word or the man, startled you and irresistibly claimed your attention. Zeal, combined with natural talent, was the secret of his eloquence, as, indeed, it is of any worthy of the name.

Mr. England was also appointed chaplain of the North Presentation Convent of Cork, of which his sister is and has been for a very long period one of the most efficient and respected members. Not confining himself to the mere duties of a chaplain, he took the whole establishment under his care, devoted much time to the improvement of the system of education pursued in it, frequently found leisure to teach in the schools in person, spared no exertion for its advancement, and took the deepest interest in all that related to its regulations, circumstances, and working.

Nor did he forget in Cork the unfortunate class whom he so boldly took under his protection at College. The Christian's Charity extends even from the purity of the cloister to the nameless horrors of the house of infamy. The Magdalen Asylum, then building, claimed his good wishes and most earnest labour. He preached, toiled, begged, and went in debt for it. Nay, so important did he esteem the least delay in the matter, that before the time of its opening, in January, 1809, he assembled six of the future inmates, placed them under the superintendence of the matron, and supported them at his own expense for a considerable period.

The City Jail was another scene of Mr. England's exertions. The wretched inmates were often exposed to danger and subject to neglect, in consequence of there being no regularly-appointed chaplain, and no government salary. The harassing, and in a worldly sense, totally unrequited toil of this position, Mr. England ambitioned and obtained. From the nature of his mind he was peculiarly fitted for such a post, and he attended to it almost as if he had no other occupation. The result was correspondant. The instances of his success furnished topics for conversation at the time, and some of them might have presented subject for a romance. The guilty hearts he chastened, the reckless spirits he startled, the wild criminals taught by him to accept the felon's chain as a welcome penance, and the despairing wretches he bade hail the gallows-doom as the gate of life, are known but to the great God alone. We cannot resist the temptation of giving the following striking and well-told incident, from the memoir of Mr. Reid:

"A gallant youth, of noble frame, of joyous soul, of previously blameless life, and steady piety, and who supported by his labour a widowed mother, had been inveigled into robbing an arsenal, and possessing himself of some public arms; detection followed, he was tried, convicted and condemned to die. The arms, however, had been effectually concealed, and with delusive casuistry, persuading himself that his forfeit life had purchased the property of the oppressor, he communicated his secret to his now doubly bereaved and destitute mother, who fell under the same temptation, to retain the miserable profits of his crime.

"Mr. England proffered his ministry; but the Catholic doctrine of restitution—the stumbling block to so many alarmed, but half repentant souls—was in the convict's way. He announced publicly, in the prison, that he should not restore the arms; and his desperate associates animated and confirmed him in his resolution. In vain Mr. England argued, expostulated, entreated—the prisoner was obdurate. The day for execution came. It dawned on the shepherd still struggling to reclaim his wandering sheep. 'I am going to say mass, will you attend?' 'I will, but you will not give me communion.' 'Then it will avail you nothing to attend the sacrifice.' 'I shall not restore the arms'—and they relapsed into a gloomy silence. At length the sheriff arrived. The case had excited more than usual sympathy, and a strong military force was in attendance. The convict received the grim executioner of the law with the calmness of a martyr. The fatal rope was placed about his neck. Not a nerve trembled, not a muscle shook, not a drop of blood forsook his cheek, not a sparkle of his eye was dimmed. He simply remarked, 'You have allowed me very little jerk—but 'tis of no great consequence,' bowed to the sheriff, and moved towards the door. At that instant Mr. England stood before him, and glaring on him with an eye that could penetrate the inmost soul, exclaimed. 'Stop, Sir! you shall not go to hell for half an hour yet!' The prisoner staggered back, 'what did you say?' 'I said you should not go to hell for half an hour, yet!' 'How could you speak so to a dying man!' 'You know I speak the truth, and that I should not do my duty if I did not!' The culprit turned away, and crouched in the corner of his prison, as hiding from the wrath to come! 'Indulge me, Sir, for half an hour,' said Mr. England to the sheriff. 'My warrant,' he replied, 'extends till five, P.M., you can have till then, Sir.' 'I shall do whatever I am to do in the time I ask.'—And here the impenetrable veil of the confessional falls around the penitent and minister of reconciliation. But this we know, that within that hour passed forth to die, without defiance as without fear, a weeping Christian; and that he who marshalled him through the dark portals of eternity, and has stood by many a death bed, assured me that he never commended a departing soul to the mercy of his Saviour with better hope than he did on that sad day."

All this while he was editing, and, to a great extent, writing, a small monthly periodical which he had originated himself, called "The Religious Repertory," for the purpose of diffusing more widely and putting in attractive form the dogmas and practices of religion. He was always sensibly alive to the importance of making literature a medium of religious instruction. Seeing that it was, and would be henceforward to the end of time, a great motive-agency to man, he recognized the vast utility, the vital necessity that such power should be an instrument for the church to use, not a weapon for the devil to wield, and he always, with that practical spirit that distinguished him, endeavoured to carry out the principle in his own way and his own sphere. The little periodical we speak of is before us. In those days of farthing pamphlets it would scarcely "take;" in its time it affected its purpose well.

Let it not be forgotten, that in the midst of those varied and multiplied avocations, he was performing zealously and punctually many of the duties of an ordinary missionary. He seemed to have found the Gorgon secret of ubiquity.

But he had yet another avocation more engrossing more important in its results, and one which conferred more lasting honour on his name. We have yet to contemplate another phase of his character—we mean his political life. We believe that the value of his services in this way, though long recognized in private, and fully acknowledged by those who worked with him, has never been sufficiently stated in public; and we are in a position to know that the only deficiency found in the admirable sketch of his life that appeared in a periodical some years since, was in this respect. For we owe not a little to Mr. England's political exertions, nor were they the least important of his life. In other portions of his career, we see him boldly effecting great though particular benefits; in this we view him successfully working for a still enduring national, nay, European principle and practice. We find he visibly propelled—we had almost said originated—a movement which ever since has been his country's chief resource, and is still her brightest and most rational hope. It is scarcely necessary to run over the history of the time. The "upper nation," after long centuries of provincial strife, had caught a glimpse of the loveliness and sweetness, the glory and rich dowries of nationality—had wooed her manfully, won her bravely, felt her beneficence, and seen the wonders of her presence, and then had lost her basely. At the commencement of the century its members were palsied or corrupted, disheartened or sold. The land groaned, once again, under the evils of doubly-riveted servitude. There was no hope from her upper classes. Then the breath of political life, the fire of manful energy was breathed for God's purposes by a few true men, into the crushed and sluggishly-suffering heart of the "lower nation," the great Catholic masses. Sole representatives of the proud Celtic race, and children of the Scand-descended knights, who scorned to trample Christ's cross at the word of a king or the dictum of a parliament. They uprose and demanded in religion's name, first of all, freedom from political disabilities, and liberty to worship unpunished before their own ancient altars. Guided by those who aroused them, they worked not only in religion's name but by means which religion sanctioned. Disclaiming alike brute force and mean chicane, they were joined by the pious and the good, and sympathized with by all honest men who looked on or heard of them. To struggle for liberty was no longer considered Jacobinical, or to attend a public meeting a sign of Gallic indifference. This movement, to a great extent, succeeded, and will achieve with God's blessing further triumphs. Its principle has been adopted in almost every country in Europe. It is one of the great notabilities and lever-powers of the age. We need not name him for whom our very heart aches and a tear has already fallen on our page, who has just been hailed with sorrowful acclamation and honoured with requiem praises, as the chief originator of the movement and the principle. But the position and merit we claim for Mr. England is of this sort, that he was one of the first, perhaps one of the greatest, certainly one of the most earnest, who early and almost instinctively espoused the cause, stoutly worked for the movement while it was yet young and much contemned, boldly adopted and preached the principle while it was still despised and unacknowledged, generously hailed the genius of the man before he was yet widely honoured. And now, a word in deprecation of the sneer we can fancy rising on some honest face, that we should wish looked lovingly on John England and kindly on us; and in brief reply to the cold dogma—"A priest should not meddle with politics." Good friend, we honour you, and we hold in deepest reverence the judgments of that section of our hierarchy and clergy, who have decided with you now as well as then; but we claim equal respect for that larger section who have decided otherwise, and who then as well as now acted as Mr. England did. We will by no means allow that they outstepped the priestly character, or sullied their lawn, or culpably exceeded their legitimate function. We must hint, also, that they followed the example of the Augustines and Gregories of the primitive, the Dominics and Bernards of the mediæval, the Liguoris and Pii of the modern church. Holding this opinion, believing that such interference was justifiable, Mr. England was soon convinced it was necessary.

Believing this, the fiery zeal of him who in his youth revolutionized his collegiate town, was too ardent to let him stand idly by, while his brothers and fellow-countrymen, the children, stamped with the image and redeemed by the blood of God, were at once starved and corrupted; his heart beat too warmly to allow him to witness unmoved, the disappointment of honourable ambition and the prostitution of the energies of youth; and his religious feelings were too strong to permit him to withhold from a struggle in which the dearest interests and most useful safeguards of his church were involved and imperilled.

So Mr. England became a political man.

We believe from the time of his coming on the mission, he joined zealously, though not ostentatiously, in political affairs, and pledged his right loyal allegiance to the new movement; but it was only in the year 1812, at the time of the great election in Cork (in which Colonel Longfield, Sir N. C. Colthurst, and C. H. Hutchinson were the candidates), that he appeared prominently in political life. He became one of Hutchinson's committee, and ablest of his most active supporters. As a Christian priest and as a politician, he exerted himself with his accustomed activity to put an end to the scandalous system of bribery and consequent perjury, that at this time disgraced every electioneering contest. He contributed much to the general discountenancing and partial discontinuance of this nefarious practice. His chief success was with the poor forty-shilling freeholders. Although the election was over, "he laid," says a late well-informed writer, "the foundation of the independence and public virtue of the constituency, which so often since has caused the principles of freedom to triumph in his native city."

But his most remarkable and successful effort, the great act and chief service of his political life, was the determined and talented resistance offered by him to the Veto proposal. His success in this would alone vindicate his political activity. Nothing can better illustrate the salutary change in the opinions of the Catholic party than the way the Veto was received. At this period, when no Irish Catholic would bestow on such a proposition aught but a contemptuous smile, it is difficult to imagine that five and thirty years ago the church should be placed by it in so dangerous a position, or that the highest courage and the most delicate tact would be required by those who opposed it. The Catholic party, even when united and putting forth its utmost strength, was as yet comparatively unimportant. It was still but a young and exotic existence in the political world. On the Veto question it was divided into two violently opposed sections. The government were abetted, not as is sometimes said, by the corrupt or worthless only, but by much of the honesty, some of the ability, and all the aristocracy of the party. The measure was accepted in high places, hailed by the nobility, gentry, and merchants, sanctioned by a supposed Papal rescript, received by some of the prelates and clergy, and promoted more than all, by some of the tried and influential leaders of the people. It was supported too by a party who spared no expense, neglected no exertion, despised no meanness, scorned no falsehood to carry it, and so acquire the controul, or be enabled to subsidize a body felt to be the chief obstacle to governmental designs. Thus the peril was more imminent than would at first seem possible. On the other hand, the clergy as a body stood firm, and were its most consistent and active opponents. Mr. England, amongst the rest, was alarmed to the utmost. He became the very genius of anti-Vetoism in the south—he would not hear of the proposal—he gave it no quarter. He boldly denounced those who accepted it, however high in station or rich in popular reverence. He protested against it at public meetings—spoke against it in private society, wrote against it in newspaper and magazine, and preached against it from the pulpit and the altar. “What!” he would exclaim, “to put the appointment of our prelates into the hands of an intriguing Protestant minister. It would be madness—it would be treason!” In Cork he had much to oppose. There existed a soi-disant “Catholic board” holding its meetings in a private drawing-room, to which the gentry only were admitted. This aristocratic club declared in favour of the Veto, and exerted all the influence it possessed for the acceptance of the proposal. Now this club was rotten in its constitution, stood in the way of a better organization, and was effecting evil only in its working. Its principle, declared in an express resolution, was that “Property should be the standard of opinion”—words long notable in Cork. Such a body would be a disgrace, an anomaly, and a clog to any political movement for freedom. By long continued exertions, Mr. England succeeded, with the help of O’Connell, in creating a more healthy and popular organization, and sweeping away for ever this emanation of genteel stupidity. This was a great propeller to the cause; but it was not the greatest of Mr. England’s anti-Veto exertions. The Cork Mercantile Chronicle, the only organ of Catholic opinion in the province, had been for some years on the decline; the proprietor, Mr. Haly, being involved in difficulties, it was about being given up. So intense was Mr. England’s zeal, and so little did he spare personal sacrifice, that against the advice of his friends, and at considerable and ill-afforded pecuniary loss, he assumed and for a long time conducted the editorial management of this paper, worked it into great and deserved popularity, and by a long series of stirring articles—in his own peculiar vein, informed with varied knowledge, pregnant with vigorous thought, and racy with sound practical sense—alarmed the south into active resistance.

On the whole, as we dispassionately review the movements of the time, we are disposed to agree with those who assert that to Dr. England, with O’Connell, is due the honour of having preserved the freedom and vindicated the privileges of our church in this vital and perilous matter.

Mr. England’s political articles, letters, and essays, published about this time, are, as we have said, of a very high order of excellence. It is evident the writer is a man of strong, solid, mental calibre. Sometimes rough in diction, they are always valuable in thought; often careless in execution, they are invariably well conceived; vigorous ratiocination distinguishes them more than imaginative beauty. They are more substantial than elegant—more thoughtful than artistic. A vein of genuine hearty eloquence runs through them all. We cannot trust ourselves to quotations, lest we should soon find ourselves at the boundary of our prescribed space.

Mr. England early acquired the friendship of the great Catholic leader. There were some points of similitude between them. They were each distinguished—of course, in different degrees—for that solid mental physique, that ready practical way of working, that unwavering zeal, that burly frame of body, and that sound sense. The one revered the other as his political chief; that other recognised in his clerical friend the ablest of his colleagues. When O’Connell was in Cork, he not only spent a great part of his time with Mr. England, but, it is said, attended regularly his morning lectures.

And now that the times have gone by, with their generation—now that the priest and the agitator have both passed away, and taken their places among the dear shadows of the past, it is no breach of confidence, no disrespect to the dead, no dishonour to the living, to mention a circumstance familiar to many in private, but, we believe, never stated in any public way. It is, that John England was the instrument, under God, of making Daniel O’Connell a practical member of his church. The well-authenticated circumstances are these: the latter came to Cork soon after the unfortunate affair with D’Esterre, and the threatened encounter with Mr. Peel. Mr. England who never forgot in the politician the anointed minister of God, remonstrated with him sharply. O’Connell tried to reply, but was soon answered. They held long conversations together, of which nothing is known, save that the result was favourable. The priest followed up his advantage by long earnest letters and a visit to Dublin. He was at length successful. Ave Maria! They were great souls; may they rest in peace.

It would be impossible, in the space we can command, to detail at further length Mr. England’s political labours. Their general character and efficacy we have indicated, and we can do no more. But we must keep in mind, to estimate the man, that they were merely corollaries to his clerical functions, and that no brother-clergyman excelled, and few equalled him in punctual discharge of such of the latter as he undertook. In 1813 we find him appointed president of the diocesan college of St. Mary’s, lately opened by Dr. Moylan for the education of candidates for holy orders.

The following year, 1814, brought two heavy losses to Mr. England in the deaths of his earliest benefactors and best friends, Bishop Moylan and Dean Mac Carthy. They left few men in the church like them. Not long after Dr. Murphy, the late prelate (whose life was so ably sketched in the CATHOLIC MAGAZINE for June) succeeded to the episcopate.

In 1817, the thirty-first year of his age, Mr. England was appointed parish priest of Bandon, to the deep regret of his friends and admirers in Cork. There could scarcely have been a more judicious selection than such a man for such a position. It is almost unnecessary to say that for centuries this town was the chief stronghold in the south of the most virulent of the Protestant party: nor need we remind the reader of that inscription on its ancient gate, become symbolic of stupid intolerance wherever the English literature has spread. The “sounde and holy towne” of the Pacata had not lost its characteristics when this young parish priest, with right good will and power, if any man had, determined to effect a change in it. For a year or two he gave up almost every other avocation to devote all his time and talent to this object. Stories are yet afloat of his unshrinking boldness, and ready presence of mind, in encountering the ruffian underlings of the dominant sect, who, caring little for the decencies of life, published concerning him the vilest calumnies, and, knowing nothing of moral restraint, endeavoured to stop the progress of improvement by taking the life of its Apostle. He remained in Bandon until 1820, and succeeded to a great extent, in this brief period, in arresting the torpidity of his own flock, checking the arrogance of their masters, and uniting in mutual brotherhood, as in affection for himself, the wise and good of all classes and each denomination.

At the urgent request of the popular candidate, who remembered his services on a former occasion, Mr. England took a leading part in the affairs of the election in 1818. As chairman of Hutchinson's committee he contributed much by his eloquent addresses, vigorous exertions in canvassing, and ready expedients in difficulties, to this first great electioneering triumph of the Catholic party. Mr. Hutchinson, on the day of his return, publicly thanked him from the hustings, and pronounced on his character an eloquent eulogium.

But now that such successes are frequent, and that not only the parties but the objects of those days have passed away, it is a dearer and a prouder thing to remember of Mr. England, that he had a considerable share in organizing the new Catholic movement, and was one of those nine men who sat in that back-parlour of the bookseller's shop, immortal in a nation's memory, calling themselves a "Catholic Association," forsooth, and discussing quietly the best method of wresting an obnoxious measure from the hands of the most powerful and united ministry that ever swayed the councils of the empire.

But he was not to be an Irish "agitator;" nor was it his destiny, crozier in hand, to wrestle with tyrant power like the prelate of Kildare and Leighlin. Not on Irish land was he henceforth to toil, nor for Irish interests. And more's the pity! We don't know exactly why he accepted the prelate of Charleston: we can only tell what everybody is aware of, that he did. He did leave Ireland to join that latest succession of the Apostolic choir, whom it has been the fate of this land to nurture and send forth for thirteen centuries. From preserving the faith in an ancient Christian country he went to preach it in a new—from defending a crushed majority, to rear a despised minority—from labouring manfully for popular liberty to resisting steadily popular licence. After the 21st of September, 1820, poor Ireland saw little of her illustrious child and valiant champion. On that day he received the grace of episcopal consecration at the hands of Dr. Murphy, in the church of St. Finbar. The general regret manifested on his departure was as great as might be expected. He was presented with valedictory addresses on all sides, and entertained at one of the largest public dinners ever given in Cork. Few men have left their native city for whom their was more sorrow. It was not a matter of addresses and dinners only, but a genuine, downright grief of those who knew him. He was accompanied by his sister, Joanna England, who would not part him, and left all for him. She supplied the immediate wants of his see by a surrender of her little dowry, and resolved to be the support and sharer of his wants and dangers. After having narrowly escaped shipwreck, they arrived in Charleston on the 30th of December, when the bishop immediately took possession of his church, and received the resignation of the vicar-capitular of the Archbishop of Baltimore.

And here an entirely new scene opened before him, in deep-vistad prospect. Quite a strange, unfallowed field stretched in wide expanse to claim his labour, his courage, his skill, and his perseverance.

He was the first bishop of his see. It had previously formed part of the see of Baltimore, and was now suffragan to it. His jurisdiction extended over three states of the Union—North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; each of which is as extensive as some European kingdoms. Over this vast tract his flock, consisting of about 60,000 souls, was thinly and at long intervals scattered. It was composed chiefly of exiles from his own country of the poorest and most ignorant class, and of refugees from St. Domingo, yet more ignorant and more difficult to manage because more familiarized with guilt. Ecclesiastical matters were in the utmost confusion. The Catholic population had given up almost all religious observances through unwillingness to renounce formally the faith of their fathers, and inability to adhere to it practically. Except in one or two places they had no house of worship, and seldom saw a clergyman; while they were at the same time so uninstructed as scarcely to know the dogmas or understand the observances of the church in which they were born. Their moral conduct was on a par with their religious knowledge. To them the church seemed no watchful mother: what wonder if they proved disobedient children. She did not hallow their occupations, or make their homes happy, or their hearts pure. She neither blessed their unions, baptized their children, ministered by their death-beds, nor prayed over their graves. They needed all that a numerous and zealous priesthood could do to win them back to her arms, and they called imperatively on all sides, every one, to their new pastor for succour immediate and plentiful. This that pastor could not afford. He brought with him two priests, a little money, a courageous spirit, talent and zeal: but no more. To convert this vast diocese we have described into a well-organized and flourishing see he found on his arrival, four clergymen and two small chapels! We think we can see from his diary (lying before us) that at first the difficulties that presented themselves astonished and appalled him: but we can discern, also, that after a while they only kindled his enthusiasm and fired his energy. With undaunted courage, and in his old resolute practical way, Bishop England went about the work before him.

That God who seeth all things and penetrateth the hearts of men only knows the labours and privations encountered by this bishop. Every year he made it an indispensable duty to visit every Catholic settlement in his vast diocese, in doing which he was obliged to travel often 2000 miles, perform the greater part of the journey on foot, encounter almost inevitably a terrible fever, and suffer constantly and habitually, not mere poverty but downright want. In each place he remained one or two days, endeavouring to revive religious observances, making arrangements for their future regular performance, and trying to arouse something like Catholic fervour by public preaching and private remonstrance. His eloquence was quite a novelty in those parts. We find him (in his diary) after a day of labour, and a night of travelling, preaching to his own congregation in the morning, to the Presbyterian at mid-day, and to the Episcopalian at night; filling the intervals by receiving deputations, organizing societies, hearing confessions, administering the sacraments, and the like—and after all, snatching a little repose and setting off at day-break for some other place. He had the unutterable satisfaction, however, of knowing that those exertions were not unsuccessful—that his own flock were improved, and his erring brethren beginning to think less harshly of his faith.

His chief want, that of clergy, he at first endeavoured to supply by drafting young men over from the south of Ireland. Few came, and those who did soon fell victims to “the stranger’s fever.” But his resources did not fail him. He opened an ecclesiastical seminary in Charleston, where he resolved to educate a priesthood for himself, and from among his own spiritual children—thus effecting the double advantage of rendering his clergy innocuous to the disease that swept away strangers, and making Catholicism an institution naturalized in the country. His funds proving insufficient for this project, he added to his seminary another school for elementary education, then very much neglected even among the upper classes, and so supported the one by the revenue derived from the other. This temporary expedient produced results very lasting and important. Other schools were opened in opposition or emulation: attention was generally attracted to the matter, and a great educational movement was originated.

The greatest obstacle to the progress of Catholicism in the Carolinas he soon perceived to be a kind of delicate aristocratical prejudice. Those states having formerly belonged to the crown had been endowed with a more splendid and organized variety of Episcopalian Protestantism than most others, which the inhabitants had come to view as an ancient and venerable institution—emphatically the church of intellect and reason—consecrated by the usage of their fathers, and by the virtues and sufferings of the first missionaries of their country. Worshipping in handsome churches, amidst the high born, wealthy, and educated, they contemned that faith whose temples were sheds, whose worshippers were mechanics, and whose antiquity in the land was only a few years old. They had taken up some wise notion that Catholicism was the religion of vulgarity and stupid ignorance. Partly to meet this prejudice and partly in indulgence of his own pious inclinations, Dr. England endeavoured to produce in his little wooden cathedral, consecrated to St. Finbarr—the best edifice that his poverty permitted him to erect—some faint image of the holy magnificence and touching ceremonial of European altars—supplying the deficiencies of circumstance by the splendour of an eloquence which the proudest chapter might envy, and which drew around him, in wondering admiration, and doubting thought (“as if the nadir had kissed the zenith”) the wealthy and refined of the laity, telling them of a faith more ancient than tyrant Henry’s—figuring to them a ceremonial more beautiful than Latimer’s—describing a heroism more dauntless than Halden’s—preaching a religion professed by the wisest and most learned men that ever lived or were then living. He made all respect—many doubt and not a few—change.

In pursuance of the same policy, and to counteract the influence of the diluted and bigoted literature that prevailed—by creating another, Catholic, vigorous and healthy, fresher and less exotic, the bishop devoted a great deal of time to literary matters—indeed more than would at first appear desirable for one with so much sterner work on his hands. He started, and for a long time edited, a periodical called “The United States’ Catholic Miscellany,” the first of the kind ever published in the Union, but which soon called up around it a host of imitators and rivals. To the time of his death he constantly contributed to this publication. He put before the public in its pages a vast number of essays, letters, and sketches, always valuable and healthy in tone; but not always as careful or artistic, as if they were not dashed off at midnight after a hard day’s labour, or penned in a sick bed, when more active employment was prohibited. The “Miscellany,” is before us and we can easily recognize the bishop’s papers. We are not surprised at the effect they produced among his “erring brethren,” who, despite their affectation of diletante refinement, appear to have had much hearty reverence and honest looking-up to talent and worth, when they saw them. We hope Bishop Reynolds, the successor of Dr. England, has not relinquished his project of republishing these and his other productions. Even at this sad time, we are certain such a work would find purchasers in Ireland. It would be melancholy if all that was left us of John England, save the stirring memory of his deeds, should be cast into an oblivion, which intrinsically would be a vandalism, and, relatively, a mark of stolid ingratitude.

With the same views Bishop England joined and, of course, infused new vigour and fresh utility into a literary and philosophical association for some years existing in Charleston. Discouraging the quirps of rhetoric which the members thereof styled eloquence, and the vapid and puerile declamation they considered argument, he introduced a taste for his own plain vigorous manner, simple statements, and close reasoning. The admiration of some had scarce a bound, when they found this poor, Irish priest surpassing their first men on their own ground, and proving himself almost as intimate with literature, art, and science, as with the matters of his own peculiar study. Some of his addresses have been published, and we understand were well worthy of it.

He also delivered a fine address before the Congress, which, perhaps, did more to raise the estimation of Catholicism than any other of his literary labours.

The practice of duelling, so stupid and so unsupported by the shadow of a principle, so traitorous to the ordinances of man and the laws of God, Dr. England always had a special horror of. In his new diocese it prevailed to a frightful and most alarming extent. He determined to check it, and, as usual, effectually did. Striking the matter at its root he called the proud gentry of the Carolinas around him—organized an anti-duelling society—induced General Pickering of revolutionary renown to be its president, and so produced a discouragement of the system from the very class whom it most affected. “I have listened to him,” writes one who knew Dr. England well, “as, with merry triumph, and unsparing though playful ridicule, he talked over, with a gallant officer, the preliminaries of an ‘affair,’ rejoicing the while in his opponent’s baffled love of mischief.”

Vide alteram partem. See another phase of this wonderful man’s character. It is an August noon in Charleston. The terrible fever-plague rages. The sun, hot beyond our conception, makes the very pavement scorch. The streets are empty, for none dare stir out for love or lucre. The air is even as the breath of the destroying angel. Infection is in every inhalation you draw: death is in every house you pass. The water is dried up or foetid. Not even the funeral car patrols. Yet, staggering along the silent streets, a tall man makes his way. His cheek is flushed unhealthily: his eye flashes omniously. You look at him, and mutter his doom is nigh. That man is the Bishop of Charleston. He is carrying religious consolation to some dying wretch. He ministers at the beds, not only of his own congregation, but of all who suffer friendless.

He labours thus every day, and all day long. In a higher than an episcopal sense, he is, those sad times, true "angel" of a God, merciful to man. For the good of all, he dares a danger too imminent for any to despise—encounters and endures a torture at which one must shudder who contemplates. Nor does this long day end his labours. At midnight, when the dew, cold and clammy, far more fatal than the heat of morn, falls thickly, he may be seen again unhesitatingly threading the pestiferous streets—entering houses marked with the fatal yellow—kneeling by some humble member of the church—aiding him with the church's helps in his last struggle, and pouring into his ear the church's words of consolation as the world, dream-like, fades away, and the terrors of eternity loom present and awful—inhaling the while that breath, so hot and stifling, not a symptom of death only, but a herald. His clothes, damp with the dew, and stained with the terrible black discharge, the last sign of the disease—his head reeling, and skin scorching—he kneels for a while before the crucifix in his humble home, and flings himself exhausted on his bed to gain strength to recommence his labours.

This, we need scarcely assure the reader, is no fancy-sketch. Such was the routine of prelate duty in Charleston during the continuance of the occasional plagues. We, Catholics of Ireland, can well understand this: we in some sort expect it. But to the proud, easy-going Carolinians it seemed totally incomprehensible—a mystery, or rather a visible returning of the Apostolic times. In their category of impulses they knew none to direct—in their annals of heroism they read nothing to surpass deeds like those. Above all other things, they won for the bishop the veneration of the good of every denomination. And when at length, as must happen from the nature of things, the poor body was outworn, and the pastor himself was stricken, and he who aided needed aid—deep, and healthy, generous and unbigoted was the sympathy felt for him throughout the states he ruled.

But even in ordinary years, when no plague afflicted and no public applauded, the life of our dear countryman was one of incessant privation, hard struggle with circumstances, and brave self-denial. In the mere matter of revenue, he was in constant want and subject to continual privation. His bishopric was indeed no sinecure. His mitre was an Etrurian crown—heavy and hard to bear—a mark of suffering, a sign of endurance. Contemplate, if thou canst, oh! worldly-minded man, that lookest upon church promotion as the grand object of ecclesiastical ambition—the prime reward of priestly merit, and thou, oh! "philosophical historian," that assurest gaping readers that it is in the pomp of Catholicism lies its elixir of sway, that the gracefully-flowing chasuble wins the mind more than the pure heart beating so warmly beneath it—that it is the shadow men love, and not the substance—the type, not the typified; contemplate with mind's eye the prelate of the Carolinas as he performs his ecclesiastical visitation, trudging along the hot sands of that burning clime, with no carriage or servants—for he cannot pay for them—with his vestments and books bound on his back, with his clothes in tatters—for he has given his last dollar to those starving tradesmen in the town he has left; nay, barefoot, for he must save his broken shoes—and thou thinkest of a thing which was indeed a fact, in those parts, some twenty years ago, and which we have on the authority of those who witnessed it, and of others who forced the admission from the bishop's own lips. Whatever thou thinkest of it, or, you oh! wiser readers, it is a picture which since we first saw often occurs to us, and which gives us a clearer notion than almost anything else of what this venerable Dr. England in all truth was—a picture we are not likely soon to forget.

It is also known that the bishop of Charleston was sometimes in want of mere food, often in want of decent clothes, and more than once punished for debts incurred in his ecclesiastical foundations. He at one time told a dear friend of his, that he has frequently walked the streets of Charleston with his feet to the ground, though the upper part of his shoes appeared still whole.

This was apostolic poverty indeed.

But amidst his privations and dangers he had for a long time the sweet support—more soothing than any thing else earthly—of that gentle, loving sister, who had left home and country, and broken those domestic ties which with her were tendrils of the heart, to follow him. Joanna England undoubtedly possessed many of her brother's high qualities. No danger appalled—no failure disheartened—no privation ruffled her bold, trusting spirit. She had his fervent piety, and his practically-working zeal. Her love of him was unsurpassed by any feeling save her love of God. She resolved to be, and was the consolation of that busied prelate's home. Much of his talent she shared also, in a quiet, feminine way. Extensively acquainted with the literature of her own language, of France, and of Italy, read in Latin and Greek, having a considerable share of scientific knowledge, and possessing altogether a vigorous and highly-cultivated mind, she, who in any society would have been an ornament, in Charleston was an unheard-of phenomenon. When to this was joined a merry, cheerful disposition, excellent sense, attractive manners, and sincere amiability, the charm was complete. After a while she became leader of "ton" in Charleston, with its aristocratic dames, and led it to some purpose by introducing a taste for educational advancement. She was of great service to the bishop in bringing him in close contact with the wealthy and high-born—"constituting," says Mr. Reid, "a golden link between him and the higher classes in the community." But even this consolation was taken from the missionary of a crucified God. On the 17th of November, 1827, this sister died, a victim to the "stranger's fever." We did not read unaffected the following passage in a private letter, from Dr. England to his mother, announcing the sad intelligence:

Charleston, November, 24, 1827.

"I had lately prepared to write you a very different letter from what this shall be. I had hoped, even but a week ago, that Joanna and I had passed safely through the trying ordeal of the summer months, now closing. But God has been pleased to order it otherwise, and it is our duty to bow in submission. May his holy name be praised, as His will has been done. To you and her other relations in Ireland it will indeed be an afflicting communication, but to me what must it be, to know that the body of my darling Joanna now lies mouldering at my vestry door. Seven years have passed away since you saw her, full of life and hope, and affection, but then she was little more than a good, innocent child, though almost a woman in her age. Seven days have not yet passed since I joined in her dying prayers, and resigned to God a sister, whose genius was my delight—whose information was my resource—whose taste was my safeguard from criticism—whose affection was my solace—whose hand often protected me from death—whose eye was the star of my hope in my long nights of suffering—whose smile was the beacon of my recovery—whose playfulness was the winning of my soul from oppressive care and corroding disappointment. . . .”

Dr. England's zeal for the instruction of the blacks was another very interesting feature in his episcopal character. While he recognized and defended the present expediency of the constitution, that consigned them to slavery, he never forgot that they were a portion of his flock—that they were children of God and heirs of heaven—that Jesus' commission, whereby the missionary holds authority, was “to teach all nations.” Being the most despised by all, they were the most loved by their bishop. They were his “dear children.” He frequently was accustomed, in his leisure hours, to gather them in his own home to impart to them the lessons by which they, as well as the proudest, were to be judged. His own mass at the cathedral was always offered for, and attended solely by his coloured friends; and we are told that sometimes, when he was unable to preach his usual three sermons, he, in general, disappointed the wealthy, and addressed their slaves. His exertions proved in the highest degree successful. So apparent became the improvement in their moral conduct, and so much more efficiently did they perform their duties, that the planters, who before were so alarmed by the intrusion of baptist incendiaries under the guise of missionaries, used beseech him to visit or send a priest to their plantations.

In the year 1832, on the 13th of August, Dr. England revisited his native city, after an absence of over twelve years. The public enthusiasm, and the delight of his friends on again seeing their beloved pastor, after the trials and dangers he had passed through, were as great as we may suppose. He was entertained at a public dinner and invited to some others. But he was now a foreign bishop, not a Cork priest, and he was obliged after a very short stay to proceed to Rome, whither he was bound. He took with him a nephew, then a very young man, who has since proved himself worthy of his illustrious relative, and whose name is already important in the political history, known to the literature, and dear to the friends of his country. Passing through France and the Austrian dominions, having stopped on his way a short time at Lyons, where he had some business to transact, and at Vienna, where he was received in a very flattering manner by the late Emperor, he arrived in Rome on the 16th of December, and quickly acquired the respect and gained the confidence of Gregory. His suggestions, with regard to the American church, were all received with consideration, and many of them adopted with promptitude. As a recognition of his services, he was elevated to the rank of assistant prelate to the Papal throne. He was also named legate to Hayti, with full powers to investigate the disordered affairs of the church in that island. While at Rome, so great was his mental activity, that not content with conducting a number of important negotiations, he preached several orations—one especially for the Irish Franciscans of St. Isidore, which has been published—and wrote an exposition in English of the ceremonies of the holy week, which has proved of great utility to the visitors of the Eternal City.

Having returned, by Ireland, to his diocese, he proceeded in the autumn of the following year to Hayti, in his quality of apostolic legate. Since the revolution there, ecclesiastical matters had been in the utmost confusion. The Spanish priests having been expelled with the rest of their countrymen, the inhabitants ceased to hold communion with any church. The “Code Napoleon” was introduced, and a very ludicrous variety of Gallicism had taken the place of Catholicism. Dr. England having had many opportunities of becoming acquainted with the dangerous condition of the island, had long wished to devote some time to its interests. At first he was received by the authorities with distrust, but he soon won at least their respect. He spent several months in endeavouring to negotiate their return to the church, and at one time was so certain of success, that he despatched some young men to Rome to be educated for that mission; but suddenly the government became alarmed, obstinately refused to dispense with the obnoxious conditions of the “Code Napoleon,” and obliged the bishop to return discouraged, but not disheartened.

On his arrival in Charleston, he had to encounter a storm of obloquy as unexpected as it was confounding. During his absence, his enemies—for even he had enemies—spread a report that he was arranging a general revolt of the slaves, in which the free blacks of Hayti were to assist their brethren in attaining their freedom and slaughtering their masters. The recent violence committed in a partial “rising,” instigated by Baptist fanatics, had considerably alarmed the planters—this rumour terrified them. The bishop's character, the improbability of the matter, his past services, were forgotten for awhile in the excitement of the moment. Apprehension became almost a certainty, when a letter, purporting to be from a slave to Dr. England, couched in the most ferocious language, was audaciously published and disseminated. In the midst of the alarm, and to the surprise of every one, the bishop returned. He would probably have fallen an immediate victim to popular fury, had he not, with characteristic resolution, at once sought an interview with the leaders, and soon convinced them of the hastiness of their conviction and the injustice of their charge. They were ashamed and abashed, but the mob was not satisfied. The latter came to the barbarous resolution of “capturing, tarring, and feathering” their venerable benefactor. The bishop had to fly to his house. The crowd surrounded it, and after various efforts to break in, were about to set it on fire. The magistrates not being able to act, nothing remained for Dr. England and his friends but to surrender, when a party of Irish militia, brought in through a back way by an old female servant, stationed themselves at the windows, and prepared to resist to the utmost. The determined look of the fellows, and the ominous clicking of the musquetry made the cowardly multitude pause. Lead proved a cogent argument—and a few bullets, as oil upon the waters. The mob dispersed, and the bishop was saved.

Heaven knows, if Dr. England much valued worldly praise or blame, this must have been a heart-rending return to him for his long years of toil, his sacrificed health, and the leaving of his home and country. But this is what all, of every age and land, who bravely followed Christ must bear; and we may be sure that the strong heart of Bishop England did not shrink from that which Jesus loved and suffered.

The excitement in Charleston, of course, speedily cooled down, and was succeeded by a hearty sorrow, and a vehement desire to make some reparation. General veneration, or rather love for Dr. England, was increased by the circumstance tenfold.

But he did not forget Hayti. Next spring he went to Rome again, to explain what he had done, and obtain further powers. Feeling his health much on the decline, and being directed by the Holy Father to continue his legatine labours, he procured the appointment of the late Right Rev. Dr. Clancy, late Bishop of Oriense, to be his coadjutor in the see of Charleston. On the 10th of November, 1834, he arrived in his diocese, accompanied by four members of the Ursuline community of Cork, whose establishment in Charleston he had long contemplated, and at length, with much difficulty, effected.

After several ineffectual attempts in Hayti, and some journeys through the States, he went to Rome in the autumn of '36, on matters connected with the American church.

Once again, and for the last time, he visited his native city in June '41. Having stayed a few weeks at Lyons, and a short time in Cork, he left Ireland never to return. The voyage was particularly bad—dysentery raged frightfully on board. The bishop, after being for a long while the consolation of all, was at length violently stricken, and most alarming symptoms ensued. On his arrival in America, however, he rallied, and for some months continued his accustomed duties. But his day had nearly come and his reward was nigh. The rigours and exertion of the ensuing Lent prostrated him. Symptoms of the most violent typhoid appeared, together with a complication of other diseases. Fiery zeal and a robust constitution may defy hardship for a while, but in the end poor human nature must yield, as it ought. The bishop's fight was fought out even unto the close. His death-sickness was borne as we might expect—the last of the ills of mortality, the painful prelude to the opening of the gates. In his last moments he summoned his clergy around his bed, and addressed them in the quick starts of a dying man, a last advice so touching and so solemn, that the memory of it shall never leave our minds. We intended to give the entire, but it is with difficulty we insert the opening passage:

"Gentlemen of the Clergy.—It is now many years since I was called by God to administer the affairs of his church in this diocese. Throughout that period I have encountered great difficulties; but He assisted me with strength and graces for the performance of my duties beyond my natural capability. On some occasions, fortunately for me, I have corresponded with those graces: on others, unfortunately, I have not. I commit all my deficiencies to the 'advocacy of Jesus Christ, the just: who is the propitiation not for my sins only, but for those of the whole world.'

"Some of you have borne with me 'the burden of the day and the heats:' others have more recently joined us in labouring in the vineyard of the Lord. The relations that exist between you and me are now about to be dissolved. On reviewing our connexion I remember many things I deemed myself obliged to say and to do, which to you may have appeared harsh or oppressive. I can truly declare that in many of those circumstances I acted (however mistaken) from a sense of duty, and in that manner which to me seemed most adapted to the end I had in view—your good. Let the motive extenuate whatever was unnecessarily severe in my judgment, or conduct. I confess it has likewise happened, owing partly to the perplexities of my position—chiefly to my own impetuosity, that my demeanour has not always been as meek and courteous as it ever should have been, and that you have experienced rebuffs when you might have anticipated kindness. FORGIVE ME.

"Tell my people I love them—tell them how much I regret that circumstances have kept us at a distance from each other, my duties and my difficulties have prevented me from cultivating and strengthening those private ties which ought to bind us together: your functions require a more constant intercourse with them. Be with them—be of them—win them to God. Guide, govern, and instruct them—'watch as having to render an account of their souls, that you may do it with joy and not with grief.' There are among you several infant institutions which you are called on, in an especial manner, to sustain. It has cost me a great deal of thought and labour to introduce them—they are calculated to be eminently serviceable to the cause of order, of religion, of education, of charity—they constitute the germs of what I trust shall hereafter grow and flourish in extensive usefulness.

"I COMMEND MY POOR CHURCH TO ITS PATRONS—ESPECIALLY TO HER TO WHOM OUR SAVIOUR CONFIDED HIS, IN THE PERSON OF THE BELOVED DISCIPLE: WOMAN BEHOLD THY SON: SON BEHOLD THY MOTHER. . . ."

He continued to speak in this strain for about fifteen minutes, when, exhausted by the effort, he sank back on the pillows. The holy sacrament of extreme unction was solemnly administered. And there, in the dimness of the evening-time—his clergy kneeling around him—angelic spirits, unseen by all save him, ministering—the crucifix reared before his dying gaze—his countenance irradiated as with the rapture of anticipated bliss—then, and there, and thus, the APOSTLE expired.

A SHORT ADDRESS TO ALTAR SOCIETIES. By the WYKEHAM BROTHERHOOD. London: F. A. Little.

THE USE AND ABUSE OF CHURCH BELLS, WITH PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS CONCERNING THEM. By Walter Blunt, M.A. London: Masters.

WE have already intimated, that one of the main objects of our Periodical is to assist in reviving a taste and feeling for art—for art not as a thing of mere curiosity or insensate gratification of the connoisseur or virtuoso, but for art dedicated to its highest and holiest purpose, the adornment of God's earthly temples. The field is a wide one, and at present the labourers are few in comparison to the importance of the work, nevertheless we entertain no misgivings as to our ultimate success, for where the end to be arrived at and the means used are alike honourable, the cause must prosper. Christian art is not limited to architecture, painting, and sculpture—those arts which have been called fine—but embraces many minor accessories of a less striking character, which should be as carefully guarded and as judiciously directed as their more important allies. For it is not sufficient that the great frame work of the house of God should proclaim his glory in lofty spires and gorgeous sculptures, but the smallest decoration which the piety of the humblest Christian might offer should harmonize with the spirit of the majestic pile, of which it is a part.

The works above-named treat of some of those details of Christian art, for which reason we notice them in this place. The first is a publication emanating from the "Wykeham Brotherhood," a society composed of some of the most learned and eminent Catholics, lay and clerical, in England, whose object is to investigate and revive ecclesiastical art, and to show its intimate connexion with the doctrines and ceremonies of religion. The second is from the pen of a member of that portion of the Established church of England, which in latter years has been remarkable for its Catholic tendencies in doctrine, as well as for its labours for the revival of ancient Catholic art; for which we can scarcely be too grateful. For although we must pity the delusion of those who would substitute the externals of Catholicity for true Catholic faith, of which the externals are but the natural and material manifestations, we are still compelled to acknowledge that their labours seem to be the means by which an all-wise Providence is gradually leading the minds of erring men back to the one true-fold.

We shall, in the first place, notice the tract by the Wykeham Brotherhood, as it relates to the holy of holies, the altar, the seat of the great Christian sacrifice, and the chief object of a Christian's love and veneration in every church, we must premise that the arrangement, form, and decorations of an altar, like everything else appertaining to the material church, are not matters depending on individual taste and private judgment or caprice, but should be regulated by ancient Catholic examples and symbolism. The neglect of this principle has caused the many tawdry and tasteless decorations, often almost of a profane character, with which the altars of many of our churches have been, and unfortunately are still bedizened. After a few prefatory observations, the writer of this earnest address says,

"Above all things, improper carving and vulgar devices should be avoided. For instance in altars for the dead never use the inverted torch, as it would imply the extinction of hope, and, consequently, disbelief in the resurrection. It is far better to have an altar perfectly plain than ill-adorned. Hearts transfixed with darts, Cupids toasting hearts, and other devices of the Valentine's day style are to be eschewed. Never think of defiling the Holy of Holies with such vulgarities as these, now, alas! too often found there. The proper ornaments for the altar are, sculpture and colouring. The figures of our Lord, our Ladye, angels, saints, the Agnus Dei, the pelican, the sacred monogram, the ichthus, the symbols of the Holy Trinity, or the Evangelists, are all fit and appropriate ornaments, and may be placed in arches, panels, niches, trifolia, quadrifolia, or otherwise, as may be most convenient. Flat columns, with angels in bold alto-relievo, form beautiful divisions for the compartments. Paneling of simple arches or quadrifolia is always beautiful. The three primary colours, red, blue, and yellow (gold), are all that are needed (except in cases of mortuary altars, where black is desirable); and it should be observed that in altars for our Blessed Ladye blue, in those of the holy Sacrament, white should predominate; but all should be well relieved with gold, as, without this precaution, the colours will not harmonize well, but will produce a very heavy effect. The colours should always be of the richest—the silica colours are said to stand better than others; and in sculpture, beauty of form should always be attended to, as quaint, distorted, and ill-proportioned figures excite ridicule rather than devotion. Altars having been generally destroyed, we cannot point to ancient specimens; but most of the old churches contain old altar-formed tombs, which may be taken as models for altars. Many altars, especially those on which the holy Sacrament is reserved, have over them a rich canopy in marble or wood, which may or may not be gilt and coloured. Such canopy is called a ciborium."

Modern tabernacles have exceeded all just proportions. The ancient tabernacles were small metal towers for the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament. Indeed, where they are not required for this purpose, they should not be used as merely ornamental, and had better be substituted by a floriated cross. Anciently the blessed sacrament was reserved in a golden pyx or dove, suspended over the altar, or in a rich tabernacle in the side wall of the chancel. The latter is to be preferred, as the former is liable to accidents. The Wykeham Brotherhood here give us two very simple and characteristic examples of tabernacles in the form of towers, which may be placed on altars, and observe,

"The tabernacle being the place in which the holy Sacrament actually resides, should be as rich as our means enable us to make it, but in keeping and propriety; not with heavy and unmeaning profusion of ornament. Gold, silver, jewels, and enamel are the proper means for its adornment, and where these are too costly to be had, it may be carved and gilt, or otherwise beautified, only in correspondence with the architecture and ornaments of the church."

With the writer's observations on the "Screen and Altar-piece," we entirely coincide, not only because we are aware that these features have been wretchedly treated in modern churches, but because of the liberal spirit in which the author treats this part of his subject, and which is a complete answer to the votaries of Pagan art, who pretend to believe that those who wish to revive the ancient spirit of Catholic art, also desire to preserve the imperfections in drawing which some remains exhibit.

"The best and most appropriate back for an altar is a screen of tabernacle-work, in wood or stone, composed of niches filled with statues of saints and angels. These, however, are expensive and cannot always be had. A good picture is always appropriate; but it should be made with judgment and good taste. It is best to place it in a triptic, so as to shut up in Passion tide. The subject of the picture may be some event in the life of our Saviour, his blessed mother, or of any saint connected with the altar or the place. But care should be taken that the drawing be good, and the forms beautiful. Above all things, those burlesque, distorted, and disproportionate figures which are sometimes used to represent Him who was 'fairer than the children of men,' and Her, who was "among the daughters of Adam as a lily among thorns," are to be studiously avoided. To borrow the language attributed to Pope Adrian the First, 'our blessed Saviour is to be represented with all the attributes of divine beauty that art can bestow upon Him;' and surely the same may be said of his blessed mother. It is a grievous and mischievous error to suppose, because some of the productions of the middle ages, that have escaped the devastations of Protestantism and revived Paganism, are ill-designed and ill-executed—and, perhaps, were spared on account of their very worthlessness, that such was the general school of those periods. In the works even of Cimabue, Nicolo, Pisano, and Guido da Sienna, and much more, in the magnificent compositions of Giotto, Ghiberte, Masaccio, and Angelico da Fiesole, the greatest beauty of form and draping is always aimed at, and generally obtained without any sacrifice of the devotional character of the picture; and prints of many of the works of the great masters may be had at a moderate price, and will be found the very best models whereby to form a really good and devotional taste. Ghastly, misproportioned, and skeleton-like crucifixes should be altogether banished from the church as rather ludicrous than devotional."

After some other pointed observations on the tastelessness too frequently shown in the decorations of the altar of our Blessed Lady, the writer says:

"All such monstrosities, as well as drunken-faced wax or clay figures to misrepresent the stations of the Passion are quite inadmissible in the sanctuary—all that appears there should be noble, sublime, and good. And good, like the Divine Being whose attribute it is, is triune in its essence—a harmonic triad snatched from the music of the heavenly spheres, whose notes are virtue, beauty, and truth. Beauty, then, is essential to the good—and out on the irreverence that would put what is not good into the Holy of Holies."

We are not aware that sodalities, such as those addressed by the Wykeham Brotherhood, exist in Ireland, but we know that many ladies interest themselves in the decorations of altars, and truly a holy and glorious work it is, the highest they could be engaged in, but we regret that their taste and knowledge are not compatible with their zeal and piety, and that the results of their pious exertions are too frequently repugnant to good taste, and often provocative of contempt. Part of the Wykeham tract relates to those decorations and furniture of an altar, which may be the immediate work of a lady's own hands, and claims their especial attention. Respecting altar cloths, it is observed that they should be of the finest linen, and the borders elegantly worked, though not in "point-lace of the last new ball-room fashion." Two plates of examples of borders are given, and many more of a similar nature may be found in Pugin's "Glossary of Ecclesiastical decorations and costume."

Every altar should be provided with a set of antependia or frontals, corresponding with the canonical colours. These afford great scope for a lady's talents in embroidering decorations. The ground should be of rich velvet or silk, and the various ornamental devices wrought with gold, silver, and coloured threads.

No amount of decoration in paneling, gilding, painting, or sculpture on the front of an altar should dispense with the use of antependia, which are its proper vestures. The Archæological Journal contains some very useful hints on "Medieval Embroidery," and the Ecclesiologist (third number, new series) contains many practical suggestions on needle-work as applied to altar hangings. An embroidered hanging would also form a suitable back ground for an altar, where the more expensive decoration of a reredos or good painting could not be obtained.

The address contains many useful recommendations with respect to the sacred vessels and other furniture of the altar, and concludes with remarks on "adventitious decoration," amongst which the very chaste and appropriate ornament of flowers—"the spontaneous offering of external nature to the church"—is recommended.

"It has always been customary to decorate the altar with flowers and green boughs at certain of the great festivals. A carpeting composed of the leaves of flowers arranged by their colours into a kind of mosaic design is truly beautiful, and the flanking of the altar with boughs and flowers, with lights tastefully disposed among them has always a pleasing and festive effect. For doing this well, no rules can be given—good taste, and the form and conveniences of the place must be the sole directors. But we may remark that trumpery artificial flowers in trashy plaster of Paris vases, are things fit only for the dust-hole, and should never be placed in the Church."

Artificial flowers (no matter how elegant imitations of natural flowers) are, of course, to be excluded as unrealities from the sanctuary of the Most High, where all should be good and true. Lists of the flowers which may be appropriately used on the different festivals are given in the 18th and 21st Nos. of the Ecclesiologist, new series.

To all who love the splendour of God's house, and who wish to give expression to their devotional feelings by contributing to its adornment, we recommend the attentive perusal of this earnestly written tract, and praying that our Lady may prosper the good work which the Wykeham Brotherhood has taken in hand, we venture to express a hope that the day is not far distant when a similar association for similar purposes may be established in Ireland.

We now turn to Mr. Blunt's pamphlet, which treats of a subject by no means so important as the foregoing, but still of great moment as a matter of religious æsthetics. There are few persons who have not felt the influence of the sound of bells as they have heard them peal out from steeple-top the glad announcement of some high festival of holy church, or day consecrated to some hallowed association; or listened with delight to the solemn peal of the "Angelus," borne from the cloisters of a convent on the gentle breeze of a summer or autumnal eve, over far-spreading planes or up the wild glens of a mountain district. There is in the sound of a bell a harmony with nature in all her varied moods, and well did the ancient churchmen know and value this, when they associated it with so many of the important offices of the church, and memorable events in the lives of the faithful. And beautiful is the language used in the office of their dedication, when the church prays, "that as the voice of Christ appeased the troubled sea, so God would be pleased to endue that sound with such virtue that it may intimidate the enemy and encourage the faithful people, and that as the Holy Spirit formerly descended upon David when he struck the chords of the harp, and the thunder of the air repelled adversaries when Samuel offered up the lamb, in like manner at the sound of that vase passing through the clouds, flights of angels may surround the assembly of the church, and save the minds and bodies of the believers with an everlasting protection." So sacred were bells esteemed in the Ages of Faith. Thus sanctified by the prayers of the church, they became objects of especial care, and were frequently dedicated to saints whose names they bore. With other legends, too, they were inscribed, but not of a frivolous or profane character, but conceived in the Catholic spirit which so eminently characterized the middle ages. A few of those ancient inscriptions yet remain, of which the following are examples:

"Laudo Deum verum, Plebem voco congrego clerum,
Defunctos ploro, Pesem fugo, Festa decoro.

Trinitate Sacra fiat hæc campana beata,
Det veniæ munus nobis Rex Trinus et Unus.

Sit nobis grata Virgo super astra levata.

Sit nobis portus ad vitam Virginis ortus
Ortus solamen det nobis Virginis. Amen.

Fons Evangelii repleat nos dogmate cæli."

Many other inscriptions of a similar character remain on bells which fanatic rage long ago rendered silent, and which are now preserved in the Museums of the curious.

Cardinal Bona devotes a long chapter to the history of bells, and to the description of the ceremonies of their consecration; and Durandus at length explains their various kinds, and the mystic meanings attached to them.

Mr. Blunt's pamphlet commences with a review of the various abuses to which church bells have been subjected by the Protestantism of the last three centuries, but as we are not immediately interested in this part of the subject, we pass over to that which is of more importance, the use of church bells. The writer observes:

"The bells are to the whole parish what a church organ is to an assembled congregation. They wake up the heart's affections and lead us in our praises to God. But they have a holy use and purpose of still broader character—They call us to the church, and bid all come who can. They warn, too, those who cannot come, that it is prayer-time now, that they may raise their hearts with us in our prayers though absent in body. They preach to all continually of death and judgment, of heaven and hell; and while they invite the willing, they warn those who will not come. They remind us all, amid our busy occupations, that this is not our continuing city, that we are but pilgrims and sojourners upon earth; and while they warn the slothful Christian thus continually to "gird up his loins" and haste heavenwards, they preach to those who never hear another preacher and tell them of a judgment to come. Again: they wake the heart to gladness on all the holy feast days of the church, loudly calling upon us to 'rejoice in the Lord;' and in times of fasting and humiliation, eloquent by their silence or by their mournful sounds, they call us to penitence and sorrow. Again: if any of our neighbours, rich or poor, be joined together by holy church in marriage, the bells ring out their cheerful peal of joy, bidding us all to raise up our hearts in thanksgiving with our brethren (whose marriage 'represents unto us the mystical union which is betwixt Christ and His church'). . . . Again: when any is passing out of this life the 'passing bell' is tolled, acquainting us with the awful circumstance, warning us that our own time may even now be at hand, and calling upon us to pray for our departed brother. . . . And when the soul is departed and delivered from this death-bearing body, the bells ring out in notes of solemn cheerfulness their peal of chastened joy calling on us to thankfulness for our brother's deliverance from trial and difficulty and peril—this sinful, tempting, ever dangerous world. . . . And when the body is deposited in the tomb, the bells ring out their note of praise, bidding us "to sorrow not as those who have no hope."

These are a few of the important and significant uses of church bells, and should be carried out in every church which possesses a bell, as far as possible. The writer briefly alludes to cases in which church bells may be abused, as follows :

"Thus holy are the church bells—and thus great is their holy usefulness to us. If, therefore, they are used for any common purposes—if upon occasions of mere worldly joy—if when the church would call upon us to gladness, her bells are made to sound the note of sorrow—if their sweet voices should be bought and sold, loudly proclaiming the rich man's weal or woe, and silent or almost silent about Christ's poor—then is their usefulness destroyed, their holy purpose abolished or reversed, and a grievous sin is committed against the church, and against God to whom they are dedicated."

The pamphlet concludes with some practical suggestions on the management of bells, and the arrangement with respect to bell-ringers, and recommends "that the use of bells be confined strictly to ecclesiastical purposes"—a recommendation in which we heartily concur, for surely few things can be more painful to the ears of a Christian than to hear those instruments which are, or should be, solemnly dedicated to the service of the God of peace, ringing out the triumphs of political parties, or proclaiming the joys of this world.

Biographia Miscellanea.

SAINT COLUMB-CILLE.

On the seventh of December, in the year of our Lord's era, 521, at Gartan, in the district of Kilmacrenan, in Tyrconnell, was born a child of the line of the local princes, who became afterwards an eminent author, and living a life of untarnished purity, has long been accounted a glorified saint in heaven. The happy parents of this favoured man were both of noble birth. His mother, Aethena, was a daughter of the Leinster House of Macanava; his father, whose name was Feidhlim, was fourth in direct descent from the monarch Nial Neigallach. While in his mother's womb, it is related that his future greatness was announced to her by several angelic visitations, in one of which, a spirit clothed her with a shining garment, and then disrobing her, spread it out in the air until it covered all the visible landscape.* On enquiring into the meaning of the vision, she was told by this angel it was typical of the fame of the son she was soon to bring forth.

The child being born, was, we are told, baptized Crimthan. But in early boyhood he received either from his parents or teachers the name of Columb, which signifies a dove, and in after life his disciples added to this cille, or, "of the churches;" hence his historical name.

From his earliest youth he seemed marked out from the common crowd for some great mission. The son of a Milesian Prince he was, doubtless, taught in his seventh year, according to their custom, to mount a horse and fling a javelin; and ordained, perhaps, a knight of the Red Branch. But mildness, wisdom, and poetry were even then visitants in his bosom, where afterwards they fixed their unchanged habitation. The mountains and the sea-shore of his father's principedom, and the conversation of the holy priest of Kilmacrenan, had for him greater charms than the warlike sports of the court or the battle songs of bards.

The first school to which the young Columb was sent, was that of Moville, on the western shore of Lough Foyle, within a few miles of its junction with the North Channell. St. Finian presided over this seminary, which enjoyed the countenance of the O'Doherties, dynasts of Innishowen, in whose territory it was. The site was one of the most sheltered in all Leathuinn, and certainly not the least picturesque. Behind it towers Carrignamagdy, the broad and beautiful lake stretched over from it to the fertile side of Magilligan, and near to it is the rocky sea-coast of Innishowen. Here the young O'Donnell was first educated. He was here admitted an acolyth, in which capacity he was remarkable for the fervour and sweetness of his chanting in the divine office; and doubtless the grand hymns of Sedulius, so often on his lips, had the greatest share in forming his poetical tastes. Here, also, he was admitted to deacon's orders. It is told, that while with St. Finian, the wine of the monastery was exhausted, so that none could be had for the service of the altar, and that he being despatched for it, finding none, taking water and blessing it, the miracle of the marriage-feast at Canaan was re-wrought there. It is also told that a priest of the monastery passing him one night as he lay sleeping, saw a ball of fire, as it were, burning before him, which cast on his face a seraphic lustre, awful in its beauty. From Moville he went into Leinster, probably, to the place of his mother's people, where he continued his studies under the direction of one called Germanus.

Here, it would appear, the spirit of prophecy first manifested in him. Reading in the fields with his master, a girl, pursued by an infuriated ruffian, ran towards them, and was killed almost at their feet. Inspired with a holy horror of the deed, Columb foretold a terrible retribution for the murderer, which came to pass in the very mode he indicated. Whilst in Leinster he wisely profited by the opportunity of attending "the Lectures" given in Clonard, already famous for the erudition of its teachers. St. Finian, its founder, still presided over that institution. In 546, being then but a deacon, he returned to Tyrconnell. He had now gained some inkling of his mission. A fair hill above the Foyle, then crowned with ancient oaks, he obtained from his relatives, and there he founded his first church and monastery. Around these, in lapse of time, a city grew up, and that city stands till this day, and bears the name of Derry. Having witnessed the completion of this work, he resolved to make the tour of Ireland, on which he started accordingly in '48 or '9. On this journey he is said to have erected many monasteries and churches, such as those of Drumcliffe, in Derry, Rachlin Island, and Swords, but these, I think, must be attributed to his times rather than to him. It is, however, certain, that in 550 he founded the famous abbey of Durrow, in the King's County, the profanation of which, six hundred years later, cost one of the chiefs of our English invaders his life.* Kells, in Meath, had formerly a monastery also attributed, on good grounds, to his hands.

It was about this time he was ordained priest. Of this ceremony, Adamnan and O'Donnell tell us a strange story. He was "sent," they say, to a holy bishop of East Meath—called St. Etchen—who lived in the locality now known as Clonfad. On arriving at the episcopal habitation, he was told that the bishop was out ploughing in the fields, whither our church-builder went, and thence returned home with the saint in the evening. Those who sent him to St. Etchen,

* 1186.—"Hugh de Lacy, while superintending the erection of a castle on the ruins of the abbey, was killed by one of the labourers, who, indignant at the profanation of the sacred spot, struck off his head with an axe while he was stooping down to give directions."

* Lanigan, Eccl. History, vol. ii.

intended to have had him ordained a bishop (for a single prelate, according to the discipline of the Irish church in that age, could confer such a dignity), but by mistake the saint read the office for the ordination of a priest, instead of that for a bishop. Columb-cille would never afterwards permit himself to be invested with the mitre. Thus, from his earliest youth, marvels and adventures seem to have arisen at every step he took onward in life.

His career as builder and poet commenced about the same period, namely, at his twenty-fifth year, which coincidence betokens that his meditative powers and practical designs must have reached that early maturity, through much mental study and self discipline. Over both these ambitions the spirit of faith presided, and as his first erection had been a church, so his first poem was a hymn. Of this composition a living author has given us the following translation :

"Hear us, O God, whom we adore,
And bid thy thunders cease to roar;
Nor let the lightning's ghastly glare
Affright thy servants to despair.

Thee, mighty God, we humbly fear;
With Thee no rival durst compare;
In loftier strains than earth can raise
Thee angels choirs unceasing praise:
Thy name fills heaven's high court above,
And echoes tell thy wondrous love.

Jesu! Thy love creation sings,
Most upright, holy, King of kings,
For ever blest shalt Thou remain,
Ruling with truth Thy wide domain.

The Baptist who prepared Thy way,
Ere he beheld the light of day,
Strengthened with grace from God on high,
Rejoiced to know thy day drew nigh.

Though strength was gone and age prevailed,
God's aged priest by prayer prevailed;
A son was given—a Prophet came
The great Messiah to proclaim.

The gems that shine with dazzling light
Upon a cup of silver bright,
Resemble, faintly though it be,
The love, my God, I bear to Thee."*

In the interims of his more active labours, if we can receive several concurrent traditions, Columb also found time to transcribe the two copies of the Four Gospels, known severally as the "Book of Durrow," and the "Book of Kells,"† and also to compose several other hymns in Latin and Irish.‡ The free exercise of his industry as a transcriber, is related to have been the cause why he first left his native land. He had borrowed from St. Finian a psalter, of which he took a copy for himself before he returned it. But the owner of the original claimed both as his, and the case was referred to a Brehon, who adjudged that as to the owner of the cow belonged the calf, so to the proprietor of the psalter belonged the copy. Columb refused to admit the legality of such a decision, and retreated into Ulster, where on hearing his tale, the Clan Connall resolved to sustain his quarrel. The monarch of Ireland, who still abode at Tara, espoused the claim of St. Finian, and the belligerents meeting at Culdremne, in Sligo, fought a battle, in which the Clan Connall were victorious and the copyist kept his book.* This broil rendered his longer abode in Ireland undesirable; Durrow and Kells were in the territories of the monarch, and his residence in Tir-connell might furnish at any future day a fresh casus belli. He resolved, therefore, to emigrate. But before he left his relations he gave them in charge a finely adorned case, in the form of a relic-box, which he charged them to carry before them in battle, but not to open. This they preserved. Through all their varied fortunes the O'Donnell's held fast by it. They carried it with them in their banishment; and it is as it were but yesterday that an heir to their name recovered it, in an obscure town on the Continent. Tradition had annexed to its opening some fearful penalty, but the present Ulster king-at-arms not being credulous in such matters, caused it to be opened, and lo! an ancient copy of a Latin psalter, written on vellum, and plainly bearing all the clearest signs of antiquity.† This, then, was the ancient talisman of Tir-connell!

The year 563 was a happy one for the souls of the Picts and Minor Scots, and the people of the western islands. It was that in which Columb-cille with his chosen twelve companions crossed the northern channel, and landed amongst them. At that time Bridisius was king of the Picts, and Connall ruled in the Dal- aradian colony. Since the cessation of the Roman wars their country had enjoyed repose; but the Christian missions of Palladius, and others, had prospered but indifferently. In the highlands and the western Isles, more particularly, the cross was yet to be planted, and the planter was come at length. The two kings gave him every facility for the prosecution of his mission, and such success crowned his labours, that all Britain resounded with admiration. Having done his work on the mainland, he coasted among the Hebrides and Orkneys, where the veneration in which he is held to this day testifies best to the verity of his apostleship. Sailing by one of the former islands, he resolved to procure it for his retreat. Its dimensions were limited indeed—three miles long by one wide. The western side of it was rocky and stern, and beyond it "the rude Corbrechtan roared." Small hills, like the backs of a shoal of dolphins, ranged along its centre; its eastern shore, which faced the coast of Ross, was low and accessible. The purple flowers of "the beautiful sea-bugloss," garnished the shore, the sturdy sea-holly grew among the cliffs, and beneath "the fatal Belladonna." Luxuriant grasses and daisies spread over the loamy fields, and sheeted the central vallies; the gannet fished along its verges, and the wild geese rested their wings in flight, or led their callow brood along its slopes. This little island, which was called Hy, the Scottish king, bestowed upon him cheerfully, and here he forthwith erected that seminary, which Johnson justly called "the great school of theology."‡ The island he called Iona. He also erected

‡ I cannot here refrain from copying that noble passage in which the great English moralist of the eighteenth century speaks of his feelings on landing at Iona. "We were now treading that illustrious island, which was once the luminary of the Caledonian regions, whence savage clans and roving barbarians derived the benefits of knowledge and the blessings of religion. To abstract the mind from all local emotion would be impossible, if it were endeavoured, and would be foolish if it were possible. What ever withdraws us from the power of our senses; whatever makes two or three small churches upon it, and a residence for himself and his monks.* The place appears to have been uninhabited at this time. He covered its pastures with sheep, but would allow into it no black cattle.† He used to say, that “wherever there is a cow there must be a woman, and wherever there is a woman there must be mischief.” His monks tilled the fields with their own hands, and from the inlets of the isle easily obtained their lenten fare. In the process of time this romantic establishment attracted students from all parts of the north-west, and many princes vied with each other in deference for its founder, who passed many of his days sailing in a rude corrach among the isles or along the shores of Scotland, baptizing, preaching, and adjusting quarrels. He was, in real truth, the father of that people, and we little wonder that their posterity at this day should believe that he still looks around the sea from Iona, after every storm, to see that no harm has been done them or their boats or flocks.

When not on his missionary tours, he superintended the school he had established, or busied himself in multiplying copies of the Gospels or of the Psalms. He also composed many occasional hymns in Irish and Latin; among them one in praise of the Blessed Trinity, and two laudatory of St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise, and of the holy virgin, St. Brigid. He is likewise believed to have written “A Life of St. Patrick,” which is now either lost or is no longer known as his. These compositions are to be assigned to the period of his life between 570 and 590. On one of the central hills, or elevations of his island, we are told that he had a sort of cairn piled, whence he used to resort daily to look in the direction of Ireland. This spot—Gaelic—tradition still points out as “the place of the back turned on Ireland.”‡ In the list of poems ascribed to him, Colgan mentions one, on “His passion of looking back to Ireland.” Indeed, he appears to have loved Ireland with all the devotion of an unstained soul. No mother ever so watched her child—no child so trembled for its mother’s weal, as this venerable man watched and trembled in his anxiety for Ireland. Among his poems are two others which sustain this exalted idea of his patriotism. One is called “An Epistle to some holy men of Ireland,” and the other, “A dialogue with St. Cormac, his disciple, on his return from his first navigation through the ocean.”§ Yet, amid all this care, labour, and contemplation, no moroseness ever crossed his heart or brow. “His countenance,” says Adamnan, “resembled that of an angel. In conversation he was brilliant, in work holy, in disposition excellent, in council distinguished. Although he lived on earth, yet he himself was furnished with heavenly manners. Every hour of his life was passed either in prayer, or reading, or writing, or some useful occupation. His fastings and watchings, also, were unwearied. Yet in the midst of all these austerities, he ever preserved a cheerful countenance, and was beloved by all who were brought into intercourse with him.”*

Such was Columb-cille, in the seventieth year of his age, when he was called upon to take part in two affairs of the highest public importance, in his native country. Most of his former opponents were now no more, and many also of his friends had been gathered to the dead. St. Finian and his royal champion slept the sleep of peace, and the memory of the bloody fray of Cuilidremne was forgotten, or recalled only to be regretted. The fame of the exiled covvist had been yearly wafted over from Iona to Ireland, by those who were educated there, or had adventures there to visit so renowned a personage. Hence, he was well fitted for the character of a mediator between the conflicting parties. The immediate causes for his interference were these: the Scottish colony in Caledonia were now in the second or third generation, yet laid claim to the Irish district of Dal-aradia, in Antrim, which their fathers possessed at the time of their emigration. Aidan, their king—himself one of the Clan Clonnall—advanced this claim, and Aadh, the Irish monarch, refused to admit it. The second cause of his interference arose from the number and insolence of the Bardic profession in Ireland, which the lampooned chiefs had entered into a confederacy to annihilate by legislative act, at the earliest opportunity. To decide these difficulties, an assembly of the states of Ireland was held, at Drum-ceat, in Derry, in the year of grace, 590; Columb-cille as mediator on the part of King Aidan, consented to attend.

It was the first Christian congress in Ireland. The chiefs of almost all the kingdom, with their companies of retainers, marched to the north. The new priesthood, with its host of bishops, led the procession to the hill of council, where the monarch of Ireland was to meet these representatives of the spiritual and temporal orders of his subjects. Nor can we suppose that the bards, so deeply interested in the result, were absent. The seanachies also were there, and not inattentive spectators of the scene, to judge from the fulness and the enthusiasm of their relations of what was enacted.

Columb-cille, on the Dalaradian dispute, gave counsel that it be referred to arbitration, and proposed that Colman, a learned, aged, and holy person, should be the judge of the matter, which was consented to. Colman accepted the task, and before the assembly was yet dispersed, he decided that the colonists had no right to the land of their progenitors in the mother-country, but that they could claim the right of co-operation or clanship from the Dalaradian’s in every just case of war. This decision was at once ratified, and it continued in force, apparently, until the days of Edward Bruce, who seems to have been the last Caledonian Scot who fell in maintainance of its condition.

In the dispute about the bards, Columb-cille was

This Adamnan was Abbot of Iona, in the middle of the seventh century, and is praised by Bede for his scriptural knowledge and personal sanctity. He was one of those who most contributed to adjust the paschal dispute which existed between the Celtic and Latin churches in his time. Another who also materially advanced that union of celebration, was Cumnán of Durrow, also St. Columb’s monastery. The Saint himself is said to have foretold the controversy, and to have declared for the authority of the Roman calculation, and to have prophesied its final prevalence.

equally, though not so easily, successful. He proposed that laws should be made limiting their numbers, and defining their just privileges. He contended that their proper management, and not their extirpation, was the desirable change; and, finally, the assembly of the states concurred with him, and the bards were saved. Henceforth they were to exist, subject to the laws, an element in the sphere of society, not its arbitrary and self-willed scourges. In the Danish wars of the ninth and tenth centuries, they were found on every field in the thickest of the danger, in every camp the most watchful of sentinels, and there was no scene of victory or of defeat where the blood of the bard and of the soldier did not flow together. The harp as well as the sword might then be found in the cold hands of lifeless heroes. When, after the decisive battle of Clontarf, more peaceful times dawned upon our island, their fortunes also brightened, and the current of their lives ran smoothly among festival greens and glad castles. The harpers of Wales, of Caledonia, and Britain, came to them to learn "the gentle craft" of sweet sounds, and the same part the troubadours of Provence, and the minnisingers of Germany played in civilizing the tastes of continental feudalism, the like they achieved for the people of these western isles. Such were the fruits of Columb-cille's diplomacy at Drumceat.*

After the assembly had risen, he remained for some months in Ireland. He seems to have made "a circuit" of his old foundations. He found them all flourishing and likely to flourish. Derry and Kells were dear to his heart, as his first creations, and not less so was Durrow, to whose holy inhabitants he addressed a poetical "farewell," says Colgan, when about to return to Iona. And so famous did that island grow, that many kings resigned their thrones and retired there to dwell in peace. Three sepulchres still exist among its ruins, which contain the ashes of several of those illustrious men who living bore the majesty of Norway, Scotland, and Ireland.

The death of this great good man was beautifully fitting for one who had lived such a life. He was engaged in copying out a psalter, and had reached to the 10th verse of the 34th psalm, where it is written—"They who seek the Lord shall want no manner of thing that is good." It was on the ninth day of June, in the year 597. He was then advancing to four score; and the summer that smiled over the isles and shores his clear eye could see from Iona, was congenial to the repose his own heart contained. Foreseeing that he could not complete the work on which he was engaged, he said to those near him—"Let Baithen (meaning his chosen successor) finish the rest," and so, laying down his stilus, his soul departed in peace from its earthly tabernacle.†

His remains were interred with reverence and grief, among those of his departed companions and disciples, but in after times were transferred to Downpatrick, of which it was long ago written :

"In Down, one grave three Saints do fill, Patrick, Bridget, and Columb-cille."

The character of Columb-cille is beautifully simple, yet on that account more difficult of explanation, to

* The best account of this assembly, and of the part St. Columb-cille bore in it, is given in Prince Manus O'Donnell's Life of his illustrious predecessor. This work, written in Irish, was completed in the year 1520, and reflects credit on the industry and piety of its eminent author. Colgan has translated the greater part of it into Latin, in the second volume of his Acta Sanctorum.

the understanding of this day. A poet by nature, and a missionary by a providential necessity, his life exhibits him as the possessor of an imagination thoroughly disciplined, a fancy obedient to the commands of faith, and a heart teeming with affection and patriotism, feelings so generalized by the circumstances of his destiny, as to include his scholars, his converts, his habitation, the very birds of the air themselves. In the original constitution of his mind, the poetic element appears to have preponderated; this, as an apostle to nations wrapt in heathen darkness, he was obliged to curb and keep in bounds. But it would not always be restrained, and, doubtless, most of the many beautiful legends of him which yet exist, in Ulster, Scotland, and the Western Islands, have originated in real occurrences, which took place while he was under the influence of its inspiration. All the best virtues of our nature seem to have been his—piety, perseverance, cheerfulness, charity, and patriotism. His "holy Isle," his great success as an apostle, his last visit to his native land, and the manner of his death, illustrate these qualities as his characteristics. His services to learning as an author, and as founder of the Ionian school, were surely considerable. His rescue of the bardic order from extinction, entitles him to an honourable place in the history of Celtic literature, and his success as a pacificator between Ireland and her only colony, gives his name a title to be enrolled with the first of our patriots.

SKETCHES OF

The Lives of Great Christian Artists, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

NO. II.—FRA ANGELICO DA FIESOLE.

In the year of man's redemption, 1447, Tomaso Calandrino, the son of an humble physician of Sarzana, was elevated to the chair of St. Peter, with the title of Nicholas V. New glory was added to the church, and the fair land of Italy was again hopeful, and rejoiced in the advent of a tribune, sent by an All-wise Providence to rule his heritage on earth, and to direct the extraordinary intellectual and classic enthusiasm of the age to the glory and usefulness of the church. The fierce political conflicts which accompanied the rise of the Italian republics, had in a great measure subsided before the close of the first half of the fifteenth century. A wholesome balance between the rival claims of the democracy and aristocracy had obtained, and the feuds which had for centuries divided nearly all Italy and Germany into two violent factions, had now subsided. The scholastic philosophy of the middle age was in its decline, and the new enthusiasm for Pagan antiquity was beginning to diffuse itself all over Europe, and to manifest its influence on every department of intellectual cultivation. The church once more, for a short space, appeared to enjoy repose in her own patrimony. Avignon was for ever abandoned, and the successors of St. Peter had returned to the Eternal city. A man of enlarged views and of knowledge and prudence, in accordance with the spirit of the age, was required as visible head of the church, to gather together her apparently scattered forces, and to demonstrate again to the world that the divine promises of her founder were unfailing. This head was obtained in Nicholas, who rose from the humble station of a transcriber of manuscripts and arranger of the Medici Library of San Marco, at Florence, to the supreme dignity of Pontiff. His only recommendations were his extensive erudition, his enthusiastic love of ancient literature, and his unaffected piety. On his elevation to the Popedom, however, he displayed talents of no uncommon kind as a statesman and ruler, while his munificent encouragement of scholars and artists has endeared his name to posterity.

While engaged in the foundation of the celebrated Vatican Library, Nicholas also turned his attention to the re-edification and embellishment of various buildings, religious and civil, in Rome. He recollected having seen, during his occupations in San Marco, a youthful and humble brother of the Dominican order, who was as remarkable for his humility and modest bearing, as for the unwearied industry with which he laboured in decorating the walls of his monastery with suitable frescos. This brother's services the Pope was determined to obtain in decorating the chapel of the Vatican; and so well was he pleased by the humble Dominican, that he offered him the Archbishopric of Florence then vacant. The friar declined this mark of his Holiness's favour, on account, as he said, of his own unworthiness, at the same time recommending Frate Antonio, an unknown brother of his convent, who was thereupon elevated to the Archiepiscopal dignity, and became the most distinguished prelate who had ruled in Florence for many centuries.

This monk-artist was Guido Petri de Mugello, known in his monastery as Fra Giovanni da Fiesole, to whom has been given the name Angelico, as expressive of his sanctified life and of the purity and devotional feeling of his works. He was born in the ancient and romantic little village of Fiesole, situated on the side of a hill overlooking Florence, of which city it was the parent, about the year 1387. His parents are said to have been persons of distinction, and were enabled to confer upon him a liberal education as well as a patrimony, by which he could have passed an easy and probably an influential life in this world. In his earlier years he had devoted himself to the illustration of missals and other ecclesiastical manuscripts, by which occupation a love for the contemplative life was imbibed; and in his twentieth year he sought and found a retreat from the tumult and distractions of this world, within the cloistered shades of San Marco, in Florence. Henceforth his life was a continual course of religious exercises. The art which he practised, and by which he has obtained the appellation of the "Painter of Paradise," was a continual hymn of praise to the sovereign Being, to whose inspiration he attributed every effort of his pencil. He never left the precincts of his monastery, except on the occasion of his visit to Pope Nicholas V., till a short time before his death, when he undertook another journey to Rome, where he died in 1455, and was buried in the church of Santa Maria Sopra Minerva.

The life of Angelico was therefore diversified by few of those external stirring events, which cast an exciting or romantic interest over the lives of the great of this world. What internal conflicts this good man endured, no one, of course, can surmise; but let not the slothful and timid in this active life of ours suppose, that the man of internal life is free from trials and temptations peculiar to his vocation, and frequently as difficult to surmount as those which beset the worldling, or attempt to excuse their own shortcomings by pleading the greater ease of the contemplative state.

From the time Angelico assumed the habit of the order of St. Dominic, he was a child in obedience. He never painted but by the order or permission of the superior of his monastery, and his works, when completed, became the property of the convent, so that thus the fame of the individual became absorbed in the community of which he was a member. This was the almost universal practice of the artists of the middle ages, and may account for the names of the architects of the stupendous piles raised for religious worship in the ages of faith, being, for the most part, unknown. Angelico's preparation for the painting of a picture was by meditation, fervent prayer, and the reception of the holy sacraments, with earnestly beseeching the blessing of heaven on the work which he was about to undertake. After this preparation he made the design of his subject which he never could be induced to alter, either by the after reflections of his own mind, or by the advice of others; and those who have seen his works, and are capable of appreciating their beauties, acknowledge that they are in harmony with this earnest faith and devotional feeling. He is described to have been a man of the most amiable temper; and it is said that he was never seen angry. Amongst his other admirable qualities, his willingness to impart the knowledge he possessed to others was conspicuous, so that during his lifetime he had many pupils who were devotedly attached to his person and his principles, and who, as far as possible, preserved the style and sentiment of his works after his death. Amongst the most distinguished of these was Benozzo Gozzoli, who was enthusiastically attached to his master, and who assisted him in some of his latter works. He enlarged on Angelico's style by the introduction of landscape backgrounds, and other accessories in his pictures, but he never equalled him in the grace and purity of the composition of his figures.

While seeking to be unknown of men, and labouring only for the honour of the church, the salvation of his own soul, and the renown of the order of which he was a member, Angelico secured an undying fame, and earned the glorious title of "Prince of Christian Artists." Little deemed that simple monk, as he laboured from early morning till the vesper bell warned him that the time for repose had arrived, that the works which were then glowing, and becoming animated as it were, beneath his hand, should, after the lapse of four centuries of neglect, be esteemed precious models for the revival of Christian art. His sole ambition (if ambition it could be called) was to leave, not memorials of his artistic powers and skill, but salutary lessons to his companions and to the future brotherhood of his house; lessons that might recall their wandering thoughts and aid in fixing them in the contemplation of eternal truths, as they paced the silent cloisters of San Marco, or worshipped beneath the proud towers of its glorious church. Yet while labouring with this singleness of intention, and confining his thoughts and exertions to a sphere apparently so narrow, his works produced under the influence of those feelings have given him nearly a world-wide celebrity, and will continue to be daily more and more appreciated, as just views of the end and scope of art are developed.

In the style of Angelico's pictures, the mere connoisseur, whose taste is formed by academical notions and models of Pagan antiquity, will find little to interest him, but the Christian who esteems the legitimate sphere of art to be the power of exciting faith and hope and love, will find much to please his imagination as well as to interest the best feelings of his nature. The sublime terrors of Michael Angelo, 'tis true, are not to be found in his works, nor the gracefulness of Raphaelle's great productions; but a wonderful combination of art and purity, which speak a more mysterious and consoling language to our hearts, and in which it is impossible, as Goerres says, not to recognize a still higher beauty, evincing all the characteristics of mystic vision. We are not challenged to admire the artist's skill in anatomy and the mere imitation of uninspired nature, but the simplicity and chasteness of the style of his drapery, and the profound symbolism of his decorations; not the expression of rude passion in the faces of his men and women, but rather the poetical and religious fervour of his saints and martyrs. His power lay not in the expression of the evil tendencies of man's fallen nature, but, in the words of Baffalmacco, "in representing saints, holy men, and holy women, on walls and over altars, in order that by their means, men, to the great despite of demons, might be more disposed to piety and virtue." His representation of the Blessed Virgin so affected Michael Angelo, that he declared "it was humanly impossible to paint such a blessed form as he composed of Mary, in his picture of the Annunciation; the painter must have beheld her." In the mechanical treatment of his subjects, Angelico has been excelled by artists who have existed since his time, and who have applied themselves more directly to the study of animate nature, but in the purity of expression and beauty of the heads of saints, and in the embodiment of feelings of faith and hope and divine contemplation and resignation, he has never been surpassed, and perhaps will never be approached in excellence till another spirit like his shall arise. No matter how much the egotistic philosophy of our times may slight the influences which religious observances exercise over intellectual labours, the life of this prince of mystic painters, demonstrates that a spiritual communion with a holier world is a portion of the blessing which has been promised to the pure of heart. That it was under the influence of this divine blessing he was enabled to produce his admirable works, we can entertain no doubt; and we must admit, with Vasari, "that such an extraordinary talent as he possessed could only be the attendant on the highest sanctity—for to succeed as he did, the artist himself must be religious and holy."

The works of Angelico are very numerous, and are to be seen in many of the picture galleries of Europe, but it is said that none of them has reached any of the public collections in England. Passavant attributes to him, however, a small pen and ink drawing at present in the British Museum, which he describes as "a youthful saint in the costume of that period, with long hanging sleeves, supporting himself with both hands upon his sword. He is standing in a richly-ornamented tabernacle of Italian architecture, with a gable in the Gothic style; drawn in Indian ink, with the pen, upon white paper." He also says there is an "Herodius dancing at the banquet," in the collection of Mr. Samuel Rogers. His greatest works are the frescos on the walls of his own convent of St. Mark, in Florence, in the church of St. Maria Novella, and in the chapel of Nicholas V., in the Vatican. The collection of the late Cardinal Fesch contained one of his easel pictures, representing the last judgment.

The Louvre is fortunate in the possession of one of the most beautiful of this master's easel pictures. The subject was a frequent and favourite study with the artists of the middle ages—the coronation of the Blessed Virgin by her Divine Son—and was peculiarly adapted to the genius of the blessed Angelico. It was painted for the church of St. Dominic at Florence, and continued to adorn it till the commencement of the present century, when it was obtained by the French government and placed for the first time in the Louvre in 1815. A. W. Schlegel published outline illustrations of this work, with explanatory notes. Recently a very beautiful collection of lithographs, consisting of half figures from the picture, has been published by Debost and Des Mottes of Paris. These plates include three angels with musical instruments, figures of St. Agnes, St. Augustin, St. Laurence, the Blessed Virgin, and our Lord. They are accompanied by an abridgment of Schlegel's description, and a short notice of the painter's life, compiled from Vasari, Lanzi, and Bottari. Mrs. Jameson, with her usual accuracy, describes this admirable work, "It represents a throne under a rich Gothic canopy, to which there is an ascent by nine steps; on the highest kneels the Blessed Virgin, veiled, her hands crossed on her bosom. She is clothed in a red tunic, a blue robe over it, and a royal mantle with a rich border flowing down behind. The features are most delicately lovely, and the expression of the face full of humility and adoration. Christ, seated on the throne, bends forward, and is in the act of placing the crown on her head; on each side are twelve angels, who are playing a heavenly concert with guitars, tambourines, trumpets, viols, and other musical instruments; lower than these, on each side, are forty holy personages of the Old and New Testament; and at the foot of the throne kneel several saints, male and female, among them St. Catherine with her wheel, St. Agnes with her lamb, and St. Cecilia crowned with flowers. Beneath the principal picture there is a row of seven small ones, forming a border and representing various incidents in the life of St. Dominic. The whole measures about seven and a-half feet high by six feet in width. It is painted in distemper; the glories round the heads of the sacred personages are in gold; the colours are the most delicate and vivid imaginable; and the ample draperies have the long folds which recall the school of Giotto; the gaiety and harmony of the tints, the expression of the various heads, the divine rapture of the angels with their air of immortal youth, and the devout reverence of the other personages, the unspeakable serenity and beauty of the whole composition render this picture worthy of the celebrity it has enjoyed for more than four centuries."

A series of thirty-six plates, engraved in outline, from the pictures in the Academy of the Fine Arts in Florence, has been published by G. B. Nocchi of Firenze. They illustrate several scenes and passages of our Lord's life, and of the holy Scriptures. Amongst them is the celebrated Last Judgment, which the Count de Montalembert esteems the chef-d'œuvre of Christian painting. The same artist was engaged some time ago in engraving in outline a series of full-sized heads from the frescos in the convent of San Marco, which are probably published by this time.

The frescos of San Marco have also been illustrated in chromolithography by M. Henri de Laborde, and are not only accurate copies of the outlines of the magnificent works which they represent, but also fac-similes of the original colouring.

Sepulchral Monuments.

"If any one shall seriously survey the tombes erected in these our days, and examine the particulars of the personages wrought upon their tombes, he may easily discern the vanity of our minds, veiled under our fantasticke habits and attires, which in time to come will be rather provocations to vice than incitations to virtue; and so the Temple of God shall become a schoole-house of the monstrous habits and attires of our present age."—Weever's Funeral Monuments.

THESE words of old Weever are nearly as applicable to the present time as they were to the period in which they were written. The general debasement of art was nowhere so perceptible as in the monuments of the dead, when that enthusiastic antiquary undertook to preserve in his great work some memorials of "the glorious rich tombs and goodly monuments of our most worthy ancestors, of which few remains through the malignetie of wicked people, and our English profane tenacitie will be shortly left to continue the memory of the deceased to posterity."—Since that time the work of violent iconoclasts has ceased, but it has been succeeded by a barbarous taste which has proved as great a foe to antique art. The opinion which some had, "that tombs and their epitaphs taste somewhat of Popery," could not prevent that work of humanity which affords comfort to the mourner in the commemoration of the dead, by the erection of material monuments; a practice most in accordance with one of the deepest and, perhaps, most amiable feelings of our nature, and which consequently has existed at all times and in all countries, but at no time and in no place with such tender feelings and holy sympathies as in those which have been blessed by the influence of Catholicity. We find, therefore, that when Christian symbols were forbidden as "Papal," the emblems of Paganism quickly took their place, so that modern cemeteries and churches present rather the appearance of the burial grounds of heathens than of the resting places of the bodies of departed Christians. In churches and church-yards pertaining to the "establishment," all Christian symbols have been carefully excluded as "Popish;" and revived paganism, as "Protestant," has been allowed to run riot. With those abominations we have no concern at present, but our own churches and cemeteries, having felt the influence of the depraved taste of our neighbours, demand our attention. 'Tis true we never abandoned the precious symbol of the cross, but then we have associated it with emblems of paganism not a few. Weeping figures, cinerary urns, and inverted torches, too often enjoy a more conspicuous place on the tombs of Catholics than the emblem of their faith and hope.

Let us attempt to picture a church-yard of the ages of faith with its monuments and those of the adjoining church, and contrast them with those of our days.

You are probably a way-farer, on a pilgrimage of devotion to some ancient shrine, or to a scene which has been hallowed by the presence of some saint or sage of whom you have heard and read and dreamed till his very being became familiar to you, and every scene which he loved, every object with which he was associated in your memory, was some manifestation of his spirit. Starting from amongst lofty and wide-spreading trees, a tapering spire, surmounted by a gilded cross and cock,* announce that you are in the neighbourhood of a village church. You pause awhile; slowly and solemnly the tower bells peal out their mournful tones, and anon a "merrie peal" declares that a Christian warrior, who has "fought the good fight," is about being laid, more in triumph than in sorrow, in his last consecrated bed. You piously resolve to assist at this corporal work of mercy, and having arrived at the lych gate,† you await the approach of the funeral train. The "merrie peal" you had heard awhile ago, is succeeded by a slow and solemn toll. At length the procession arrives; a cross is borne at its head, then follows a priest in cope with his attendants, reciting portions of the office for the dead; then the coffin, supported on a bier covered with a pall of rich material embroidered with a goodly cross, and borne by some of the brotherhood of the guild of which the deceased was a member. Then follow the mourners bearing lights, emblems of joyous hope. The members of the guild follow close after, and the villagers, in processional order, close the train. The coffin is laid under the lych gate, and the funeral train rest till the clergy and choir approach from the church. The first peal of triumphant bells announced the approach, a second peal now shows that the church is welcoming the actual arrival of one of her children whose work is done. The coffin is again taken up, and the procession moves forward and enters the church by the south porch, where the departed had long years ago renounced "Satan and all his works and pomps," and had by the waters of holy baptism become a living temple of the Holy Spirit. The bier, with its burden, is then deposited in the centre of the nave, the attendants reverentially kneel around, and

"The mass is sung, and prayers are said,
And solemn requiem for the dead;
And bells toll out their mighty peal
For the departed spirit's weal."

Then the procession moves to the grave—dole is distributed amongst the poor—and the Christian hero is committed to his last earthly resting place, and "no more his bed he leaves ere the last angel-trumpet blows."

And now having assisted at this last corporal work of mercy, let us survey this sacred precinct, which contains the earthly temple of the Most High, and the hallowed spot where Christian bodies have reposed through long ages. It is situated on a gently-rising ground—its form is that of a parallelogram, stretching from east to west. No building adjoins it, except the simple parsonage of the parish priest, and the still less pretending dwelling of the fossarius, or grave digger. The church stands in the centre of the length of the plot of ground, but is situated more to the north than to the south side. It is observable that there are few graves on the north side of the church, and no memorials whatever to the persons there interred. They have been all strangers, and the parishioners here, as elsewhere, entertain a traditional dislike to sepulture in that position. The precinct is surrounded by a low fence-wall, of that class of work known in the country as "rubble," about four feet high, and surmounted by a plainly-moulded coping of dressed stone. Within this fence yews, poplars, and firs are skilfully intermixed, and almost intercept all view from within or without. Towards the east there are yew trees,* and around their bases are arranged circular wooden or stone seats for the accommodation of those who come hither to meditate, to commune with the memories of departed friends, or to pray for their souls' weal. The entrance to the church-yard is by a lych gate, and a stile—the latter for foot passengers, and the former for funeral and other processions. It is a solid yet ornamental structure. Its jambs are of stone, appropriately carved with heraldic forms of the cross and monograms of the Holy Name. The canopy is wide, spreading towards the north and south, and is elegantly carved. Beneath this canopy the coffin is always laid down till the arrival of the priest and choir. The gates are of oak, strongly framed, swinging on floriated hinges of iron, and fastened with a padlock, which in itself is a wonder of the smith's art; the key, too, is worth observing—the wards form the monogram of our Lord's name. There is no path but one within the sacred precinct, and that conducts you from the lych gate to the south porch of the church, by a route a little circuitous, because the gate is placed to the south-west. The first object that arrests your attention is the large cross placed mid-way between the entrance and the south porch, and to the east of the path. It stands on three graduated steps above a strong plinth of rubble masonry, which form what is termed the calvary. Its height may be about twenty feet. Its arms and head are surrounded by a circle. Its sides are elaborately carved with various Scriptural and mystic devices. On one side is the fall of Adam, with minute sculptures illustrative of the Old Testament, tending upwards, and terminating with the figure of our crucified Redeemer. On the other sides are various subjects from the life of the saint under whose patronage the church is dedicated. A gently-rippling stream, running in a south-westerly direction, attracts our attention; we trace its source and find it to be the "well of our Ladye," situated in the south-eastern angle of the precinct. It is covered by a beautifully-carved wellcot, exhibiting fleur de lis and the letter M in antique character, which was erected, as a quaintly carved inscription informs us, by one of the former parish priests—"Hanc turrem in honore sanctae Mariae Virginis construxit et dedicavit Eugenius quondam Rector hujus ecclesiae." It is ever clear and cool; it supplies the water for holy baptism, and all the necessary purposes of the church, and affords refreshment to the weary pilgrim. Let us try its efficacy. Miraculous cures have also been attributed to it, the memory of which is transmitted amongst the worthy parishioners from generation to generation.

Let us now walk through the green turf, treading reverentially, for we are on consecrated ground, and trace the affecting memorials which filial piety or brotherly love has raised to the memory of departed friends and kinsmen. You will observe, that the little green mounds which mark the graves are all turned in one direction towards the east, except in the case of the graves of priests, which are all made to regard the west. Here and there low and simple oaken crosses mark the resting places of the more humble parishioners. There are head-stones varying in height from a foot and a-half to three feet, and embodying some heraldic form of the cross; but, perhaps, the most usual forms of these memorials are the coped coffin-lid and the flat Lombardic slab. The former is about seven feet in length, in the shape of a coffin—whence its name—and sloping downwards from the centre to throw off rain; and a slightly relieved cross, with floriated stem and calvary, extends from the head to the foot. The Lombardic slab is an oblong, flat stone, with a floriated cross in low relief or incised, and a marginal legend surrounding it. These comprise the four classes of church-yard memorials of the departed faithful. Their legends or epitaphs are in the same spirit, and in structure differed little from those on the monuments in the interior of the church of which we shall soon have more to say.

It is now noon-tide, and we had better retire to the church and investigate its lore; but ere we enter let us rest within the porch, while we hold some conversation as to the time when sepulture was first permitted within the church, for doubtlessly you are aware that the ancient canons forbid any one to be buried within the church itself. "At first, indeed, even the bishops, saints, and martyrs were buried near the church, 'juxta ecclesiam,' as Bede says of St. Augustin's body. This was in the front court, the Paradisus Ecclesiae as at Rome, or in France 'Ecclesiae Parvium.' Thus, before many of the churches of Ravenna, as at the cathedral, and before the Basilica of St. John the Baptist, stand vast sarcophaguses in which great personages were buried, before it was permitted to entomb any one within the church. Constantine was buried in the porch of the Apostles' at Constantinople; Honorius in the porch of St. Peter at Rome; St. Augustin, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, was interred in the porch of St. Peter and St. Paul, which was a church of his foundation, near Canterbury, and together with him, six other archbishops who next succeeded him, whose relics were afterwards removed into the abbey church. In the fourth century, bishops were buried within the church; though, for a long time after, only bishops, abbots, holy priests, and laics of the utmost sanctity were allowed to be buried in churches. By degrees, however, this salutary discipline was broken through, and persons of all ranks, without regard to spiritual qualifications, were admitted to be buried within the church; the only distinction required being that laymen should be placed with their feet towards the altar, while ecclesiastics should have their heads next it, as if fronting the people. Still the memory of the former discipline prevailed, so far as sometimes to induce great princes, through humility, and as an expression of penitence, to command that their bodies should be interred without the walls. An instance of this occurs in the history of Suger; for we read, that when he proposed to rebuild the Abbey church of St. Denis, the entrance was obstructed by a great massive porch which concealed the portal. This had been built by Charlemagne, from a pious motive. Pepin, his father, was buried under that spot, not laid on his back like other dead men, but prostrate, with his face against the ground, in order to denote, as he had said, that he wished to make amends for the excesses committed by his father, Charles Martel. Charlemagne, not enduring that his father should be buried without the church, had built this huge porch, that by this contrivance he might be within it. Suger, however, had the body removed to another place, and the porch destroyed."

* From these trees the "Palms" blessed and distributed by the church, on Palm-sunday, were taken.

At a later period it became the practice to bury distinguished personages under the very foundations of the walls of a church.

We shall now enter the church. It is a solemn scene, still and awful, yet not oppressive; we feel that a Holy Presence fills all around, and a bright light, flickering in a corona lucis, indicates the actual presence of the Most High, under the sacramental veil. We kneel in lowly reverence for a brief space and then rise doubly impressed with the sanctity of the tabernacle. Although it is little past mid-day, a dim, "religious light" pervades the consecrated pile—a few scattered worshippers kneel around; some at altars, others before niches filled with images of the blessed Virgin and other saints. The church consists of nave, and aisles, and chancel, of the best period of Gothic architecture. The south door, by which we entered, appears to be very much older than the remainder of the building—in fact it is a portion of the ancient and simple church, erected here many centuries previous, and which, with this exception, had been entirely removed to make way for the new structure. The nave is divided from the aisles by arches, supported on ranges of piers alternately circular and octagonal, with bases of elegantly-formed mouldings, and capitals of delicately-wrought curling foliage. The arches are deeply moulded, and over them are small quatrefoil and trefoil openings, forming clerestory windows. The aisle-walls are low, and pierced with windows of geometrical and flowing tracery at irregular intervals. There is a large door at the west end of the nave, opening in two folds or leaves, stoutly framed of oak, and ornamented with iron hinges, covering the surface and forming the most curious devices; the jambs are formed of deeply-sunk mouldings and columns, and the arch is elaborately moulded and decorated with wall-flower and other ornaments. At the east of the nave, a triumphal arch opens into the chancel, the very glory of the pile; eastward of the aisles, too, are chapels of our Ladye and St. John, and at the west end of the north aisle stands the massive bell-tower with its lofty broach spire, containing a peal of eight bells, each one of which bears the name of a saint and an appropriate legend. The east window of the chancel is a glorious object to behold; it is composed of seven days or lights separated by monials;* its head is formed of graceful flowing tracery, and the entire is filled with stained glass of the most exquisite design and execution. The central light contains three subjects, the lowermost, the crucifixion, within a circlet of ruby; over it a large vesica piscis,† containing, on a blue ground, a representation of our Saviour enthroned in great majesty; he holds a globe in one hand, the other is raised in benediction, his head is surrounded by a golden cruciform nimbus; over this is the ascension. The adjoining lights contain representations of several passages of our Lord's life, and the annunciation and assumption of the Blessed Virgin. The outermost lights contain the Apostles, St. Patrick, St. Augustin, St. Edmund, and other fathers, martyrs, and confessors. The other windows of the church are filled with pictures of saints and holy personages, the example of whose virtues, thus brought conspicuously before the faithful, might afford them inspiration and courage to follow in their steps. Some of those windows also serve as memorials of the departed, by the use of marginal legends, such as this: ✠ "Orate pro anima Henerici rector hujus ecclesiæ qui hanc fenestram fieri fecit."

The interior of the bold oaken roof is painted with a deep azure ground, spangled with stars; the mouldings are relieved with gold and vermillion; and the intersections of the timbers are adorned with gilded bosses of various designs, some the monogram of the holy name, others, crosses on shields, heraldic achievements, &c., fully emblazoned. In the west bay of the nave-roof, are several shields, or, bearing-crosses, gules, and shields, gules charged with crosses saltier and moline, argent. One large achievement, in the vertex, exhibits a full emblazonment, parted per pale, the dexter argent, a stag statant, proper, attired, or, sinister gules, on bend, argent, three trefoils, vert. In the south aisle-roof, are shields, gules with sword erect, in pale, argent, surmounted by two keys, and in the north aisle are shields argent, with talbot's head, tenné, seme of billets. The walls are decorated with subjects from scripture and local traditions done in fresco, and pious texts, so that no space is left unoccupied or uninteresting. In the chancel, the miracle of the loaves and the fishes, the last supper, and the text "Sanguis meus novi Testamenti pro multis effunditur in remissionem peccatorum;" in the chapel of our Lady, St. Anne teaching the Blessed Virgin, the annunciation, and the flight into Egypt, and the assumption, with the "magnificat" are represented. The nave is adorned with portraits of the early saints of the church, a goodly throng of bishops, priests, abbots, monks, nuns, and other holy personages, and with such texts as "Domine dilexi decorem domus tuæ." Over the chancel arch, on the west side, is a magnificent painting; it is the last judgment, or "doom." Enthroned in awful majesty, is the Saviour of the world, accompanied by our Lady and St. John the Baptist. It is a miracle of art;—observe the throng of all nations and peoples—on the right the just, on the left the unjust are arranged, each one bearing his badge, by which alone you distinguish his earthly rank; for emperors, kings, politicians, and heroes have here only precedence by their positions amongst the just or unjust—the sentence is passed—the doom is irrevocable. It is one of the last things to be remembered—lowly kneel, and meditate upon it.

You are near the great Rood, with its loft and screen, situated in the chancel arch and beneath the "doom." It is a magnificent work of the most perfect period of Christian art. That large central compartment of the screen, with doors opening inwards to the chancel, is called "the holy door;" there are four narrower compartments at each side, separated by slender monials. The lower part of these is formed of solid panelling; the upper part is overhung by a series of beautiful canopies, enriched with crockets, crops, and crisp foliage wonderfully undercut. The loft is an ample space, and supported by a wide-spreading canopy rising from the screen. The entire is painted and gilded in the most costly fashion. The monials are

* The ancient name for the mouldings dividing the days or lights of Gothic windows; they are now called mullions.

† A figure formed by the junction of two segmental curves at their points, often enclosing a representation of our Saviour or the blessed Virgin. It was also the shape of most ancient monastic seals, examples of which may be seen in the museum of the Royal Irish Academy. We are glad to perceive that the stamp on the school-books of the Christian Brothers, containing the arms and motto of the order, is in this ancient form. For its antiquity and the supposed derivation of its name, see Dr. Rock's Hierurgia.

enriched with small statues of saints ; the lower panels are filled with paintings of saints, done on gold diaper ground, in lively colours. Rising high above the loft is the great "rood," the chief object of veneration ; on the cross is the figure of our Redeemer—not represented as an agonizing sufferer or criminal, but with a countenance beaming with heavenly love—his arms outstretched as if embracing mankind, whom, by his sufferings, he has redeemed. At the extremities of the head, foot, and arms of the cross, are the evangelistic symbols, and on each side stand figures of the Blessed Virgin and the beloved disciple, St. John. Thus the worshipper has constantly before his eyes two of the greatest mysteries of religion, the atoning sacrifice of his Redeemer, and the final judgment at which he will have to render an account of the use or abuse he has made of that sacrifice ; and the nature of the veneration to be paid to the representation of so awful a subject is conveyed in the following lines :

"Effigiem Christi dum transis pronus honora
Sed non effigiem sed quem designat adora."

The floor contains its appropriate lore, and harmonizes with the general effect of this rich pile. It is entirely covered with small square encaustic tiles,* forming varieties of geometric and heraldic devices, some of which are similar to those on the bosses of the roof.

The font, near the west door, we shall not forget, with its symbolic representations of death and sin overpowered by the waters of the sacrament of regeneration, and its beauteous illustrations of the sacraments, its massive cover, surmounted by a golden pelican, and its curiously-wrought surrounding railing of bronze.

Let us now return to the rood-screen ; and having obtained permission to enter the chancel, let us reverentially examine its costly furniture. Ascending three steps, which mark the commencement of the sacrarium, we reach the altar, a slab of marble, marked with five crosses on its upper surface, and supported by four pillars ; beneath this slab, or "mensa altaris," in a costly "feretrum," or portable shrine, are the relics of martyrs, deposited here at the time of consecration. The front of the altar is furnished with an antependium of rich stuff, elegantly embroidered, enamelled, and set with precious stones ; in the centre is a pelican, within a vesica, and at the angles are the emblems of the evangelists. At the sides of the altar hang curtains of costly stuff, also embroidered, and, like the antependia, changed to suit the canonical colour of the day. On the altar reposes the missal, a manuscript richly illuminated in colours and gold, and massively bound with painted boards and golden clasps. The altar-cards are very small, unobtrusive charts, containing the "lavabo," beginning of St. John's Gospel, and parts of the canon of the Mass. No tabernacle occupies the centre of the altar, but a large and exquisitely-wrought cross, adorned with enamel and jewels ; at each side of this cross stand two massive candelabra of solid gold, elaborately chased. At the back of the altar, and under the great east window,

* These are small squares of baked earth, generally of a brown colour, and impressed with some pattern, generally of a yellow hue. They are about six inches square, and four of them usually form some complete device. There are many examples remaining in the south transept of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and Mr. Oldham has published a short account of Irish encaustic. They are very extensively manufactured and used in England at present, and form the most appropriate and beautiful covering for the floor of a church.

is a triptic,* containing an admirable copy of Hubert and John Van Eyck's picture of the adoration of the Lamb ; it is like all other triptics, composed of a central compartment and leaves or doors by which it may be closed in passion-tide ; it is also divided into lower and upper pictures. The lower picture represents the "Lamb who taketh away the sins of the world," standing upon a vested altar ; his blood flows from his breast into a chalice ; he is surrounded by kneeling angels bearing the cross in triumph, with censers in their hands, and saints robed in white, bearing palm branches in their hands. Beneath the Lamb is "the fountain of living waters," surrounded by apostles, martyrs, bishops, and priests "who came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb." On one of the leaves is a representation of St. Christopher, accompanied by groups of pilgrims ; and on the other, troops of mail-clad knights with banners and trophies. Over the Lamb is the Holy Spirit, under the semblance of a dove. In the centre of the superior part of the altarpiece is represented God the Father, enthroned as sovereign pontiff of the church ; he is robed in a rich cope with embroidered orphreys, and wears the tiara ; in his left hand he holds a sceptre, and his right hand is raised in benediction. On his right hand side, is seated the blessed Virgin, reading, richly attired and crowned ; on his left hand is represented St. John the Baptist, dressed in the skins of beasts, covered with a cope, with a book resting on his knees. On the folds are represented St. Cecilia, sitting at an organ, and accompanied by choiristers. On the ends of the folds Adam and Eve are represented, as symbols of the origin of sin ; and over them are depicted the sacrifice of Abel and his murder by Cain, to show the depravity of fallen man, and the necessity that existed for the sacrifice of the Lamb.

In the wall, on the Epistle side of the altar, you observe three arched recesses—these are the sedilia, in which the priests and deacons sit while the choir chants the "gloria," and other parts of the mass ; they are elaborately wrought in harmony with the remainder of the building. East of the sedilia is another and a smaller recess. It stands about three feet over the chancel floor : this is the piscina, it contains a credence shelf, and a ground drain.

But we are greatly digressing ; our object is to investigate the sepulchral monuments, and we have nearly scanned every part of the church ere we commence our task. Some other day, and, with the kind permission of the sacristan, we shall examine the treasures of his ambryes, with their splendid chalices, crosses, thuribles, pyxes, and tabernacles ; and of his strong, iron-bound cedar chest, with its chausables, copes, dalmatics, stoles, orphreys, and other priestly vestments.

Ere we leave the chancel, let us see this beautiful recess on the gospel side of the altar. It is the "Founder's tomb," and also serves as the "Easter sepulchre." We shall call it a "canopied tomb," to distinguish it from other recesses of a somewhat similar nature. It is about two feet high and eight feet long. The front consists of a series of beautiful canopied niches, or tabernacle work, filled with figures of the apostles. The "tabula," or upper slab, is of dark marble ; and upon it reposes the figure of the founder, clad in knightly armour, the hauberk covering the entire of the body, with coif de mailles for the head and chausses for the legs and feet, surmounted by a plain surcoat, with sleeves, fastened round the waist with a girdle. His hands are clasped, as if in hopeful prayer, on his breast; his sheathed sword lies by his side, typical of his having died in peace and not in the field of war; his legs are crossed, and his feet rest on a lion couchant. The following simple legend, in quaintly carved characters, on the margin of the "tabula," informs us not of his military prowess or his worldly distinction, but of the fact of his having been a benefactor to the church.

"✠ HIC JACET CHRISTOPHERUS DE BARNIVALLE, MILES, QUI HANC ECCLESIAM ÆDIFICARI FECIT. CUJUS ANIMÆ PROPICIETUR DEUS."—AMEN.

The canopy is richly cinquefoiled within crocketed resant arches; each cusp or point of the foliations is adorned with the figure of an angel, bearing shields, with the arms and quarterings of the deceased knight; panelled buttresses with pinnacles, finials, and tracery, flank the sides. In the spandrels between the arches and buttresses are shields emblazoned with the armorial achievements of De Barnivalle, parted per pale, baron and femme—first argent, five sheaves of wheat,* proper; second, parted per fess, in chief two dogs courant, in base one dog courant. The under groining of the canopy is painted deep azure, spangled with stars. The back is richly diapered with colours and gilding. On the wall at the head of the tomb, is a representation of the guardian angel with overspreading wings and long severe drapery, the hands outstretched, quite in the style of Giotto's school; and at the foot a portraiture of St. Christopher, the knight's patron saint, with an uprooted tree in his hand as a staff, and the infant Saviour on his shoulders. Both paintings are executed in the most brilliant colours and gilding.

Under a low arch in the south wall of the Lady chapel, is another enriched recess, within which is a low shelf or ledge of masonry, surmounted by a slab of marble, containing an inlaid floriated cross and calvary of brass enamelled. On one side of the stem is an incised chalice, showing that the individual commemorated was a priest, and around the margin is the following epitaph:

"✠ IN GRATIA ET MISERECORDIA JESU HIC REQUIESCIT CORPUS EUGENII, QUONDAM RECTOR HUIUS ECCLESIE: CUJUS ANIMÆ PROPICIETUR DEUS."—AMEN.

Around the walls of the aisles you will find many such memorials of the departed faithful, both laics and clerics; but on the floor there are several mementos worthy of your attention. One is a slab of grey marble, incised with a cross, and bearing no name, date, or other inscription, save

"✠ O CRUX SANCTA ADJUVANS NOS."

Another is a brass or latten† plate, containing incised figures of a knight and a lady; at the feet of the former lies a lion, the emblem of courage and generosity; at those of the latter a dog, the emblem of fidelity and affection. The costume of the female is that of the time in which she lived—a long robe covering the whole body, showing the tight sleeves of an under garment, and surmounted by a mantle; a wimple surrounds the neck and chin. The following epitaph is on the margin:

"✠ HIC JACENT JOHANNES DE BOTELERUS, ET BRIGIDA UXOR EJUS QUI QUIDEM JOHANNES OBIIT IN FESTO EPIPHANIE ANNO DNI, MCCCCLV: ET PREDICTA BRIGIDA OBIIT IN FESTO S. MI-

* In heraldic language, "garbes."

† The mixed metal of which these plates were made was called latten or laton.

CHÆLIS ARCHANGELI ANNO DNI MCCCCLVII. QUORUM AIAS ET OMNIUM FIDELIUM DEFUNCTORUM MISEREATUR DEUS."—AMEN.

Here again is another variety of memorial, commemorative of the "cementarius" or chief mason from whose "plats" and directions the church was erected. It is laid near the south porch door, and consists of a "floor cross" or slab, with cross and calvary in very low relief; the margin is inscribed with the following legend:

"✠ ORA PRO ANIMA JACOBI HUIUS ECCLESIE CEMENTARIUS."

To this text is added:

"DOMINE, SECUNDUM DELICTUM MEUM NOLI ME JUDICARE."

A little to the east of this you perceive a small brass commemorative of a priest—the figure is represented in the eucharistic vestments, holding a chalice in his hands; from his mouth proceeds the legend:

"SANGUIS CHRISTI SALVA ME."

Around the margin is written:

"✠ JOHANNES GOWANNUS, CLERICUS, CUJUS AIE PROPICIETUR DEUS.—AMEN. CREDO QUOD REDEMPTOR MEUS VIVIT."

This being the memorial of a clergyman, you observe its head is turned towards the east, while the memorials of the laity extend from west to east.

Near this priest's memorial is a large brass, measuring about six feet in length, and inscribed with a figure in the costume of the early part of the fourteenth century, a straight robe reaching to the feet, under a mantle buttoned on the right shoulder; on the girdle is hung a rosary; the beard is long and pointed, but the head is bald. The inscriptions in Lombardic character are in Latin and French. From the mouth of the figure proceeds the legend:

"VIXI, PECCAVI, PENITUI: DEPRECOR MAJESTATEM TUAM UT TU DELEAS INIQUITATEM MEAM."

And on the margin:

"✠ ICI GIST EDUARDE DE CUSACKE, LYMNERE DEKI ALME DIEU CIT MERCI.—AMEN."

This, probably, is the memorial of the artist whose works in fresco, on the walls of the church, we have so much admired.

Another very simple and affecting memorial is the sunken effigy in the floor of the north aisle, commemorative of a female. It is a thick slab of marble; a quatre-foil opening at the head reveals the face, bound with a wimple, and the upper part of the closed hands, as if the entire figure was enclosed and but partially revealed from the stone.

There are many monuments, brasses, and floor crosses yet to be seen, but their varieties are few and definite—I mean that they may be all classified under about six different heads; the differences of embellishment are more numerous, but one spirit, and a harmonious style, pervades all. You observed some canopied brasses in the nave, of various degrees of ornamental character and excellence.

The sun is now declining gloriously in the west; the evening shadows begin to fall fast and deepen within this consecrated pile. Pause awhile 'neath the arch of the west door—a solemn gloom involves the chancel, still every object is visible. The beams of the setting sun dart their bright radiance through the storied glass of the great western window, casting its various tints on pillar and pavement of nave and aisle. The villagers pass and repass as they enter to perform their evening devotions: "Te lucis ante terminum." All will soon be darkness, save where that solitary light burns brightly, on its "corona," before the altar of the Blessed Sacrament. Let us retire. The amiable old parish priest is a dear friend of mine—as you are a pilgrim I shall introduce you to him; he is ever hospitable to the stranger and wayfarer—I was such myself when I first made his acquaintance—and as we walk to his parsonage we may awaken some solemn and devout feelings, and profitable reflections from a day spent amongst ancient sepulchral monuments.

We have been indulging in reminiscences of things as they existed four centuries ago. But, alas, alas! times have wofully changed since then; and ruined chancels, desecrated altars, and shattered way-side crosses speak eloquently of the spirit which animated the centuries which have just elapsed, but whose evil reign is terminating we trust. “In the ages of faith,” says a vigorous writer, “men visited and knelt by tombs and graves; now they would shun them, and try and banish them from their sight as things odious and dreadful; and, in accordance with the spirit of the times, which strives to make churches like assembly rooms, gay and comfortable, with carriage drives and covered porticos to set down the company—the very remembrance of death is to be excluded, lest the visitors to these places might be shocked. Hence, burying the dead is become a marketable matter, a joint-stock concern, an outlay of unemployed capital; and a large pleasure ground, sufficiently distant from the town, is staked out by some speculators, in which, according to the prospectuses issued, every religion may have its separate parterre, with any class of temple from the synagogue to the meeting-house.”

A modern cemetery needs little further description; it is familiar to every one. There are few who have not visited Kensal-green, Prospect, or Mount Jerome; and, perhaps, some of our more fastidious readers have revelled in the luxuries of Pere la Chaise, its intricate and maze-like walks, its elegantly flowered parterres, its easy seats, and pagan associations. They are all of the same type. A vast area surrounded by high walls, a huge entrance gate, with comfortable lodges for mercenary porters and their wives and families, supply the place of the precinct or garth enclosed by a low embattled fence and lych gate, with the residence of the ostiarii and fossarii, lay brothers from an adjoining monastery or other establishment of ecclesiastical persons. The fine old church with its tower and spire is not to be found, but in its stead a Doric portico or Pagan temple neatly done in Roman cement, and opening to the east. There is a mortuary altar within, covered with plaster of Paris urns, and so situated, that when mass is celebrated at it, the priest faces the west. The grey stone cross, “rising high above the lowly graves, and protecting them with its arms,” and “beautiful to the eyes of him who loves to meditate amongst the tombs—beautiful in its moonlight loveliness, beautiful in its sunlit brightness as it peers through the foliage of the green trees,” is entirely abandoned. The simple oak crosses, the low head stones, and coped coffin stones pointed eastwards, are supplanted by forests of tall slabs of painted stone, with lengthy eulogistic inscriptions, enumerating the virtues, real and fictitious, of the departed, and couched in such phrases as “affectionate wife, beloved child, tender and attached husbands,” and so forth.

It not unfrequently happens that one headstone is the tribute of “love, affection,” and all that sort of thing, on the part of one “tender and devoted wife” or “husband” to two departed wives or husbands. The top of this memorial is adorned with sculpture in low relief, exhibiting an ill-conceived and worse executed monogram of the Holy name, inscribed by a series of spikes, flanked by angels’ heads, with expanded cheeks and wings. Sometimes a more extensive subject is essayed, like that which we saw some time ago in Prospect cemetery, representing the crucifixion with all the instruments of our Lord’s passion, accompanied by SS. Peter and Michael the archangel; the whole so repulsive and abominable in conception and execution that we are surprized the Cemetery Committee permitted its erection. Amongst these absurdities are mixed monumental piles of the strangest and most extravagant varieties. Here you will observe the ponderous slab supported on four or six enormous balustrades. Again, the debased copy of the Roman warrior Scipio’s tomb, covering the ashes of the great Irish orator, meets your eye. What association can there be between the two? and did it not strike the artist of this memorial, that the marble tomb under the sky of a sunny clime, could not be effectively worked in granite, and would be out of place in a northern climate? Here again you behold a left-handed imitation of a French general’s monument which graces Pere la Chaise. The square pedestal, with inverted torches, lyres, &c., and surmounted with an urn, is a favourite design. Pyramids, obelisks, broken columns, complete columns, and innumerable other trash of that kind, are fitting complements of those. But it would be impossible to go through a catalogue of the vagaries with which cemeteries and church-yards are deformed now-a-days.

Wherever you find monuments within churches, they are of the same character as those in the cemetery. There again you find the heathen symbols of annihilation, the cinerary urn, the inverted torch, and weeping figure, with pediments, pilasters, and all the details of pagan architecture, instead of the altar-tombs, with the effigy of the departed sleeping in peaceful hope, and enshrined within a goodly canopy with consoling portraiture of saints and angels. The prayerful appeal for the suffrages of the faithful, gives place to laudatory and often profane inscriptions.

It is time that these abominations should be abandoned. Happily a taste for ancient Catholic architecture is beginning to revive amongst us. Sepulchral monuments form conspicuous objects of artistic decoration in the material church, and their proprieties are involved considerably in one of the great dogmas of the church Catholic. They should, therefore, engage the attention of all who are in earnest about the restoration of ecclesiastical art and ancient customs; as well as of those whose office is to see that religion takes no detriment from the ignorance of the multitude, and that epitaphs and memorials contain nothing heretical or profane, or likely to bring the faith into contempt. The author of “Mores Catholicæ” says: “the Church, in several synods, proposed to restore the ancient discipline respecting sepulchres, and strong measures were enforced to correct the abuses which time and the pride of family had introduced. In the council of Rheims, in the year 1583, it was decreed that no tomb should be erected higher than the ground, and that no statues, or military standards, or trophies, should be placed upon them, and that the dead were only to be praised in becoming language. ‘Quæ ad pietatem et preces pro mortuis faciendas spectent potius, quam defunctorum, enarrandis laudibus insumantur.’ By the council of Tholouse, in the year 1590, no inscriptions or emblems were to be placed in the church but such as were approved of by the bishop or archdeacon. The occasion of these statutes was the pagan taste which had begun to affect even the ancient style of sepulchral architecture." We see from this high authority, that sepulchral monuments, like all other portions of the material church, are not matters to be directed by individual taste or fancy, or caprice, but that their character, their accessories, and the nature of their inscriptions, have long ago been decided by authority and ancient precedent. It is highly desirable that those ancient decrees were now enforced.

It will be seen, from what we have said of ancient Catholic monuments, that they may be classed under three heads for church-yard memorials. 1st, Oak head crosses. 2nd, Head stones, in the form of an heraldic cross. 3rd, Sculptured and coped coffin stones.

The varieties within the church are: 1st, Canopied tombs, bearing recumbent effigies or brasses. 2nd, Plain, low, sepulchral recesses, with or without effigies or brasses. 3rd, High tombs, often bearing brasses or effigies. 4th, Floor crosses and Lombardic slabs. 5th, Brasses with incased effigies or crosses. 6th, Slabs, showing part of the figure.*

It may be necessary to make a few observations, as to the different classes of persons for whom these may be respectively appropriate. The first of the church-

* We add the following note from Mr. Pugin's work on "the present state of Ecclesiastical architecture," by which it will be seen that revived Catholic monuments are much less expensive than those we have been in the habit of erecting.

"As it is very probable that many persons erect those pagan and Protestant-looking tablets and emblems to the memory of their departed friends, in consequence of their ignorance of ancient design, and inability to procure correct models, it may be useful to insert the following list of the various sorts of monuments anciently employed, and the average cost of executing them at the present time:—

A high tomb under a canopied arch, crocheted and pinnacled with effigy of deceased, vested, of natural size, angels or weepers, in niches, around the tomb, with scriptures, emblems, &c., from	£	£
	150	to 500
A high tomb, with the effigy natural size, with weepers or tracery in panels,	50	to 100
A plain arch in a chancel, with effigy, natural size.	30	to 100
Ditto, with a slab and monumental cross and inscription	25	to 50
A plain high tomb, with inscription round edge and monumental cross on top	20	to 30
A whole length brass under a canopy, with evangelistic symbols and inscriptions	100	to 200
Ditto without canopy, &c., &c.	50	—
A half brass, with inscriptions and evangelists	25	to 50
A ditto, small	10	to 20
A quarter size whole-length effigy and inscription	10	to 20
A chalice, with hand over in benediction; a very simple but ancient emblem of a priest's tomb	3	to 5
A brass, of a cross fleury, with inscription on stem, and effigy in centre	25	to 50
A stone slab, with cross fleury engraved in lines, and inscription, shields, &c.	10	to 15
A ditto, raised in Dos D'Ane and cross fleury carved in relief on it; these are well calculated for external monuments in church-yards	10	to 14
Stone crosses (heraldic), with inscriptions set up at the heads and feet of graves,	5	to 10
Plain Oak crosses, with painted inscriptions, for the same purpose	1	to 3

Of course the exact cost of all these different monuments will vary in proportion to quantity of detail and enrichment about them, and the materials in which they are executed; alabaster will be more costly than stone, and Purbeck marble than Yorkshire slabs, and so on; but the above list of monuments, which are strictly in accordance with Catholic traditions, has been drawn out to show that the pious memorials used by our forefathers may be revived at the present time by all classes."

yard memorials is very suitable where the person to be commemorated belongs to the humbler classes, or to the poor and humble in spirit; the other forms are appropriate for members of almost every class of society.

Before speaking of monuments within the church, we must observe, that sepulture there is not necessarily implied by the existence of the memorial. A monument, in its true use, is not intended to mark the precise place of sepulture, but to excite the devotion and prayers of the faithful for the person commemorated. Indeed it is desirable that sepulture within the walls of the church was entirely forbidden; but, for those who value privileged sepulture, a custom of the middle ages might be revived—we mean the formation of arched recesses in the foundations of walls of new churches. This was frequently done in the case of founders, whose tombs were erected immediately above their graves.

For founders of churches and great benefactors, bishops, and other ecclesiastical dignitaries, the canopied tomb or low-arched recess, with their recumbent effigies, seem the most appropriate. With respect to these effigies, "we may notice," says an eloquent writer, "this important peculiarity, that the figure is always represented lifeless, while the modern statuary aims at positions significant of energetic action, or at least of vitality. I would rather call the ancient figures dormant; for the clasped or raised hands imply only a torpid state of devotional repose, a transitional slumber, and never pourtray the relaxed, nerveless prostration of death. How perfectly this embodies the Catholic idea of departure in the Faith; how exquisitely symbolical is the dormant and prayerful attitude of Christian sleep!"

Priests, and other ecclesiastical persons, may be commemorated by brasses, either bearing an incised floriated cross with a chalice, or the effigy vested in alb and chausable, and holding a chalice in his hands. Brasses may be also used as memorials for the laity, and Mr. Pugin has shown, in his "Apology," that modern costume may be arranged to harmonize with the ancient drapery which so characterizes the old brasses.

Floor-crosses, Lombardic slabs, and sunken effigies, may be used in any case, and are very effective and appropriate. A beautiful example of an incised floor-cross remains in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, and is engraved in Brandon's Analysis of Gothic architecture; at the base is a calvary or three graduated steps, and the head and arms are beautifully floriated.

For distinguished members of the church, no more suitable memorial can be erected than a chantry chapel. This may be embellished with the utmost degree of magnificence. Several examples of this once general memorial yet exist, as that glorious fane at Westminster, where, as Lord Bacon says, "Henry VII. dwelleth more richly dead in the monument of his tomb, than he did alive in Richmond, or any of his palaces," and which yet, popularly, bears the name of him by whom and for whose sepulture it was erected, although dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.

This may be a proper place to express an opinion as to the most appropriate monument to the memory of O'CONNELL. A church has been already suggested, and, abstractedly, no more fitting memorial could be erected to the memory of him, who was mainly instrumental in raising Catholicity to its present position in this country; it might, moreover, be made the opening of a bright day for Christian art in Ireland; but the idea of entirely devoting a church to this purpose is quite untenable—every church being dedicated to God, under the invocation of one of His saints. Wherever the remains of O'CONNELL finally repose, the metropolis of Ireland, without question, is the proper place for his monument; and there, many a parochial and conventual church is wanted. If the funds, raised for the O'CONNELL testimonial, be artistically managed, a beautiful church, complete in all its embellishments, could be erected; to it might, and ought to be added a chantry chapel, and endowments made for one or more priests, whose duty it would be to offer the Holy Sacrifice, daily, for the repose of the soul of the great benefactor of the Irish Church. This chantry would of course bear the name of O'CONNELL, while the church would bear that of its patron saint; but the entire would, by association of ideas, form the great memorial of the Liberator of Catholic Ireland. Thus the monument would be made useful in the highest sense, by supplying a spiritual want of the people, and by giving an impulse to Christian art; it would be in strict accordance with the spirit of Catholicity and the example of ancient times, and would be altogether, we are convinced, the tribute of respect most appropriate, and upon which, we believe, the spirit of him whom it would be intended to honour, would look most approvingly.

The Brothers.

A LEGEND OF MOUNT MELLERAY.

THERE is a lone chapel all tranquil and blest,
And stately the sentinels guarding its rest,
For no city beholds it, no village is nigh,
But it springs from the mountain right under the sky;
With the free winds around it—its foot on the sod,
And its face looking up to "the blue eye of God;"
With its banner of piety sweetly unfurled,
And hid, like a nun, from the gaze of the world.
Oh! once on the Sabbath day lingering there,
I heard the low vesper-bell calling to prayer,
And bowed down adoring, when grandly the sound
From the mellow-toned organ came winding around,
While a peace and a rapture I could not control,
Like a breathing from Heaven, came into my soul,
And I thought if God called me to dwell with him there
How gladly I'd serve him in labour and prayer.
Now the vespers are sung and the feeling is o'er,
And mine eyes may behold the lone chapel no more;
But I love to remember the smile on its face—
Like the blessing of God on that desolate place—
To hush my wild heart with the memories dear
That twine round the vesper-bell tinkling and clear,
And though far from the mountain-church still would I glean
And sing every legend that's linked with the scene.

The setting sun fell grand and fair
Upon the mountain's breast,
When full of labour, peace, and pray'r,
The monks lay down to rest,
Short hours of slumber soon to cease,
But felt and prized the more,
For shadowing forth the Heavenly peace
When all life's toils are o'er.

And calmly fell the winter ray
Upon their foreheads bare,
And calm the sainted brethren lay,
As if they slept in prayer;
Or if a smile unconscious stole
Upon some sleeping face,
Twas dream of Heaven that sought a soul
So full of bliss and grace.

Yet one with brow contract and stern
Seems wrung by sudden pain:
Perchance his thoughts have yet to learn
The peace that shuns the vain—
Perchance the countless links that bind
Each human heart below,
For mastery o'er the sleeper's mind
Are striving wildly now!

God comfort him if he have come
To that lone mountain's breast
And found within his convent home
But sickness and unrest!
God aid him if he turn away
With many a vain regret,
And shrink from every weary day
That must await him yet!

But God's good angels hovering there
Could tell another tale,
Of what has knit that forehead bare
And worn that cheek so pale.
Oh! he may toil like fettered slave,
And pray with seraph fire—
One sinner's soul he cannot save
From God's avenging ire!

He had a brother, in his youth,
Dearer than aught but Heaven,
And still against God's light and truth
That brother's soul had striven,
Till he had left him drunk with wrong,
When, to that mount ascending,
He knelt, amid the cowl'd throng,
In prayers for the offending.
God! how he fixed his eyes above,
When—hands clasped in each other—
With the strong voice of human love,
He pleaded for that brother,
And every hour with fervour new,
For his whole soul was in it,
He prayed for him with love as true
As in that tearful minute.
Oh! Thou who wept beside the grave
Where Lazarus lay sleeping—
So slow to smite, so swift to save—
Take pity on his weeping:
If ever one heart's prayer could win
Thy mercy for another,
Look down on his, so dark within,
And spare his erring brother!
Oh! how his sad life wore away
In toil, and prayer, and sorrow,
And still, the grief of every day
Was fresh upon the morrow.
And still, his wak'ing sighs were shed
In painful dreams, whenever
He sunk upon that weary bed
Where his heart rested never!

The mild rays of the autumn moon
 Fell on the mountain's breast—
 A brother's soul will pass full soon
 To its eternal rest.

The holy hymns are chanted there,
 The holy lustre shed—
 The abbot kneels, in grateful prayer,
 Beside the dying bed.

"My Father, one distracting thought
 Haunts me with vain regret;
 Another's grace from Heaven I sought,
 And have not found it yet:
 I had a brother, young and dear,
 But guilty-proud away—
 Pray God would guide his footsteps here,
 Before his dying day.

My Father! with a ceaseless prayer—
 A vigil never done—
 One human soul was worth the care
 Of God's Eternal Son!

Dark was my life with ceaseless thought,
 Though I in Heaven might dwell,
 How black the cup, with anguish fraught,
 Which he must drain in Hell!

But now I look to Heaven above,
 And half forget my cares,
 Commending him to God's sweet love,
 And your most holy prayers."

* * * * *

"Lift up thine eyes," the abbot said—
 He gazed enraptured there,
 For, even beside his dying bed,
 That lost one bent in prayer!

No clasping now of kindred hand—
 No close and dear embrace—
 Enough to see the pardoned stand
 In God's redeeming grace.

What now the thrilling pain and fear—
 The vigil long and dim?
 Oh! how he blesses every tear
 That he has wept for him!

* * * * *

Yes, o'er that brother he had sighed,
 With sighs that would not cease,
 While he was kneeling by his side
 In piety and peace.

ECCLESIASTICAL ANTIQUITIES OF DOWN, CONNOR, AND DROMORE, CONSISTING OF A TAXATION OF THESE DIOCESES, COMPILED IN THE YEAR MCCCVI., WITH NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS. By the Rev. W. REEVES, M. B., M. R. S. A., perpetual curate of Kilconriola, in the diocese of Connor. Dublin: Hodges and Smith.

THERE is no one conversant with the history of Irish literature in the seventeenth century, who does not look back with pride on the array of talent and erudition which this country exhibited at that period, notwithstanding war, persecution, and outlawry. The secular priest, the cowed friar, and studious layman then toiled with an intensity which resulted in the production of these splendid works now so anxiously sought after as models of classic elegance, and grand repositories of great actions, and illustrious memories. The men who laboured with such earnest love seem to have anticipated a time when their works would be absolutely necessary as records of a race scattered to the four winds, and doomed to hopeless destruction. The patrimonial inheritances of chieftains and tribes, wrested from their rightful owners, were fast passing into the gripe of Scotch and English undertakers, who could have no sympathies in common with those they dispossessed. The ancient religion of the land was to make way for a new creed, and as its apostles had vowed to maintain it with fire and sword, every vestige of Catholicism was to be uprooted from the soil, all efforts failing to dislodge it from the hearts and souls of those whose fathers cherished and treasured it as their proudest heirloom. To make conquest complete in all its details, it has ever been the policy of invaders to exterminate the conquered, and tear to pieces every record of the races over whom the fortunes of war have given them unbridled power. This policy was older than the days of Machiavelli, nor has it seen its finale in our own times. Ireland ever since the Reformation, and particularly in the seventeenth century, has been made the battle-ground whereon Saxon swordsmen, and Saxon legists have tested this policy, and all but succeeded in carrying out. An undying love of nationality, a devoted attachment to the old faith, and the special charge which divine Providence has had of this country seem to have averted our utter destruction, and reserved us for higher destinies. But the craft and policy employed by England in the days of our weakness have since furnished lessons for despotism, wheresoever man is cursed by its withering influence. The old instruments of coercion have passed into other hands—the Russian autocrat rekindling the fires of persecution in unhappy Poland, has availed himself of all the star-chamber policy of Elizabeth and King James. The religion of the people furnishing a pretext for spoliation and massacre—the churches with their revenues, and the monasteries with their termons, have been transferred to savage clans who, countenanced by the apathy and unchivalrous bearing of European potentates, now hold and enjoy the titles, lands, and shrines of a people who once saved the western world from impending ruin. If Poland had not great historic memories—if her priests, heroes, and law-givers had not left deathless records, happily rescued from destruction, in vain would we now look over the map of Europe for such a nation; if she had not the light of her history irradiating the past, and still shining into the souls of her dispersed children, what would now remain to stir their hearts, or nerve their arms to strike once more for their faith and fatherland?

But barbaric hordes, thank heaven! have not been able to sweep away the memories of a people. Phlegmatic Germanism, and French ingratitude may for awhile retard the emancipation of a prostrate race, but there still live within their bosoms, remembrances which no tyranny can blot out—hopes fed and sustained by God himself, which, in fitting season, must teach the descendants of Europe's saviours that theirs is a higher and holier destiny than to toil and moil as serfs for Tartars and Calmucks.

And, as with Poland to-day, so fared it with Ireland in the seventeenth century. 'Twas the great crisis of her destiny, and the remnant of the Celtic tribes, with their priests, bishops, and swordsmen, prepared them for the worst. They struggled gallantly, if not wisely. They taught the thieving Scot, and burghers of Clan London that they should have no easy conquest; and in many a red field, from Kinsale to Aughrim, gave proofs of undaunted, but unavailing heroism. If they fell beneath the strong hand of tyranny and injustice, they still maintained a claim to European respect and veneration. The battle they waged was for their faith and independence. 'Twas for those grand objects that the Desmond had risen in the South, and O'Neill in the North; nor did the admiration of the Catholic world for their devotedness grow mute on the Janiculum, when the latter was laid in a foreign grave. But it was not the chivalry of O'Neill, nor was it the Italian devotion of the Geraldines which entitled them to this respect—for their religion, and attachment to it, they deserved the title of martyrs. The history of English savagery and persecution reveals facts which challenge competition with the most fiendish barbarities of Nero or Domitian; nor will you find in the Martyrologies of Rome patience and fidelity surpassing that of Diarmid O'Hurley; nor brutality more revolting than that of the primate and chancellor, Adam Loftus. In the person of the Irish people, Christ was mocked, scourged, crowned with thorns, and crucified. The whole land was converted into a wide Aeldema; nor did Pilate and Herod lack representatives, if we look to the days of Parsons, and Borlace. They differed upon many points, but in hatred to the Catholic people they were sworn friends, and when the body of the faithful was broken, and blood-clotted, they sat down at the foot of the gibbet, and gambled for the vestment. Even so, the people did nothing more than their duty. Struggling against the robber, the incendiary, and heresiarch, they achieved no right to praise which would not be accorded to any other people. Resolved on maintaining their faith and possessions, the abandonment of such a principle would have sunk them in the esteem of mankind, and would now bring a blush to our cheeks. But, as we have said, they had still higher claims on the respect and gratitude of Europe.

In the ages of faith, the clergy of Ireland carried the light of religion and literature into the black forests of Germany, and the wild passes of the Alps. When ignorance and vandalism prevailed even north of the Humber, Ireland kept alight the lamp of religion and science. Her schools were the resort of students from the shores of the Danube and Euxine, and her priests had won titles of distinction in the knowledge-halls of Christendom. None of all the crowned monarchs who have ruled this world did greater service to religion and arts than Charlemagne, and his counsellor and bosom friend was an Irish teacher. To the genius of Alcuin may be attributed the foundation of the first University, the fame of whose scholastic philosophy has not died away. Soon after, when Alfred sought to diffuse learning amongst his people, he eagerly availed himself of the aid and guidance of an Irishman, and the elevation of Oxford to the dignity and dimensions of a University is mainly attributable to the genius of Erigena. Proud memories these—honourable to the old land, and well worthy the respectful imitation of us even in the nineteenth century. 'Tis perhaps a national vanity which leads us to attribute whatever kindness we have received at the hands of foreign nations to the fame and bravery of our countrymen, so distinguished at Viterbo, Campo Santo, and in many other battle-fields. But we regard it otherwise. The gratitude of a people is more lastingly secured by services fraught with more serious results than a victory won by blood. The remembrance of religious and literary enlightenment is treasured by a people when dynasties are dead and buried—a revolution may destroy the one, but the other defies all influences and accidents of time. Long before the name of an Irish soldier was respected on the Continent, the Irish priesthood had secured their country a high place in the esteem of mankind. From lone Iona to the gorges of the Appenines—from the vineyards of Fiesole to the icy shores of Scandinavia our missionaries won honour for the land and the schools that sent them forth; and 'tis to their high merits we must ascribe the respect and sympathy which it has been our good fortune to experience in the days of our bondage and weakness. 'Tis universally acknowledged that the Irish priesthood cultivated letters with éclat and assiduity in the ages of faith; nor need we adduce proofs where such are not wanting. The taste for literature, sacred and profane, did not cease to be cherished when imperial enactments came in rapid succession, from the English parliament, to retard the march of mind and brutalize the people. In spite of Elizabeth and James the First, schools flourished in Ireland, and, notwithstanding all the restraints created by a narrow-minded policy, we can now point to men who, educated in these seminaries, have since acquired a European celebrity. Wadding and Harold are in themselves a host. In the year 1608, Galway gave education to 1200 scholars.* That great seminary inflicted a shock on the nerves of Primate Usher, as great as if he had met the Pope with the college of Cardinals in the metropolis of Connaught. Out of that school, in the most disastrous times, came many men of the most profound erudition, the greatest of whom was Lynch, the author of Cambrensis eversus.† In conclave with the principal of that school, M'Firbis stored up much of that great historical and genealogical learning without which Sir James Ware would not have been able to work so successfully. In the cloisters of our monasteries, too, though the din of war fell upon their ears, our friars were not unmindful of literature. The O'Clerys gave whatever time they could snatch from the duties of the choir to the compilation of their annals. When their sojourn in Donegal abbey was rendered hazardous by the marauders of the pale, they betook them to another quarter, and found a scriptorium in the silence and solitude of Kilbarron. They laboured like men who thought that the old Celtic race was about to be exterminated, and would fain leave behind the record of their civilization and nationhood. At length, when the strong arm triumphed—when the monastic abodes were laid desolate, and the Irish priesthood sought a refugium in distant lands they did not cease to toil and labour. Hugh Ward commenced, and laid the foundation, of one of the greatest works on hagiology which this or any other country possesses; when he died, Colgan took up the materials collected and reduced them to form, earning for himself the title of the Irish Bollandus. Amid the disasters succeeding the short lived era of the Catholic league, 'tis marvellous to look into all that the Irish priests accomplished in literature. Had we nothing to refer to but Walsh's History of the Remonstrance, or Callaghan's Vindicie Catholicorum Hibernia, we might be justly proud of the scholars furnished by the clergy. Some of their books were meant to be read not only in Ireland but at Rome, as they had to deal with Italian as well as Irish politics, and the elegance of the latin in which they were written must even now excite the admiration of every scholar. Ward, Hickey, and O'Clery, left a void which we regret to say has not been filled up, and we would anxiously impress on the brotherhood of St. Francis's order, the necessity of editing some of the works which Colgan and his predecessor have left unpublished. Time and opportunity cannot be wanting, and if the Irish friars of St. Isidore's only knew with what anxiety the educated classes, in Ireland, look to them for the translation and publication of the works lying in their archives, they would not fail to emulate the industry and abilities of their predecessors. Beyond all doubt, the nineteenth century is more favourable to literary pursuits than was the stormy era of the seventeenth, with its pillagings and burnings; nor need we fear that the men who boast of Wadding, will undervalue the claim which the Irish people has on their literary as well as priestly ministration.

The man who, next to Colgan, did eminent service to his order and country was a Dominican friar, subsequently Bishop of Ossory. In a thatched cottage, in the poorest region of Kilkenny city, this learned man sat down with all the earnestness of fond enthusiasm, and compiled that great repertory of information—The Hibernia Dominicana.

In the year 1723, the illustrious author of this grand work proceeded to Rome, where he soon distinguished himself in the College of S. Sixtus. His early proficiency won him the admiration of Benedict XIII., who saw that the seeds of literature broadcast in the Dominican seminary, had taken deep root in the young novice's soul. In 1759, the humble friar was promoted to the episcopal dignity; and, as if jealous of his order's old renown, laboured with incessant toil to produce his great work.* Tradition tells how he travelled on foot to visit many of the remarkable remains which, even now, attest how grand were the Dominican foundations in this country before the spoliation of the monasteries. It is related, that he used to put on the garb of a sailor, in order to screen himself from injury and insult, at a time when every underhead squireen was privileged to trample on "a mere papist." The thatched house, with its little parlour, and sculptured mitre, emblematic of the dignity which borrowed a reflected splendour from its illustrious wearer, is worthy a pilgrimage to Kilkenny; and we will never forget the fond prayers uttered in that humble abode by some enthusiastic young Irish laymen, for the repose of him who did such lasting service to his religion and country. Since the days of De Burgo we have had only one priest eminently distinguished in Irish historical literature, and we may well boast of the research and high attainments of Dr. Lanigan. Had J. B. Clinch given more time to archaeological pursuits, or if he had adopted the clerical profession instead of the legal, we might now possess some additions. O'Conor, too, was well calculated to do his religion and history eminent services, if the genius of Columbanus had not been sacrificed to vapid controversies. They were all educated at Rome, and two of them, at least, did honour to the Irish College.†

However painful must be the admission, we cannot now disguise the truth that none of the Irish clergy has arisen to prosecute the study of Irish literature, successfully continued, or we should rather say, revived by Lanigan.‡ Looking across the channel, we have reason to be jealous of Milner, Wiseman, Lingard, and Tierney. Each and all of them have done much for the antiquities and history of their native land—what may we expect when the learned converts return from beyond the Alps, and give English Catholicism the benefit of their acquirements? This, in our judgments, should act as a stimulus to the Irish Catholic priesthood, and fix their attention. The secular clergy it is true have incessant duties to perform, but

* De Burgo was appointed, in a provincial chapter, Historiographer of the Dominican order, A. D. 1753. We know not whether the chapters make such appointment now.

† We deem it almost superfluous to remind the reader of Abbé M'Geoghegan's "History of Ireland," written for the Irishmen serving in the Brigade. 'Tis more to our purpose to mention another illustrious name, less familiar to the generality of readers. We do so for the purpose of showing one of the many obligations we owe to Rome. O'Molloy, a Franciscan friar of St. Isidore's, published his "Theologia Sacra" in 1666, and ten years afterwards brought out the "Lucerna Iohannina," a book of devotion, in the Irish language, with a Latin title. The same year he published a grammar of the Irish tongue, "Grammatica Latino-Hibernica." This he dedicated to Cardinal Camilli, telling him that the Irish language was proscribed by the English government, which occasioned the loss and neglect of domestic records, and endangered the existence of the language itself. (Anth. Hib., vol. iv. p. 314.) The Roman Government ordered type to be prepared for these works, and an Irish friar, at a distance from Ireland, laboured to keep alive the language of his fathers. What a grateful reminiscence!

‡ Of course we do not forget the labours of Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Madras, who has made an abridgment of Lanigan. The late Rev. Mr. Brennan, O. S. F., has given us two volumes of Irish ecclesiastical history. But these works fall immeasurably short of what they ought to be. We are aware that many of the Catholic priesthood have given time and talent to collecting valuable materials for church history, and in honest candour we do not fear to chide them for not publishing. Out of many; we may name Rev. J. T. Mullock of Dublin, and Rev. Mr. Russell of Cork, who have made this subject their study, both at home and abroad. In fact, the Catholic priesthood has, in our own time, given many most valuable writers to periodical literature, and we feel justified in blaming them for not giving us the result of their labours in the other departments. No men are better educated or more passionately fond of literary pursuits than the young and over-worked curates of this country.

* "O'Flaherty's West Connaught," by Hardiman, p. 420, et seq.

† We are rejoiced to learn that a translation of this most valuable and rare work, with copious notes, from the pen of a learned professor in Maynooth, will be shortly presented to the public.

the regulars are exempt from most of these painful occupations. With the exception of wearing the habits of their respective orders, there is not a single duty of their calling which they may not discharge as uninterruptedly in Ireland as in the city of Rome. They are, no doubt, seriously interested for the progress and advancement of religion; and, having abundance of time, we flatter ourselves that they will not rest content with the fame, and high repute of their predecessors but rather strive to emulate them. Since the days of the confederation, when in 1646 the supreme council ordered Father Stephen White's book, De Sanctis, et Antiquitate Ibernæ, to be printed, not one of our Jesuits has acquired fame beyond that of a pulpit orator. Usher, with all his bigotry, said of White that "he was a man of exquisite knowledge in the antiquities not only of Ireland but also of other nations."—Primord. p. 400. Though this eulogy may be applicable to many Irish members of the Society now living, we lack the works which would deserve it. Not so, however, can we speak of the Italian Jesuits; they are above all praise. Marchi, and our old grammar master De Vico, not to speak of Perrone, are names familiar to all—Ireland too had just reason to be proud of Arsdekin, who distinguished himself as a theological writer and illustrator of St. Patrick's labours. The religious orders have it in their power to raise the character of their country, making literature and science ancillary to religion. In the olden time they were the constituted guardians of the learning and enlightenment of the world, and every library gives evidence of their zeal and industry. Our Most Holy Father, in his late encyclical to the superiors of the religious bodies, touchingly alludes to this fact when exhorting them "to labour that their orders may resume their ancient dignity and the glory of their original splendour." This, says Pio Nono, is to be done by "cultivating, defending, and snatching from ruin letters, sciences, and arts," and "thus," continues our Holy Father, "you are to use all your efforts that your subjects apply themselves with perseverance to the belles lettres, since the principal and most brilliant glory of the religious orders has always been the study and the assiduous cultivation of letters, the composition of so many learned and laborious works."* With the most profound respect we would, therefore, conjure the religious bodies to walk in the footsteps of their predecessors and turn their regards to the literature of their country. They need no example to urge them on in this glorious pursuit, and they are not, as were their brethren in days gone by, hunted down like wolves, but in a position to work as peaceably as though they dwelt in the Roman College St. Isidore's, or the Minerva. Toiling thus, they will preserve, undimmed, "the light trailing down," and give us reason to love them as we now cherish and revere the memories of Wadding, White, and Dominic O'Daly. Above all, they will not leave the work of CATHOLIC CLERICS to be accomplished by Protestant divines. Heaven help us in the nineteenth century if we could not boast a few Catholic laymen like Hardiman, O'Donovan, and Eugene Curry, to whom we owe a large debt of gratitude; for, in the department of archæology, we have not competed with Protestant writers.

Any body reflecting on the vast quantity of polemical works with which this country teems, need scarcely desire that another volume be added to that collection, save when some new heresy puts forth its arms to do battle with the church. 'Tis plain to our comprehension that the Italian, French, and English controversialists of the eighteenth century have left us theological weapons wherewith to guard and defend the doctrines of our holy church against all assaults—be they feeble as in the flimsy novel, or backed by the perverted ingenuity of abler writers. The works of the fathers, with their profound erudition and lucid development of the faith delivered to the custody of Peter's successors by our Lord Christ, need not be called into our service when the church, confronting sectarianism and false teachings, stands out in battle order with the "vexilla Regis" in her van. No power of despotism—no serried array of brute force, with its flashing artillery of might or mind, can weaken or overwhelm the invulnerable phalanx that guards the frontiers of the church when the genius of Augustin is evoked, or the pealing voice of Chrysostom, stirring the hearts of her children, bids them forth to fight her fight, and make her terrible as an encampment.

'Tis time, then, that we bestir us in the prosecution of studies that have been neglected, and are still so important to the progress of religion. The Irish Catholic priesthood have been hitherto, necessarily, mixed up in political and polemical quarrels for the vindication of their rights as citizens, and the protection of the altars which they have so faithfully served. One or other of these causes, or both combined, must account for their non-appearance amongst those who have given time and talent to the investigation of ecclesiastical antiquities—the very mention of which should be dear to a Catholic. There is no branch of study more enthusiastically cherished by the authorities at Rome. Aringhi spent his life burrowing in the catacombs, and consigning to paper the results of his mole-like existence. Marchi, a Jesuit, has followed his example, and consecrates his whole life to the disinterment of the Christian fossils which escaped the observation of his predecessor. Piranesi and Pistolesi have done for Rome, above the surface, what the two former have been effecting in latebris terre. Guibert and Cochet,* two learned French priests of our own times, have rendered their religion great services by their close attention to the study of Christian art and ecclesiastical monuments. In Belgium and Germany the Catholic clergy do not lag behind their neighbours, nor shall the Irish, if words of ours can cheer them on. When we consider the immense amount of talent that exists amongst our reverend confreres—their identity with the people—their knowledge of the legends and traditions of the classes amongst whom they live—we cannot but anticipate most favourable results, if they turn their attention to the study of Irish antiquities. The impulse ought to come from Maynooth. At no former period could that great establishment boast more truly learned men than its present corps of professors, many of whom have given brilliant proofs of their abilities in our periodic literature. If our honest suggestion could be adopted, we would advise the immediate formation of a museum (what great ecclesiastical college should be without one?), and that the professors would communicate with the clergy throughout the land, begging them to collect whatever remnants of Celtic or Anglo-Norman Catholicity have escaped the hands of English purchasers. Monumental inscriptions might be found in the various churchyards, and the priest of the locality need only be asked to transcribe them. Manuscripts and reliquaries might be thus rescued from destruction and profanation, and preserved in our national college. Every priest throughout the land would gladly co-operate in such dignified work as this, and we need not say how greatly their conjoint efforts would tend to strengthen and beautify our faith. Once some regular organization is set on foot, we may be likely to obtain valuable records from Italy and other Catholic countries. Spain, France, and Belgium would not refuse us the valuable parchments which have been there preserved, and a proper application to our Holy Father would enable the Irish friars of St. Isidore's to publish what they preserve as dumb curiosities; or, in case this was not feasible, we do not see why the whole body of the Irish priesthood would not collect a sum sufficient to defray the expenses of some learned scribe to make copies of them. A proceeding like this would insure beneficial results, and stimulate Catholic Clerics to do that work which by right is theirs.

An anxiety for this consummation has made us prolix, and we now turn to Rev. Mr. Reeves' splendid volume.

Living in the very centre of a population, the descendants of the men who swelled the ranks of Munro and orange William's armies, the Rev. Mr. Reeves has doubtless many serious and laborious duties to perform, ministering to the spiritual wants of his flock. From these cares, he has contrived to snatch sufficient time to compile a mass of information on purely Irish history, local, traditional, and antiquarian. This research has, necessarily, obliged the learned gentleman to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the early ecclesiastical and civil records of that portion of Ulster in which are situate the dioceses of Down, Connor, and Dromore. 'Tis to us inexplicable, with what zeal such distinguished Protestants as Usher and Ware have prosecuted the study of Irish antiquities—nor can we cease to admire that persevering industry with which Mr. Reeves has applied himself to the same task. To our judgment, Mr. Reeves has had greater difficulties to overcome than any of his predecessors in the field of Irish history. A few fragments of a taxation-roll, as old as the days of Pope Nicholas IV., or as Mr. Hunter, keeper of the records at Carleton Ride, would have it, of the time when Clement V. swayed Christendom (A. D. 1306), furnish the meagre text upon which the reverend gentleman has accumulated such an immense body of information.

There is something of perplexity regarding the precise date of the taxation, for the author leads us to believe that it was imposed during the pontificate of Pope Nicholas IV. (A. D. 1291), and subsequently, bowing to the authority of Mr. Hunter, makes it some years later, under the pontificate of Pope Clement V. After all, this is a matter of little importance, since we may ascribe its real date to one or other of the two pontificates. Pope Nicholas IV. laboured with might and main to recruit the armies of the crusaders, and when he found that the Saracens were likely to drive

* L'Abbé Cochet has written, amongst other works, a most charming volume on the churches in the department of Dieppe. Speaking of the church of Saint Remy, this learned ecclesiastic thus expresses his love of such priestly pursuits: "J'avais attaché mon cœur aux murailles mêmes de l'édifice; j'aimais ses grands arceaux et ses hautes colonnes. J'étudiais avec tant de plaisir les sculptures de la renaissance et les archives de la fabrique! les unes après les autres, j'ai déroulé toutes les pages de son histoire, et je me proposais de l'écrire."

the Giaours of the middle ages out of Palestine (they lost Tripoli A.D. 1289), determined to appeal to the generosity and chivalry of Christendom. Muratori (annal d' Italia), speaking of Pope Nicholas's anxiety for the fate of the Holy Land, says: "Non ommise il Pontefice Niccolò diligenza veruna per soccorrere quei Cristiani, con far predicare la crociata non solamente per tutta l'Italia, ma anche per tutti i regni Cristiani, e intinar decime per quella sacra spedizione." Without entering, however, into the controversy we incline to believe that Mr. Hunter has led Mr. Reeves into an error, for if we may attach credit to Muratori's account of Pope Clement's taxation, we have no reason to believe that it extended to Ireland. Pope Clement, 'tis true, exhorted the Genoese and Venetians to contribute to the support of the crusades; but the monies so levied, far from being expended in equipping fleets or armies for Palestine, were pocketed by the kings of France and Naples. In fact the only good resulting from a four year's war was, the capture of Rhodes by the knights of Malta; and, according to Muratori, Pope Clement had little concern for the conquest of the Holy Land, as the very name of crusade was nothing better than a specious pretext for raising money. We have no sufficient reason then to believe that the taxation in question was imposed in the time of Pope Clement, as Muratori regards the latter as a fraud, and does not make mention of any portion of the church protesting against it save the French. In his own blunt style, the Italian annalist, speaking of Clement's taxation, treats us to this quaint narration: "Ma pelando con tal pretesto il Papa e i Cardinali le Chiese di Francia, si gialiardi furono i lamenti di quel clero, che lo stesso Re s'interpose per metter freno agli abusi." From which we infer that the taxation-roll, which forms the foundation of Mr. Reeves' work, belongs to Pope Nicholas, whom all annalists describe as in right earnest about the holy war, and doing the very opposite of fleeing (pelando) a portion of Christendom, as did his successor, Clement V. To corroborate this view of the matter, we have still extant the letters of Pope Nicholas to the Bishop of Meath, and the Dean of Dublin, appointing them collectors of a tax of one-tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues for six years, "in subventionem terræ sanctæ."

Having disposed of this part of the subject, we deem it well to make the reader acquainted with the esoteric and undated manuscript, which we believe to have been written about 1291. 'Tis a bare catalogue of the various churches, having opposite to them their annual revenues, and then the tax payable out of the yearly income, as thus:

"(Dunen's Dyoces.)

Capella de Burestona	xviii. s. liii. d. decia xxi. d.
Capella de Balliboran, abbot gge,	xvi. s. decia xix. d.
Eccia de Kirkeleth	xii. m. r. decia xvi. s.
Eccia de Rathcolpe	liii. m. r. decia v. s. liii. d.
Eccia Cnokengarre	xii. m. r. decia liii. s. viii."

This specimen of the taxation of Down will give the reader a fair idea of the difficulties with which Mr. Reeves had to contend. The catalogue furnished him with nothing more than the names of the churches and the sums to be paid by them. Without any clue to the history of these churches save local tradition (in many instances fast dying out), or the information derived from the diocesan archives, and ancient annalists, the learned author sets out to investigate the actual state of the ruins, if such exist, and appends, by way of note, as much of the history of these venerable foundations as he has been able to bring to light. Let us take for example the church of Kirkeleth, above mentioned, to give an idea of Mr. Reeves' erudition.

"Kirkeleth, now Killeief parish. By the country people it is generally called Killeeth. Colgan reckons this church to be one of those founded by St. Patrick, and, on the authority of the Sanctilogium Genealogicum, represents Eugenius and Niellus as its first ministers. In the annals of Tigernach, at the year 1008, and of the Four Masters, 1001, it is called Cille-Cleith, and in 1034 was annexed to the see-lands of Down. About the year 1171, John de Courcy confirmed the possession of Killeeth to the bishop. About the year 1183 Bishop Malachi granted the church to the abbey of St. Patrick. The name Killethe signifies 'the church of the hurdles,' probably in reference to its original construction: 'more Scotorum, non de lapide, sed de robore secto atque harundine tecta.'—Bede, H. E., iii, 25."

The taxation of Down, Connor, and Dromore extends over 119 pages, and from the brief abstract we have made the reader will easily perceive that we cannot give anything like an analytical criticism of such an immense mass of information. As well might we think of doing so with the Hibernia Dominicana, or any other great repository of learning, wherein the text is elucidated by most copious notes gathered from Irish, Saxon, Latin, and Anglo-Norman authorities. Every page we turn over gives sufficient evidence of Mr. Reeves' unwearied research, and intimate familiarity with the manners and customs of the times when a Pope could rouse the flagging spirit of chivalry, and draw supplies from edifices, many of which we would not now be able to recognise were it not for the learning and industry of the reverend author. To accomplish such a work as this, teeming with the civil and ecclesiastical history of Ulster, the gray legends of mouldering oratories and wayside churchyards, we can more easily fancy than describe the amount of etymological erudition that was required to produce such valuable and interesting information, worth all the guide books and tourist's notes that have ever been written. 'Tis apparent, too, that Mr. Reeves must have visited on foot every ruin he describes, whether situate at the roots of Slieve-Donard, or crumbling in some unfrequented glade. Nay more, wherever modern vandalism has uprooted the early evidences of our ecclesiastical history, and barely left the trace of their existence, an accurate measurement is made, and the result enables us to form a very concise notion of the dimensions of the church, chapel, or cell, whose name is still found on the taxation-roll, or in the muddy traditions of the people. Let us take for example Rathcolpe, in the diocese of Down:

"Now Raholp, in the west angle of Bally-culter parish. In a subdenomination called 'Benagh,' about 100 yards to the right of the road leading from Downpatrick to Ballyculter stand the ruins of a church called Churchmoyley. They are 33 feet 4 inches long, and 21 feet 4 inches wide. The south wall is overturned; the east and west walls are about 12 feet high. The east window is 4 feet 6 inches high and 10 inches wide, splayed inside to the width of 3 feet 2 inches. In building the walls, yellow clay has been used instead of mortar. The plot of ground, which the ruins and cemetery occupy is about half a rood, and seems from its elevation above the surrounding field, to have been at one time a 'rath.' The voice of antiquity ascribes the foundation of the church of Rathcolpe to St. Patrick; and at the hand of St. Tassach, its bishop, according to the hymn of St. Fiech, he received the communion shortly before he died."

Thus, page after page, we learn facts of which we have been hitherto ignorant, and in ignorance of which we were likely enough to remain, on many important subjects touching local and antiquarian lore, if this valuable work were not by us. We are free to confess, too, that we attached implicit faith to the etymologies of Sir James Ware and the learned Colgan, nor thought of questioning derivations till such notes as the following met our eyes. (Appendix, p. 199).

"The name Bangor is popularly supposed to mean 'Whitechoir.' Even Colgan interprets the Welsh Bangor by Ban-chora, 'idem quod pulcher chorus vel albus chorus.' (Acta, SS., p. 439). The same derivation is given by De Burgo, in his Hibernia Dominicana (p. 21). This fanciful origin of the name was probably suggested by Jocelin's narrative of a vision, which St. Patrick witnessed near the site of the future abbey: 'Divertit aliquoties quiescendi gratia ad quandam monticulum, non longe situm a valle, in qua postea constructum est Beannocho-reuse cenotium, cōsentes ergo conspexerunt de colle vallem illam etherea luce, ac multitudine militia celestis repletam.' (c. 98). To this legend may be fairly traced the Latin appellation 'vallis Angelorum.' But the name Bangor is of a very different origin: it is only a modification of the word Banagher—the root of the word being 'Beanna,' the Irish for horns. Thus 'Banna Barche,' the old name for the Mourne mountains, signifies the 'peaks of Barche.' Keating, who traces the name of Bangor to its proper root, has preserved the following curious tradition to account for its application: 'Kennafold, son of Blathmac, son of Hugh Slaine, enjoyed the sovereignty four years. In his reign, Bangor was burned and its congregation slain by the foreigners. The reason why that place was called Bangor was this: Breasal Breac, King of Leinster, went with an army to plunder Scotland: and he brought many cows and herds of cattle with him into Ireland. And after he and his forces landed they formed an encampment in the place which is now called Bangor, and slaughtered a great number of cattle until a considerable number of the 'Beanna,' i. e. the horns of the cows were scattered over the plain, so that the place ever since bore the name of 'Magh Beannochoir.' A long time after that, when the holy abbot Comgall erected the monasteries of Bangor in the same spot, he gave the name of the place in which it was erected to it, viz., Beannchar, so that it has retained it ever since."

As may be supposed, holy wells and forgotten shrines, once frequented by pious pilgrims, and fondly revered for all the dear and sainted remembrances associated with them, are amply treated in this volume. The early haunts, and last resting place of SS. Patrick, Columba, and Brigid, become familiar to us as we turn over these learned pages, detailing the life and exit of our patron, and the holy men who raised such glorious monuments in Ulster. How the heart stirs within us as we read of the translation of the relics of Patrick, Brigid, and Columba, and the vicissitudes of the shrine which held the canonized bones of our apostle. What weeping and wailing may there not have been in Down when a political expedient, devised by John de Courcy, caused the relics to be exhumed and removed from "Dunum ubi erat mea resurrectio!" Fancy bodies forth all the actors in that memorable scene of 1186. Cardinal Vivian, arrayed in his purple robes, followed by the Irish priesthood—who cursed his base truckling to English domination—and the mailed soldiers of De Courcy, marshalled to do honour to the holy remains as they were borne off.

"From Dun-da-leth-glas of the Cassocks,
It is the royal cemetery of Erin,
A town wherein the clay of Columba was covered.
In the same grave was buried
Brigid the victory of females."

Passing over the narratives of the saints who founded the sees of Dromore, Down, and Connor, and the succession of the bishops down to the Reformation, we must bring this meagre notice to a close by giving a brief outline of the history of "St. Patrick's bell." "This ancient reliquary," Mr. Reeves informs us (p. 369), "is preserved in an elaborately-formed shrine remarkable at once for its beauty and antiquity. Its age, which might be presumed, from its style of workmanship, to be very great, is determined by the inscription which is evidently coeval with the construction of the case . . . the inscription runs thus: 'Oratio pro Domnallo O Lachlainn per quem facta est campana hæc, et pro Domnallo comarbano Patricii apud quem facta est, et pro Cathalano O'Maelchallain pro custode campanæ, et pro cudulig O Imonai-nen cum suis filiis qui cooperuere.' This inscription, Mr. Reeves tells us, is undated, "but possesses two historical notes by which its age may be ascertained with considerable precision; thus determining that the inscription belongs to one of the fourteen years immediately succeeding 1091. At that early period, Cathalan O'Maelchallain was keeper of this bell; agreeably to the custom of the country, which vested the custody of venerated relics in particular families, and associated with the keeping certain emoluments or immunities. In the middle of the 14th century, this relic, according to the Four Masters, was in the hands of another family. At the year 1356 they have the following entry:

"Solomon O'Mellan, keeper of the Bell of the Will, died. He was the general patron of the clergy of Ireland.

"Again, at 1425, they make mention of

"O'Mellan, keeper of the Bell of Patrick's Will."

Mr. Reeves does not inform us how the O'Mellans became the hereditary custodians of this relic, but we are indebted to his research for some curious documents preserved among the Primatial records of Armagh which throw great light on this most interesting subject. Thus we find John, Archbishop of Armagh (A.D. 1471), excommunicating and interdicting John O'Mellan, keeper of the bell, and transferring the custody to another "propter demerita custodis." This sequestration involved loss of fees and lands, enjoyed by the custodes in virtue of the sacred deposit. And here let us remark that so much were our ancestors interested for the preservation of venerated relics and manuscripts, that certain lands were allotted to those whose duty it was to take special charge of matters pertaining to the altar and literature. Thus the Mac-Moyres, "keepers of the book of Armagh," held the eight town-lands of Bally-moyre, "on tenure of its safe preservation," and Colgan,* explaining the nature of the office, tells us "that in progress of time the word scribe denoted any ecclesiastical person whose duty it was to copy ancient monuments and edit new books." "For," says that most learned friar, "every celebrated monastery and cathedral church was accustomed to furnish some monk or cleric of singular erudition, on whom devolved the duty of not only instructing the people by lessons, but also of elucidating national antiquities, and chronicling their country's history."—Trias, Th. 631, 632.

God grant we may soon witness the revival of such dignified pursuits, for which not eight town-lands, but the whole island would be everlastingly grateful.

But let us return to the "magical, musical bell."† Transferred from the custody of the O'Mellans, this venerable relic passed into the hands of the O'Mulhollands, with a strict order under the seal of the Lord Primate, that it should not pass thence "quousque super his aliud a nobis specialiter habueritis in mandatis." According to Mr. Reeves, who has examined the primatial Registra with minute accuracy, the family of O'Maelchallain was then residing in that part of Tyrone which is now transferred to the County of Derry under the name of the barony of Loughisholin. The same family is mentioned, in 1458, in a monition from Primate Prene; and a year before the rising of the north several families of the same name were settled in the parish of Killead. Three centuries and a-half after the faculty granted by Primate Prene, the same bell is discovered in possession of the same family. But let us hear Mr. Reeves:

"In the year 1758, Bernard Mulhollan died at Moy nagoll, in the parish of Maghera, and County of Derry, aged seventy-five years. His son Edmund lived at Shane's Castle, in the capacity of under agent to the O'Neill family. His son Henry, being designed for the priesthood, received a liberal education, but, failing to enter holy orders, he became master of a grammar school, and, towards the end of the last century, followed his vocation in the now obliterated village of Edenduff-Carrick. Among his pupils was Adam M'Clean, who in after life cherished a lively feeling of regard for his preceptor, and was enabled to afford him assistance in his declining years. To testify his gratitude for the kindness he received, the old man, when on his death-bed, consigned to Mr. M'Clean the possession of this venerated relic, which was found, together with a copy of Bedell's Irish Bible, in an oak box, buried in the garden, where, for safety's sake, it had been deposited by the last of his hereditary keepers."

With this extract we must close our meagre notice of Rev. Mr. Reeves' splendid work. There is not a single page in the entire volume from which we might not gather extracts vying with each other in erudition and interest. To any one making Irish history his study we hold this book to be indispensably necessary, and we trust every Catholic clergyman in Ireland will make himself familiar with its contents. We want words to describe the great amount of learning and research it combines, and the spirit of generous impartiality which characterizes it. No man, valuing the early history of this country, should fail to have it by him, and we recommend it with all our hearts to our reverend brethren. Any work coming from the pen of the Rev. Mr. Reeves, if it be but half as good as this, must ensure him a large circle of readers, and we hope soon to have his promised volume on the history and antiquities of Bangor. In this, as in every other literary undertaking, he has our most earnest wishes for his health and success. We should not omit to mention, that we never saw anything superior to the typography of this volume.

* Every one reading Mr. Reeves' book cannot but be astonished at the vast and minute learning, historical and topographical, contained in the multitudinous notes selected from Father Colgan's works.

PARISIANA. A FEW NOTES ON THINGS IN GENERAL, AND PARIS IN PARTICULAR. By SPECTATOR. Richardson and Son, Derby, and Capel-street, Dublin.

SUCH is the title of a pamphlet of thirty-six pages, published by an English Protestant, who has deemed it expedient to establish himself in this city as publisher and vender of Catholic books. Now, as far as this brochure is concerned, we will briefly remark that its rhapsodic narrative, of all that came under the observation of Spectator, may be very entertaining to the folk who can expend a few days, and a few pounds on an excursion from Cockaigne to Paris, but there is no one of common sense who, having perused its contents, will not very naturally ask himself why he threw away his shilling on such a miserable production. Had the pamphlet been brought out by a publisher of Protestant books, we would have no reason to complain of the epithets and references it contains; but, good Mr. Richardson, you must be sorely blinded to your own interests, when you expend ink and paper insulting the feelings and religious sentiments, not of French Catholics alone, but of English, Irish, and Scotch. A short time ago we noticed in a public journal some well administered animadversions on a spelling-book printed and sold by you, in which you entertained your juvenile readers with a story of a Priest and a Jester, and to the story was prefixed a grotesque wood-cut, which would have suited Temple's History of the Rebellion, or any of those lying productions designed to caricature and misrepresent the religion of the Catholics of this Empire. We thought that the lesson then taught would have prevented a recurrence of all such over-sights for the future, but we have been grossly deceived, as we will now make it appear. At p. 13 of Parisiana, your Spectator, in a burst of proud indignation, informs the public that a Frenchman, dazzled at the sight of an Englishman's equipage, "fawns like a very parasite;" and that all this "is a mere mask, a jesuitical tactic for gaining an honest livelihood and keeping the wolf from the door." Now we do not pretend to be so good a judge of character as Spectator, but we do believe that fawning on Englishmen is a phasis of the French mind utterly unknown to all save the writer of Parisiana. In any case, we have a right to expect that Mr. Richardson, as a seller and publisher of Catholic books, would not allow any writer in his service to bandy such epithets, or perpetuate the old, rotten, cant-words which adorn some English dictionaries, to the edification of the elect who associate the very name of Jesuit with everything "shuffling—artful—deceitful." Doubtless, you thought you were doing good service to the Fathers of the Society, who, as in duty bound, will acknowledge the compliment. At p. 18 we are entertained with a short jeremiad on the laxity of French morals, and Spectator tells his readers, "I speak not of the crafts of priesthood, the delicious delusions of the pious 'directors,' for these important details the reader is referred to the able and popular work of Michelet (Priests, Women, and Families, translated by Cocks)." And, again, at p. 33, Spectator, gravely moralizing on French marriages, tells us that they are bonds forged by the hands of interest—a union cemented "by the callous words of priesthood." Now, Mr. Richardson, without meaning you any disrespect, we solemnly assure you that if you contemplate serving the Catholic Religion in England or Ireland by such works as this you are grievously mistaken. You, have printed, and, no doubt, sold a great number of books containing practical instructions for the penitent and confessor. The speculation, in a temporal point of view, was doubtless a right good one, else you would not have embarked in it; but do you not see, that by referring your readers to the lucubrations of such a traducing infidel as M. Michelet you are depriving your own mouth of bread—commending and upholding books which, if read by the credulous and sensual, will leave all your ascetic works a dead weight upon your shelves? So far you have been standing in your light, and doing the very reverse of what your Protestant fellow-countrymen deem thrifty and wise. But what are we to think of you? or rather, what do you think of us? Do you imagine that any Catholic to whom the guidance of youth is committed will seek your shop to purchase books, when you did not scruple to advertise a pamphlet like Parisiana, with its sarcastic innuendo against a Society recognized by the Universal Church? Can you think that the Catholic priesthood will encourage you if you publish shilling pamphlets describing the sacrament of matrimony as a bauble cemented by the "callous words of priesthood;" or that any Catholic will feel an interest in the publications of a man who, not being a Catholic himself, can have no means of using that discretionary power so much required in a publisher of Catholic works? Verily, we thought you had too much common sense, and worldly knowledge, to commit yourself by such a contemptible production as your Spectator has cumbered you withal. As for him, he has done well concealing his name; but, good Mr. Richardson, henceforth employ some Catholic to edit your books, and do not outrage the religious feelings of those by whom you hope to make a fortune.

Saint Columbanus.

PART II.

"Quidnam dulcius quam majorum recensere gratiam, ut eorum acta cognoscas, a quibus acceperis et rudimenta fidei et incitamenta bene vivendi?"—William of Malmesbury.

WE have now seen this young monk of Erne, by sheer force of zeal and intellect, originate a great ecclesiastical movement in Europe, and found a monastic institution, whose benign influence had already begun to be felt in every province of Franke-Gaul. We have wondered at the fervour of the zeal, and the vigour of the intellect that could, in so brief a period, effect so much; and we have determined with ourselves, that Columbanus was no ordinary man, but one worthy a high place among our proudest national remembrances. The remaining portion of his life was not less active nor less admirable, though the immediate effects of it are not so strikingly appreciable. But, in truth, it is very uncertain, groping in the dark to compare the effects of a great man's deeds. What know we of effects or causes in any order? The most trifling acts beget the greatest. The mightiest things may be traced to causes unremarkable. Princes are not the sole legislators, nor mighty lords-abbot the only apostles of the world. It is sufficient if, through the dimness of time past, we can discern a holy one working and suffering unflinchingly, we may be quite certain such working and suffering proceed very effectual indeed. So, we must not, after the shallow fashion of some, esteem the latter part of Columbanus's life less worthy than the first, because his path was rougher and his visible progress less. Hitherto we have seen him radiant with prosperity's sunny light, doing great things in the name of the Lord Jesus, amidst the plaudits of a startled nation; now we have to portray a character more noble and befitting—a man thorn-crowned as his master was, disappointed and heart-weary dragging through life a heavy cross, even unto the death.

And the first form of that cross was hard and sore to bear. His brother-ecclesiastics in France, children of the same mission, comrades and superiors in the same harassed force, visited him with their displeasure, censured his proceedings, and grievously obstructed the working of his dear institution—for some envied, and many misunderstood him, and all agreed that his adhesion to the paschal usage of his country and his church was a legitimate ground for censure. Oh! it is a strange and mysterious thing in the annals of the church to read of saints at variance. Oh! it is a thrilling proof of the weakness of all human judgment, of the folly of expecting the scales to be adjusted before the accounting day. We have not now space nor fitting opportunity to enter at length into the paschal controversy, or to rebut the sneers of those who treat the matter as puerile, or the misrepresentations of some who denounce the conduct of the Scotch ecclesiastics as heretical. The subject is one of the most interesting, and at the same time perplexing, in the antiquities of western Christendom, and would need, and probably shall have, a paper to itself. These facts demonstrate the close and loyal connexion ever maintained between the church of Ireland and the mother-church of Rome—the holy earnestness of men who risked so much for what we would esteem trifling, and the generosity and unworldliness of a contest in which the leaders of either party were revered as saints by the other, in which Paulinus, Saserian, and Wilfrid were invoked at Armagh and Iona, while Colman, Aidan, and Columba were blessed at York and Lindisfarne; in which all were hailed and canonized by the universal church of God, as most holy followers of that Saviour who bequeathed peace unto men. Columbanus's share in the controversy was small, confined almost entirely to writing some gentle, firm, and learned letters—a few of which have been preserved in the 12th volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum—to the French bishops and the Roman Pontiff, in defence of his position, in deprecation of the scandal and trouble caused by the foreigners, and in entreaty "to be allowed to labour undisturbed with them as brothers in the vineyard of Christ." After four years of much suffering and some danger, the persecution was discontinued, and the storm blew away—blew away only to return with a rougher violence.

Hitherto the abbot of the Vosges had lived in amity with the temporal power—a circumstance not very usual with the earnest ecclesiastics in those times. While the monarch, St. Goutramm, reigned in Burgundy, all was well. During the short reign of the Austrasian chief, Hildberb, the monks were undisturbed. In the early years of young Theodrik's rule, everything promised favourably, Columbanus was his most honoured friend and venerated teacher, guide in his political councils, and director of his religious progress. Days and nights used the young monarch spend in retreat in the choir of Suxen; days and nights used the abbot devote to the conduct of the admirable little court of Challons-Sur-Saone. Burgundy was about to be ruled by a wiser Goutramm; the attention of France was cast upon it, and the bold heart of the lord abbot swelled with exultation. But the scheme of God's providence who shall unravel? The mother of the king's father, one who had risked much for him, an aged woman, who, it was said, was endeavouring to expiate a life of crime by an old age of penance; a grey-haired queen, who having outlived her power and her friends, had been just expelled, by a casualty of those rough times, from the very court of which she was for long years the mistress—now sought in the name of charity, of affection, and of gratitude, a refuge in the dominions of Theodrik. Who would resist such a claim? She was received with all the honour that a queen might wish, and all the lovingness that a warm, young heart could proffer. Sad was the day she entered the Burgundian court! For no penance was the aged miscreant doing, but plotting new schemes of guilt—no repose did she seek at Challons, but a fairer field for her ambition—no chance of royal whim was it that expelled her from her grandson's court, but a foul murder done with her own palsied hands. She had scarcely taken up her stay when she commenced her fiend-like labours. Discerning that the ruin of the young king's character would be the only secure basis for her power, she directed her exertions to this effect. Of noble and venerable appearance, child of the most illustrious race in Europe (the proud princes of Spain), of undoubted talent and seldom-rivalled dissimulating powers, she was peculiarly fitted to sway an inexperienced and unsuspecting mind. She began by ridiculing the advice of Columbanus, and the pious practices of the young man, when cautiously withdrawing the restraints of religion, and insidiously introducing temptation, she encouraged Theodrik, with fatal success, before long, to enervate by luxury and debase with precocious debauchery, a mind naturally vigorous and virtuous. With very fatal success, indeed. Alas! human nature is weak, and the devil is wily. Alas! youth is variable, and Meerovingian blood was hot. Theodrik was strongly tempted, and he wretchedly fell. He plunged into crime of all kinds with a wildness, a vehemence, almost unknown to those stoical times. The counsels of the abbot were rejected, and himself despised. The lessons of youth were forgotten, and the hopes of manhood thrown away. The model court of Challons became a scene of the maddest crime—the kingdom of Goutramm the holy, a theatre of riotous broils. Plundering excursions took the place of visits to Luxen—the gaming-table was substituted for the council-board—the banquet-hall for the church; and all that Columbanus had laboriously effected in the political affairs of the country, was desperately reversed. What could the poor monks do? They prayed and remonstrated, entreated and threatened. Columbanus several times visited the king, brought him to repentance and left him, only to hear of his more dangerous relapse. His very appearance was sufficient to bring the unfortunate young man to contrition—the very presence of temptation was enough to make him forget it. On one occasion the abbot produced a stronger impression than usual, remained a considerable time in court, and prevailed upon Theodrik to dismiss his mistresses, as an initiatory step towards permanent reform. After his departure, it required all the art of Brunchilda to remove the effect he had produced. The latter now determined that at all hazard he should never again have an opportunity of exercising his magical sway over his former pupil; and she dexterously endeavoured to bring this about by creating in the king's mind an angry feeling against his monitor. The next time Columbanus came to court, she received him in great state, and presenting the king's illegitimate children, asked his blessing for them. The stern missionary refused to bless the fruit of sin. This was what Brunchilda expected and desired. Feigning the utmost indignation, she ordered his immediate and violent expulsion, and then flying to the king, so worked upon his parental feeling, that he permitted her to send a messenger to Luxen, announcing his high displeasure, commanding the monks to imprison themselves within the monastery until his will was declared, and forbidding any to afford them succour under a grievous penalty.

This was the brochure of tyranny—the temporal power was now fairly at issue with the man of God.

One summer evening, in the year 607, Columbanus and a few monks approached the royal residence of Spissia, between Lemur and Montreal, to remonstrate against this violent and, as it happened, illegal decree.

A strange place to us would this Spissia have appeared. It was one of the peculiar residences of the Frankish chieftains—then scattered somewhat thickly over the central and western parts of Gaul—where they made demonstration of their authority, collected their revenues, and lived in turn while the produce accumulated sufficed for their support. It was situated on the borders of one of those primæval forests that formerly overspread more than a third part of the country, portions of which are to be seen to this day. The buildings were partly of stone and partly of wood—long, low, irregular but expensive structures; the residence of the monarch of the court was in the midst of all; in its profuse ornament there might be noticed a strange intermixture of the rudeness of the northern warriors and the refinement of the Imperialized Celts; marble colonnades extended before timber palaces, fine statues stood in empaved apartments, and good paintings adorned walls which the stainer or tapestrier had not seen; magnificent couches spread their inviting folds for him whose throne was a three-legged stool; and primitive beer and stirabout was disposed in goblets of chased gold upon tables of marble; around this principal dwelling were grouped the habitations of the “Lendes,” and attendants; farther off, and encircling all, were the watch-houses of the guards and the tents of the Fiscalini, who, as their name imports, were the workers of the royal Fisc, and exercised, for its benefit, the trades of the weaver, armourer, tanner, smith, &c., still further were disposed the huts of the serfs and the enclosures for cattle; the whole was flanked and nearly surrounded by the royal demesne-land.

The confusion was considerable when Columbanus was announced; the utmost the queen could effect was, to have a haughty message sent that it was too late for an audience, and that the abbot should delay until the morning; poor Theodrik added that an apartment of honour should be prepared for him under the royal roof. Not accepting this latter, Columbanus took up his abode with a poor serf; late at night, on his return to this humble shelter, he was astonished to see a sumptuous repast laid out, and the king's servants waiting to serve him; but he well knew compromise would not suit the prince's temper. “Begone!” said he to the servants, “I reject the gifts of the impious,” and as he spoke the dishes were broken, the wine spilled and the servants fled in affright. The missionary retired to rest—meanwhile rumour of the matter spread—he was awakened before dawn by the joyful cries of the people as the king knelt, in penitential garb and with sorrowful mien, by his couch, promising, by all he held dear or sacred, to amend his life, revoke his tyrannical commands, and revive in Burgundy the blessed rule of Goutramm.

So the firmness of Columbanus was once more successful. But not long after the disorders of the court recommenced; as a significant token of the state of affairs, the Abbot was again forbidden approach to the king. The latter made a final effort, he addressed him a letter of ecclesiastical censure and excommunication “in sacris.” It was a bold step; it was a strange rescript in the Frankish court. The poor king, too deep in crime now to be affected much by its sacerdotal sternness, was too proud not to be enraged by its unaccustomed audacity; urged by the reproaches of the queen and the flattery of his venal companions, he took horse immediately and galloped with a small train to Luxen; but, so hastily was his resolution executed, so vague was his original purpose, so confounding was the aspect—calm, serene, and dignified—of Columbanus when he appeared, that with true Meerovingian dignity, he forgot what precise charge he was to make. After standing abashed for a while, he roughly demanded admittance to the interior of the monastery. This was something to have hit upon; Columbanus calmly replied that he had suitable apartments for visitors, but that it was against rule to admit strangers farther.

"Ho!" said the king, anxious to redeem his indecision, "those places must be open to us."

And he sprung from his horse, drew his poinard, and moved with his party into the monastery. He had proceeded as far as the refectory, and no one dared oppose him, but the brave spirit of the abbot rose with the emergency. He stepped forward, opposed his person to the king's, and sternly bade him retreat; then there was clashing of swords among the minions and fierce looks from the soldiery—a deed of blood was near being done, but poor Theodrik paused, hesitated—fled! Columbanus followed him—a crowd had assembled outside—before the people, in the midst of the armed retinue, and to his very teeth, he resolutely denounced his conduct and prophesied his fate.

Writhing under his words, pale with rage, yet endeavouring to assume an air of dignity, the king replied, "I perceive you hope to get the crown of martyrdom by your audacity—I am not so foolish—but hear what I command; as your system differs from all others, return whence you came."

"If," answered Columbanus, his countenance calm and his port erect the while, "if you would have me leave my monastery, you must compel me by force."

So saying he withdrew, and his rude visitors rode away.

Not long after, two parties were seen proceeding in opposite directions along the forest highway between Luxen and Bourcherasse. The one was a small band of soldiers, such as were then attached to the persons of the more powerful princes, as a kind of body-guard, accoutered with habergeons, leathern helmets, light battle-axes, slight spears, and small daggers; they were commanded by Bandolfus, a Burgundian nobleman, a boon-companion and warm adherent of Theodrik's, and they chatted gaily, or caroled some rude soldierly strain, as they rode towards the abbey. The other party were moving in the direction of Bourcherasse, where court was then held, and consisted of monks, habited in the long white robes of their order, and chanting an ecclesiastical canticle, as the custom was with the stricter sort of clergy in that age. Clearly, cheerily, above all rose the voice of the lord abbot, when, grasped by the hand of Bandolfus, he was roughly hurled to the ground! With calmness undisturbed, with countenance unruffled he submitted to the indignity; remounting his palfrey he bade the monks return to Luxen as they were rudely commanded.

For some days after, he continued to go through his monastic duties as if nothing had occurred; the soldiers meanwhile kept watch and revel in a neighbouring house.

But at length a message arrived from the king, and Columbanus was escorted to Besancon, to await the royal pleasure; after remaining at this place some days he returned to the monastery, being unrestrained by any guard, and unbound by any promise.

Great was the joy of the monks on again beholding their "father," but wild was the rage of the king when the abbot's disobedience was made known. Some advised instant assertion of the royal power by putting the offender to death, but the severest penalty Theodrik could bring himself to inflict, was the exile he had before decreed. A military force was accordingly despatched to Luxen; in the dead of night Columbanus "and all of his nation," were dragged forth from their brief repose—hurriedly were they mounted on their mean palfreys—hurriedly were a few valedictions uttered—hurriedly were they escorted away. As Columbanus departed he turned round, and with such calm dignity as was his wont in chapel-quiet, gave his abbatial benediction.

This was in 610, according to Mabillon and Fleury.

And "les Vosges," saw no more of him, but his work aided thousands to perfection; his name is remembered to this day—a sweet and solemn memorial of the past; and his spirit was a power mighty and swaying for long ages in the land he loved.

The missionaries and their guards now proceeded towards Nantes, whence Theodrik intended they should embark for Scotia. But this Columbanus did not intend; in his youth he had devoted himself to a foreign mission, and though years were crowding upon him, and the hand of power was heavy over him, he had not repented. Remembering all he had effected, neither his courage nor his ardour failed; besides, Abbot Jonas tells us he was warned, in mystic vision, not to depart from this wide vineyard of the Lord, while it lay all around untilled and weed-grown. He had resolved not to go—he has told his wondering monks his resolution—and he will not go, he swore, though Theodrik rave never so fiercely, or Brunchilda grow a-thirst for rougher vengeance, or Bagnemod, his guard, redouble his vigilance.

They stayed awhile at Auxerre, where no doubt they visited the shrine of St. German, and besought his intercession with more than ordinary fervour, for he, too, on earth, had battled stoutly in the cause of holy church, and suffered grievous things from the temporal power; and he had a stronger claim. Just 300 years before, when he was bishop of the place, there came hither, from the western isles, a strange, earnest man, with mind full of strange visions he had seen on lone hill-tops and in gloomy caverns far away; who, after being befriended in every way by German, instructed in his school, received as his disciple, and sent to Rome with his recommendation, had returned to the pagan island, whence he came, with mitred head and missionary power to achieve a work the most notable of the century, and leave a name venerated of every after age, and called by us—St. Patrick.

At Auxerre, Columbanus uttered his celebrated prediction, to Ragnemod, "remember," said he, "I tell you, that Clothar whom you now so much despise, will, before three years, be your master."

Clothar was the son and successor of Hilperik of Neustria, concerning whom we have had occasion previously to speak.

At Orleans, too, they made some delay. Being neither allowed to enter the city, nor supplied with provisions out of it, the monks were obliged to remain two days on the banks of the river (then a considerable way from the town) without eating; on the third day two of them escaped, and going in quest of food, were plentifully supplied by a Syrian woman and her blind husband. It is related that Potentanus, one of the monks, suggested to the latter, that if it was the will of Providence, their holy abbot might do some good for him. Urged by a sudden hope, and full of a new faith, the hospitable blind man presented himself before Columbanus; the latter knelt in prayer for a long while, and then arising, he signed the sightless eyes with the sign of the cross, and, by the name of Jesus, bade the man see—in that all-saving name the blind saw.

Henceforward the monks did not need provisions.

Arrived at Nantes there was some difficulty in procuring a vessel bound for Scotia. During their delay they were entertained by two pious maidens, Procula and Dola, though the courtly bishop, Sopronius, refused to take any notice of them. At length they embarked, and the Burgundian guard left them; scarce had the vessel arrived at the mouth of the harbour, when the ship was encountered by a vast mass of water, and thrown back upon the strand. There it lay for three days. The master, alarmed, thought he discerned the finger of God in this, entreated the monks' pardon, loaded them with presents, and permitted them to disembark.

And once again the persecuted abbot and his monks were free—once again right triumphed in some poor measure on this earth. Whitherward shall the missionaries turn? At first Columbanus thought of returning to his dear Vosgian institute, but it was apparent that his presence would peril its existence and obstruct its operation, without any equivalent advantage. Enough had not been done to vindicate the authority of the church; it was time to recommence the active propagation of her doctrines. After writing a touching farewell letter to his Vosgian monks (preserved in the Collectanea, No. 31), he started for Soissons, then the capital of Clothar, of Neustria, with zeal as ardent and spirit as unbroken as when the gates of Bennchoir closed behind him, twenty-one years before.

Owing, probably, to his custom of continuing missionary labour on his journeys, so as to make them resemble ecclesiastical visitations, it was very late in the year when Columbanus met, under the gates of Soissons, a splendid cavalcade of priests and nobles, with king Clothar at its head, and festal banners waving in the breeze, and festal music swelling on its breath. For the fame of the Scotie recluse had penetrated hither, and fired men's enthusiasm and commanded men's love. Clothar, it appears, several times invited him to his court, and he now received him with honour seldom paid an ecclesiastic in those days. A lodging was appointed him in the palace, and afterwards, a more suitable one in a neighbouring cell. Columbanus did not disappoint his expectations. During his stay he was the king's confidential counsellor in political matters, his spiritual guide, and his beloved friend. Who can guess what influence this visit of the Irish monk, to the second father of the Meerovingian line, had upon the after destinies of France and of Europe? There can, at least, be no doubt that it affected very seriously this prince's character and government.

Nevertheless, for some cause of which we are not told, Columbanus relinquished his project of founding a monastery at Soissons; and, to the deep regret of Clorbie, left that city ere long. He next went to Paris, where he was entertained by the bishop, and then to Meaux, where he was prevailed upon to make some stay, by Channeric, a powerful chief, and Agneric, lord of Champagne in Brie. The fruit of this brief visit was very wonderful. Burgundofora, the beautiful daughter of Channeric, was devoted to God by Columbanus, in a neighbouring convent, where she lived a life of surpassing holiness and became Saint Burgundofora. Faro, the son of Agneric, moved by his teaching, flung aside his arms and spurs, and every prospect of worldly honour, to study for the ecclesiastical state. Just ten years after the missionary's visit, he was received to the episcopate of his own diocese, and likewise, by the blessing of God, became a canonized saint.

From Meaux, Columbanus proceeded to Eussi, on the Marne, where he spent some time with the pious Autharius, and where, too, the influence of his instruction is in a remarkable way traceable. Ado and Dado, the sons of his host, we find soon after as founders and abbots of two great Columban monasteries. Verily, healing and blessing went out from him as he walked!

At Metz he was honourably received by Theodobert of Austrasia, and invited to found a monastery which would be munificently endowed and placed under the royal protection. Declining this latter, Columbanus asked, in stead, permission to travel amongst and preach to the king's wild subjects, in the Helvetian and trans-Rhenane provinces. The oddness of preferring to convert rude boorish heathens, to administering to the weal and reposing in the favour of a Christian and Meerovingian sovereign, excited Theodobert's merriment; but the small request was granted, and the arrangement was scarcely concluded, when the king found reason to rejoice in it. Before his departure, this strange Hibernian monk administered to him a warning and a reproof, in words so strong that they cut him to the heart, and so just, that they deterred his violence; so stern that they alarmed; so serenely uttered that they awed him. In pursuance of their design, the monks went on to Mentz, where they remained a short time at the request of the bishop, and thence continued their journey up the Rhine, stopping at various places, and making many excursions into the country on their way—sailed up the boisterous Limath, entered the lake of Tigurin or Zurich, disembarked on its western bank, and took up their stay in the southern extremity of Tug. Nor did they remain long here. Walafrid Strabo (Vit S. Gall L. 1 cap. v.) has a somewhat incredible story at this place, of their entering a pagan temple on a day of sacrifice, openly setting fire to it, and being compelled to fly from the vengeance of the people.

We next find them near Brigantium, the modern Bregentz, in the country of the Seine, where they built cells on the ruins of an ancient oratory of St. Aurelia, and went to work with all earnestness and courage to convert the people. These Suevi were a tribe of the northerns, who, after passing down through France and being tossed about for a hundred years by the various swayings of the tide of conquest, had at last settled down here, and betaken themselves to hunting wolves and bears in the forests, worshipping great misshapen idols and unseen weird spirits, and fighting lustily with one another—as was incident to their position. The singular feature about them was, that they had been, some time before Columbanus arrived among them, converted to Christianity, but had afterwards, for want of missionaries or some other cause, relapsed into the worship of their idols, "saying," quoth Jonas, "these are our ancient gods and protectors."

The missionaries' first step was, as usual with our Abbot, a bold one. At Bregentz, on a small island, was a temple—very magnificent, according to Walafrid—built originally for Christian worship, but latterly used for pagan purposes. A great pagan festival was announced at this place; crowds, from the most distant parts of the province assembled, and the priests prepared all their artifices and displayed all their wealth; the great gilt Jotum was brought forth and presented to the reverence of the multitude. As all bent in adoration, a white-robed Christian priest appeared on the altar and demanded silence and attention; both being granted, he preached to them a thrilling discourse—he reminded them of their apostacy—he ridiculed their idols—he appealed to their reason and their feelings, and he ended by casting a stone against the idol and hurling its fragments into the deep waters of the lake. All were confounded for a while—scarce was the act done when Columbanus entered in solemn ceremonial robes, followed by a train of priests, waving censers, sprinkling holy water, and chanting loudly and unshrinkingly the service for the consecration of a church. Round the building they walked unhurt, blessing and singing as they went; and the ceremonial and the psalmody—unheard, unseen, since childhood's time, bringing back old thoughts and things—touched those savage people's hearts; round and round the fearless monks went, and no hand was stirred against them; deep in the wave the idol lay, and no bold diver moved for it; on high the holy cross was reared, and none were there to harm it; and when the ancient altar, so long thrown by, was raised—and the blessed relics of St. Aurelia, so long forgotten, were exposed, and the great Christian sacrifice, so long uncelebrated was once more said and sung, of the Jotum worshippers, some wept, some shuddered, and all declared they would be Christians.

This brave deed was but the prelude to success still greater, and, henceforward, there was no want of hopeful labour for the missionaries.

In the midst of this, Columbanus took a hasty journey to Austrasia, to remonstrate with king Theodobert, whom he yet thought to save by opportune advice. The long threatened war between the guilty brother-kings had at length broken out. In a vision, the abbot was forewarned of the result; both kings commanded in person. The Burgundian forces lay north of Toul—the Austrasian, south of it. The latter was found by Columbanus, as doomed troops often are, full of rash confidence, gorgeously equipped and wretchedly disciplined. At first he was received with courtesy, but when he made known his mission—announced that he had come to warn that proud army of its defeat and utter ruin, and to implore that braggart monarch to disband his troops, relinquish his crown, and enter a monastery, “lest with the loss of his kingdom he might also lose his soul.” Loud and long was Theodobert's merriment, and difficult was it found to prevent the soldiers from tearing to pieces the audacious prophet of evil. With heavy heart Columbanus returned to his cell, to await the course of events and the fulfilment of his prediction.

Everything happened as he had said. A few months after Theodobert was defeated at Toul and again at Tolbiac—obliged to fly, almost naked, to Cologne—taken prisoner there, and soon after put to a cruel death by his ferocious grand-mother.

This was in 612, according to Henault.

These occurrences inflicted another heavy blow on the poor lord abbot. Since he left Burgundy, his object seemed to have been to rear, in those forest wilds, a monastic institution which should be a second Vorges to the Helvetian and trans-Rhenan provinces, and one more great fortress of religion and civilization to Europe for the present and the future. But scarcely had the victories of her grandson put the dependencies of the Austrasian chieftaincy in the power of Brunchilda, than, with a vindictiveness characteristic of her race, she tracked her victim to his retirement and recommenced her persecutions—the more actively that in the former instance she had been disappointed of the full measure of her vengeance. Soon Columbanus perceived that his presence would ruin all hope of establishing a powerful monastery in the country. Before long he had to determine to leave his poor Suevan people and his new mission, and proceed, with the greater part of his monks, to Italy. He left at Bregentz the most beloved of his disciples, Gallus, hoping that he, at least, might do something for the twice-deserted people. The name of the Gall almost tells the story of his success—or would tell it to any Helvetian peasant. Compelled to retire to a desert spot, upon the Stiemba (Stinace), he succeeded in establishing there a small number of cells, converting the surrounding population, and laying the foundation of that great monastery of St. Gall, so renowned in European history and the annals of literature. It is scarcely necessary to remark, that the canton of St. Gall is now one of the most important of the Swiss-confederate states.

In the early part of 612, according to Muratori (Annali d' Italia, at 612), the Scotie monks arrived in the city of Milan, where, the fame of their virtues and sufferings having preceded them, they were received with great honour by Agidulph, king of the Italian Lombards, and his pious queen, Theodolinda; and in Milan there was a wide field for their exertions, in consequence of the disordered state of political matters and the encroachment of Arianism—the clergy were divided among themselves—the reins of discipline were loosely held or roughly sundered—the pious were scandalized and the poor were shamefully neglected. The reception of the heretical bishops at court, and the open propagation of their doctrines, also occasioned great anxiety to those who had the interest of the church at heart. In partial remedy of those evils the monks devoted themselves for about a year to ordinary missionary labour, knowing that until some degree of unanimity and healthy action was restored to the ecclesiastical body, no monastic foundation could prove immediately serviceable or prosperous. They seem to have been wonderfully successful in this project, to have quickly gained the confidence of every party, and become a link between all.

At this time, Columbanus addressed to Pope Boniface I., a very extraordinary and very characteristic letter on the subject of the three chapters. It is preserved in the Collectanea, No. 6, and, if we could give it space, would well deserve translation.

In the commencement of the seventh age there stood, in a noble spot, deep-embosomed among the Appenines, and about thirty miles from Genoa, an ancient church, crumbling and moss-grown—built some centuries before by an eremite saint, whose name the calendar has not recorded—but which had been now for a long time untenanted by priest and unblest by sacrifice; just resting on the brow of the wooded hill of Bobbio, it commanded a glorious prospect of the loveliest mountain scenery in Italy—it was at once neighbouring and secluded from the haunts of men.

On the ruins of this church Columbanus, at length, fixed his residence and built his monastery, recommenced once more that cenobitic life he had been so long deprived of, and found that retreat from the bustle of courts and the weariness of journeying he had so much ambitioned. It appears that he was now broken down in health by all his labours and sufferings; his task was nearly done, and the physical man had been worn out in the doing of it. Well-knit was the frame and stout the muscles of that west-Laighean man, but a life like his had too severely tested them; that physical beauty which had made him fly from the world some fifty years before, had given place to another of a more celestial kind—more touching and serene—that of the body out-worn by the fire of the spirit, and beaming, through every failing lineament, with an intelligence and a glory not human: all his biographers love to tell us of Columbanus's beauty—they can only find that one true word for it, "angelicus." And pleasant and solemn must have been "the active repose" of this retirement, half-like, symbolic of, and a prelude to that repose and love-labour that shall not know interruption. The eremited church was repaired; stone was quarried from the rock, wood hewn from the forests by the hands of the monks themselves, in the old Eastern way, and a goodly monastery was built after the fashion of dear, western Scotia. Christmas, 613, a large number of monks, some Scotie, some French, and some Italian, sang in the choir of the new cenobium—the nave of the ancient church.

Columbanus now put aside all political and literary business and devoted himself entirely to the rearing of his institution and the duties of his abbacy.

One day, in the following year, 614, the silence of the mountain was disturbed by the arrival of a large and magnificent company at the gate of the abbey; the leader of which, an ecclesiastic of high rank, demanded immediate audience of the lord abbot. Great must have been the old man's delight, and that of his French and Scotie monks, when they recognized, in the stranger, Eustasius, the new abbot of the Vosgian monasteries, and one of the most saintly of their old companions.

Abbot Eustasius brought momentous news from France.

Theodrik, having become, as we have seen, by the defeat and assassination of his brother, sole sovereign of the two kingdoms of Austrasia and Burgundy, and the most powerful prince in Europe, flushed with triumph, thought it full time to prosecute his old quarrel with Clothier of Neustria; all his preparations were made—a camp was formed—the "Lendes" of the united territories were assembled—savage and naked troops were summoned from the countries beyond the Rhine, and the enterprize was a-foot—when, seized by a fearful complaint, the unhappy king wretchedly perished in his royal town of Metz. The Confederacy of course fell to pieces, and Clothier, as next heir, proceeded to take possession of both kingdoms, but Brunchilda, with desperate folly, endeavoured to oppose him, and at length found a plan for his assassination. This exasperated Clothier to the utmost, he seized her person, and cruelly punished her long life of crime by condemning her to a violent death; by his orders, also, two of Theodrik's illegitimate children were executed, a third escaped, and the fourth was permitted to enter a monastery. The successful prince was crowned at Soissons, Metz, and Challons, second monarch of all the Franks, by right of conquest, succession, and election.

Thus did it happen, that before the close of 613 (Henault, &c.) all the predictions of Columbanus, regarding France, were verified.

King Clothier observing this, and not forgetful in his prosperity of the friend to whose counsels he owed so much, determined he should have him, henceforth, by his side; he shall be tracked wherever he has gone; Abbot Eustasius must follow him into the Helvetian country, where report saith he hath settled, or into Egypt, where Augustin, bishop of Suri, maintains he hath gone; or, to the fair island of the western seas, whither false Leodomald, count of Nantz, swears he hath sailed; a noble equipage, moreover, shall Eustasius have, and twenty young nobles shall be his guard, and his expenses shall be defrayed from the royal treasury. Such an embassy accordingly started, and, after much travelling, traced Columbanus to Appenine Bobbio.

Yet he will not return with them. In truth he cannot. He assures the monks and lords they would bring to Clothier his mortal part only; and they see the justice of what he says, and do not press their mission. A letter—a noble and affecting farewell letter, the lord abbot penned to the king, with his own trembling hand. He thanks him for his wish to have him in his court, explains to him how impossible it would be, in the course of nature, to comply with it, and reminds him that God is always nigh and ever ready to counsel. He congratulates him on his success, reproves him in striking terms for his cruelty to Brunchilda and the children of Theodrik, and gives him a good deal of advice regarding his conduct in future, in the exalted position he had attained. He asks him, as a last request, to protect and forward his Vosgian institution. In conclusion, he imparts to him his final abbatial blessing.

Eustasius, after a short stay, returned to France.

Clothier was much disappointed. He received the letter with the utmost reverence, as the last earthly utterance of a veritable saint, in his regard, and ordered it to be enrolled among the most precious archives of his chapel. "Les Vosges" he took under his special care, bestowed on the community freedom of election, enriched the abbacy with large annual revenues, and the lordship of meadow and forest land for many "walds" around, that the institution might realize the promise of its first success, and be to him and to posterity a monument, and great tangible proof of the wisdom and zeal, the lore and the sanctity of "le grand Missionnaire Irlandais."

It is almost needless to say, that the saint's work at Bobbio was likewise blessed by God and crowned with enduring success. Even during his life its influence had begun to spread through the land, and its affiliations to multiply its benefits in distant provinces. To any informed student, it is only necessary to mention its name, to remind him of its after-importance in the history of Italy and of Europe, of art, of science, and of literature.

Just twelve months after the departure of Eustasius, the angel of death, after many warnings and much threatening, visited the lord abbot. And never, surely never, since the world began, was a soul found more triumphantly prepared for his awful advent! In the solitude of his cell, in the silence of the night, a flood of splendor, more gorgeous and lovely far than the rays of the noon-day sun, poured around the saint and flooded the apartment. And then, plain for the attendant monks to see, did the Virgin Mother appear, supporting on one arm her awful babe, and with the other beckoning the dying mortal to join the heavenly host, smiling, at the same time, with a smile so ineffable that heaven itself seemed half-revealed in it—the while, angelic music, joyous and exultant, pealed in all ears, and angelic forms, visible and glorious, flitted to and fro; and there was wafture of distant wings and tinkling of soft cymbals far away. Anon, the vision fled, and all was dark and silent as before. Columbanus got himself removed to a bed of stone, and bade the monks be called, for he was dying fast, he said. Long he lay there, gasping half-articulate prayers, and struggling with unseen foes. The final moment came at length. His countenance lit up as with the first beams of approaching glory, and raising himself on his hard bed, he cried aloud in a sweet, tranquil voice—“Gloria tibi, Domine!” and died.

Yes; in that little cell of mountain Bobbio, one of the noblest spirits of that century passed from the earth to the bosom of God.

The life of Columbanus was one great act of worship—his death was the fitting consummation of it.

Reader, if the past pages have not given thee a notion of the vigorous individuality of this man, no words of ours now can do it. But if we have, indeed, rescued his memory from dusty clasped books, and made it live for awhile in thy mind, we shall not deem our little work in this CATHOLIC MAGAZINE un-availing.

Offering.

[From the French.]

BEFORE the Virgin's altar

A young man knelt in prayer,

And laid down, for his offering,

A withered May-flower there.

But there was one beheld him

Who whispered in his ear,

“The purse of gold thou bearest,

Were it not better here?

Our high and holy Mother,

Small need of gifts hath she;

Yet what thou hast most precious

Would thy best offering be.”

Then said the youth, faint smiling,

“That branch was offering meet,

For never miser loved his gold

As I have treasured it.”

And he laid the purse so weighty,

Down on the altar-stone,

Yet counted for his sacrifice

The withered leaves alone.

M. G.

The Martyred Sisters.

A CHRISTIAN widow, of Greek origin, lived at Rome under the reign of Adrian. This virtuous woman was called Sophia, and had three daughters, but little of this world's goods to cheer them with.

During the infancy of her children, this good mother provided every moderate comfort for them by her wisdom, her courage, and her perseverance. But scarcely had these young creatures arrived at the age of girlhood, ere they each contributed by their labour to the maintenance of the family; and Sophia, who was most piously resigned to her lot, found herself better off, and thanked God for his merciful care of her and her dear children, and felt that on this earth the greatest recompense a parent can receive is, the virtue and merit of those entrusted to her maternal care.

Pistis, the oldest of the three, did the most good by her constancy in combatting with difficulties. The disappointments, contradictions, and obstacles which she met with at every step she took, never shook her for a moment—she had the gift of faith, and that was sufficient to uphold her strength and her serenity. Having received from Heaven the gift of poetry, she had cultivated it in order to sing the wonders of the redemption. In a little time, the work, which was undertaken to please God, added to the prosperity of the family, the works of Pistis being sought after and purchased by all the Christian lovers of poetry.

In the same manner as Pistis was a poet, Elpis the second daughter was a musician; more lively than her sister, she found happiness in looking forward to the future—full of confidence, she rushed before time with open arms and smiling lips. Her taste was of the highest order and most brilliant character. She put to music the songs written by her sister, and taught them to the young Christian girls, who sang them in the church on the different feasts of their religion; and although she was happy at succeeding so well, yet she looked upon the present success as upon the steps of the ladder by which she was to ascend to the glory that is to come.

Agape, the third daughter of Sophia, was not gifted, like her sisters, with either the art of poetry or music. She was remarkable for her modest virtues, which made her continually watch over the happiness and comforts of those around her, unmindful of her own gratification. She was economical, active, and industrious in their little menage. But these qualities were not the only tribute which she brought to the family support. She embroidered; and when it was necessary, for the gratification of others, her needle produced with wonderful quickness works of extreme beauty, the price for which was no sooner received than distributed.

If the two eldest daughters of Sophia were beautiful, the young Agape was charming in the extreme. Her eyes of raven blackness gave to her countenance an indescribable sweetness, as if her soul was animated with that pure fraternal love which the disciples of our blessed Lord felt one for the other. All the Christian families felt proud of these young girls; they were the joy of the church in Rome.

Unhappily, the reputation of the muse-inspired Pistis, and of the matchless melodist Elpis, found its way from the interior of the church, and came to the ears of Fabius Metellus, a young senator of very relaxed manners, and he rushed to see and hear these wonders. By the strength of gold, for alas! corruption has never been completely banished from this earth, he obtained through the care-taker of the temple, an introduction to it during the ceremony on Easter Sunday. The glory of Christ risen from the dead was celebrated by joyous halleluiahs. The daughters of Sophia could not be mistaken, as they were placed at the head of the young Christian maidens, clothed in white, their heads covered with veils, and surpassing all their young companions in beauty; but it was not those whom he had come to see—who had charmed Fabius. Agape had captivated him altogether. "By Bacchus, he must," he said, "draw out these exquisite beings from the obscurity in which they had been too long languishing. This beautiful daughter of the muses, and her melodious sister would have greater power in captivating the ears of the emperor, than they would of those obscure priests of so melancholy a religion. As to the young girl, whose name he never heard mentioned, her chaste beauty should never ornament other heart but his, and if," he continued, "my wife, the haughty Fulvia, murmurs at this, I shall remind her that as she has never, as yet, presented me with an heir, I have a right to repudiate her, if my caprice leads me to do so."

Fabius's mind became altogether occupied with these sinful thoughts; and the more he looked upon Agape, the more intense his admiration became; not the mere passing admiration of a capricious heart, but a sentiment profound and absorbing, and for the first time in his life the young senator understood the intense happiness that a young and virtuous woman's affection could yield to the object of her regard, and on leaving the church the wish of possessing Agape was secondary to the ardent desire of being loved by her.

From this day the slaves of Fabius wandered around the residence of Sophia. The report they made to their master of the simple and chaste life led by these four females ought to have turned him from his projects; but, incapable of understanding the charm of self-denial and mortification, he only saw in this rudest and retired existence the consequences of poverty and the securities imposed by a too strict mother on three young and beautiful girls. Strengthened by these impressions, he sought to introduce himself to their humble abode by extravagant praises of the talents of the two eldest daughters. These praises were accompanied by the most brilliant offers of fortune, fame, and all those things of which he thought this suffering family in need.

The spiritual and wise Sophia recognized at once the seducer by the brilliancy of his promises, and endeavoured to elude him by saying that the talents of her children were far beneath the description given of them by the young senator, and, therefore, their desire was to remain unknown and unobserved. Fabius, irritated by this defeat, sought to repair it by costly presents, but these were repulsed by this wise woman with equal dignity. Laying aside the character of protector, he assumed that of a man anxious to reward merit wherever it was found, and drawn to this family less by the sympathy for their surpassing talents than by admiration of their Christian virtues. There was some truth in this subterfuge, for although he spoke only of the two oldest, yet, in reality, his thoughts rested upon the mild and modest Agape.

Sophia repulsed this dangerous intimacy as she had formerly done his proud offers of protection. "My daughters and myself," said she to Fabius, "live according to the commands of Christ, and are content earning our daily bread. To desire more would be criminal. Our reason for refusing the offer of fortune, which you have made us, is that if we had accepted it our hearts would have become attached to the things of this world; and wo to those who raise idols in their hearts, and sacrifice them to the golden calf; the kingdom of Heaven is not for them, for they receive their reward here. You now demand our friendship, it is freely granted to you, in obedience to the commands of our blessed Lord who desires us to love each other, those who injure us, as well as those who hold out to us the open hand of honest protection; but you must acknowledge that a prudent mother is bound to keep from the society of her daughters a man who presents himself escorted by flattery, presents, and assumed benevolence."

Fabius Metellus, thus reprov'd, felt the most violent anger arising in his breast, and infuriated at the Christian religion by the wisdom and virtue of Sophia, he resolved to obtain by force what would not be granted to him by entreaty, and without further delay he sought the prefect of Rome, saying, "We have at our fetes poets and musicians of a very low order, whilst the Christians possess those of the most commanding talent; but the people of this sect are most impudent and arrogant—two of their daughters have refused the offers I have made to them to embellish by their talents the fetes at my villa. Assist me by your power to force them into obedience."

Lucius, prefect of Rome, was one of those men so perfectly satisfied with the present time that he laughed at the idea of regrets for the past, and any aspiration after a better future was in his mind a species of insanity if not a crime. A Roman by birth and an epicurean by nature, he was an unbeliever from weakness of intellect. He hated, in the Christian doctrine the dogma of God's perpetual presence, and that love and service of that God could alone conduct to eternal happiness. He regarded as dangerous subjects those men who hold out their hand to the poor and endeavoured to raise the slave from his state of complete abjection. He laughed at the faith that sought and hoped for other goods than those of this world, and saw in the paradise of the faithful only an exaggerated parody of the Pagan elysium. Such a man was happy in having it in his power to humble the whole sect of Christians in the person of two young, helpless, and unprotected females.

"As these virtuosos," he replied to Fabius, "are deaf to your entreaties and indifferent to earth's choicest gifts, we shall see what command and fear will effect."

In fine, the prefect sent to Sophia to desire that she would have her daughters brought to his palace. The fetes which Lucius here gave were veritable orgies. The female visitors were those of the most fallen and degraded characters. Sophia would have endured a thousand deaths rather than conduct her daughters to such a place, she therefore resolutely refused. Lucius threatened her with violence, but the virtuous widow, steady in the path of duty, felt no fear, for she knew that although she herself was of Greek origin, yet her husband had enjoyed all the privileges of a Roman citizen; therefore her daughters were free subjects, and no one had a right to use force but the emperor, and it was on his power that Lucius and Fabius relied for vengeance.

Antonius, the favourite of Adrian, was dead, he had thrown himself into the sea in order to verify an oracle that promised to add to the days of the emperor those years that a friend voluntarily gave up, and Adrian, in the delirium of his grief and gratitude, had raised altars to this victim of Pagan credulity. Power is always surrounded by flatterers, the cities hastened one before the other to raise temples to Antonius, and Rome was about celebrating public games to his honour. It was to these fetes that Lucius invited Pistis. She must first sacrifice to this new god, and afterwards join with the other poets who were singled out to sing the virtues and beauty of Antonius.

Agape was alone in the house when the guards of the prefect presented themselves before her. Impressing, by a sigh, the necessity of silence to their only domestic, she gave herself up in the place of her sister to the high priest of Antonius, before whom they brought Agape. This man was touched to the heart at the extreme youth and candour of this young girl. "My child," said he, after having read the decree of Lucius, "so mild and so beautiful you will not rebel against our divine master, therefore the prefect will abandon his severity and you will thus give me speedily the pleasure of restoring you to your family."

"What must I do to accomplish this, my lord?"

"Very little indeed, charming Pistis, immolate these two sparrows on the altar of Antonius, and then compose in honour of this young god some of those verses the renown of which has even pierced the walls of this temple."

"Never," replied Agape, "I believe in one God, creator of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only son. He pities you, awaits you and will open his arms to receive you. He has taught me to pray to our Father who is in heaven for you, and for all those unhappy creatures who are still in the darkness of idolatry."

"Child," said the high priest, "risk not your life with these high flown dreams. You shall remain three days in my house, this is the command of our great emperor, by the lips of his prefect—you shall be with my daughters; they are as good and as charming as you are yourself, but at the same time they are too sensible to allow their minds to wander on questions that don't concern them. May their example open your eyes—and when the fatal time arrives, instead of giving you over to the justice of a severe tribunal, I hope I shall have to restore you to a mother who weeps for your absence, and to sisters who are calling you by their groans."

Agape, without undeceiving the high priest as to her identity, profited by the respite granted to her, to write to her mother to inform her of the dangers by which she was menaced. "Take care to make known these dangers," said Agape, "let not the zeal of our Christian brethren slumber, this would be to draw coals of fire upon their head. Fly, yourself, my beloved mother, profit by these three days to place yourself in security along with Pistis and Elpis, that by suffering alone I may not fail in the task which God has given me to perform."

The old servant had so well kept the secret of Agape that Sophia believed her child was occupied by her ordinary works of charity. Learning by this the abyss of evils the anger of Fabius might draw around her Christian friends, she trembled from head to foot. "Oh! my God!" she cried, "is the persecution about beginning afresh with the Christians? Ought I to deliver up to the fury of the pagans my friends and my children—these dear children whom I have watched from infancy, and who were the objects of my tenderest love? Or shall I take the advice of my noble girl, and abandon this innocent victim in order to save her sisters? Agape, my beloved child, if she should sink under the tortures and deny thee, Oh! my God! What then shall I do? Here human wisdom abandons me."

"Her faith will save her, my mother," replied Pistis, "those who shall walk with a firm step in the midst of peril will be strengthened by God, and partake of the glory of his eternal son. Let us fear not, but go and see this high priest, tell him his error, and, if necessary, let us teach all by our example not to flinch in presence of those who would ask us to deny that by which we can alone expect life."

Elpis then said, "When God calls his servants to labour he prepares the reward which will be theirs at the close of the day. Let us partake of that which awaits Agape. I do not fear that my sister will show any dastardly weakness, but for my part I am ambitious to share the palm branches which she is about to gather."

Here the two young girls each taking a hand of their mother conducted her to the temple of Antonius, where they found Agape exhorting to patience an old slave who was covered over with ulcers, and from whose infected body a most noisome smell was emitted. This man, about to quit this earth, was abandoned by all the world, the young Christian alone lavishing upon him the most tender care and heavenly consolations.

The three days which were given for consideration were passed by. The prefect demanded of the high priest of Antonius if Pistis were willing to obey him, or if the utmost severity of the law was to be put in force against her. The high priest, who, as we before said, had a heart accessible to pity, was grief-stricken to find that he had four instead of one to deliver up to the tribunal of the prefect, renewed his prayers and entreaties in order to induce Agape, her mother, and sisters to obedience, "I do not want you," he said, "to renounce your faith, but solely to dissemble for a day, a single day, in order to save your lives. If your God is just and good, as you say he is, he will excuse you."

Pistis became flushed with indignation on hearing these words. "Our God," said she, "will not accept of a love so weak and wavering. What! are worldly considerations sufficient to restrain a soldier from rushing to the breach, and will not our faith uphold us in the hour of peril? To deny God, the supreme ruler, would be a punishment far beyond what the torture could inflict, and a scandal greater than the excess of his cruelty."

"You," said the gentle Elpis, "can only see the evils by which we are surrounded, but I am looking towards the recompense. Depart from hence you who would endeavour to place yourself between us and the sunshine of our glory,"

The high priest saw in all this only the wildness of fanaticism, and, addressing himself to Agape, whose sweetness and tenderness of heart he well knew, he pointed out her mother and her sisters who were about becoming victims to their obstinacy. "What will it cost you?" he said, "simply a genuflection before the image of a god, or a young man if you will have it so, but who, god or mortal, was inoffensive, and died in believing himself a victim for his emperor and his friend."

"If the death of Antonius was an act of virtue our just and merciful Saviour would have strengthened his soul and awarded his faith, but never shall we bend the knee before the image of a creature subject, as we ourselves are to sin and death; already once have I wished to save my mother and my sisters in offering myself alone to the anger of Cæsar. God has shown to me the pride of my sacrifice in rejecting it. If our blood, shed for the honour of his holy name, will open the eyes of those unhappy creatures who are still in the darkness of ignorance, our duty is to shed it, even to the very last drop. Adieu! brothers in Christ Jesus! pray with us that our martyrdom may be fruitful, and that I may have strength while it lasts to keep my hands raised to heaven, calling down upon my unhappy brethren the grace of Christ crucified."

The wife of the high priest, taking Sophia apart, endeavoured to persuade her that a sensible woman, as she was, ought to put a stop to the enthusiasm of her daughters in throwing themselves so blindly into peril. "No," replied Sophia, "up to this day I have guided them—now I shall follow."

The high priest, feeling that his advice was useless, decided, with a deep sigh, upon giving up his prisoners. He wrote to Lucius that with the obstinate Pistis he also sent him the mother and two sisters, who appeared quite decided to brave the orders of Cæsar. But a cruelty which far exceeded the prison and the preparations of torture, awaited these unhappy females. Sophia was separated from her children, and transported to Corinth, her own country, where she was tried, and condemned to imprisonment for life.

Fabius had purposely avoided naming Agape to Lucius, when he had drawn the attention of the prefect upon this suffering family. Learning that she whom he loved was about being delivered, along with her sisters, to all the severity of the laws against Christians, he ran to the prison where the three young girls had just been placed; there, in a dungeon, the profound horror of which has no parallel in our cities, and in presence of instruments of torture fearful to look upon, he renewed his useless supplications. Pistis and Elpis withdrew themselves from him with visible disdain. Holding Agape, he exerted all his rhetoric to save her. "Accept of me for your husband," said he to her, "once honoured by this title, I know well my interest and my fortune will disarm the rigour of the law. I adore it is true the gods of Rome and of the civilized world, but that matters not—mixed marriages are common in our faith. Christians may people our ante-rooms without offending God. Dear Agape! you shall have liberty to build a chapel in my palace, if you will not allow your Christ to abide amongst the protecting gods of my domestic hearth. I solemnly swear to respect your faith, to cherish your mother as my mother, to love your sisters as if they were my own, and to hold out a protecting hand to all Christians through love of you. But why do you not reply?"

"Excuse me, my lord," replied Agape, "I have been asking myself if I were wide-awake, or was it in the wanderings of a dream that I thought I heard you propose to me to seat myself in the place occupied by the noble and austere Fulvia."

"Fulvia has never presented me with an heir, and the law allows me to repudiate her."

At this reply the blush of shame and indignation covered the brow of Agape. "What!" said she, "is it a crime you propose to me, as a means of saving myself? Is it to trample under my feet justice and humanity? To purchase my blood by the tears of the heart-broken? And this you call simple and natural to do. Oh! may God forgive me my sins, and give me grace to forgive you your offences against me. But leave me, and learn that not one of these tortures, the instruments of which you see before you, could be half so cruel as the thought of usurping the place that belongs to another."

Fabius, baffled and furious, saw only in the generous anger of Agape her profound dislike for himself, excited the prefect to exhibit the utmost severity towards this rebellious and fanatical sect.

The same evening the three sisters were conducted before the tribunal.

"Why do you refuse to sacrifice to the divine Antonius?"

"We recognise but one God, all-powerful and eternal, the creator of heaven and earth, and to adore any other would be a most horrible sacrilege," replied, successively, Pistis, Elpis, and Agape.

"You are Christians then?"

"We are Christians."

"What good can attend this folly?" exclaimed Lucius. "This powerful God, for whom you brave Cæsar, has left you to languish in poverty—this just God will not save you from death, whilst ours, if you bend the knee before them, will grant you life, and with life—riches."

Pistis, raising her head, said, "To believe in God, the sovereign good, and to die for him, is a glory preferable to all the pomp and grandeur of this earth."

Lucius, turning towards Elpis, said, "The pleasures of life are more suitable to your age than these haughty struggles against grief. Lips like yours were rather formed to lisp songs of love than to utter cries of anguish."

"You bid me fear, but I only hope," replied the young girl, "if man has prepared fearful tortures for us, the angels are reserving for us ineffable joys."

"But think that it is death that awaits you."

"Death!" cried Elpis, in an accent of triumph, "Death by the hand of the executioner, 'tis but heaven opening upon us. My sisters, let us praise God, who has thus deigned to show his bounty to us."

Lucius enraged, interrupted their thanksgiving by pronouncing the sentence that condemned them to the tortures.

The Christians were instantly conveyed back to their dungeon, and during the eight hours that intervened between the judgment and its execution nothing was spared in order to seduce them—neither menaces nor promises—but they remained firm and immovable. The thought of martyrdom had converted these fragile and feeble girls into all the firmness and strength of heroines.

The evening before the day appointed for the execution, the bishops of Rome, and all the principal Christians of the city came to communicate with them. The adieu which followed this holy ceremony were touching in the extreme. Conducted to the place of torture, their fortitude forsook them not. Pistis asked of God that he would preserve, whole and entire, unto the end, that plenitude of faith which was a recompense for all her sufferings.

Elpis was radiant in hopes of futurity, and Agape prayed with charity for all those around her. Fastened to the instrument of torture, their limbs were broken one by one with refined barbarity. Elpis and Pistis did not allow a single murmur to escape them. Agape's tears fell abundantly; and, vanquished by her grief she cried out, addressing the executioner, "When will you cease torturing my unoffending sisters."

"And do you not feel the pincers burning into your bones?"

"No, I only feel the sufferings of my beloved sisters," replied Agape, losing all consciousness from a blow which she owed to the humanity of the executioner.

Fabius and the high priest of Antonius hastened to remove from the torture the delicate and mangled remains of this young and lovely girl. From the heat of the body, and from the blood flowing from the wounds, they hoped to recall her to life. Fortunately Agape recovered the use of her senses; her first words were to ask for Fabius Metellus.

"Let him come quickly," said Agape, "for I have but little time. My mother prays for me at Corinth, where my martyrdom has been miraculously revealed to her, my sisters await me in heaven, but I cannot leave until I have converted Fabius to our faith. God has told me that the breath from my lips will suffice. Bring him here. Bring him here. My God, if he should come too late," cried Agape, in a tone of anguish, and feeling life fast ebbing from her.

Fabius approached her, bewildered. "Fabius," said Agape, "we have purchased eternal felicity—touch this blood that you have caused to flow—receive the last breath which you have shortened, and note the feeble stream of this blood, and the imperceptible sigh which I breathe upon you—raise your soul and conduct it with ours into the realms of everlasting bliss."

"Yes, converted by so much charity," said Fabius, "I am and ever shall be a Christian."

"May God alike save all our enemies," said Agape.

The high priest, his wife, and his children embraced Christianity at the same time as the senator Fabius Metellus, and the church, which was a witness of these martyrdoms and these conversions, places in the rank of the elect, Pistis, Elpis, and Agape—figurative names which, in our idiom, we translate into FAITH, HOPE, and CHARITY.

Columbille's Hymn to the Angels.

I.

Oh! which may be the brightest, best—
The fairer star beyond the rest—
Which ought I welcome to my breast?

Of all the seven Archangels.

Tho' each may choose his favourite own,
To me no brighter makes him known,
Than all together—all in one—

My favourite, seven Archangels.

II.

Michael, Raphael, Uriel—ye

To others may more welcome be,

But not one less than all for me—

Ye flaming seven Archangels.

Gabriel, Sariel, Romuel bright—

Let others woo your rapturous light,

But bend to me no less their flight,

Than seven sublime Archangels.

III.

True! Michael best repels the foe,

And Raphael heals the heart of woe,

And Uriel burns the breast of snow,

Among the seven Archangels.

True! Gabriel's tidings turned our doom,

And Sariel spreads his rich perfume,

And Romuel waves the proudest plume,

Yet equal all my Archangels—

IV.

Thou seventh sublime seraphic dove,

Tho' some bestow on thee their love—

And trust their tears to thee, above

The six supreme Archangels;

Yet not to thee alone will I

Entrust my tear, my sob, my sigh:

But to my arms you all shall fly—

Ye seven serene Archangels.

V.

Tho' all in splendour's garb be rolled,

And each be bright as sun of gold,

Yet ne'er shall I a favourite hold,

Save all the seven Archangels.

Let others choose but one, or two,

For me such choice will never do,

I must have all my seraphs true—

Seven sublime Archangels.

MIGUEL.

A Thought on Calvary.

Crown'd and throned, King Jesus, bleeding,

Reigns in gory pomp on high:

Men around, like devils, taunt him,

Tears of angels dim the sky.

Awful ichor, wave immortal,

O'er a suppliant sinner roll;

Cleanse me in your purple torrents,

Heal, revive, inspire my soul.

From thy wounded breast, my Saviour,
 Lo! the saving fountains play,
 Royal river! in thy flowing
 Wash my scarlet guilt away.
 But, my soul! what mortal sadness
 Hangs on Jesus' brow the while,
 And a God-like sorrow mingles
 With th' expiring victor's smile?
 Ah! for us His heart is breaking.
 Yes, for Man—the cold ingrate,
 Who returns a God's affection
 With a worse than demon hate.
 Not the nails that tear each fibre—
 Not the spear his heart within—
 Lacerate that loving bosom
 Like our crushing load of sin.
 He had smil'd on Calv'ty's altar,
 Sweet as when enthron'd above.
 Were his countless pangs rewarded
 By our dearly-purchased love—
 But our cold and heartless torpor
 Rises on his shrinking view;
 Not alone His veins are streaming,
 But His soul is bleeding too.
 Jesus! stay my shuddering spirit,
 Horror loads my struggling breath,
 I am guilty of thy murder,
 I have sold my God to death.
 Oh can Earth—can Hell have torments
 That for crime like this atone?
 Wilt thou rise and crush creation,
 Thundering from thine awful throne?
 Shall the lovely stars, extinguished,
 Be a howling waste again;
 And red lightnings blast for ever
 Ev'ry trace of guilty Men?
 Hark! he speaks, "For all my anguish—
 All my blood and tortures here—
 All thy malice—grant me only,
 Contrite sinner, one pure tear!"

The Country of St. Patrick,

AND THE

PLACE WHERE HE WAS CAPTURED.

THE following notice of a subject of controversy which has been disposed of, by some of our historical writers, more summarily than satisfactorily, it is hoped may not be misplaced in this periodical. Mr. Moore referring to St. Patrick's origin, observes—"His own Confession,* a work of acknowledged genuineness, proves him to have been a native of the old Gallician or Armoric Gaul." "Patrem habui Calpornium Diaconum filium quondam Potiti presbyteri qui fuit in vico Bonavem Taberniae: villulam Enon prope habuit ubi capturam dedi."†
 "Dr. Lanigan,† observes Moore, "has shown clearly that the place here mentioned was in Armoric Gaul, being the same town as Boulogne sur Mer, in Piccardy." . . . "The country," he adds, "anciently known by this name, comprised the whole of the northwest coasts of Gaul; and in that territory now called Boulogne, St. Patrick, it appears, was born." The account of St. Patrick's origin, given in the Confession, does not prove him, however, to have been a native of Armoric Gaul; neither does any ancient geographer state that Armoric Gaul comprised the territory now called Boulogne. No such extension eastward was given to Armoric Gaul.

Mr. Moore's statement rests on the authority of Dr. Lanigan,§ who says that "Boulogne was well known to the Romans under the name of Gessoriacum; but about the reign of Constantine the Great, the Celtic name Bonavem, or Bonaun, alias Bonon, which was latinized into Bononia, became more general." This statement is said to be taken from a passage in Hadrianus Valesius, but on referring to that passage, we find it merely stated, that "in the time of Constantine, the Galls began to call Gessoriacum "Bononia." Lanigan makes the name Bonavem—a compound of two Celtic words—Bon "mouth," and Aven "river;" and the addition of Tabernia, he says, marks its having been in the district of Tarvanna or Tarvenna, alias Tarabanna, a celebrated city not far from Boulogne, the ruins of which are now called Tarrabannensis. In none of the old geographers do I find this district called by the name above mentioned—the territory now of Boulogne is termed by all of them, that of the Morini. Altogether this effort to identify Bonavem with Boulogne, and Taberna with Tarvanna, is too much strained to satisfy the enquiry or convince the enquirer of the truth of the assertion.

Colgan considers Alcuin the site of the place called Nemthur, which St. Fiesch sets down as the birth place of St. Patrick. Lanigan, in support of his hypothesis, states that there is in the Bolouguese territory a district called Neustria—and Nemthur, is accordingly transferred into Neustria or Nesstria, on the authority of a passage in Probus, where reference is made to Bonavem, "which town," he says, "we indubitably find to be in the province of Neutria, formerly inhabited by giants.¶ Yet, Probus calls St. Patrick a Briton, and in some old breviaries and chronicles, he is so styled likewise, but in later ages the word great has been added to the name Britain, which is spoken of as his country; and in some French breviaries the word great is substituted by that of Gallican. This Gallic-Britain, Lanigan observes, Probus had in view, and says that writer clearly shows the country of the Morini, or the Bolouguese, was included in the territory of that of Brittany, and is so described by Pliny. His capture then he maintains was the consequence of a visit to his relations in the Brittanies—"Et iterum post paucos annos in Britannis eram cum parentibus meis."* Lanigan referring to this passage, states that "St. Patrick, in his Confessions, mentions his country under the name of Britannie." The passage, however, literally rendered, states that "he was in the Brittanies with his relatives" at the time of his capture; but the mode of expression from analogous passages, where proceeding to a place is rendered in similar terms, would lead one to believe the meaning of it was, that he was on a voyage into Bretagne with his relations when he was captured.

After six or seven years spent in slavery in Ireland, the saint effected his escape. In his Confessions he says he travelled 200 miles, over land, to "where the ship was;" and on his arrival there, he adds, "we then set sail, and after three days reached land." The probable length of voyage from the south-west coast of Ireland to that of Normandy or Brittany. Some say he landed at Treguier, in the latter province. Now it took him twenty-eight days to reach his native country from Treguier, or whatever the place was called, where he landed in Gaul, and all this journey was through a desert country. In his own words—"Et viginti octo dies per desertum iter fecimus."* If Treguier was the place where he landed, as Lanigan supposes, how did it come to pass that it took him twenty-eight days to reach Boulogne, and how does it happen that the intermediate country is called a desert? Does not both the time taken in the journey, and the character given to the country he traversed, correspond better with that region of the Franks on which Rhenish Taverna was situated, and the country between it and Brittany? Lanigan refers to another passage in the Confessions, for a confirmation of the saint's origin in Armoric Gaul, where the same mode of expression is thus corrected by him, with the addition of the word in brackets—"ut pergens in Britannias et libentissime paratus eram quasi ad patriam et parentes non id solum sed eram [paratus] usque Gallias visitare fratres et ut viderem faciem Sanctorum Domini mei."† He had a great wish to go to the Brittanias (as to his country and his relatives), and to proceed as far as the Gauls, for the purpose of seeing his brothers and the saints of God.

In the fifth century, it is stated, there was an emigration, into Armoric Gaul, of some fugitives from the opposite coast of Britain; but long previously to that period, a people called Britons inhabited that part of Gaul. Bede says the Britons of Albion came originally from the Armoric region. "In primis autem haec insula Britones solum, a quibus nomen accepit, incolae habuit qui de tractu Armoricano, ut fertur Britanniam advecti australes sibi partes illius vindicarunt."‡

But if Armoric Gaul was not the country of the saint, it is certain he regarded it with affection, because it was the country in which his uncle, St. Martin, and some of his family were living; and might not the country of the Gauls, which extended beyond the Rhine, in which St. Martin was born, and where probably some of his family might then be living, better correspond with the account given of the distant place he was desirous of visiting? He refers elsewhere to the country of his family, and gives it to be understood it was distant from Ireland where he then was, and from which country he could not absent himself on account of the duties of his mission. "Timeo laborem quem ego inchoavi."§ If his relations had been living in Britany, there would have been less difficulty for him to have visited his family, or for his relatives to have come to him, for Ireland, though it might be in relation to Belgic Gaul, what he calls "the extremity of the world," it could not have been so with respect to Armoric Gaul.

The country which is described as Armoric Gaul, by Magini, the celebrated geographer and commentator on Ptolemy, "comprehended the Gallic Aquitaine lying between the Loire and the Seine, and the coast of Brittany and Gascony. This region is called Armorica, by Pliny, to which (says Magini) belong Bearne, Navarre, Bigorre, Gascony, with Comminges, Armaignac, Albrete, besides that part of Biscay facing Gaul. Then beyond the (northward) Poictou, Tancoigne, Perigort, Quercy, Auvergne, Berry Turenne (Tours), Salonie, the Borbonnois, Forrest, and Villay de Puy." These limits comprehend the greater part of the coast of Brittany, and totally exclude Piccardy and the region of the Boulonnais. The country now called La Bretagne, and not Boulogne, then corresponds to the region referred to by Probus, as close to the Western Ocean. Its north-western boundary extended along the coast of Lower Brittany, and Probus states that the Taverna referred to was situated at the northern extremity of Bretagne, not far from the Western Ocean.

M'Geoghegan, strange to say, with the account of St. Patrick's origin as given in his Confession before him, made English the territory of Tabernia, and St. Patrick a Briton; his words are—

"Il etoit natif de la Grande Bretagne. Il naquit dans un village qu'il nomme lui meme dans sa confession, 'Bonaven' un territoire Tabernia, 'in vico Bonaver Tabernia,' a l'extremite septentrionale de la Bretagne, et peu eloigné dit Probus de la mer occidentale; de vico Bonnavæ, Taburnia regionis haud procul a mare occidentale."

Bishop Nicholson says—"I have read in an ancient Irish manuscript, whose authority I cannot dispute, that St. Patrick and his two sisters were brought captives into Ireland from Armorica or Brittany in the kingdom of France."

There is another reason for supposing Brittany a more likely place for his abode than Piccardy, its vicinity to the see of his uncle St. Martin (or of his cousin, as some without good reason will have him). In his Confessions, St. Patrick states he was sixteen years of age when he was sold into slavery,* with others of his countrymen, to a Northern chieftain. The prevailing opinion as to the pirates by whom he was carried away being natives of Ireland—it is by no means improbable—is destitute of foundation, the practice of stealing and selling men was common among their Gallic and Britannic neighbours;† that of buying slaves from the latter belonged to the Irish, and the crime was that of nearly all the nations of antiquity.

The manner of his captivity has been detailed by a writer of his life of the early part of the seventh century, St. Evin, abbot of M'Greon, to whom Jocelin owns himself to be obliged. Brooke cites this account of St. Evin in his Essay on the ancient and modern state of Ireland:

"His (St. Patrick's) father and mother, brother, and five sisters, undertook a voyage to Armoric Gaul, now called Basse Bretagne, to visit the relations of his mother, Conchessa.

"It happened about this time, that the seven sons of Tactmude, a British Prince, were banished, and took to the sea; making an inroad into Armoric Gaul, they took Patrick and his sister Lupita (some say Tigrida) also prisoners. They brought their captives to the north of Ireland, and sold Patrick to Milcho Mac Huanan, a prince of Dalradia."

Brooke's, it must be added, impressed with the generally received opinion of St. Patrick's British origin, leans to the fabulous account of the saint's place of captivity having been in Scotland. What deserves attention is the account of the voyage of St. Patrick, his mother, brother, and sisters, to Armoric Gaul to visit his mother's relatives. His uncle, it is to be remembered, was then living at Tours, and a voyage by sea from Boulogne to Brittany would have been an improbable occurrence with a view of getting to Tours.

If St. Patrick was born and captured in Armoric

† O'Flaherty says the Franks, as well as the Saxons, committed piratical depredations along the coasts of Belgica and Armorica, in the reign of Diocletian.

Gaul, it is then evident that it was not in the region now called Boulogne, but in some part of Basse Bretagne. It seems strange that those, with the exception of Usher, who have made the question of the birth-place of St. Patrick the subject of enquiry, have not commenced by ascertaining the early history of a member of his family, whose eminence was likely to make his country and his history matters of some notoriety. With that view the writer of this notice endeavoured to ascertain all that was known of St. Martin of Tours. Enquiries in this direction might furnish very plausible grounds for believing that St. Patrick was born in Taverna, a town which the old geographers place in Alsace, bordering on the Rhine, or in a maritime town named Enona, in that region now called Illyria, formerly Pannonia, on the Adriatic shore, in the same country which was the birth-place of St. Martin.

Usher observes, that St. Martin was a native of Sabaria, in Pannonia, and that it is probable his sister, the mother of St. Patrick, being of the same country had followed him into Gaul. The accounts we have of the relatives of St. Patrick, favour the opinion of the Belgic or German descent of his family, rather than the Gallic, and the names of all the persons connected with him are, evidently, more of German than of Gallic origin.

Potitus, a priest, was his grandfather; Calpornius, a deacon, his father; Conchessa, his mother; Darecla, Tigrida, Lupita, Lienania, and Cinnenum, his sisters; Secunden, Mel, and Loman, his nephews. It is necessary, however, to observe, that little dependence is to be placed on those accounts of the saint's relatives. Colgan asserts that Saints Darecla, and Lienania are one and the same person; and Lanigan abolishes one of the disputed parties altogether, and asserts that Darecla died in 518, or fifty-three years after the death of St. Patrick, in 465; Usher, Colgan, and the Four Masters, however, state that St. Patrick died in 493. Lanigan calls in question the account of the relationship of the above-named persons with our saint, chiefly on account of the absurd stories connected with their histories: for instance, Tigrida, one of his sisters, is stated by Jocelin to have had seventeen sons, who all became bishops, priests, or monks, and five daughters, all nuns. In the Tripartite Darerca, the saint's sister, in order, it would seem, to enhance her merit, and to bring it nearly to a level with Tigrida's, is made the mother of seventeen bishops more, but of only two nuns; while Cinnenum has a smaller quota of filial prelates, priests, and deacons allotted to her. Lupita passes with our biographer for a virgin, and for a matron—and a mother with another. Lanigan and Tillemont, on account of this wholesale manufacture of bishops, priests, monks, and nuns, reject the parents, to whom a pious fraud, not unfrequent in those times, gave a marvellous progeny of bishops and religious men and women. But, though we may reasonably reject the marvellous progeny, the fiction of the latter is rather an argument for the existence of the persons whose eminent piety is thus made the peg of religious enthusiasm whereon to hang all the little exuberances of zeal and absurdities of biographical extravagance. In an old Spanish work, entitled "Flores de Espana excellencias de Portugal," describing the pre-eminent perfection of the women of the latter country,* mention is made of the case of Maria Marcella, born in Avile, the Archbishopric of Braga, who was brought to bed of seven male children at one birth, all of whom lived to become priests, and to hold benefices, whose names were inscribed on the sepulchre of the mother in the chapel of St. Domingo, in Chaves. The pious author maintains the credit of his prolific country-women against Ravisius Textor, who gives the marvellous account of Margaret, Countess of Holland, who brought forth 363 children at a birth, and does away with all the merit of the countess's fecundity, by disparaging the size of her numerous offspring—he makes them out so small that they were hardly worth speaking about, "eran como pequenos pullos," and moreover the 363 Dutch babies all died. The probability that such persons existed as Maria Marcella of Chaves, and Margaret, Countess of Holland, is not done away with by the absurdities of the writers above referred to.

Sulpitius, the disciple of St. Martin, in his life of the latter, says, that St. Martin of Tours was born in Sabaria, in Pannonia,* but was brought up respectably by parents, not of the lower class of pagans at Sicinum or Pavia in Italy.† St. Martin's father was a soldier, and afterwards a tribune. He visited France and settled at manhood at Poitiers, in Aquitaine in France, with the bishop of that place, St. Hilary, where he was instructed and directed by him. Afterwards he founded a monastery at Milan—was driven away—returned to France and was made bishop of Tours. He died there, in his eighty-first year, in 410, in the first year of the pontificate of Anastasius.‡

The names Bonaven, Taberniæ, or Bonaven, or Taberniæ, are not to be found in Strabo, Pomponius Mela, Ptolemy, Pliny, Paulus Orosius, nor in the later geographers, Ortelius, Magini, or Girava, but old Sebastian Munster, in his German Geography, makes mention of a town in Alsace, not far from Strasbourg, of the name of Taberniæ, a corruption, he says, from Taverna.§ "Taverna was a Roman fortress, built or restored by Julius Cæsar, which he surrounded with twenty-five towers, and strengthened the walls with 365 buttresses, in correspondence with his division of the solar year into twenty-five weeks and 365 days."

In 1525, this place was the scene of dreadful slaughter, occasioned by the Reformation. "The Romans," continues Munster,|| "had three Tavernas near the Rhine, for the winter quarters of their troops—one at Alsace, which is now possessed by the Argentine (or Cologne) bishops; the Rhenish Taberna, whose lord is the Bishop of Spire;¶ and the Taberna of the mountains, a mile distant from Vaussenburg."

We find, then, in ancient time, a "Taverna," in Alsace, "juxta Rhenum," and that St. Patrick, in his Confessions, states that he was born in Bonavem Taberniæ. Whether the latter was used as a proper name, or the designation of a place of encampment generally applied to the sites of places that had been winter quarters of the Romans, is uncertain. The name Bonavem, or Bonaven, we look for in vain in the ancient geographies, no such name is mentioned in any of them. The Spire, formerly called Nemesus, adjoins that Taberna described by Sebastian Munster. St. Fiesch, in his life of the saint, says, that he was born at Nemturris, "natus est Patricius Nemturri;" Ptolemy in his Geography names Nementuripa, but this town he situates in Navarre; the Rhenish Taberna, Munster places under the dominion of the Bishop of Spire, the ancient Nemesus, but the Alsacian Taberna under the government of the Bishop of Cologne, and it is the Alsacian one, he says, which was remarkable for its twenty-five towers. The Nemesus of the former, and the towers of the latter, might have given the name of Nemturris to some intermediate place. The great difficulty, however, to the supposition, that this place might have been the town mentioned by St. Fiesch, is the distance from Alsace to the nearest part of the sea-coast which is on the Adriatic, and St. Patrick's account, which leads us to imagine that the place of his birth and of his capture were not far distant. The analogy, moreover, in the names above referred to, may be somewhat strained, but in that which follows I think the reference that is drawn is not liable to the same objection.

St. Sulpitius's account of St. Martin's birth-place, I find confirmed by Sebastian Munster, in these words, in his description of Hungary and that part of it which comprised Pannonia: "Secundum Taladiensem comitatum Castriferrensensis est ubi Sabaria vetusta quondam civitas quae divi Martini patria fuit."* This city of Sabaria, in or adjoining the field of tents, the birth-place of St. Martin, lay towards the Danube, and not far distant from the river Araban. The two Pannonias were divided by the Danube, and the inferior extended nearly to the Rhine. Jocelin explains the name Taberna as signifying the field of tents, because, he adds, the Roman army had encamped there. So that we find the birth-place of St. Martin, Sabaria, in Pannonia, was a place of tents; and the birth-place of St. Patrick, in Taberna Bonavem, probably of the same description. One of his biographers expressly states he was born in the place of tents; Colgan says the same: "Patricius natus est in Campo Taburnia campus autem tabernaculorum, ob hoc dictus est eo quod in eo Romani exercitus quodam tempore tabernacula sua ibi statuerunt hyemali frigore."

Lanigan ridicules the idea of Taberna being the name of the site of a Roman encampment in which there were tents or tabernacles, because the proper term would have been Castra and not Taberna. Lanigan is certainly mistaken in this inference. I need only refer to Sebastian Munster's account of the Taberna's and Sabaria to show this error. In his Confession, St. Patrick states that his father had a small villa at Enon, not far from his place of birth, Taberna, where he was captured. In none of the ancient geographers is this name to be found; but in Ptolemy we have a name very nearly resembling it, Enona, a town in maritime Illyria of Pannonia, on the Adriatic. In the "Geographia Universa" of Cluverius,† the town of Enona is set down, in his chart of Pannonia, on the Illyrian coast of the Adriatic, between Istria and Dalmatia, in Liburnia, a place intersected with deep bays and sheltered by several small islands, such a place as pirates might be supposed to haunt.‡ The coincidence is very striking, of a maritime town of the same country in which St. Martin was born, differing only in a letter from the name of that place where the Saint was captured. The literal translation of the passage in the Confession is as follows: "My father was Calpurnius, a deacon, son of a certain priest, Potitus, who was (dwelling) in the village of Bonavem, of Taberna; he had a small villa near Enon, where I suffered capture." Lanigan renders the words, villulam Enon prope habuit, "he had a small villa, Enoir, near the town," which entirely alters the sense of the passage. The existence of any town of the name of Enoir—the proximity of the region of the Rhenish Taberna,* to that part of Pannonia which was the country of St. Martin, is deserving of attention. But the difficulty that exists is the distance from the Taberna of the Rhine, and the maritime town Enona, southward of the Danube: which two places are separated by three provinces. The paragraph in the confession, though it does not give us to understand that they were near or adjoining towns, does not lead us to imagine that a maritime villa on the Adriatic, would be possessed by an inhabitant of a town on the Rhine.

This difficulty would be insuperable, if the passage literally and accurately expressed the writer's meaning, which many other passages in the same work do not. It seems by no means improbable that his father was a native of Pannonia, of that country in which it is reasonable to believe that Conchessa, the wife of the latter was born, as it was the native place of her brother, St. Martin. If such were the case, the probability of St. Patrick's father possessing a place on the Adriatic, in the same region which had been the residence of his family, after his removal to the presumed place of his ministry at Taberna, would be obvious.

Lanigan has partly founded his hypothesis on the analogy between the name Taberna and Tarabanna; it would not be much more far-fetched to derive Bonavem or Bonaven, from Pannonia or Bannonia, for, by the latter corrupted name, Munster states that Pannonia was, at one time, called. The fact that I rely on is, that St. Patrick's parents were of the same country as St. Martin, and that country was Pannonia. The inferences drawn from it, and from the various circumstances referred to in the several works I have noticed, are, that the sphere of the duties of the Saint's father was in another province of Cisrhenan Germany, in the Alsacian Taberna, where St. Patrick was born; and that the place of capture, or at which, having embarked, he was captured, was the town of Enona, on the Adriatic, near which his father's original place of residence might have been situated.

If it be objected, that in those early times (the period of St. Patrick's capture) the pirates of England or Gaul did not extend their voyages beyond the coast of France, it may be answered that they conveyed their English slaves to Rome, in the time of Gregory the great, and it is not to be supposed that these slaves were brought there overland. If these observations, intended only to be suggestive of further enquiry, be founded on reasonable presumptions, where there are no authenticated facts to rely on, it may perhaps be admitted, at least, that with such data as are now before us, there is a greater probability that St. Patrick was a Frank of Germany than a Gaul of Brittany, or that region of the Morini, in which the modern Boulogne is situated.

Maynooth College.

WHAT varied feelings, and recollections, will awake in the bosoms of our numerous and widely-scattered clerical readers, as the picture of their venerated Alma Mater, Maynooth College, slowly rises before them! Incidents once clothed with ephemeral importance, now in the dim distance of many years, dwindled into insignificance; hopes and fears that the stern realities of after-life would now show to have been groundless or puerile, but which faithful memory testifies to have once engaged all the interest of the adolescent soul; friendly intimacies that then promised to endure for ever, long since broken up, nay, scarcely remembered. And all the little circumstances of college life, how they do return at the mention of Maynooth! We seem once more to hear the sound of the great but too vigilant college bell, summoning the youthful recruits of the Irish church from their healthy slumbers, and sending them trooping, after a few moments, to their common devotions in the spacious prayer-hall; and then we think of the well-ordered and almost incessant pacing around the extensive corridors, whenever outdoor exercise might have been unattainable; and the loud buz, and the laugh, and the friendly argument and joke by which the pent-up spirits took to themselves compensation for long silence and confinement. Maynooth College—yes, and when thy name is heard, we bethink us, how, some twenty summers since, having perpetrated the usual sonorous lesson about notes Gregorian, we were wont to sally forth on our Wednesday walks through the surrounding country, with caps and cloaks of every shade of black, from the deep unsullied jet of the freshman, to the venerable but faded russet of the respected senior; agile limbs clearing ditch and fence, and the startled hares which abound in Carton's princely demesne flying from their forms in the tender corn, met by foes at every turn, and frequently captured by the overwhelming disproportion of these numerous biped beagles. Or, transported in imagination—it is evening, and we are seated at the window of our diminutive apartment, looking out upon the noble avenue of elms, which, stretching away from the rear of the college, terminates at the Royal Canal. The sinking sun, pouring all its tempered radiance upon the opposite windows, lights them up with a thousand mimic fires; the multitudinous armies of rooks, who seem to have ever had a special predilection for getting through their evening roll-call directly over the college buildings, are slowly drawing away their noisy forces:

Agmine magno
Corvorum increpuit densis exercitus alis.

They are retiring to their umbrageous homes in Carton's interminable woods—as the same gentle Mantuan hath it:

Progeniem parvam dulcesque revisere nidos.
"To their forsaken nests—and callow care."

I Georgics, 414.

A few parting notes from the thrush, in a neighbouring tree, are sent forth with a gushing exuberant energy, that proclaims all its little heart to be in the song, echoing again through the vesper stillness—and stillness it is, indeed, because 'tis now the hour for study, and profound silence reigns through the halls and chambers of this vast building. Here and there figures may be seen gliding by, passing and meeting, but not a word is interchanged, until the iron-throated bell once more disturbs the quiet, and summons them to other duties.

Since that peaceful routine of life was our own, what "strange eventful scenes" and unlooked-for events have come forth from the womb of time! We have seen many a proud and prosperous one humbled, and many a light and happy heart seared deeply by grief, and loving circles broken up and scattered o'er the wide world, and Divine Providence in a thousand unknown and unsuspected ways, working wonderfully its great ends of reward and retribution. Oh! how many heart-harrowing scenes have we witnessed during that time! how many burthened and bursting hearts have sought comfort and advice! what innumerable forms of human suffering have we encountered! to how many hundreds, nay, thousands, has it been our lot to administer the last solemn rites of religion, whilst contemplating the death-struggle that was traced on the half-glazed eye and clammy brow, and endeavouring with many a word of holy hope to sooth the trembling and departing spirit! Such is the life of the Irish Priest.

During such a dreamy retrospect of Maynooth its minor characteristics, and subsequent events, there is one reflection most likely to arise—a painful one, no doubt, yet not without its uses—and that is, how fearfully death has thinned the ranks of those whom we knew in early college life. In our own times we had amongst the superiors and professors the venerable and learned French refugees, Anglade and Delahogue; we had the late admirable bishop of Cloyne, Dr. Crotty; the erudite Slevin; the late primate, Dr. Kelly; the accomplished scholar, Dr. Boylan—these and many others of that rank are now no more; sleeping, we trust, the sleep of peace. And oh! what a host of others, companions and friends, called away since that to the reward of their labours. But never has death been so busy amongst the ranks of the Irish clergy as for the last two sad years of famine and fever.

In the midst of a low level tract of land, distant about fifteen English miles from the metropolis, and at the extremity of a wide, straight street of tolerably-built houses, which may be considered a continuation of the fine avenue leading to Carton—the princely demesne of Ireland's solitary Duke—the front entrance to Maynooth College greets the eye of the visitor. As you enter through the handsome gate of Portland stone, ornamented with figures of sphinxes and lions, you feel there is a sober, solemn air about the place, in agreeable accordance with the nature of the establishment. This is owing greatly to the massive fragments of the old castle of Maynooth, which was once the residence of the princely Fitzgeralds; these ruins are immediately outside the gate, at the right hand as you enter, and they remind the traveller of the days of the eighth Harry, when Sir William Skeffington, the Lord Deputy, together with Brereton, sat down before its lofty walls, garrisoned by the adherents of that unfortunate Geraldine, Silken Thomas. It was soon taken—treachery accomplishing what could not be achieved by force; for, says O'Daly, the biographer of the Geraldines, "this castle was impregnable,"* and even its present dilapidated relics give evidence of its former strength. It was erected in the year 1426.

The front of the college consists of a projecting centre, which is the building originally purchased by the trustees, to which were immediately added two wings; the whole facade being about 400 feet in extent. Two further ranges of building were subsequently erected, making three sides of a quadrangle, and very large buildings in the immediate vicinity, which it were uselessly tedious to particularize here, especially as, under the direction of the celebrated Pugin, another extension of the college is being made, the foundations of which are, at the present writing, above ground.

The College of Maynooth was founded in the year 1795—the bill for that purpose having received the royal assent, on the fifth of June, in that year. Like every act on the part of England, wearing the semblance of concession, the endowment of Maynooth College was more truly wrung from its fears and dictated by its policy, than attributable to its justice or generosity. Despite of every effort, the Catholics of Ireland, at that period, had become a numerous and were daily becoming a most influential body; from their ranks were taken the bone and sinew of the British army and navy—now, above all other times, most needed against the dreaded arms of the French Republic. In no country under heaven, then as well as now, did the Catholic clergy wield a greater influence on their laity: both the one and the other had long writhed beneath the cruel scourge of English persecution; and slowly and grudgingly was that parliament which called itself Irish, and which was too soon to enact so pitiful a part before the world, beginning to relax the bloody code, which though indebted for its birth to the mistress country, found ready and merciless sponsors in our own. Then, too, was it perceived how suicidal was the policy, which would continue to send the pastors of such a people to mould their feelings, and imbibe their politics in the college halls of Paris, Bourdeaux, Louvain, Salamanca, and Rome; and it was resolved at last to provide at home for the education of the Roman Catholic clergy, thus guarding them, it was to be hoped, from a dangerous sympathy with England's enemies—and establishing a specious claim on their confidence and gratitude. This determination, however, on the part of the government, had been preceded by an important movement of the Catholic body towards the same end.

There had been a temporary suspension of the system of continental education, in consequence of the bloody and devastating wars between the various European powers. Hostile fleets and roving privateers swarmed in the adjacent seas; and in consequence of the irreligious fury of the French hordes overspreading every land, many of the peaceful abodes of learning were abandoned in terror by the students. Thus the fountain, from which the Irish mission had been hitherto supplied, threatened to become dry; at any rate, it appeared expedient that our people should no longer be dependent, if possible, on a source so precarious.†

So early as 1792, the Catholic leaders, amongst whom was the celebrated John Keogh, suggested plans for the foundation of an Irish and National College for the Catholic clergy. The occasion was a favourable one for such a design, as the Relief-bill which was passed in the spring of 1793, besides conferring the elective franchise on the Catholics, together with other privileges, permitted them to endow colleges and schools. Carlow College had been completed and opened in the course of that year, for the education of lay and ecclesiastical students, but it was obviously inadequate to meet the necessities of the Irish mission. The general committee or convention of the Roman Catholics, when dissolving at their last meeting, on the 25th of April, 1793, appointed a committee, consisting of the following gentlemen—Hugh Hamill, Thomas Broughall, John Sweetman, John Keogh, Edward Byrne, R. McCormick, and D. T. O'Brien, Esqrs., "to consult, communicate, and correspond upon the best and most effectual means of procuring an improved system of education for the Catholic youth of the kingdom; and of forming, when practicable, such establishment as may be most conducive thereto."

With right hearty zeal did the gentlemen entrusted by the general committee proceed to their work. They had agreed amongst themselves as to the general principles of the plan, viz., that whilst it embraced the Catholic youth, it should not exclude those of any other religion; that it should depend on the people for its support, and be subject to the joint controul of the clergy and laity. They then entered into a correspondence with different parts of the kingdom, and nothing could exceed the alacrity with which sums of money were at once subscribed, in furtherance of this noble object—promising to realize the brightest anticipations of its originators; they then submitted their

"The scholars generally went to the public schools or universities; otherwise, the number of masters would have been at least double. The whole number of scholars in the Colleges of the Lombards, Nantz, Doway, Antwerp, and twenty in Bourdeaux, received priests' orders before they went abroad; and, by the exercise of their functions, were enabled to support themselves during the course of their studies. Of the whole number, there were supported by foundations 160, and by the exercise of their functions as priests 260."

general principles to the prelates, the majority of whom expressed their cordial approbation. At one of their meetings with the prelates, Dr. Reilly, the primate; Dr. Troy, Archbishop of Dublin; and four others who were present, made very considerable offers of pecuniary aid, and Dr. Reilly proposed a plan, something to the following effect: that there should be a grammar school in each diocese, where the lower branches of education might be taught elementarily; that there should be four provincial academies, where such youths as were designed for the church, for other professions, or literary pursuits should be received from the diocesan schools, and instructed in the languages and sciences; lastly, that there should be one grand seminary, in which those who had passed through the provincial schools should be entered, for the purpose of standing public examinations: such as were destined for the church to receive the necessary testimonials for their ordination; and such as were otherwise disposed, to qualify themselves for degrees in whatever college they should think fit, which might be authorized by law to confer those dignities.

The preceding plan was referred to Dr. M'Nevin and some other gentlemen, in order that the details might be more explicitly brought forward; and every thing promised a successful issue to this attempt, at forming a great comprehensive system of education for the Catholic body.

It was at this period, however, that the Catholic bishops presented an address to the king and lord lieutenant, expressive of their unshaken loyalty and grateful affection to his majesty's person, approving of the suppression of Defenderism, and deploring that so many concerned in that unhappy system were of their communion. The popular leaders became alarmed; there was something about this address that dissatisfied them—it savoured, they thought, too much of adulation, and might lead to a too close connexion with a government whose tyrannical acts were fresh in their memories, and whose new-born kindness they despised as a concession, merely, to imperious necessity. Thus were the seeds of dissension scattered; and, shortly afterwards, it was intimated to the gentlemen engaged in maturing the popular plan of education, above alluded to, that they might desist from any further labour, as an arrangement had been made, by which Catholic education would be conducted solely by the bishops, under the auspices of government, and sanctioned by act of parliament.

On January the 14th, 1794, the Catholic prelates presented an address to the lord lieutenant (the Earl of Westmoreland), in which, after stating how, of those designed for the Catholic ministry, 400 had to resort to foreign countries, they prayed the establishment, in Ireland, of a Catholic college; adding,

“Your Excellency's memorialists also beg leave, humbly, to represent, that although the mode of education practised in the University of Dublin may be well adapted for the various departments of public business, yet it is not alike applicable to the ecclesiastics of a very ritual religion, and by no means calculated to impress upon the mind those habits of austere discipline so indispensable in the character of a Roman Catholic clergyman, that without them he might become a very dangerous member of society.

“That a distinct place of education is also necessary, because the regulations of the Catholic church enjoin, that candidates for holy orders shall be proficient in certain branches of learning which are not included in the exercises of the University of Dublin. That even where the Roman Catholic religion is the established religion, candidates for holy orders are obliged to receive the most important part of their education in seminaries, distinct from the public universities.

“Being advised, by counsel, that his Majesty's royal license is necessary, in order to secure legally the funds which they may appropriate for that purpose, they humbly beg leave to solicit your Excellency's recommendation to our most gracious Sovereign, that he will be pleased to grant his royal license for the endowment of academies or seminaries for educating and preparing young persons to discharge the duties of Roman Catholic clergymen in this kingdom, under ecclesiastical superiors of their own communion.”

This document bore the signature of John Thomas Troy, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, “for myself and on behalf of the Roman Catholic communion in Ireland,” January 14, 1794.

Government kindly went beyond the humble prayer of this memorial, and on the 23rd of April, 1795, during the viceroyalty of Lord Camden, leave was given to bring in a bill for applying the sum of £10,000 “granted to his majesty, or part thereof, for establishing a college for the better education of persons professing the Popish or Roman Catholic religion and intended for the clerical ministry thereof.” The Act by which the College of Maynooth was founded, and which is technically styled 35 Geo. III., c. 21, was introduced on the 1st of May, and by it twenty-one trustees—namely, the Chancellor and the three Chief Judges, six Roman Catholic laymen, ten of their bishops, and Dr. Hussey—were appointed, for the purpose of “establishing endowing, and maintaining one academy, for the education only of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion.” It then authorized these trustees to receive subscriptions and donations to enable them to carry this object into effect: it gave them the power of appointing the resident-professors and allotting their salaries; no Protestant, or son of a Protestant, was to be received into the college under certain penalties, and £8000 were to be granted towards establishing it.

It appears curious enough, that a petition against this bill was presented from the liberal party amongst the Roman Catholics, by Mr. Grattan. They urged that undue power was given to these trustees—the mere nominees of the government; that they could appoint professors and scholars on the foundation, without any examination into their merits or qualifications; and, finally, that the plan of education obstructed the educating together Roman Catholics and Protestants, and thus kept up a line of separation which the true interests of the country required should be entirely abolished. This remonstrance, however, availed nought, and the bill was passed without any alteration.

There were some “burning and shining” lights connected with the early history of our college. Its first President, Dr. Hussey, was a man held in the highest repute for learning and prudence, and he enjoyed the friendship of the great Edmund Burke, at whose death-bed, it was confidently reported, he attended in his spiritual capacity. There were two eminent French Professors, Delort and Darre; Drs. Flood and Aherne had earned continental fame as Theologians: then there was Clinch, the learned and truly eloquent author of letters on church government—in the language of an eulogist of his, who can scarcely be said to exaggerate, “he was a linguist, a canonist, a divine, a historian, a mathematician, a rhetorician, a poet, and a philosopher”

“Who ran

Through each mode of the lyre and was master of all.”

John Chetwood Eustace, the classical tourist of sunny Italy, whose dust now reposes in Naples, was the first professor of English elocution; and there were Delahogue and Anglade, and Usher, and, last not least, the amiable and learned Ferris, whose “memory is in benediction,” and who, after a chequered career of forty-five years in various parts of Europe, returned at last to bestow the hived-up wisdom and acquirements, of so many years, on his own beloved country. These were illustrious names; yet what talent could be expected to vegetate under the stunted patronage of a suspicious government? In the year 1806, the propriety of increasing the annual grant from £8000 to £13000 was brought before the British parliament by Sir J. Newport; on that occasion Lord Howick adverted to the efforts made by the French government, through the agency of the Rev. Dr. Walsh, ex-president of the Irish College at Paris, to induce the Irish, English, and Scotch ecclesiastical students, then on the continent, to re-unite in one grand seminary in that metropolis, and under the patronage of Napoleon, Hugh Murat, &c. This Dr. Walsh went so far as to invite the students of St. Patrick's College, at Lisbon, to repair at once to Paris, holding out to them various inducements to do so, and this invitation was considered of so much importance, or so much danger, as to draw forth an indignant protest against Dr. Walsh's proceeding, addressed to Dr. Crotty, at that time president of the Irish College at Lisbon, by the Most Rev. and Right Rev. Dr. Troy, Dr. Bray, Dr. Dillon, Dr. Moylan, Dr. Plunkett, and other prelates. "Bound as we are," they say, "by every tie of gratitude, to the present government, for its very liberal support of an ecclesiastical establishment at Maynooth, and which, under the auspices of the present administration, we hope will very shortly be considerably enlarged, we not only feel it our duty to declare, in the most unequivocal terms, our reprobation of such attempts to seduce the youth of your house, but are determined to use the authority vested in us, in order to prevent even the possibility of excuse on the part of any of our students, who might be tempted to accept of that insidious offer" and they conclude by declaring "that any person being in holy orders so accepting incurs suspension, ipso facto, and that all others acting similarly will never receive ecclesiastical faculties in their several dioceses."

Doubtless, the allusion to this attempt of the old Gallic enemy to get into his hands the education of our clerics, had a salutary effect on the decision of the House of Commons; at any rate, the sum of £13000 was voted to the college of Maynooth. But this was only a transitory ebullition of British generosity, or, rather an exercise of British prudence. A short two years had scarcely elapsed, ere, the Whigs being displaced, the hereditary foes of the Catholic body proposed to reduce the grant to £9250; it was in vain that Sir John Newport remonstrated; General Mathew, the staunch and consistent friend of the Catholics, upon that occasion said, that "he could testify, from personal inspection, that the original buildings of the college would soon tumble about the ears of the inmates, unless the whole of last year's grant was voted;" he added a very explicit and apparently an authentic statement, regarding Napoleon Buonaparte's offer to restore all the Irish bourses, provided the Irish students would come to Paris for their education; he very plainly charged the ministry with being swayed in their determination to reduce the grant to the college by the sinister interference of a member of the royal family—which drew forth a rather equivocal denial from the chancellor of the exchequer. The grant, after all was reduced to £9250; and at that figure it continued, for many years, to furnish a pretext, from year to year, for many a dreary exhibition of impotent yet rancorous bigotry. A few months since, it was increased to about £26000.

As might be expected, the doctrines taught in the college and the discipline therein prescribed, have been always the principal points of attack for its enemies—furnishing convenient matter for misrepresentation, or pointing many a sorry and stupid sarcasm. There was a double object attained by even a partial success on the first subject; it raised an outcry against the college and the vote by which it was supported, whilst through its sides the blow might reach the Church itself, inasmuch as identity of doctrine amongst all the members of that church is at once its greatest boast, as well as its most glorious characteristic. Both the doctrines and the discipline of the college were subjected to a searching enquiry in the year 1826; a year that will be memorable in the history of Maynooth College, for then, indeed, was it put upon its public trial.

Five gentlemen had been appointed by his majesty to report on the general state of education in Ireland, and their enquiries led them, in due course, to the renowned gates of Maynooth College, armed with sovereign authority to lay bare all its mysteries, and to turn it, as it were, inside out, for the pity or edification of all his majesty's lieges. Their names were, T. Frankland Lewis, J. Leslie Foster, W. Grant, J. Glassford, and, last not least, A. R. Blake, the only Catholic on the commission.

The examination of witnesses commenced on the 19th of October, 1826, with the president of the college—at that time the venerable B. Crotty, the late bishop of Cloyne and Ross—and closed on the 7th of November following, with that of A. Knox, Esqr., law-agent for the college. The witnesses examined were in number thirty-three, comprising superiors, professors, students, with a due admixture of some unhappy men who had been formerly alumni of Maynooth, but subsequently conformed to the established church. As we speak just now of those persons, we may passingly observe, that, with one very gross and discreditable exception,* they alleged very little against the doctrines and discipline of the college—with so many motives of interest or revenge to do so, were it at all in their power. But what shall we say of the great body of the evidence? it must indeed have astonished if it did not convert or convince such as Leslie Foster—plain, sound sense, a thorough knowledge of what may be called their own professional business, perspicuity of statement, and a transparent candour that, much more effectually than sleight of cunning, foiled some unfriendly attempts to embarrass and confound them; all these were the salient characteristics of this evidence.

It might appear invidious to particularize individual excellence, during this trying investigation, were it not that one remarkable course of evidence stands out clearly and unmistakably transcendent, we mean that of the Rev. Dr. Slevin, professor of the Dunboyne establishment. For nine successive days, did this profound scholar explain those doctrines of his church that had reference to the questiones vexatæ of the temporal power of the Pope, his dispensing power, his infallibility, &c., elucidating, as he proceeded, those rescripts and bulls that might seem to be susceptible of an adverse interpretation; the interrogations put to him were evidently furnished by a professional hand of no small cunning, and Dr. Slevin's replies evince a quantity of information, and a power of memory to recall that information, rarely equalled, and perhaps never surpassed; briefs, canons and decretals, church property, mixed marriages, all come in for inquiry, whilst the Corpus Juris Canonici, the Hibernia Dominicana, the councils of Lateran and Trent, and the works of Benedict XIV. are severally ransacked for the obnoxious opinions so often imputed to Catholics; but nothing comes amiss to the invincible Doctor, who appears ready-armed at all points, so that it might really be supposed that the one or two "great facts" fished up each day out of the depths of ecclesiastical history for his special bewilderment, had formed the most recent subject of his study and investigation.

* We forbear giving his name, as we know not whether he survives, and indeed those on the Commission, who might have otherwise most warmly sympathized with him, seemed utterly ashamed and quite willing to leave him to his self-wrought punishment and disgrace.

A most interesting examination, likewise, is that of Dr. Mac Hale, the present distinguished Archbishop of Tuam. During his residence at Maynooth, as professor of Theology, he had written and published those remarkable letters which bore the signature of Hierophilos, and which attracted universal admiration for the graces of their style, whilst their bitter but polished invectives against the monstrous abuses of the established church in Ireland, provoked the numerous partisans and dependants of that establishment beyond all bounds. The statutes of the college stringently prohibit the publication of political pamphlets by any member of the college; and, besides, they require, before the publication of a work of any description, that the sanction of the President should be asked and obtained. Stoutly and pertinaciously did the Commissioners contend that Dr. Mac Hale had violated both these statutes, and with firmness and ingenuity did he maintain that such penal enactments are to be interpreted with indulgence, and that he had not infringed the spirit or counteracted the end of those laws, framed as they were to prevent the dissemination of those works only which might be injurious to religion, public order, or the interest of the college itself.* Thus far baffled, they next, with all due and stern solemnity, produced some of the most caustic passages of the letters, in which are depicted, in no mincing phrase, the evils inflicted on this unhappy land by English dominion and the minions and agents of England. And right boldly did the unbending prelate adhere to these convictions and published opinions of his college life, and the garbled and isolated passages cited by his interrogators he explained by counter-passages, or by showing their true signification from the entire context.

In this eighth report of the Commissioners, which serves as a kind of useful preface to the body of evidence, the latter, under the name of an appendix, nearly filling the goodly folio, we find the Commissioners stating, that "they did not conceive it fell within their province to examine into the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion, except where they appear to be connected with the civil duties and relations of Roman Catholics either to their fellow-subjects or to the state." 'Tis hard to reconcile this assertion of theirs with their persevering and almost impertinent inquiries about some pious sodalities established in the college; and whose mysterious bonds of union, and supposed cabalistic pass-words, seemed to have put some of them on the keenest scent to discover something of ulterior design. Upon the examination of the Rev. Dr. Dowley, at that time Dean of the College and now the president of Castleknock Seminary, they were very curious to ascertain what were the peculiar advantages or inducements to belong to these sodalities. "As members of this pious confraternity," replied that gentleman, "they have no inducements or advantages but such as are entirely and exclusively spiritual and religious. Here, with sentiments of great respect for this Board, I beg leave to submit whether subjects purely and strictly religious, practices merely of Catholic discipline adopted in the college, are legitimate matters of investigation. The authority of the visitors of the college is restricted by act of parliament, and does not extend to points which belong exclusively to the doctrine or discipline of the Roman Catholic religion. Whether the powers of this commission are more extensive, it is not for me to determine."* Dr. Dowley was asked no more questions on this topic.

* "This book," says Dr. Mac Hale, "is either considered as present as it affects the character of the college of Maynooth or as it affects mine. As far as it is connected with Maynooth, I must say that I feel a deeper interest for the establishment of Maynooth than any that can arise from mere personal considerations . . . for my own personal character I have no apprehension: with respect to that, the writings are before the public and its judgement has been fixed . . . Had I known, or could I have suspected that my situation as professor would be a check on the well-regulated liberty of protecting my religion from wanton assault, or, at the same time, of expressing my opinions of political affairs, as far as they would not interfere with the respect due to the established government, I would not have held the situation of professor for an instant."—Appendix to Report, page 303.

Nor were the students of the college unrepresented before the Board of Inquiry on this occasion. They were directed to choose by ballot a certain number from amongst themselves, to afford whatever information was in their power to the commissioners; and amongst those thus selected by their fellow-students, we find the names of the present newly-elected Bishop of Cork, Dr. Delany, Professors McGawley and Furlong, whose after-career fully justified the confidence then reposed in their ability and discretion.

Having previously observed, that the various harsh things said and written about the college have reference in general to its doctrines as there taught, and its internal discipline, we have deemed it right thus to call attention to this government inquiry, because on that occasion there was a strict investigation into both the one and the other, and the result as published, has been a most triumphant one for the college. Upon the subject of the doctrines taught in Maynooth, as we have observed before, it was not merely a fencing between laymen and practised ecclesiastical tacticians; for to any one looking even cursorily through the evidence, it will be apparent how admirably supplied the commissioners were on all the knotty points and damaging facts, and dangerous precedents that might affect Catholicity. What, for instance, could these gentlemen be supposed to know of the Decretum Gratiani? or the bull Singulari nobis? or what could the father of the cashiered commissioner of Poor-Laws—Mr. Lewis—know about Benedict the Fourteenth's elaborate decrees concerning church property, or the Turks in Antibar, or the fifth book of Gregory the Ninth's Decretals? Yet on all these points the commissioners were diffuse, nay, argumentative.

Upon what is termed the discipline of the college, we have now a few words to add. Perhaps it is not straining too much the just interpretation of the word discipline, to take within its import the general daily routine of duties, the distribution of time, the selection of college studies, and the apportionment of rewards and punishments. A large number of our readers must be cognizant, more or less, of the nature of the discipline prescribed at Maynooth College in this sense of the term, and need not therefore be reminded that the students rise at five in summer and at six o'clock in winter, by which means a very handsome portion of the day's business is accomplished, whilst the "drowsy world is dreaming" outside; that they breakfast at nine o'clock, dine at three, and have a moderate supper at eight o'clock, P.M.; that, upon an average, they are allowed to speak to each other only during four hours each day, and retire to bed a little after nine, P.M.; that they are permitted to perambulate the neighbouring country once a week, in charge of their dean and monitors: all these particulars are pretty well known or guessed at, and are not very interesting. The discipline established at Maynooth College, there can be no doubt, is severe; the most of it, it is true, has been copied from that of the old ecclesiastical colleges of the Continent; but it is by no means so easy a matter for your buoyant, jocund, young Irishman to fall steadily into the harness of college life, as for the Spaniard, Italian, or Frenchman, drilled as the latter generally are through boyhood, in those preparatory seminaries so abundant amongst them, so rare with us. This severe system, together possibly with the unsettled temper of the times, finding its way partially into the college, produced some untoward results in its early history; and it is said, apparently on good authority, that nearly one hundred students were expelled from time to time during the first fifteen or sixteen years of its existence. Where there are stiff necks on the one part, and the law administered, perhaps, in a spirit too Martinet-like* on the other, such results, although deplorable, are almost sure to follow—'tis not unlikely, too, that from this crucible of college discipline, there did occasionally escape and become lost to the priesthood, some pure ore of manly genius, as well as the dross and alloy of baser natures. We are not to be understood as disputing the necessity or depreciating the importance of strict controul, and more than military precision in the habits of ecclesiastical students. Nowhere should there be more practical deference paid to the sentiment that "order is heaven's first law," than amongst them. Those who framed the regulations of our clerical seminaries, set aside, as they ought, all merely temporal and worldly considerations, and looking solely to the end and object of the young student's course; knowing that end to be a dignity without comparison on this earth, and the highest wherewith frail humanity may be invested—knowing that his future position in life will be one encompassed by perils the most formidable, and enemies visible and invisible beyond counting, participating in the joyous anticipations of his successful zeal, and trembling too at the very idea of his possible fall; a fall that, archangel-like, would draw within its hideous vortex the fate of confiding and seduced thousands—with all this and more before their eyes, they took a spiritual, and as it were, super-human view of the task imposed upon them, and in executing that task rejected all ideas of mere expediency, human estimation, enervating comforts, and the like, as of very secondary importance. Sic currite ut comprehendatis,* seemed to be an exhortation for ever before them. The sagacious legislator, and the prudent superior, will generally know where a system of sound and necessary discipline ends, and one of harsh rigorism and stern severity commences; they will see how far habits of self-controul, temperance, submission to authority, simplicity of attire, and close attention to professional studies may be enjoined and encouraged, without being permitted to degenerate into crouching meanness of spirit, slovenliness, hypocrisy, or a neglect of those other studies that humanize and expand the soul, and are the rich and attractive embellishments within which are shrined the precious pearls of moral worth and sound learning.

* Dr. Crotty, in his examination before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, acknowledged that the authorities of the college, on one occasion, felt constrained to expel a young man for having in his possession the book called Roderick Random, "although he was not aware of the objectionable nature of the book." Appendix to Report, p. 61.

Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes
Emoluit mores.

Not that this happy medium we allude to is so palpable as to be hit on at once; repeated trials, and some length of time will be requisite for those who are even the best disposed to devise a proper system—and none deserve better the character of being truly wise than they upon whom facts are not thrown away in such a cause, and who are willing to profit by the lessons of experience. Extremes on every subject superabound. Dr. Milner, on one occasion, assured the reading public that the students of Maynooth, after having employed two or three years in the study of English, Irish, Latin, and French, were required to devote a distinct year to the study of poetry, and, after that, another year to rhetoric† We are sure "the wish was father to the thought," when the worthy Doctor wrote thus, under, of course, some misconception; nor do we altogether participate in the full extent of the wish.‡ Yet, we have no doubt that the greatly increased resources of the college will be speedily applied towards a more ample provision for those branches of science and general literature which grayer and more necessary studies had previously, more or less, superseded; there will be more opportunity for developing and fostering talent in any particular department, and the supply of labourers being now in fairer proportion to the wants of the vineyard, those who before could but taste passingly of the stream, may now drink deeply of its pure and refreshing waters.

Yes, a great task is, indeed, imposed on the authorities that rule over Maynooth College, and the fulfilment of a high destiny is before them. No one, acquainted with their professional attainments and unostentatious virtues, can fear for a moment that they will not be equal to that task. Crippled finances can be no longer a reason why there should be abbreviated studies. With a wise and bold liberality, that might well startle, from their death slumbers, the grim shades of Duigenan and Percival, the annual grant † Inquiry into certain vulgar opinions, pages 18 and 19.

‡ A more recent writer, Mr. Inglis, in his "Tour through Ireland" (a book, in our humble judgment, exceedingly overrated), asserts, that it would be a grievous mistake "to judge of the course actually pursued at Maynooth from what is set forth in the Report of the Education Inquiry Commissioners, which latter appears to be a varied and a liberal one;" he adds, that the late president, Dr. Montague, acknowledged to him that "it was adhered to as far as could be accomplished."—Inglis, "Tour," vol. ii., p. 332. Had this writer spent a little more time in the College, or paid it more than one very short visit, he might have formed a higher opinion of the attainments of its inmates: he certainly would have found that only in a seminary so admirably regulated, could they possibly achieve so much as they do.

to the college has been recently raised from £9,000 to £26,000. Oh! how much solid good may be achieved—how much Catholic and national glory won by the judicious expenditure of this sum! Spartam nactus es—hanc exorna. In every walk of literature there will be found many competitors, seeking, by fair and honourable exertion, those chairs whose endowments have been so handsomely increased. A new stimulus will be given to aim at proficiency and superiority; and, when it is further ascertained that at Maynooth favoritism and undue influence would be of no avail, unobtrusive merit will uplift its head, and come forward with the inspiriting consciousness—that the prize is for the most deserving. Palmarum qui meruit ferat.

There is the library, too—that most important adjunct of a college—of course it will be enlarged, and its treasures thrown open, as far as possible, for the acquisition of all the students. The pecuniary allowances, made to so large a number of the latter, will, likewise, enable them to add greatly to their private collections of books; and, if we can judge of them from those times, when their means were comparatively limited, there never were young men better disposed so to make creditable exchange of government bounty, and to emulate the fair fame of the wisest and best of their predecessors.* And thus it is that, through the vista of quickly coming years, we behold Maynooth College taking and vindicating its proper place, as the vast ecclesiastical nursery of the most truly Catholic people on the face of the earth. There will be “ample scope and verge” for the industry and taste of the professors and élèves of Maynooth. The recent resuscitation of Catholic feelings and yearnings in England is being daily manifested in the production, by Protestant hands, of works illustrative of the miracles and virtues of Catholic saints, and the elucidation of the rites, ceremonials, and ecclesiastical architecture of the Ages of Faith. Strangers are putting the sickle into our harvest: let them be no longer suffered to monopolize what with us would

* We must not dwell upon the interesting and exciting topic of our ancient literary glory. There are few who have not heard of the poetic Bishop of Fiesole—St. Donatus; a motto from whose verses decks the title-page of our CATHOLIC MAGAZINE—or of the learned St. Aidan of Lindisferne—the monk Macdolph, who founded the school of Malmsbury—St. Columkille, who established the great nursery of piety and learning, the monastery of Iona—St. Columbanus, the founder of the monasteries of Luxica and Bobis—St. Gall, &c. &c. It is of St. Columbanus that we read in Flaherty’s “Ogygia:” “Cum per totam Galliam divinæ religionis fervor torperet, Dominus Christus ad repellendas ignavia tenebras, de occiduis Hiberniæ partibus splendidissimum radium Gallicis finibus emergere præcepit B. Columbanum egregium Scotigenam.” And this island, too, offered a hospitable retreat within its own boundaries to the literary pilgrims of the whole world. “Multi nobilium simul et mediocrium de gente Anglorum relicta patriâ insulâ, vel divinæ Lætionis vel continentioris vitæ gratia, illo secesserant. Quos omnes Scoti libentissime suscipientes victum quotidianum, sine pretio, libros quoque et magisterium gratuitum præbere curabant.”—Pede, l. 3, c. 27. Hither came Gildas—the most ancient British writer whose works have come down to us—hither came St. Agilbert, the second bishop of the West Saxons—hither repaired St. Sulgenius, concerning whom Camden quotes the well-known lines from the life of the saint:

“*Exemplo patrum, commotus amore legendi,
Ivit ad Hibernos sophia mirabile claros.*”

The accomplished Alfred, the pride and boast of England, came in the throng to imbibe erudition in our Irish schools. “In Hiberniâ omni philosophiâ animum composuit.” (Gul. Malms, lib. i.) He afterwards made noble use of his knowledge, in the founding, or, at least, restoring and endowing of Oxford, in which, immediately after its being opened, the learned Irishman, Duns Scotus, lectured to admiring thousands. But we must have done.

be a labour of love; and the execution of which by those who are aliens to our faith is at once “our glory and our shame.”

Manuscripts and printed records, having reference to our country’s past story, are thickly scattered abroad—throughout England and the Continent: who could so becomingly look after these expatriated treasures as the heads of our national Catholic College? And then, there are precious relics of our past glories, both sacred and profane, in various parts of our own green land, some in public, and some in private custody; is it too much to hope that, ere long, Maynooth may reclaim, by all earnest and legitimate means, those rich trophies? Thus, forming the nucleus of a great national museum, which would vividly recall the brilliant memories of the past, and cause every aspirant to the priesthood of our one old church, to become athirst for the moral, social, and political redemption of “the land that bore” him!

Thus, writing about and dwelling upon merely intellectual culture, we must be permitted to guard ourselves against being thought to undervalue the far more important domain of the heart, and the rectitude and purity of its principles. We are not of those—God forbid!—who would postpone the latter to the former; nay, we flatter ourselves, we apprehend tolerably well the imminent danger of mere learning, unaccompanied by the restraint of religious principle: we have before us the warning of the apostle, scientia inflat,* and we remember the complaint of the old philosopher, “Postquam docti prodierunt—boni desinunt.”† Suffice it to say, that we considered that department of moral training to be in the best possible hands, nor could we be guilty of the intolerable presumption of penning one line on the subject; safe as we are in saying that it will ever engage, as it has ever engaged, the Christian and paternal solicitude of those who are happily its proper guardians.

Flourish both, say we! Vigorous be the growth, and clustering the superabundance of virtues that vegetate in the bosom of our own dear Maynooth College! Verdant be the literary laurels that are to deck, in thick and honourable profusion, her childrens’ brows! Lucet et ardet be her perennial motto! a light to the nations of the earth—a furnace of glowing charity and ardent zeal in the service of a grateful world! So may she be the exulting parent of generations of saints—so may she best fulfil the godlike mission assigned to her.

Family Records of the De Fraynes.

[The family of De la Frayne, or De Frayne, now called Franey, was formerly of great note, and possessed large estates in the counties of East and Westmeath, Wicklow, and Kilkenny. They were often summoned as peers to sit in parliament: in the 24th and 30th of Edw. I., 1296, sat Foulke de la Frayne.* Patrick de la Frayne, knight, Robert de la Frayne, 48th Edw. III., 1374. And again, in 1333, two of the De Fraynes, namely Fulke and Oliver, were summoned among the magnates of Ireland to attend Edward III., with arms and men in his wars in Scotland; and again to assist the King of England in the war with France in 1346. In 1329 Sir Patrick de Frayne dying without “issue male,” a part of his estate fell to Oliver de Frayne of Listerling, who was seneschal of the County of Kilkenny, an office of high honour and trust in those times. His posterity lived in the castle of Ballyreddy till about the year 1650, and were called, then and now, the "Buides-la-Frenigh," by the people of that neighbourhood, being an Irish word signifying "the Knights de Frayne." Many and various are the legends and traditions still extant relating to that extinct family. Robert de Frayne, of Ballyreddy, married Elaëor, daughter of the Baron of Brownsford. He died in May, 1643, and is buried in the old church of Ballyneal. His son was drowned in the river opposite the town of Ross, as he was crossing over in a boat; he was to be married on the same day to a daughter of Colonel Arsdell, an officer in Cromwell's army. His horse plunging, a plank started in the side of "the cotte," and young De Frayne perished. That fact is well authenticated, on which was founded the following tale.]

As you travel from the pleasantly situated town of Ross, after passing the picturesque wooden bridge that crosses its broad river, and connects it with the opposite village of Rossbercon, going along the road which winds towards the hills on the west, the village, or rather valley of Ballyreddy, is gradually presented to your view. Surrounded with gently sloping hills, which are covered with a rich verdure, through this once richly-wooded valley, which now presents a naked and rather desolate appearance, runs a small but limpid stream, beside which, in the early part of the fourteenth century, dwelt one of those powerful Anglo-Norman nobles whose ancestors came over in the train of the redoubted Strongbow. This was Sir Hubert de la Frayne, whose valour and loyalty to the English cause and crown had won for him this and the surrounding territory, which had been forfeited by William Le Graunt, the kinsman and abettor of the brave Earl of Desmond. In vain did his retainers, headed by his elder brother, resist the intrusion of De la Frayne, whose numerous followers, aided by troops sent to his assistance by the deputy, on his return after the suppression of the rebellion of Desmond, soon dispersed his small but faithful band, making prisoner their chief—who for his resistance had his head impaled on one of the towers that defended the newly-erected walls of Ross; a grim and awful warning to all who felt disposed to violate the law, or resist the ordinances of that fierce and stern justiciary, Ralph De Ufford. De Frayne having thus gotten possession of his newly-acquired territory, secured it to himself and followers by the erection of one of those square and massive towers or castles so frequently met with throughout the country, the strength of which he further augmented by a strong and embattled wall, surrounding all with a deep moat, which was kept constantly filled with a large supply of water. To this rude and early dwelling, in the lapse of more than two centuries, was added a more commodious and comfortable residence, called "the Court of Ballyreddy," every trace of which the rude hand of time, and still ruder hands of the unthinking peasant, have nearly effaced. This, however, did his descendants continue to enjoy, though sometimes engaged in the turbulent and petty warfare so common in these times, till the arrival of the army of the victorious Cromwell had threatened its possessors with confiscation and ruin.

After the memorable siege of Wexford, in which the town, though gallantly defended, had been basely betrayed into the hands of Cromwell, and its inhabitants given up to indiscriminate slaughter, a large and well-supplied body of troops was sent forward to invest Ross, whilst another and a larger force, under the command of Ireton, had been dispatched to reduce Duncannon, which, owing to its brave garrison, and the skill of its governor, Colonel Wogan, resisted all their efforts to take it. The town of Ross, though from its situation badly calculated to sustain a siege, was, however, put in the best possible state of defence by the Duke of Ormond, the then viceroy, and the command of its garrison given to Lord Taaffe, an experienced officer. The walls were repaired, and considerably strengthened, the trenches widened, and several outworks raised. Moreover, the Royalist army, under the Duke of Ormond, lay encamped along the opposite side of the river, protecting thereby a large portion of the town which lay within range of their shot.

As the hostile troops advanced within view of the town, they made summons of surrender by the discharge of three pieces of artillery, against what was then called "Bewhy," but ever since "Three Bullet Gate;" a name which took its rise from the above circumstance, the three balls then discharged having taken their abode in its turretted archway. This rather uncivil invitation to surrender, was spiritedly answered by the garrison and townsmen, with a similar token of defiance; both sides, therefore, prepared with the utmost vigour, the garrison and townsmen being strengthened by the arrival of fifteen hundred additional men sent over by the Duke of Ormond, who appeared in person amongst them, accompanied by the Lords Castlehaven and Ards. The possession of the town was of the utmost importance to Cromwell, as it would enable him, with his whole army, to cross the Barrow, in order to besiege Kilkenny and Waterford, both which places he hoped to become master of before sending his army to winter quarters. On the morning of the third day, the batteries of the besiegers having been completed, a heavy and constant fire from three pieces of artillery soon made a yawning breach in the town-wall, fronting a wide street in which strong barricades were erected by the garrison and townsmen. Immediately on perceiving the breach, a strong body of troops was sent forward under the command of Colonel Arsdell, to pierce their way into the town, whilst a feint attack was carried on in two separate places, in order to divide and distract the garrison. The conflict at the breach was terrible; twice did the besiegers force their way through the broken wall, and as often were they desperately repulsed. At length, after an obstinate and fierce resistance, the breach was won, and the victorious besiegers, with shouts of triumph, penetrated as far as the barricade, the defence of which was in part committed to Robert De Frayne, the last male heir of the castle and estates of the ancient knights of Ballyreddy. He, a young man of undaunted courage, had, with a few faithful followers, retainers of his house, volunteered his services and his fortune for the good of his distracted and harrassed country. Rendered desperate by their situation, De Frayne and his followers made fierce resistance with their long pikes, which they used with great dexterity. In the hottest moment of the strife, just as Colonel Arsdell, had headed the assault, and advancing boldly forward, had gained partial possession of the barricade, a missile, hurled from one of the adjoining houses quite stunned him, and at the same moment he received a wound from a pike which pierced his right shoulder, passing through the joints of his armour. He reeled and fell forward into the crowd below—a yell of wild triumph was raised by the besieged, whilst those of his own regiment made furious efforts to rescue their wounded officer, and fell victims to the deadly pike of the now elated Irish. De Frayne ran to the wounded colonel, and just reached in time to prevent the deadly thrust of one of his followers aimed at the neck of Arsdell. "Stop, sirrah," said De Frayne, with a voice like thunder, just as he warded off the point of the spear with his sword; "withhold thy weapon—let no man dare strike this wounded and fallen soldier, whose life may be dear to his general, and whose liberty hereafter may guarantee the safety of this town and garrison." "Young man," said Arsdell, faintly yet scornfully, "I ask no quarter of thee, as none I intended to give." "Whatever thy intentions might be," said De Frayne, "thou hast now to deal with a generous enemy."

Just at this critical moment, the governor, Lord Taaffe, had come up with a re-inforcement, and ordered the wounded colonel to be conveyed to a place of security, and his wounds to be properly dressed. The execution of this task had been confided to De Frayne, in consideration of his services in making captive and rescuing so important an officer. The assailants who in the mean time made desperate efforts to recover their commander, and seeing all hope of success cut off for the present, thought proper to retire, leaving three hundred of their companions dead or wounded.

The garrison and townsmen animated with this partial success, made every possible preparation against the return of their furious enemy—they widened the trench, strengthened and enlarged the barricade, and were busily engaged in repairing the breach. Just as the receding and beaten detachment had arrived at the camp, the victorious Cromwell, with the main body of his army that stayed behind, in the town of Wexford after its capture, had at the same moment appeared in view, intending as soon as possible to cross the Barrow, in order to come to an engagement with Ormond and O'Neil. Nothing could equal his fury on hearing of the defeat of the troops sent to storm the breach, and their leaving their gallant colonel prisoner in the hands of a paltry and despised enemy. He fretted with rage and swore most violently. "By the holy covenant," said he, "if before this already setting sun goes down, those craven varlets bring not back again the gallant Arsdell—leaving yon paltry village a heap of smoking ruins—they shall answer for it with their heads." This he said addressing some of his principal officers who surrounded him; however, on hearing of the obstinate resistance made by the garrison, and the remonstrance of his officers, who set forth the bravery of the men sent to storm the breach, his passion gradually subsided, which, together with the lateness of the hour, inclined him to defer the intended assault till next morning. Immediate orders had been given to have the tents erected, so that the soldiers, harrassed with the march and load of booty which they carried, might speedily go to rest; sentinels had been posted in proper places, and all things seemed quiet for the evening. Intelligence at this time arrived in Cromwell's camp of the approach of a large body of the Confederate Irish, under Preston and O'Neil, who were to form a junction with Ormond, and dispute the passage of the Barrow. This news which had been brought in by Cromwell's scouts, caused much excitement in his camp. Early on the following morning, a flag of truce had been hung out by the garrison of Ross, who were alarmed at the arrival of Cromwell; and on hearing the fate of the garrison and townsmen of Wexford, were resolved to deliver up the town, which they considered no longer tenable, on conditions, which were that the lives and properties of the people should be spared, and themselves permitted to depart with their arms and ammunition. Cromwell enquired of the bearer of these conditions about the state of the wounded colonel, and was much pleased when he had heard of his wounds being carefully dressed, and that strong hopes were entertained of his recovery. With regard to the proffered conditions, he said he would take time to deliberate, and immediately convened a council of his principal officers. Fortunate was it for the garrison and townsmen, that the near approach of the royalist army, and its daily augmentation, made delay both dangerous and disagreeable to the parliamentarians—it was agreed, therefore, in council to accept of the conditions offered. A messenger had been dispatched by Cromwell to the governor of the town, intimating his acceptance of their surrender, and requesting that a surgeon from his army might be admitted to attend the wounded officer, which was promptly agreed to by the latter, who, moreover, assured the officer sent with the dispatch that all possible attention had been shown him.

Colonel Arsdell, a veteran officer, had formerly been with his regiment in Ireland, where he married the daughter of a gentleman of ancient and respectable family of English origin, long settled in that part of the country, the scene of his present adventures. He became the eventual heir of their estates, in right of his wife; he was also possessed of considerable property in his native kingdom, and had his Irish estates managed by an agent. His wife, notwithstanding her husband's bigotry, and the puritanical fanaticism of the period, remained during her whole life steadfastly attached to the Catholic religion; and her daughter Elizabeth, their sole issue, had been secretly instructed by her in its doctrines and practices. She died young, and her daughter, during the civil broils in England, in which her father had taken an active part, had been sent over to Ireland under the guardianship of her maternal uncle, who applied part of the income of her father's Irish estates to her support and education. During Elizabeth's stay in Ireland, she became acquainted with many families both of English and Irish extraction; amongst others she became, in company with her uncle, the frequent visitant and guest of Sir John De Frayne, in his hospitable castle of Ballyreddy, who, moreover, was a distant relative to her mother's family. Often did she, in her girlish glee, in the green lawn of Ballyreddy, with her youthful playmate, Robert De Frayne (whose gallant defence of the stormed barricade we had occasion to notice in a preceding page), marshal the village boys and girls in the long-dance on the eve of some mirthful holiday, whilst the aged minstrel of the village lent his liveliest airs to the rustic throng as they whirled in the merry excitement.

But these happy scenes of innocence and mirth were to pass away; the tide of war had swept over the country, with all the horrors of civil strife—all social intercourse was over, and our youthful playmates had not seen each other for years. Elizabeth's uncle—a man of mild and amiable disposition—took no part in the strife, his person and property were both undisturbed, being beloved and respected by all; he kept himself at home, watching over his fair protegee with parental care.

On the other hand, De Frayne, seeing the distracted state of his country, and the many outrages committed on unoffending persons, raised a body of his retainers and vassals, rather to check the insolence of petty marauders and freebooters, than to take an active part in the warlike movements of the period. Yet his wishes and inclinations had been strongly attached to the Royalist cause, and the success of "the confederate Irish," for which reason he was easily prevailed on to confer the command of his little troop on his son Robert, and engage them in the voluntary defence of Ross—which was hourly threatened with a siege—the capture and pillage of which, in his own immediate vicinity, would involve himself and property in the like ruin.

During the time of Cromwell's operations against the town of Wexford, Colonel Arsdell paid a hurried visit to his daughter Elizabeth, still under the guardianship of her uncle, whose property and estates he, by his high influence, protected from the rapacious soldiery. His interview with his daughter—whom he had not seen since the death of her mother (two months, only, previous to which she had been sent over to Ireland under the care of her uncle)—was tender and affecting: he embraced her with the most loving kindness, and, as he gazed on her comely and full-grown features, which bore an exact likeness to those of his departed wife, he burst into a flood of tears. "Elizabeth," he exclaimed, "I behold in thee the image of thy lifeless mother"—this he said, unconscious of what he was about, for poor Elizabeth had not, till then, heard of her mother's death. As it was carefully concealed from her by her uncle, she stood for a few moments breathless, and tears fast gushed from her eyes. After a few moments of grief and agony, her father resumed, "yes, Elizabeth," "she is dead—her spirit, I hope, is passed to a brighter and better world; do not then grieve, my dearest child, I will be thy guardian and protector. I am beloved by my general and the whole army—I have sold my English estate, in order to equip a body of troops for the service of my country; the war will soon be at an end, and Ireland shall be my future residence, when I shall have an opportunity of watching over thee. Farewell, child," "I must not delay—the General requires my presence; I hope soon to see thee again." So saying, he rushed out of the room, after tenderly embracing his daughter.

In a few nights after her father's departure, as Elizabeth and her uncle sat up later than usual, talking over the present state of things, and totally unconscious of what had befallen her father, they were alarmed by a loud knocking at the door; her uncle ran, in breathless haste, to demand of the stranger who he was, and the cause of his coming. He soon learned that he was a courier from the General's camp, bearing a letter to the daughter of Colonel Arsdell. The messenger, being led in, handed to Elizabeth's uncle a letter, written at her father's dictation, and authenticated with his signature and seal. It concealed from her his present dangerous situation, but expressed in the strongest terms his wish of seeing her immediately, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour or any other impediment; the letter instructed her that she might rely on the fidelity of the person who brought it; and that she should be safely conveyed, as a troop of horse had been sent for her escort.

Elizabeth, anticipating some disaster had befallen her father, made all possible haste for the journey. In company with her uncle, and a troop of twenty horse, she made hot haste, reckless of every other feeling but her father's safety. It was the design of Colonel Arsdell, who dreaded he should not survive his wounds, to introduce his daughter to General Cromwell, and put her under his protection, as also, in his presence, to bequeath to her the estates he possessed in this country. When Elizabeth arrived in Cromwell's camp, she was kindly received, in consideration of her father's services, by the General and principal officers. On hearing of her father's fate, she could not be restrained from seeing him immediately; and, with the most humble entreaties, threw herself at the General's feet, begging of him to allow a herald to be sent to the governor of the town, demanding admittance for herself and uncle to her father's presence. The General, not being able to resist her pitiful entreaties, consented that an officer should be sent, demanding admittance of the Governor for the daughter of Colonel Arsdell into the town; the latter, having readily consented to the proposal, she, with her uncle, having taken leave of the General, were conveyed into the town and conducted to the house in which her wounded father lay.

On arriving at the door, she was met by Robert De Frayne, who started at recognizing his former playmate, whom above all others he least expected to see; nor was his surprise diminished on discovering her to be no other than the daughter of his prisoner. "My God," exclaimed he, "Elizabeth Arsdell! Elizabeth Arsdell! and art thou daughter to the wounded colonel. I am glad, for thy sake, that thy father's life has been saved by me—I have saved him from the deadly thrust of one of those whose lives he sought to take away—I am his deliverer. Art thou his daughter?" said he again, not believing his senses—just like one awaking from a troubled dream—but she, regardless alike of his words and the compliment intended, on seeing her wounded parent, rushed towards him with extended arms, and, tenderly embracing him, enquired anxiously how he felt—if his wounds were considered mortal—or what hopes were entertained of his recovery. Cheered with the presence of his daughter, he seemed to recover his wonted strength and animation; he assured her that he then had no doubt of his speedy recovery, as his wounds were skilfully dressed, and all possible attention paid him by a physician, sent by the General, who anticipated no danger from his present state.

After some time spent in conversation with her father, Elizabeth fixed her eyes on the person who accosted her on entering, and, after a moment's pause, she brought to her recollection her former friend and play-fellow on the green lawn of Ballyreddy. She immediately arose and approached De Frayne, making a graceful salutation, at the same time offering an apology for the unceremonious manner in which she treated him on her entrance, as not knowing him. De Frayne cut short her pleadings by shaking her cordially by the hand. After some time spent in giving expression to their mutual surprise at so unexpected a meeting, Elizabeth introduced him to her father and uncle; the latter was overjoyed in seeing one whom he had not seen since his childhood—the son, too, of his former friend; nor was the wounded officer, whose soul became somewhat softened and subdued, remiss in expressing his thanks to De Frayne for his attentions to him since his capture; Elizabeth, on hearing the manner in which her father escaped the deadly thrust aimed at him, was fervent in her grateful acknowledgments to De Frayne; she conversed freely and cheerfully with him, on their former friendship. The old colonel felt pleased with the renewed acquaintance of his daughter, and he began to admire the noble person and bearing, together with the generosity and high spirit of De Frayne. Nor was her uncle less pleased with the unexpected introduction: he, indeed, began already to conceive the project of an alliance between the two youthful friends; nor did he hesitate to suggest the propriety of it to Elizabeth's father. The reasons which he urged for it were many; besides his own age and infirmities, he spoke of the perils of war, to which he was daily and almost hourly exposed, and which might, ere long, deprive him of existence, and thus leave poor Elizabeth friendless and unprotected. These reasons were found sufficient—the colonel began rapidly to recover, and there now remained no obstacle save one—that was, to obtain of General Cromwell an amnesty, in behalf of De Frayne, and a confirmation to him of his lands and possessions, which, through the influence of the now-recovered colonel, was readily obtained. All parties seemed highly pleased—even Cromwell himself was much gratified at seeing the large possessions of De Frayne vested in the daughter and sole heiress of his favourite officer; he, moreover, wisely considered it as the easiest mode of securing to his followers the forfeited Irish estates, by allowing, and even sometimes encouraging, intermarriages with some member of the proscribed families.

The town of Ross, according to stipulation, was surrendered; the garrison being allowed to withdraw with their arms and baggage, and no excesses were committed by the soldiers of Cromwell; the persons and properties of the townsmen were guaranteed by treaty, and but slight contributions were levied. Cromwell, having rested and somewhat refreshed his men, had got all things in readiness for his intended expedition against Ormond and the royalists, and large bodies of horse were detached forward to reconnoitre the enemy and discover the fords of the Barrow. On the morning previous to the march, the marriage ceremony was to take place in presence of the General and the chief officers: the sun had risen gloriously, and its soft, mellow beams, on that lovely autumn morning, lit with a golden lustre the brown foliage of the trees that grew along the banks of the river, and were reflected with dazzling brightness from the polished arms of the soldiers, as they stood in order of march along the green slopes which environ the town of Ross; the banners of the different regiments floated in the gentle breeze, and at intervals was heard the stirring sound of martial music, accompanied with the heavy rolling of the drums. Cromwell, with some of his officers, sauntered about the quay, in expectation of the arrival of De Frayne, who had gone to set his castle of Ballyreddy in order for the reception of his expected bride. The joy of his old father, on hearing of the good fortune of his son, was unbounded; his safe return—his retaining his ancestral estates, the loss of which he dreaded; his marriage with the daughter of an officer of rank in the victorious army of Cromwell—one too, whom from her infancy he knew and admired—all, all tended to awaken in him the brightest visions of a happy sunset to his old age; again and again did he tenderly embrace his son, as he contrasted his present joy and hopes with the dismay and terror which he felt, as he witnessed from his castle top the approach of the hostile army, and heard the sullen roar of the cannon as it thundered against the beleaguered town. All now was joy and bustle and preparation in Ballyreddy; the pennon, on which were emblazoned the arms of De Frayne, and which for many years had lain folded, now floated gaily on the castle top; the retainers came crowding in with all necessary supplies for the approaching festivities, and offered their warmest congratulations to their youthful chief; nothing was to be seen but smiling faces and light hearts, and again was Dermot Cleary, the old village minstrel, prepared to lend his liveliest tones to the merry dancers who were to assemble on the green lawn of the castle.

As it approached the hour appointed for the marriage, De Frayne (accompanied by his young kinsman, Oliver Fitzgerald, son to the Baron of Cluan) rode majestically down the long avenue of ancient elms which led towards the town, amidst the blessings and prayers of his faithful retainers, who stood gazing with delight on his noble bearing, and the skill with which he managed his fiery and spirited charger. Notwithstanding all the joy and gladness of heart which his father had felt at his good fortune, a sort of unaccountable gloom had spread over his mind, which in spite of himself became filled with direful anticipations or forebodings of some unforeseen calamity, which were awakened in him by the frightful dreams and other superstitious terrors of the preceding night, and which were heightened in no small degree by the domestics of the castle, whom he overheard relating to each other fearful tales, from which they augured some approaching evil. One averred, that when going to the spring, which was only a few paces from the moat of the castle, she had distinctly heard and seen "the Banshee," as she sat wailing and rending her long, raven hair, beneath the aged hawthorn which overshadowed the well, whilst another who had been the last who retired to rest, asserted she had seen the actual form of the old lady of the castle, who had been dead some years previous. Be all this as it may, the sequel will show that all these anticipations and gloomy apprehensions turned out to be but too true. On arriving at the bank of the river, directly opposite the quay of Ross, which was then crossed only by a "ferry," a boat, prepared for that purpose, had been sent over to convey them to the other side. De Frayne, who to compliment General Cromwell, intended for him as a present the noble animal on which he rode, would not be dissuaded from bringing his favourite horse into the same boat in which he himself was to cross. The tide was now rolling heavily on to the sea, and as the boat had reached halfway across the river, a sudden burst of music, accompanied with a simultaneous cheer from the army that stood marshalled on the heights above, caused the high-spirited animal to plunge suddenly forward, thus oversetting boat and crew! A low murmur ran through the spectators, whilst the more timid shrieked with horror. After a desperate effort, two rowers alone gained the land; De Frayne vainly endeavoured to struggle for a few moments, and at last sunk to rise no more. Assistance was sent as speedily as possible, but in vain—the river rolled its sullen tide darkly over their heads, and buried them in its broad bosom.

The feelings of the general and officers who stood on the quay are indescribable—a thrill of horror and regret pervaded all. When Elizabeth, who was waiting in her bridal dress, heard the mournful news, a paleness flew over her saddened features—a trembling and faintness seized her, and she survived the shock only a few weeks. Nothing could equal the anguish and distress of the old father, on hearing his son's untimely fate; the intensity of his grief for the last heir and sole representative of his ancient line, soon brought him to what he considered his sole earthly comforter, the grave. Thus became extinct, and almost forgotten, the ancient house of the once powerful De Fraynes, whose tragic end has often been the theme of many a fireside tale among the simple peasantry of Ballyreddy; the mournful recital is oftentimes listened to by the weary traveller, as he sits by the blazing hearth during the long and cheerless winter evenings; nor does the story-teller fail to accompany it with one or more of those rude productions, made and sung by some wandering minstrel at the period of the sad event—and which, with traditional fondness, they love to remember and rehearse.

A Tale of the Penal Times.

In the province of Munster, and at the very mouth of the river Blackwater, stands the ancient town of Youghal; immediately in front of it, beyond the river, on the county Waterford side, rises the bold promontory of Ardmore, exhibiting still, in perfect preservation, its old venerable round tower which many a mariner's eye has viewed, in storm and in calm. The line of coast, here, is high and precipitous, displaying huge rocks torn, by the fury of the ocean, from the mountain side. Here are, also, deep and dreary caves formed by the edge of the wave, and so spacious that the sail-boat often rests under their adamantine roofs, while those on board listen with silent awe to the rumbling echo of the waters, as they tumble through the chasms, or issue from narrow passages in the distant and dark recesses of the mountain.

This place was not without its utility in the penal times. With the so-called Reformation, the fury of fanaticism and destruction swept over all the religious establishments in and near Youghal. The two monasteries, Franciscan and Dominican, were doomed to ruin, and the noble parish church, in the erection of which kings, princes, and even popes,* had taken a part, was now converted into a house of a new and strange worship, to suit the character of that cold and unpoetical creed: what a transformation had not the venerable edifice to undergo! The varied beauties of the high gothic ceiling were concealed from view by a wretched curtain of mortar. With that screen between the worshipper and the emblems of the primitive faith, this church is found at the present day—the great eastern window has perished—the stained glass is gone, broken into fragments, because it exhibited the figures of Christian saints—the roof, too, has fallen; and, running the eye over the massive curves and moss-grown mullions of this beautiful relic, the beholder may now survey the broad expanse of the heavens.

But other objects were there, destined for still greater desecration; crosses adorned the summit of the building and the several portals, or gates, exhibited, on the outside, innumerable figures cut in stone around the gothic arches; these the Iconoclast spared not—for art was not respected by the Vandals of the penal times, nor would the creations of a Phidias or an Angelo have been spared in the phrenzy of those days.

While His churches were thus seized upon and their ornaments shivered into dust, the Catholic wor-shipper was hunted to the forests, glens, and mountains. Even at the holy well or fountain, where his forefathers had congregated of old, he was not permitted to adore his God. Acts of parliament had banned the ancient faith. 'Twas then that these caves along the sea-coast at Ardmore, became retreats of the persecuted Catholics, and in them they met, like the ancient Christians in the catacombs of Rome, to celebrate the holy mysteries of religion. Stealthily, and not without gloomy fears, did they pass one by one into the cavern where they had arranged to meet the priest on Sunday, to offer for them the holy sacrifice of the mass. In these drear abodes of the sea-bird, was the water of baptism poured on the head of the new-born infant, and here, too, the marriage vow was made and blessed. But the spy, or priest-catcher, was ever on the watch, and dogged the hunted Catholic even to this last refuge.

The priest-catcher, of whom we would speak, had been a Catholic, but he bartered his soul to Satan, and many of his brethren to the persecutor, for English gold. In his features might be traced the malice of his mind. A fiend in human shape—lost to every generous feeling, and as insensible to pity and suffering, as the lictor who lashed our lord at the pillar. It was said that he had a wife and children; and, such was the savageness of his nature, that even on them he did not bestow ordinary affection. Religion he had not; though at times when there was an occasional relaxation of the penal laws, he used, occasionally, to be observed at mass, reading—a prayer-book? no, but some old act of parliament. But the mask was now thrown off completely, he was, avowedly, an unbeliever, heartless and cold, on whose hardened brow might be distinctly traced the worse and fiercest passions of a demon.

One holy sabbath, the Catholics had assembled, and were, one by one, proceeding to the wild rock chapel, on the beach, when the spy, with a number of his accomplices, concealed himself at some distance and there waited until the last of the worshippers had stealthily entered the cavern. He watched closely, but could not ascertain whether the priest was amongst them; for in those days the rude dress of the peasant covered the person, and concealed the character of him who might have spent many a happy year amidst high-minded and polished associates, in the academic halls of Rome or Salamanca. Nor long did the priest-hunter wait, but, creeping from his lurking place like a were-wolf on the trail, proceeded at once to the mouth of the cave, and with loud shouts commanded the "bloody idolators" to surrender the priest. There was no reply. Entering the cave as far as the day light permitted, no sound came on his listening ear, save the occasional fall of a water-drop from the ceiling. Still it was certain the victims were inside, and as the loud demands for their surrender were either not heard or not heeded, their persecutors proceeded to employ a mode of expulsion not unusual or extraordinary in these drear days of our history.*

A large quantity of furze-faggots was pressed into the mouth of the cavern. Between that combustible heap and the outer entrance, a wall of rubble stone

* In 1468, Pope Paul II. published a bull, granting an indulgence to such persons as contributed, by pecuniary aid or personal services, to the re-building and enlarging of Mary's church, at Youghal.

* Major General Ludlow speaks exultingly of one of these facts as having been achieved by himself in Dundalk. After describing the mode of smothering those in the cave, Ludlow says, that "among the dead they found the priest's robes, a crucifix, chalice, and other furniture of that kind."—See Ludlow's Memoirs, published at Amsterdam, 1569.

was raised, the chinks and crevices of which were filled up with the clammy sea-weed of the shore. Then through a small aperture, left for the purpose, fire was introduced. The crackling element threw out large volumes of smoke, and fragments of the rock, split by the fury of the flame, fell down and blocked up all chance of escape for those within. Eagerly did the priest-hunter listen, but no voice was heard from the inside. Could there be any possibility of escape? One of the party was ordered to ascend the cliff, and take a survey of the upper ground. He saw a volume of smoke rising out of the field at a short distance, and on reaching the spot, found it to be an aperture in which he could trace the foot-marks of persons as if coming up out of the cave. Disappointment seized him, and he hastened to inform the rest of the party of what he had seen. After a little observation, the conviction of a sad failure dashed their spirits for the moment.

The fire was allowed to burn itself out, and as they might now enter the cave without opposition or fear of danger, lights were procured, and in they moved to examine the retreat.

After passing through several windings, without noticing anything remarkable, they entered a spacious room, at one extremity of which appeared some articles on a projecting shelf of the rock. Approaching they found it was a rude altar, with candlesticks, chalice, and missal, resting upon it, and the candles appeared as if recently extinguished. Another discovery was made—'twas the body of the priest in his vestments. It was in a reclining posture, pressed up against the side of the rock, to which he had staggered for support, or to get a little air from some chasm. At a short distance, on the opposite side of the altar, was also found the lifeless body of a young female, about eighteen years of age, holding a white linen cloth in her hands. The minutest search revealed nothing else, except, indeed, the traces of many footsteps about the altar.

The reader is naturally anxious for an explanation of these strange facts. It was furnished by the relation of the persons who had escaped.

At the time that the effects of the fire began to be felt inside, mass had been already commenced, and the priest had arrived at that most solemn part of the sacrifice when he could not depart or cease, even at the peril of his life. The attendants feeling no such difficulty, fled, and saved themselves by the passage above the cliff. In their anxiety for his safety they urged the priest to fly with them, and also her whose lifeless body was found in the cave. The former made no reply, but proceeded with the service; the latter, whose name was Nora, with the devotedness of a kind, spirited girl, declared that she would not forsake her venerable friend and pastor. She was to have communicated, too, on that day, and this explains the circumstance of her being found with a portion of the altar-linen grasped firmly in her hands. It was manifest she had obtained the object of her devotional wishes, as the appearance of the chalice, the altar, and all, clearly proved the sacrifice to have been just finished when the breath of death reached them.

Skinner Dhuv, the spy (for such was his name—a name of terror—the adjunct dhuv, or black, being given him by the people to express traits of person as well as of character), wishing to make the most of his present success, determined on leaving the bodies in the cave, hoping that when their friends came to take them away, they could not escape his snares. To remove all suspicions of such intention, he and his party moved off towards Youghal, without appearing to have made any discovery. When arrived at a small promontory which cut off all view from the ground near the cave, they retired for the purpose of concealment under a projecting rock, while Skinner Dhuv crept back again through dark and narrow passages, to watch the movements of those he knew would come to look after their friends, and give the alarm.

The day which up to the present moment was calm and sunny, suddenly changed. The wind rose, black clouds drifted from the sea towards land, and the tide which had been for some time on the ebb, rushed to the base of the cliff with a fearful roar. There was, too, a drizzling rain, not a little increased by the foam and spray from the billows. In the meantime the spy was creeping along on his way to the cave, so intent on his object, and fearful of being seen, that he never adverted to his danger till he found himself hemmed in by the sea in a small bay, from which the rocks rose perpendicular. The tide was still rushing on. He cast a wild look around, seeking for some passage to escape. All in vain! the spot on which he planted his feet to take that view, was now covered by the waters. He uttered a fearful yell, which even if heard, could have been of no avail, as no human being could approach the spot he now occupied. The voice, however, was heard by persons on the summit of the cliff. Who were they? They came to the very verge of the frightful precipice, but he saw they were not his party. By this time he had thrice fallen in his struggle against the surf, and it was manifest that his strength and courage were giving way. The people on the cliff evinced no small anxiety about him, but it was impossible to render any assistance. After a considerable period of desperate struggle, during which he had been for some moments frequently under water, a heavy wave came on, threw him down, and on its return, after breaking on the rocks, it was seen dragging the body apparently motionless out to sea.

A thrill of horror passed through the spectators above, and one exclaimed—"A prayer for his soul!" They all fell on their knees, their eyes continuing still rivetted on the spot where the body disappeared. After some moments they rose, and he who had called for the prayer said: "Though he is the murderer of my daughter, and of our good and faithful priest, I forgive him; and may God forgive him!" "Amen!" resounded from the group.

By the report of a person who had entered the cave at the departure therefrom of the spy and his party, they had been made aware of the sad catastrophe, and were waiting an opportunity to remove the dead bodies. This they were now afforded, by the death of Skinner, and the escape of his less ardent associates.

Long in the memory, and afterwards in the traditions of the simple people of that remote district, did the terrible occurrence survive. Their imaginations chained the ghost of the spy to that spot on which he died, as a punishment for his crime. And when the sea is more than usually troubled, particularly at night, the herdsman returning from his cattle, or the fisherman from the beach, is even now accustomed to tell his friends at the fire-side, how he heard the agonized scream of Skinner Dhuv, high above the roaring of the winds, and the ever-restless dashing of the breakers. It is the colouring of fancy, this, but it is also an evidence of that horror which the faithful Irish entertain for the renegade. Need we say it is also a proof of their deep-seated sympathy for those who stood by their holy creed, when stupid bigotry baned the religion of Peter and Pius IX.

Vicar of Christ, and Father of the Catholic world!

II.

Rejoice, oh, friends and brothers, in that sacred sign,
Time's tree, at length, puts forth young leaflets, fresh and vernal.
Rejoice! and join in prayers and praises to the Eternal;
For him, the man of might, who stamps our cause divine.

III.

Henceforth no more delay! Shame on the laggard now!
Haste all to Pio's throne with hope and trustful feeling!
Reigns he not in each heart? Goes not a trumpet pealing,
As 'twere through each man's breast who gazes on his brow?

IV.

Oh! blessed be the Hero, whom no cause for grief
Could make despair of God, the omnipotent's protection!
Blessed the Banner, viewed by all with deep affection,
The Age's Oriflamme, uplifted by our chief.

THE

Shrine of St. Lorchan O'Tuathail.

In the year of our Lord 1181, Lorchan, Archbishop of Dublin, with anguish-torn breast proceeded to Normandy, to represent to Henry II. the atrocities perpetrated on the Irish by the mailed adventurers who, at the instigation of a profligate and dethroned monarch, smote the inhabitants with the edge of the sword, and wrested their fair possessions from the rightful owners. St. Lorchan left Ireland when he found that he could not combine the native chieftains in one soul-knit effort to overthrow their invaders—they, God pardon them! had clashing interests, foul feuds, and petty jealousies, which set them against each other; and, while they carried on an internecine war, the chivalry of the Anglo-Norman triumphed over all opposition, and laid great part of the country at their mercy. As long as there remained the shadow of a hope for effecting an organized league amongst the magnates of the land, so long did heroic Lorchan labour to kindle a martial spirit in the breasts of his countrymen; but when he saw that their own antagonisms aided the robber-rule of the Norman, he sped forth on a mission of mercy, and resolved to implore Becket's murderer to restrain the ferocity of his liege subjects.

Ah! it brings the blush to our cheeks, when we recall the unavailing efforts of this princely bishop to band together the Tanists and Chiefs of Ireland, in a holy and noble resolve to scourge the bloody Norman from out the land. When we remember how Duke William triumphed at Hastings, our confusion increases, for though skill and strategy secured the victory for him, he met, nevertheless, a glorious resistance; and no Saxon, looking back to that period of his history, need be ashamed of the conduct of his ancestors. William conquered 'tis true, but his march was over the bleeding bodies of those who lost life with their birthright. Strongbow—De Lacy—the Gherardini, and all those who landed on the Irish shore, eventually won the soil, because its possessors were too much occupied with their own feuds and rivalries to stand between the robber and his prey. Talk of armour, caracolliing steeds, waving bannerols, proud plumes, and blaring trumpets—what were they all, if the love of fatherland stirred the hearts of this Irish people? A couple hundred horsemen, equipped as for a tourney, could not conquer a whole nation, if a national feeling nerved the hearts of the people, and roused them from that hell-trance which seems to have reduced them to a state bordering on asphyxie! Ah! if there be a single fact, in the whole range of Irish history, more calculated than another to humble and overwhelm us with sorrow and disgrace, 'tis this, and this alone.

Vainly did Lorchan O'Tuathail seek to promote a sense of patriotism in the breasts of his misguided countrymen—vainly did he remind them of their old renown, so traceable on the annals of their sires, so legible in their literary and military records. Alas! all in vain—they were apathetic; divided, and swayed by every base influence which makes men forget their duty to the land that bore them. Within the walls of Dublin, he who would have marched at the head of Irish clans to do battle with the invader, saw himself driven to be a pleader for mercy; and the archiepiscopal crozier raised to parry the stroke of the Norman sword. When the generous hierarch witnessed the recreancy and degeneracy of the Irish, 'tis not to be wondered at if he thought, or spoke as the poet hath described—

"Oh! may God, our Lord! assail me, if at times, in high disdain, Seeing this, I prayed that Brian had not wholly crushed the Dane."*

Aye, in good truth, for if the Dane had not been trodden down at Clontarf, he would have made a noble struggle for his usurpations, nor would Strongbow have had such an easy conquest.

A people so divided must be ruined in detail—literally exterminated. Smiling lands, rich in the produce of fruits and flowers, were to be won by a single charge of Norman cavaliers—a brodered scarf, the work of some fair lady's hands, was not to be won in a passage of arms with such ease, as the fields of this island when a troop of Normans, with lance in rest, and plate-armour glittering in the sunlight, spurred along the plains and hill-sides to the shout of "St. George," and "Dieu aide."

Let us repeat it, over and over again—even at this hour the lesson has a mighty moral—may we learn to appreciate it. Dissension and petty jealousies lost the land, and from that hour when Strongbow scaled the walls of Dublin, date all the sorrows, famines, plagues, and misrule that, with four-fold scourge, have lashed this wretched and degraded island.

"And throughout our desolation, mark ye not God's holy hand,
Smiting us with subtle vengeance, for our sins against the land?
Frantic feuds, and broken pactions, selfish ends, and sordid lust;
And the blackest vice of vices—treason to our sacred trust!"

But we know not how it fared with Lorchan in the land of Normandic, nor do we care to chronicle the result of his interview with King Henry. Rumours were rife that he had been prohibited to disembark in any of the Irish ports, and from all that we are able to learn, we know that his spirit was crushed within him, and that he knew he might not lay his bones in his cathedral of the Holy Trinity, in Dublin, or amid the churches of Glendalough, where he spent his youth's green years, roaming over the heights of Lug-Duff, rapt in the contemplation of God's wonders, so lavishly scattered over the patrimony of his princely ancestors.

A short time before he arrived in Normandy, he had gone to Rome, and sat in the Council of Lateran; 'tis said that he sought to set aside the bull of Pope Adrian, fraudulently obtained by an English monarch from an English pope; but in this he did not succeed; and after a short sojourn among the glorious monuments "of the mother of lone Empires," turned his steps towards home. Oh, Cari Compagni! who in youthhood walked with us over the Via Sacra, under the arches of Triumph, and along Father Tiber's sacred banks, this saint of ours pondered there, too—kneelt, perhaps, in the primordial church of St. Clement—gazed, awe-struck, on the mighty Colosseum, whose proportions had not yet been broken by the barbarous Barberini—evoked the shades of the Grachi, on the sacred mountain—paused in the pillared solitude of the Forum—yearned, like Augustin, to behold Rome on a day of triumph, and then, musing on the instability of human glories, looked far into the dim mist of coming years, and wept over the ruin which lowered on his own fated land. But now all is over, he has come ashore at that point of the coast which still bears his name. The little creek called "St. Laurent" received the barque that bore him; and with cross in hand, habited as a canon regular, and attended by a single companion, this Irish prince-bishop, of Heber's line, proceeds to a spot where some shepherds were tending their flocks. "What church is that," asked he, "whose towers we see from this?" "Tis an abbey," they replied, "of canons regular of the order of St. Victor." "This, then," said Lorchan, "shall be my resting-place for ever—here will I dwell, for I have chosen it." With faltering steps he seeks the hospitable gate, and Abbot Osbert, attended by his monks, receives the aged exile in holy embrace. Then forth they go to the church, and down kneels the blessed bishop before the altar, to return God thanks, who saved him from the perils of the sea; and then he prayed a prayer for that dear land he loved so well. Aged—infirm—heart-broken—yet a short while shall he bide among the brotherhood of Eu. The shadow of death hovers about him, and the life-blood flows sluggishly through his veins. No longer able to attend at matin-song, or seek the choir at vesper-chime, he lays him down on the bed from which he shall never rise again. A kindly voice whispers to him the propriety of making his last will and testament. "Lo!" replies the prince-bishop, "out of all my revenues, I have not a coin to bequeath—nay, the couch on which I rest is not mine own." And then, when the death-film covered his eyes, his lips moved in prayer, and he desired to be aneiled, according to the usages of the Church, and pass from out this land of exile, strengthened with Christ's mystic body, to the holy habitation of the saints.

What an imposing scene was there not then round the dying exile's bed! See the Abbot, surrounded by his community, invoking benison on the spirit sanctified by prayer and fasting—commanding it to depart in peace to the Christ who redeemed it, and the angelic hosts who wait it on the threshold of Heaven. See with what more than human love the hierarch glues to his pale lips the blessed image of the Redeemer, as though the blood oozed from the sculptured wounds—list to the solemn tones of the abbey-bell, as they surge and die away through the sombre aisles and fretted cloister, announcing the transit of a great spirit—see how the dying man's face kindles into seraphic glow as he receives the viaticum, and how they raise the nerveless limbs to imprint thereon the blessed unction; and then pause for a moment to contemplate the candour of that exiled soul—so beloved—so pure—unstained by the tinge of blood—virginal as when the baptismal waters cleansed it from original sin—a soul on which the Maker might see His own sacred impress, untarnished by lust, greed, or treachery! Thus, in the abbey of Eu, did the just man pass away, on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1181.

Great pomp attended his funeral obsequies. The barons of Normandy, and Cardinal Alexis, the Scotch legate, were present, and when the rites were done, Lorchan's remains were inhumed in the Church of Notre Dame. The fame of his sanctity went abroad; crowds of pious pilgrims were attracted to his resting-place, and thereat they so spake of miracles, that the Canons regular were obliged to exhume the mortal spoils on the 17th of April, 1186. Canonized in the affections of all; oh! but there was ineffable joy when, raising the lid of the sarcophagus, they beheld the blessed Lorchan untouched by the tomb's corruption, and looking as though he had laid him down to repose, with all the insignia of his sacred dignity on him, after some fatiguing ceremony. 'Twas not death, but a holy Christian sleep; and that robed form exhaled a sweet fragrance, as though the folds of cope and alb retained the odours that burn at the altar when prayer is wafted to Heaven 'mid clouds of incense.

Wonderful is God in his saints. Precious in His sight are their remains, whether they come from the reeking arena of the amphitheatre, torn by the tiger's tusk, or, in His inscrutable wisdom, are preserved from the appalling decay that waits common humanity in the grave. Harken not to the blasphemer who reviles the veneration in which the Church has ever held the relics of her saints—that veneration is not of to-day or yesterday, 'tis old as the apostolic times, when the hem of a garment gave out healing, and the very shadow of an Evangelist braced the palsied, gave sight to the blind, and caused the decrepid, on whom it fell, to go forth bounding like a roe.

But louder and louder grew the attestations of those who, praying at the grave of Lorchan, received signal proofs of his intercession with God. From Him alone come these marked evidences of power, and at the intercession of His most blessed servant; these cures—these unexpected restorations to life, health, and energy are His work, and he whom they invoked to mediate cannot have been an impostor, hypocrite, or cheat. His whole life becomes a volume which men begin to study as they would the Gospels. That life-volume records wonders—blessedness is legibly written on every page—spotless purity there glows and burns more brilliant than the brightest illuminating—gemmed and clasped with the most priceless adornments—'tis such as a nation might do battle for, to save it from opprobrium or disgrace. This man, then, is fit to be enrolled among the sainted in heaven, and 'tis fitting too that his name should be inscribed on their fasti here on earth.

Therefore doth Guy, seventh abbot of Eu, speed forth to Rome, and there spends he full twenty years urging the canonization of Lorchan O'Tuathail. Then does Pope Honorius III. in the year 1217, issue a commission to make minute examination of the miracles attributed to Lorchan, and when inquiry is fully satisfied, he promulgates, on the 3rd of the ides of September of the year following, the bull of his canonization.

On the 10th of May, 1226, Godefroy D'Eu, bishop of Amiens (who built the magnificent cathedral in the last-named city), solemnly deposed on the altar of the parochial church (at Eu), the relics of St. Lorchan O'Tuathail. In progress of time, his fete became the grand solemnity of the abbey; troops of pilgrims went thither from all quarters, and the abbey finally took the name of the blessed guest, who visited it to die under its roof. 'Tis, however, worthy of remark, that the abbey retains its original name, while the parish in which it is situate is called la paroisse St. Laurent.

The church in which St. Lorchan was interred, and wherein his tomb and shrine are still to be seen, is called after the saint, and according to M. L'Abbe Cochet, was anciently visited by Saints Valery, Firmin, and Remy. Viewing its destinies under another aspect, we may not hesitate to observe that this church is annually visited by the French monarch's court, and that the Queen of England, some few years ago, stood at the foot of the altar where the sacrifice of the Mass is rarely celebrated without invoking the Irish Saint. "Catholic Ireland," exclaims M. Cochet, "that day were you avenged, and in their coffins your holy pontiffs received the homage of your sovereign!"

But let us bethink us of the shrine. Immediately after the canonization, the Archbishop of Rouen came to venerate the relics, and thereon made a collection wherewith he purchased a gorgeous silver feretory, in which the body was placed. A gentleman of Eu who, at the intercession of St. Lorchan, was cured of a grievous malady, was one of the principal persons who laboured at this shrine; and when it was completed, some able artist wrought on it, in raised work, the figure of the Count of Eu, armed with sword and buckler, and inscribed on it this sententious legend, "je suis Rolland, le noble chevalier."

The shrine was placed in the sanctuary, behind the grand altar; and the concourse of pilgrims became greater every year; bringing with them many munificent offerings, to give still greater splendour to the canopy under which the Saint reposed. During the ages of faith, Catholic France thought she never could pay sufficient homage to the shrine which was destined to perish in these unhappy days when the devil, seizing fast hold on Calvin, and his coadjutor, Farel, incited them to make savage war, with torch and sledge-hammer, on everything that was venerated in Catholic times. This spirit of iconoclasm and sordid rapine springing up at Geneva, long before the lean heartless heresiarch consigned unfortunate Servetus to the blazing faggots, found its way into France, about the year 1562. The shrine was too rich a booty to be passed over by the rapacious Huguenots, who, if they had been able to carry out their plans, would have destroyed every object of art or antiquity in the world, provided its material was not gold or silver. Happily, however, the head and arms of St. Lorchan were encased in a feretory of brown wood, and in an inventory made in the year 1790, of the furniture of the church, we find the following entry "le chef du Saint sur une chasse de bois rembruni et les deux bras en bois, revetus de quelques lames d'argent." The revolutionists were disappointed—their predecessors in the work of massacre and spoliation left them no gold or silver to carry off.

While the parochial church held the shrine of St. Lorchan, the abbey of Notre Dame was possessed of another sacred relic, this was the Hanap, or chalice which the Saint was wont to use at the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice. Out of this cup, pilgrims resorting to Eu were accustomed to drink when smitten with fever. The abbatial records state that it was stolen in 1408, and restored soon after. The Huguenots laid sacrilegious hands on it in 1562, and then, in all probability it was melted down to glut the avarice, or cater to some other passion of these merciless miscreants.

Such was the fate of these relics, so long venerated by the people, and so intimately identified with their most pious associations. Happily, however, they still possess some valuable remains of his canonized bones, and though these should wither, or be scattered to the winds, the fame of his many virtues and miracles must long endear his memory to the burgesses of Eu. A remarkable proof of this we have been enabled to collect from M. L'Abbe Cochet's work, which tells us that the present King of the French has expended a large sum in restoring the monuments of his ancestors in the crypts of Eu. One of the principal objects of his solicitude has been the sarcophagus of the Saint—the identical one in which he was laid before the exhumation of his remains. "This sarcophagus," says the reverend and learned writer on whom we have so largely drawn, "is at the very entrance of the vault. On the dais is couched the statue of the saint, sculptured in the thirteenth century. He is vested in all the pontifical habits, that is to say, the tunique, dalmatic, and chasuble; his hands, placed on his breast, hold a broken staff; his head is covered with a mitre; a thick beard flows from his chin; his manipule, stole, and short boots are in every respect like those found on the abbots of Jumieges, exhumed some years ago by M. Caumont."

To give even a feeble idea of the veneration in which St. Lorchan was held at Eu, we need but turn to the pages of Cochet's book. "Whenever the people were menaced by war, famine, or pestilence, or needed good weather, the mayor wrote to the canons, and they immediately commenced a novena before the relics. If the malady or danger continued, the head of the saint was exposed for three days; if the public calamity still impended, the grand relics were then borne processionally through the city. Then might you witness a splendid spectacle—the banners and the crosses of the confraternities, followed by those of the different parishes—the Capuchins bare-footed—the cross and banners of the abbey—the clerks and priests of the parishes—the head of St. Lorchan, crowned with flowers—the two arms of the holy confessor—then, the great shrine, carried by eight canons bare-footed, and crowned with flowers, followed by the mayor and the civil and military authorities."

These processions were of frequent occurrence. In 1587, when the people were visited by pest, we are told that "the whole neighboured assembled and marched, two by two, to venerate the saint's relics. Men and women all went bare-footed, each carrying a white cross—men and women robed in winding-sheets, and the men having their hats swathed with white grave-cloths. As they proceeded, this unearthly-looking multitude chanted the following lugubrious stanzas:

"Amendons nous, amendons nous
Portons nos suaires quantè nous
Pensons qu'il nous faut tous mourir
Pour aller avec Jesus-Christ!

But we feel that this paper would involve us in prolixity, were we to dwell at greater length on the "Eglises de L'arrondissement de Dieppe;" yet, we would not be doing justice to the learned French ecclesiastic, nay, nor to our own feelings of gratitude, if we did not here translate the splendid apostrophe of our French brother. No Irish heart can fail to be touched by its eloquent simplicity, and our only regret is, that we may not let it stand in the language in which it gushed fresh and warm from the elegant pen of the foreign priest:

"Great St. Lorchan, who have come from the extremities of the world to mingle your apostolic dust with the chivalrous ashes of the Lords of Eu, your sepulchre has remained glorious with us! In your own country, Catholic Ireland, the Island of Saints, it could not have been circled with greater homage than in this Christian Normandie, the land of churches and abbeys. Your coffin is uninscribed, but your name is graved on the hearts of the people. From the depths of their tombs, the Norman princes supplicate the suffrages of prayer. You, in your tomb, receive the homage of kings, and the prayers of the people. The sarcophaguses which surround you contain death, yours alone contains life. Ages gone, thousands of pilgrims have not ceased to visit your bones, which have performed prodigious miracles. You are the protector of this city, which has placed its hope in you. Continue to defend it against the calamities which threaten its frail existence—dwell long time in the midst of these tombs of princes and warriors, who form your court—sleep in peace in this holy dormitory till the angelic trumpet awakens, from their deep slumber, these crowned heads. Then will they arise, wrapped in their cere cloths; but your glorious and transfigured countenance will fling out radiance in the middle of this people of the dead—yea, you shall be brilliant as the sun; and the pontifical habits, which you wear, shall surpass, in their spotless purity, even the dazzling whiteness of the snow."

'Tis thus they reverence an Irish saint in a foreign land. Foreign; oh, no! we should not speak of chivalrous France in these terms. We owe that land much gratitude. It sheltered our exiles, and, thank heaven, they fought, shoulder to shoulder, with her gallant children, and turned the battle's tide when all seemed lost but honour.

"On Fontenoy, on Fontenoy, nor ever yet elsewhere, Rushed on to fight a nobler band than these proud exiles were."

When God in his own good time permits, we will be recreants and ingrates, if we do not endeavour to make some suitable return for all the benefits which brave France has conferred on us. One word more. St. Lorchan has no temple in this city of Dublin. His grace, the Archbishop, is solicitous that his people would not be indifferent to the memory of their canonised prelate, and is endeavouring to raise a church, under the invocation of the holy exile. We, therefore, take this opportunity of exhorting all to contribute to this national work, and thus gladden the heart of the venerable, and venerated metropolitan, for whose happiness and longevity we, as in duty bound, will not fail to offer our most ardent aspirations. Sero in cælum redeat.

Gloria in Excelsis,

GLORY to God in the highest!

Adoration and praise evermore,
From angels thy sanctuary highest,
From the stars of Thy palace's floor,
And from man for whose ransom thou diedst,
On earth peace to men of good will.

We praise Thee, we bless Thee, we humbly adore
In jubilant chorus the Universe o'er;

We thank Thee O God! for thy measureless glory,
Lord God King of ages, who wast and art still,
Tho' the suns of the systems are waning and hoary,
Thro' aions repeating their luminous story.

Great Father Omnipotent! reigning before
The heavens went forth, from thy chambers, to fill
Peopled space with the brightness, and terror, and roar,
Of lightning-lit tempest and foam-banner'd rill,
From thunder-clad mountain to surf-trampled shore.

And dust, at Thy word, sprung to life with a thrill.
O Son, sole begotten! Redeemer, Christ Jesus!

Lord God! Lamb of God! from the Father proceeding,
The red sea of whose blood from captivity frees us,

At the father's right hand, ever reigning and bleeding,*
Oh! hear Thine own wounds for our misery pleading,

For Thou only art holy—Thou only art Lord—

Thou only most high, Jesus Christ, with the Holy Ghost, in the light of the Father ador'd,

Triune God, to whom honour and empire be solely.

* 'Tis necessary that this expression is used in the figurative sense.

Life and Labours of a Catholic Curate.

CHAPTER I.

HIS PARENTS—THEIR CHARACTER AND STRUGGLES.

WHAT a bright catalogue of enduring and unassuming duties are associated with the idea embodied in the words we have chosen for the papers which will, from month to month, appear, under the above heading, in this MAGAZINE! What a noble and consoling speculation do they open for all those who are interested in the humble struggles, the severe trials, and the painful sacrifices which, unhappily, are the lot of our people beyond that of any other nation in the world. Within this Life and these Labours lie, almost wholly, all the sustaining influences of religion, which in addition, 'tis true, to the purity of his domestic affections, constitute the happiness of the poor man, in a country where he may be said to have everything to suffer, and, with the exceptions which we make, almost nothing to enjoy. Deprive him of these sacred assurances, which shed their holy and serene lustre into his heart, and upon the humble but beloved beings that form the little circle of his affections, and what else is left him but darkness, and trial, and sorrow? In all his cares and trials—and he is seldom without them; in all his privations—and they are the lot of his daily life; in the hour of heavy sickness, and in that of death itself, who is the friend to whom he uniformly turns for counsel, instruction, and support? To this we need not reply. The affectionate veneration with which the clergymen of the people are looked up to by our countrymen, is a full and sufficient answer. If there be, however, one class of the Catholic priesthood more lovingly enshrined in the general heart of the country than another, it is that of the working curates; and, indeed, it would most assuredly be very strange if it were otherwise; for we question whether any country in Europe or Christendom could present a class of men more zealously devoted to the lofty spirit of their mission, or who work out their long and labourious train of duties with a more heroic disinterestedness than the labouring curates of Ireland. Little, indeed, are these labours known by those who sit in the high places of the empire; and, of course, they can be but very inadequately appreciated by those who are ignorant of their importance to the country, and the dangers by which the discharge of them is so frequently encompassed. In estimating those duties it is not, unhappily, necessary for us to refer back to any particular period of public suffering, in order to detail the inexhaustible patience, the unshaken fortitude, the incessant bodily toil, and the severe mental pain with which they are performed. Alas! no. The terrible scourges of sickness and famine, which, without precedent or parallel as they are, continue still to desolate the country, present to us the brightest and most melancholy records of Christian duty and self-devotion by which any class of clergymen were ever characterized. This is undeniable; and among that which they are called upon to suffer is the exhausting sympathy with the many-shaped miseries of the people, by whose depressing spirit they are so much worn down.

Indeed, we know nothing at once so fearful and so great, as the life of a working curate—when elevated to that pious heroism which consecrates his mission into such a sublime spirit as soothes and sustains the humble, and the poor, in the painful trials of life and the hours of sickness and dissolution.

In the armies of the world the pitched battle occurs only at intervals; and, after a due period of service, the soldier retires, provided for during life—and the superior officer, to wealth and distinction. But, in the life of the poor curate, for whom neither wealth nor distinction can be pointed to in the background, the battle is to be fought by night and by day—in all hours, at all seasons—and in positions where his presence is little else than another name for death to himself. It matters not to him, however, in what place or under what circumstances his solemn and formidable series of duties are to be discharged. He is not to be frightened from the pest-house by the rankest and most concentrated form of contagion—neither the burning heat of summer, nor the freezing scourge of winter's frost can close his heart against the groans of the sick, or the repentant aspirations of the dying. Through every difficulty he proceeds, unshrinking and undismayed, and it is neither the raging of the elements, the long fast, the thin coat, nor the insufficient period of rest, that can ever keep him away from the wants and sorrows, and sufferings of those who can look but to God above as their friend in Heaven, and to him here as their only friend on earth!

In thus speaking of the labouring curates of our country, it is not our intention, of course, to draw any offensive or invidious distinctions between them and the higher orders of the priesthood. The latter will remember that they themselves have once belonged to the class of which we write; and certain we are that, if called upon for their testimony in favour of the working curates, they would most amply and cheerfully corroborate the truth of every sentence we have written.

All greatness is relative, and such, as from the position of those with whom we associate it, not unfrequently leads us into an erroneous estimate of its claim upon public feeling and opinion. He, for instance, who stands upon some of the great stages of life, placed in strong relief and high prominence before the world, where all the accessories by which he is surrounded are striking and impressive, and calculated to form, as they usually do, a portion of the individual and his character such a man, we say, is in many instances estimated more from that universal consent which the conspicuousness of his station gains, than from a thorough knowledge of the conduct and principles which have led to his elevation. It is, indeed, difficult at all times for a man of this kind, tempted and made giddy as he is by the loud voice of popular applause, to avoid transfixing himself, as it were, more than he ought into the spirit, often thoughtless and precipitate, by which he is supported. The consequences are, that he runs great risk of forgetting the truthful solemnity of his original principles, and becoming, so to speak, the mere slave of his own worshippers. Such men have indeed much to contend with. In process of time they are drawn away from those sincere impressions of public duty and love for their kind, with which they originally set out, and become almost unconsciously the creatures of those external forms and manifestations of popular feeling by which, at the sacrifice of truth and duty, no public man should ever suffer himself to be led. We are far from saying, however, that such aberrations from the spirit of public virtue are always inseparable from public men, or that many public men, and truly great ones too, have not nobly stood the test of the temptations to which we have alluded.

So much for greatness of a public nature; but now may we be permitted a few words concerning that which is of a different character—we mean the greatness of the man, who, surrounded by none of those dazzling and seductive formalities that so frequently corrupt the heart and mislead human ambition to its ruin, can and does nevertheless pursue through his lowly and neglected path, uncheered and almost unknown, that greatest of all objects which true ambition can propose to itself—a simple and majestic devotion to promote the welfare of his humble fellow-creatures, to purify and exalt their hearts, to sustain them in their sufferings and sorrows, and to prepare them by a proper and faithful discharge of their duties, through all the severe phases which this life presents to them, for the meet enjoyment of that which is to come. This indeed is that true ambition—that exalted greatness whose other name is love, and before whose unselfish sublimity the noisy and unsubstantial pageant of public life, as pursued by the patriot, the senator, and the politician, will, when scrutinized by truth, be deprived of the miserable glare by which the hearts of the unthinking are so often led into delusion and error. By the one, we are too often reminded of the trick and dexterity which may be witnessed in a pantomime or a melo-drama—where false appearances are occasioned by collusion and the assistance of agencies which we cannot see; whilst the severe but unencumbered truth of the other reminds us of those sublime and miraculous manifestations of God's power that have been revealed to us, in their impressive simplicity, through the pious agencies of man.

He who comes properly to the life and labours of a priest, should be animated above all things by a spirit of faith and trust in the love and sustaining power of God, by a high and holy feeling of the truth and sanctity of his mission, and by a force of enthusiasm arising from a conviction that he has been called and appointed to that post, at which he feels it is both his duty and his pleasure to live or to die. Let not the individual then who enters into this responsibility, rest upon the cold consciousness that he is merely discharging the duties of a professional man, and that he is one of a class who have been trained and educated to fill a public department of life, like a medical man or a barrister. No, no; unless he is capable of apprehending, in a far wider and more elevated sense, the great spirit of Christian duty which he is called upon to show in his conversation and labours, he may pass through the world and his profession, free apparently from lukewarmness or blame—but he will find that on looking over his omissions, there will stand a long catalogue of unperformed duties against him.

Such was not the wordly or indifferent spirit with which he whose life we are about to record entered into his mission. This, however, will be sufficiently detailed in the progress of our narrative. We can only say here, for the support of those who may be deterred by a want of zeal or perseverance in that which is good, and by want of reliance upon the support of God in working it out, that in the early period of his life, if one were to judge by occasional appearances of unsuitable temper and a disposition to natural pride, such a person so judging would have said:

"I fear that our young friend, Owen O'Donovan, will have much to overcome, in point of temper and pride, before he is properly prepared for the Church."

And they would unquestionably have been right—for such indeed was the fact; and we only mention the circumstance now in order to inform our readers, at an early stage of our narrative, that the first enemy which stood in the way of his pious aspirations was his own heart; or, in other words, its natural propensities. He who is able, however, to triumph over these, may not fear, aided by the assistance on which he relied, to encounter the external world and its other temptations.

Owen, or Eugene O'Donovan was the fourth son of Thomas O'Donovan and Margaret Cruise, both of whose old and respectable families had been long resident in the parish of Tullybrack. His mother was a woman of that humble but trusting piety, and serene simplicity of character for which so many of our Irish mothers, in every condition of life, but especially in the middle and lower classes, are remarkable; his father held land to the amount of about seventy or eighty acres, at a moderate rent, and was consequently in tolerably good circumstances. The latter, however, was of a warm and impetuous disposition, but, owing to the imperturbable sweetness of heart which characterized Mrs. O'Donovan through every trial, both of his temper and their early struggles—for they were not without them—this tendency to passion on his part, which in other circumstances might have occasioned much domestic disquietude, was for the most part so admirably regulated, if not completely subdued, by her Christian forbearance and the affectionate earnestness of her remonstrances, that in the course of time he began to find that he was gaining a most gratifying ascendancy over his natural impetuosity and want of self-restraint.

We have said that in early life O'Donovan and his wife had their struggles; and this was true. His family were remarkable for a great deal of that indifference to agricultural industry and to a manly anxiety for independence and improvement, the existence of which still, amongst our people, constitutes a great blot upon our national character; and it is not until a consciousness of this and a full feeling of its truth shall be, time after time, impressed, if we may use the expression, upon the national heart, that we shall, with our fine natural advantages and high intellectual qualities, be able to form for ourselves a new and more elevated standard of domestic, social, and moral life. It is not then by dishonestly concealing the civil and social failings of our countrymen that we can ever render them essential service. Some persons we know are ready to cry out, with very discreditable and unmanly alarm, that we ought as an act of duty absolutely to suppress all mention of our national errors and vices, lest, forsooth, we might sink ourselves in the estimation of the English people. Such an argument, however, is unquestionably disgraceful to any independent Irishman, anxious for the substantial improvement of our condition. What! in the name of heaven, are we to have no higher standard for our own character than that which the English, or any other country, may form of us? Are we to have no high and upright rule of self-respect at home, by which we must be guided? or are we to travel abroad and borrow our moral character from those who, after all, are much below ourselves in that very point?

"Come, come, Paddy, be good now; there, be quiet; what will John Bull think of you?"

Oh! no, it matters not, it would seem, whether we are to be devoid of the fear of God and insensible to the sanction of religion; it matters not, in fact, say these men—for in truth their arguments come to this—whether we are to be without that keen and enlightened conscience, which, in addition to what we have already said, generates the highest sense of national honour and self-respect, provided we stand well in the opinion of the English people! No, no, in order to conciliate the respect of others, let us first endeavour to obtain our own—when, of course, that of others will follow; and, instead of entertaining any dread of what John Bull may think or speak of us, let us take the only true standard of life as our guidance—to wit, a fear of God and a sincere regard for the obligations of his law.

These, we submit to our readers, are much more certain and appropriate guides for our conduct than the opinions of an Englishman.

The difficulties, however, under which Thomas O'Donovan had to labour when the farm of Lisbellin came into his hands, having resulted from more than one cause, we shall dwell upon them for a brief space; not so much because they possess any peculiar novelty to our readers in general, who, we presume, are tolerably well acquainted with the unfortunate situation of the country, as because they show what energy and industry can effect, not merely in improving the circumstances of men placed in his condition, but in enabling them to make an independent stand against difficulties equally harassing and severe.

Old O'Donovan, on coming into the property at his father's death, found that with the farm he had all the responsibilities annexed to it to meet; and, on looking closely into his circumstances, he felt it anything but gratifying to reflect that his position was painful and embarrassing. He was, for instance, two years and a half in arrear, and as, whilst his father lived, he (the son) had left the management of the farm as well as of every thing else altogether in his hands, the general opinion went, that he possessed much of the old man's character, and inherited his indolence, negligence, and slovenly habits of management.

This, to be sure, was a very rational supposition, and the landlord accordingly, one day, on looking over a list of defaulters on his property, that had been submitted to him by the agent, perceived the name of Thomas O'Donovan. This gentleman—one of the old squires of the country, by name Brooklawn—was a member of parliament, and, like too many of his class, as remarkable for neglecting his own property as he was necessarily indifferent to the welfare of his tenants; the one fact being only a natural consequence of the other. He was, however, resident on his property, and, if not intimately acquainted with the private circumstances of his tenantry, he was with most of them personally—a circumstance, which even in itself was an advantage to the people in many respects. The truth, however, was, that in general his residence at home—unless when in parliament, which, indeed, was not very often, as he paid very little attention to his duties as a senator, especially during the fox-hunting season—his residence, we say, at home enabled him to know a good deal of the character and domestic habits of the people, and the consequence was, that he could not, consistently with his position, see any honest family, whose hereditary probity and integrity he knew to be without stain, visited with severity or injustice, whilst the knave or party-bigot escaped, or was treated with undue partiality and political favour.

"Hey hey," he exclaimed, "what is this?" Here is O'Donovan—Tom—the father's dead, I was at his funeral—honest but negligent; honest but negligent—how comes this? but I suppose I need not ask—the fellow is his father's son. Hey? hey? his father's son—honest but negligent, hey?

The agent, to whom he addressed these words, was his own brother-in-law, and, like Brooklawn, resided upon the property, and might be said to be personally acquainted with every tenant on the estate. He was, however, what God knows is too rare a commodity in this country, a good man; or, we should rather say, a good agent, for in other respects he partook too much of the dissolute moral habits which prevailed among his class during the period of our narrative.

"Why," replied Harris, for such was his name, "I fear in one of the respects, at all events, that he is unquestionably his father's son, as I know he is in the other; there is no honest man than Tom O'Donovan—but I fear he will turn out as careless and as bad a manager as his father."

"Here he is, two years and a-half in arrears, upon a cheap farm; and you know, Archy, I cannot stand that."

"No," replied the other, "you are in error—his worthy father, who would not defraud a child, left it to him so."

"Eject him, then—eject him—hey? he will do no good—we can easily get a better tenant—hey? You had better eject him."

"I think not; upon a principle of common justice we should give him a trial—a reasonable time to ascertain what stuff he is made of, in point of industry."

"Out with him, Archy, out with him. I know the careless habits of the family, and there is nothing good to be expected from him. I wish to get rid of such people, and to have none but persons who will pay strict attention to their own affairs."

"But," replied the other, laughing, "don't you feel that this doctrine, which is excellent in itself, comes with a bad grace from the lips of a man, who had he, and I may add his father before him, paid common attention to his affairs, might not be as he is now, sitting with a millstone about his neck in the shape of an incumbered estate. Suppose now our fat friend, the wealthy and retired pawnbroker, were to address you in the words you apply to O'Donovan, what reply could you make? Suppose he said, Brooklawn, I must foreclose my mortgage; you have a fine estate, but although I believe you to be an honest man, I think you are proverbially wasteful and extravagant—honest but negligent, Brooklawn—hey?" "honest but negligent," he repeated, imitating him.

"Well," replied the other, "there is something in that; but confound it, Archy, we can't make our neighbour's case our own in every instance. I think it would be better for himself to go out; he will dwindle down to beggary, and ruin the value of my farm besides."

"Yes, but perhaps not; who knows but he may retrieve himself. His ancestors have been for centuries on your property, and believe me, my dear Brooklawn, it is not a slight thing which should determine a landlord to eject from his property any member of a family, which, like his, has lived upon it so long, and uniformly maintained a moral character so high and spotless."

"But what is to be done, then? I have known persons like him to play upon me, when they found me too indulgent, and with my father, too."

"I will see him myself," replied Harris, "and I shall remonstrate and reason with him—in fact, point out to him his duty, and will get Saunderson, my steward, to give him some useful hints as to an improved method of cultivating his farm, by adopting the most recent and beneficial modes of tillage."

"Aye, aye—you always do as you wish—try him a little longer then, since you must have it so—put him to school if you like; but remember that neglect of business—hem! oh! well—never mind," he added, catching himself upon his own weak point; "as I said, put him to school if you have a fancy for it, or through any course that will enable him to pay me my rent."

Harris shook his head. "Ah!" said he, "I fear we have much to answer for with respect to our duty to the people."

"Why?" replied the other, with surprise, "what duty do we owe the people?"

"Do we owe nothing to those from whose labour and toil we draw our support? and is it reasonable that we should be indifferent to the condition of those who support our rank and position in life—who enable us to indulge in all the luxuries and delicacies of civilized society—to sleep in beds of down—wear the richest apparel—drink the costliest wines—use our splendid equipages—and indulge in many other extravagances perhaps not quite so justifiable?”

“Well, and have not the people, on the other hand, our property to live upon? hey? Answer me that—have they not our property to live on? hey, Harris?”

“Yes; but in what condition do we in general permit them to live upon it? Is it right, for instance, that they who clothe us so richly should go naked, or half-naked themselves? Is it right that they who enable us to eat and drink so luxuriously, should be able to live upon nothing but a miserable, unsubstantial potato? Is it just, that they who keep us in castles, should be found to reside in hovels, or in houses that are not capable of excluding the elements or protecting the inmates from their severity? Or, that those who provide us with beds of down should sleep, like animals, upon nothing but miserable straw? Is all this, or any of it, right or proper, just, humane, or reasonable.”

“But why don't they clothe better, and feed better, and sleep better? I am sure I should be glad to see them improved in all these particulars.”

“Far be it from me, my dear Brooklawn, to say that the people are free from blame—on the contrary, they are in too many instances shamefully indifferent to their own comforts. But even so; when did they ever possess anything at all like a standard of social or domestic comfort! They have been, for centuries, deprived of education—yet punished for crimes arising from their ignorance: was that just? Since we see, then, that they will still persist in neglecting themselves and their comforts; since we see that they are far behind in agricultural and industrial knowledge; that they are too generally negligent, slovenly, and deficient in habits of punctuality and cleanliness; I maintain—since we see and know all this—that it is our duty, for our own sakes, to do that for them which they have not yet had an opportunity of doing for themselves, or of knowing how to do it—raising their comforts, and ameliorating their general condition.”

“Very well, Archy, that, I dare say, is all right and proper; but I do not think that I have neglected my duty very much, nor disregarded the condition of my property—at least to any very great extent. However, as to O'Donovan, let him see to find some means of so far improving his farm as to be able to pay me my rent.”

“Yes; and then your interest for him ceases. Now that, between you and me, embraces the great national neglect, so justly attributed to the Irish landlords, with, to be sure, many noble and creditable exceptions. ‘Provided the rent is paid,’ says the landlord, ‘I care not; I trouble my head no farther—why need I? where's the necessity?’ “As to O'Donovan, however,” proceeded the agent, “before we think of ejecting him, let us, as I said, do our duty by him; let us give him an opportunity of recovering his independence, and of understanding the most effectual method of turning his farm to the best account.”

It is due, however, to O'Donovan, to state here again, as we have stated before, that he had had the courage to look his affairs in the face, before this dialogue took place, and that he had already determined to leave nothing undone, so far as in him lay, to place, by prudence, enterprise, and industry, a basis for independence and respectability under his feet.

This, on his part, was a task of considerable difficulty; and it is very probable that were it not for the confidence which he knew he could place in the agent's sincerity and kindness, and even in the landlord's disposition to encourage him, he would scarcely have had either temper or perseverance to make battle, with sufficient coolness, through his difficulties. His wife had brought him no pecuniary dowry—for it had been a love match—but she brought him one of a much higher and more abiding character in the disposition and virtues to which we have already alluded.

Harris, as he said he would, called on him, and, after a conversation of much interest, received a candid and detailed account of the difficulties that pressed upon them—among which the arrears of rent constituted only the larger, but by no means the most harassing item. He was, also, considerably in debt, or, in other words, he held himself solemnly bound, by his father's last wishes, to discharge every pecuniary obligation that the old man had left unliquidated.

We may be indolent, when we have neither heart nor encouragement to work—we may be negligent of our own interests in consequence of that neglect which we feel conscious the aforesaid interests experience at the hands of those whose duty it is to promote them—we may be in a position that forces us to evince many failings and errors, which result more from that position than from any innate conformation of character—we may be all this, but either devoid of moral integrity or deliberately dishonest, as a people, we are not.

The agent, finding that O'Donovan had anticipated him in his determination to raise himself into independence, promised him every encouragement in his power; and, indeed, felt a good deal flattered that his favourable opinion of him had been so satisfactorily borne out. Saunderson, his own steward, directed him in the best and most judicious mode of cultivation, and it so happened, that O'Donovan was neither too proud nor too obstinate to refuse the advantages of a more enlarged experience and better skill than his own.

It is not our intention to dwell at any great length upon his indefatigable exertions, whilst struggling his laborious way through the embarrassments which, under less strenuous efforts would have completely overwhelmed him. It is those embarrassments, and the almost necessary distraction of mind which they occasion, that present such a series of endless trials to human patience; and which, above all things, apart from the greater calamities of life, are calculated to test the value of the woman who has taken her lot with us through all the joys and sorrows that diversify existence. Without his admirable wife's inexhaustible patience, and her meek, calm spirit of unassuming piety, Thomas O'Donovan never would have been able to sustain himself under the repeated backslidings in the up-hill journey of his independence: like a guardian angel, there she was ever at his side, to aid, cheer, and guide him; and, when some unexpected fall from the little eminence which he had toiled to reach, would leave him nearly at the unhappy point from which he had started, there again she was, with her kind word, her cheerful smile, and her affectionate consolation.

One morning, after they had been about four years married, he came in to breakfast with an expression of rage and indignation on his features, which could not for a moment be mistaken. His wife saw at once that some unexpected provocation, or some new embarrassment had come in his way, and, with her usual judgment and good sense, she determined to wait a little, in the hope that a knowledge of its nature might the better enable her how to act under the circumstances.

“Peggy, is the breakfast done?” he asked, in that energetic tone of voice that uniformly betrays suppressed resentment, "for, if it is'n't, it's time it should, I think."

"It will be ready in a few minutes, Tom," she replied.

"What do you call a few minutes?" he again enquired, "I wish to know if it's ready now."

"Well, not exactly now, Tom; but in ten minutes it'll be before you."

"Well, I declare to heaven, I think it's the least that my breakfast should be ready for me when I come in for it."

"Well, dear, sure in general it is—don't we mostly have to send for you to the fields, to come to it? Nancy Gallagher, will you hurry the breakfast, like a good girl, the masther wants it."

"What's the raison, Nancy Gallagher," said her husband, in an angry voice, "that you hav'nt it done, you lazy huzzy? Is this traitment for me? I tell you that I won't bear it—no matter who may be the occasion of it—neither from you nor, nor— from any-one else."

"It was my fault, then, masther," said the girl, imagining that he was displeased with her mistress.

"Do'nt say what's not true, Nancy," replied Mrs. O'Donovan, "never do that; the fault wasn't the girl's, Tom; if there is a fault, it is mine—but recollect you're in earlier than usual this morning; but indeed I'm sorry it's not done, especially since I see that it vexes you."

"That! what vexes me?"

"The breakfast not bein' done."

"Why now, Peggy, do you imagine that I'm such a hot-headed tyrant as to get vexed by that? I thought you had a better opinion o'me."

"Deed and I know that to come in hungry," she replied, "and not find one's male's mate ready, does put many a one out o' temper. I'm afear'd, then, something worse has vexed you, achora, for your mind does seem disturbed—but the Lord support and strengthen you, a villish machree, for many a thing you've had to vex and annoy you!"

"Nancy Gallagher," he said, without replying to his wife, "there's Paddy Gormly at the garden gate, tell him to come here."

The girl did so, and in a few minutes Gormly came in, as he had been directed.

"Paddy," said his master, "I'll make Jack Droogan take your place at the plough to-day, and, as soon as you ait your breakfast, go through the whole mountain bar, and warn every friend I have there, to be in the Aisther Maragamore (big market). The Finigans an' we must fight it out on that day—Jemmy Finigan was with me in the fields this morning, and, bekaise I can't pay him one half of what my poor fa— of what I owe him, that is thirty out o' sixty pounds, he tould me that he'd make a saizure—I spoke him fair—upon my sowl I did," he proceeded, looking at his wife, who was, he knew, aware of his impetuosity, "I did, Peggy—upon my sowl I did nothing else, until he called my honest father a rogue, and then I let him feel what an' O'Dononan can do when well provoked."

"Why, what did you do," asked his wife, quite alarmed at the fierce smile of triumph which settled upon his features, "I hope you remembered yourself, and used no violence."

"What," he replied in astonishment, "to the man that called my father a rogue! divil sich a lickin' ever a vagabone of his name got as I gave him—I know he'll come down on me, bekaise he has the writ, to my own knowledge, these three weeks. However, what we can do we will do—an that is, gather our faction in the Aister Maragamore, and give them sich a payment as they didn't reckon on—so I tould him."

"And what did he say," asked Gormly, who was now perfectly elated at the prospect of the fight, "what did the vagabone say?"

"Faith," proceeded O'Donovan, "when he got himself over the ditch at Craction's park, he shouted back that he'd bring the execution, get paid by the sheriff, and give us a resate in full in the Maragamore. So, I say, do you go at wanst to the mountain bar, warn all our friends, and as many of your mistress's here as you can, an' to-morrow you can take the lower part of the country, round by Ballaghneed, Corboe, and Eskernabrogue."

"Let him take his breakfast first," said Mrs. O'Donovan; "sure you wouldn't have the poor boy to go away fastin'."

"No," replied her husband, "I would not, nor I don't intend he'll go till after he aits it; at any rate," he proceeded, with a voice of sullen yet triumphant indignation, "the vagabone will ruin me. How can I pay sixty pounds, and divil a sixpence worth he'll lave undher my roof, so that I'm as far back now as ever I was in my life—then there's the M'Quades will be comin' down upon me some o' these days, so that on whatever hand I turn, I'm ruined. Well, well—I'll be glad to see them that could give me consolation, or an easy heart now. Be the h—y man, Paddy," he exclaimed, in a fit of abrupt passion, "we'll make sich an example of them Finigans as never was seen before or since—the revengefull, ill-minded scoundrels!"

"Tom," said his wife, "these things is enough to make any one lose their temper; but, at the same time—stay," said she, changing her manner as if she had just recollected something, "come into the parlour a minute, I want to say a word to you."

"Well, Peggy," he asked, when they had got in, "what is it?"

"Why," she replied, "you know I never like to advise you before the sarvints—but Tom, avillish, as there's nobody here but ourselves, will you strive and be cool enough to see what you're bringing upon yourself and us by your hastiness."

"Ay, but he called my father a rogue, and that's what I'd not bear from St. Pether."

"Well, but listen—I allow it was very provokin'—but now answer me—for sure I've often known you to be hasty in matthers of business the same way—answer me, then, an' I know that whatever you will say I'll be the truth, neither more nor less—did'nt you spake something provokin' to him before he called your father—God rest him—a rogue?"

"All I said when he threatened the saizure was, that if he did it I'd make him sup sorrow, an—"

"Well, acushla, an' what?"

"Throth I b'lieve I tould him there wasn't an ounce of honest flesh belongin' to his seed, breed, and gine-ration."

"And then—what did he say then?"

"Why, he got into a passion, the vagabone, and said I was a rogue, and that so was my father afore me; the blackguard, to dar to say so!"

"Well, but don't you see now yourself, agra, that it was you gave the first privication? If you had'nt tould him that he and all belongin' to him were dishonest, he wouldn't say that your father was a rogue. Don't you see, Tom darlin, that the fau't was more your own than his? But why would you be cast down, avillish? Sure you know you wor in a worse way often, and got out of it. Are we to have no trust in God? Don't you know that nothing does or can happen contrary to his will—barrin our own sins—an' why then wouldn't we put our hope an' trust in his marcy and goodness? But then again, if we let ourselves be overcome by our self-will an' bad passions, we can't do that, nor be in a fit way to resave his grace. You're sometimes too easily cast down, Tom dear. Think of how much you have done wid your farm widin the last two or three years, and didn't you tell me yourself the other day that you thought the next saison's crop 'ud clear you of everything."

"An so it will, I hope, if I could struggle through till then."

"Did you tell Finigan that?"

"Hut! how could I?—the vagabone—the poor man lost his temper in sich a way that I—I—"

"Well, no matter, it can't be helped now, or rather, it can be helped. Tom darlin, will you be sed by me in this business? Don't you know afther all there is no one livin bein that cares for you an loves you as I do? an' who has the same right? Our lot is the same for ever; and, indeed, so far as I am consarned, it's a happy one. Oh! who then loves you as I do—who wishes for your happiness, both here an hereafter, as I do—an' who is there afther all that loves me—your own Peggy—as you do yourself? Oh! no one. Listen then, don't—"

"That's thrue," he replied, interrupting her, for his honest though occasionally too warm heart felt moved at the touching sincerity of affection with which she spoke; "that's thrue, Peggy darlin. Oh! who ever could love you as I do? But who could know you as I do, an not love you like the apple of their eye. How would I have got on at all only for you?"

"What did I do, darlin, but my duty—my bare duty—an' not that same, for, indeed, I fall far short of it every day of my life."

"Well, darlin, but what were you going to say," he enquired.

"Why, to ax you not to send Paddy Gormly on any sich message. Could you so far forget yourself, or forget your duty to God's will, an' the love you owe your neighbour, as to meet like wild beasts, full of liquor and bad feelin', to spill each others blood, an' maybe to take one another's lives; for many a life—an' you know it well—is taken in these disgraceful faction fights? An' listen again, how could you go to your knees and ax God's forgiveness, and sich thoughts of blood and revinge on your heart? tell me then, darlin, that you wont send him on such a message."

"Oh! you know, Peggy," he replied, in a voice at once of reluctance and good nature, "that you do whatever you like with me; so, I suppose, you must have it your own way this time too."

"May the blessin' of God be on you for that, darlin, an' if you'll lave Jemmy Finigan to me, too, maybe you'll come betther off than you think. Sure every one knows that there's not an honest, or a dacent, or a kinder-hearted man in the parish we live in than the same Jemmy Finigan. Hasty the whole family is, like yourself, an' on that account, surely, Tom agra, you are, I know, one that oughtn't to be too hard upon him."

"Very well," replied her husband, "manage it as you like; but, if you see Finigan, I hope you wont say anything that 'ud be mane or cowardly on my part, that he might be boastin' of aftherwards, an' crowin' over me for."

"Indeed, I promise you I will not, Tom—you may make your mind aisy on that head. And now, darlin," she added, "in order to thank God for this little victory we got over our own bad passions, and to beg of him to give us grace to keep every bad inclination undher, let us aich offer up three pathers, three aves, and a creed, and by that time the breakfast will be ready."

He at once complied with this pious intimation; and whilst they are engaged at this simple but fervent act of devotion, we shall detail a brief dialogue which took place in the kitchen, between Gormly and Nancy Gallagher, with reference to the subject matter of their conversation in the parlour.

Gormly, after a dry groan, and having screwed his features into a comical expression of disappointment and contempt, observed to his companion, in a kind of ironical confidence—"Ah, Nancy, I'm afear'd this is a bad business."

"What is?" she replied, smiling, for she understood him thoroughly, although she asked—"what is a bad business?"

"Why, what's goin' an in the parlour idin? Throth its breakin' my heart to see it."

"Throth, Paddy, whatever your heart is breakin' about, you want great improvement in plain spakin."

"And in troth," he proceeded, "there's as purty a day's fightin' lost by that hugger-muggerin that's goin' an idin there, as you'd wish to see. Howaniver, its no matter, sure I must get over it as well as another; an I wouldn't care so much, barrin in regard of the shame o' the thing."

"Still in the dark we are, Paddy."

"Now listen, Nancy, I only ax you this—does it stand to sinse or raison, or common manliness an dacency, that a man should be ever an' always regulated by his wife? eh? Throth its a burnin' shame to see the likes of Tom Donovan not able to put his hand to his mouth unless she wishes it. No, no, the sorra fight we'll have now that she has taken him into hands."

"I see," replied the girl, "its the want of the fight that's throublin' you; but, at any rate, what nonsense you do spake. Doesn't all the counthry know that he'd be hard set to hould his house an' farm only for her. Doesn't every one allow that her aquils isn't in the parish or the next one to it aither?"

"I know they do; but for all that it's onseemly; in every earthly thing, big and little, great and small, she manages him."

"Aye does she—an' its well for him that she does so. Only for her his want of temper would get him into fifty scrapes, and keep him makin' enemies for himself every day in the year."

"An' what great harm 'ud that be? Haven't we Faction enough to leather half the parish? D—I a stroke of a fight he was in since his unlucky marriage."

"No, nor sorra one ever you'll see him in while there's a puck of breath in your body."

"Farier gair, I hardly expect it—he's taken too much to the prayers for that. Isn't it odd now, Nancy, that the minute a man turns to devotion he regularly gets cowardly an' gives up fightin' and drinkin', an' every other divarsion o' that kind."

"Very odd, indeed," she replied ironically; "what a pity it is that a man couldnt sarve both God and the devil at the same time—ha! ha! ha!"

"Well, well," he observed, as he rose up, "a'fther all," and here he sighed and shook his head with a very disastrous visage, "a'fther all, Nancy, it isn't manly or dacent—throth it isn't—wait till I get you, you thief, an' I'd be glad to catch you regulatin' me—that's all."

"Aye, wait," she replied, laughing, "that same 'wait' will thry your patience, I think. I tell you now what I've tould you often, that you must regulate yourself into something a great dale better than you are, before ever you can give me the opportunity of doin' it."

This closed their dialogue, which was cut short by the appearance of their master and mistress.

The change occasioned by the admirable influence and pious spirit of this inestimable woman, on the bearing and features of her husband, was, indeed, very striking. His manner was now composed and peaceful, the turbid flush of passion had departed from his face, and in its stead there remained a solemn dignity that harmonized well with the exalted principles, which in the very spirit of unassuming humility she had infused into his heart. When breakfast was over, Gormly got his hat, although he felt quite conscious that his mission had been already cancelled.

"Begad, master," said he, affecting an exultation, which, however, he did not feel, "we'll have a murderin fine back this time. I'll sweep the whole mountain bar, plaise Goodness."

"I've changed my mind, Paddy," replied his master composedly; "go to your plough, I've thought better of it—we'll have no blood sheddin' or breakin' of bones, or what might be worse, maybe lives lost and murders committed. It's full time that these disgraces to the country should stop and be put an end to—go to your plough."

"Hem! oh, yes, Sir—very well—hem!" and as he spoke, he turned a dry glance upon Nancy, who smiled in triumph, but spoke not.

Mrs. O'Donovan's peaceful exertions, however, did not rest here. In the course of a few days she succeeded in reconciling her husband and Jemmy Finigan, who, in point of fact, had been very much provoked by O'Donovan, before he had taken out the writ against his property at all; and who, were it not for such provocation, would never have proceeded to any such lengths.

Such was one instance of the incalculable services which a pious wife can in a hundred ways—in fact, through all the trying vicissitudes of life—render to her husband and her family, and to all who have the privilege of observing and imitating her bright example.

It was by exhibitions of such unaffected piety and sweetness of disposition, joined to a mind of much strength and great powers of endurance, that Mrs. O'Donovan by degrees succeeded in enabling her husband to exercise that salutary restraint over the impetuosity of his temper, which surprised such a number of his acquaintances and neighbours. Nor was the secret of this gratifying change long undiscovered. Among their friends it frequently became the topic of conversation; for, indeed, our countrymen are in general gifted with that degree of shrewdness which often enables them to look not only into the aspect of external circumstances, but into the hidden causes which produce them. On the chapel green, for instance—when O'Donovan and his wife made their appearance at the turn of the road that approached the chapel, or in the fields where the neighbours were at work, such conversations as the following might be often heard:

"Well now, isn't it a surprisin' thing to think of the change that has come over Tom O'Donovan widin the last few years! a man that was as aisily lit up as gunpowdher itself—to grow so cool an' forbearin' that there's hardly any provokin' him!"

"Ay, indeed," another would observe, "its himself that I remimber the hasty customer—so hasty, begad, that if you contradicted him, it was hardly anything but the word an' the blow wid him."

"Throth," would a third say, "a'fther his givin' up the fightin' an' faction work, marrices will never caise. I jist thought he could as soon change the colour of his skin as grow ppaceable, or let a Fair day pass wid-out a row, especially a'fther the sup got into his head."

"Ay, an' that, too, he has given up," observed another; "sorra sup goes into his mouth sthronger than wather."

"Ah," said an old man, shaking his head, "you may all talk about his givin' up fightin' and faction work, an' his keepin' from liquor, but what signifies all that. He has overcome an inemy stronger than ten thousand like them. What great things is it to give up fightin'? an' what great things is it to give up liquor aither, especially for a man like him that was never a dhrunkard. No, no—thank God, he can boast of a greater vict'hory than either o' them."

"Aisy, boys, let us hear Jemmy, now; come Jemmy, you that's the great headpiece all out, give us some o' your narrations upon the subject."

"Troth," replied Jemmy, with a grave smile, "an' it isn't but you stand in need o' them, you unfortunate brine-oge you; but if you want to know what I'm spaikin' about, listen. I tell you that it's an aisier thing to conquer a king at the head of his army, than it is to overcome the natural temper that's born into the world wid us, especially when the same timper's a bad one."

"An' how is it to be done, Jemmy?" the others enquired.

"There's only one thing can do it," he proceeded, with an amusing degree of harmless pride at his own didactic superiority over those whom he addressed—"there's only one thing can do it, an' that's the grace o' God—blessed be his name!"

"Well," replied one of them, "you may be right in ginerall, but if the book was put into my hand, I'd switch it, that whatever change has come over him, the wife is answerable for. I lived in the family for three years, and may I never swig a cruiskeen—for I may as well say that as a worse oath—but she kept at him, palaverin' and placegin' him wid sweet words, until she buttered him up any way she liked. Throth I remimber when he was a spunky, spirited fellow, that would fight his corner an' dhrink his glass like a man; but now he's a niddhy nauddhy—a poor, quiet, spiritless creature, that you'd hardly drive out o' the kale garden. An' you call that improvement, I suppose?"

"Ay do I?" replied Paddy, "an' it 'ud be well for you, an' still better for your poor wife, that you wor like him, bad as you think him—you'd neither disgrace yourself by dhrink nor 'get your gruel'* so often as you do, an' both you an' she 'ud have a bettercoat to your backs into the bargain."

"Augh!" replied the other, "what's the world good for, if we don't take our fun out of it? Why now, spakin' about Tom O'Donovan, I remimber one mornin', while I was at sarvice wid him, that he came into his breakfast likely to be tied. One o' the Finigans,

* In other words, get yourself well beaten.

it seems, had called his father a rogue, an' threatened, besides, to make a saizure upon his property. 'Go off,' said he to me, 'as soon as you swally the last bit, and warn all my faction in the Mountain Bar, to be in the next Maragamore, till we leather them blackguard Finigans of Mulnabrogue into mummy.' Begad, I felt my heart lep to my throat wid delight, when I seen there was some chance of a daicent row; but behould you, she walks him into the parlour, an' begins o' sugarin' him up an' raisonin' him by the way, until afther some time he walks back to the kitchen, an' tould me not to mind warnin' them—that he had changed his mind, an' thought better of it, and that faction fightin' was a disgrace to the counthry! Oh! divil resave the word o' lie I'm tellin' you! God forgive her! However, that's the way that many daicent men are too often made good for nothin' by their women.*"

"Well, sportheen Gormly," said the old man, "I ever and always found that the tree is known by its fruit, and any one might know by your discoorse the kind of a youth you are. That man's wife has been the manes, always undher the grace o' God, of workin' a great reformation in her husband; for I needn't tell you, that the Almighty often uses humble instruments to bring about his own purposes. That woman's piety and charity there is no knowin'—I have it myself from good authority, that in hard times, when she sees a poor mother goin' about wid her little flock o' miserable childre at her foot, or some heart-broken father of a family wid his clacken of motherless creatures wid him, that she'll give them her own male's mate, an' fast for that time; but, indeed, it would be hard to get her aquils."

"Why, then," said Paddy Gormly, for the reader perceives that it was he, "I'll never be the man to keep back the thruth, when it is the thruth. I know myself that every word you say now is thrue—I've often known her to do it—an' I can tell you besides, that there's no end to her charity; an' upon my sowl, I have no fau't to find wid her but makin' a molshy of her husband. Sure he's nothing now but a poor, cowardly prabeen, that any one might tramp upon."

"Oh! that's another thing," observed one of them, "he's quiet I grant, but for all that it would not be very safe to go to tramp upon him."

"At any rate," proceeded Jemmy, "that woman has been the manes—by her advice and the pattrern she set him, and the cheerful grah she ever had for him—of keeping his heart up often an often, while he was gettin' through his struggles and contendin' wid the difficulties that came upon him at his father's death. However, the truth is, neighbours, that a blessin' from God attinded every thing she did, bekaise she did nothing that was dispaissing to his will, and upon every thing she laid her hand on; sich misfortunes and thrials as he had—and, indeed, he got his share o' them—she, by her patience and piety tuck the sting out of—and so, signs on it, see how thrivin' and prosperous they are now, an' God keep them so, an' spare her to him,—an' that's the worst I wish them this day, a chiernah!"

Such were the conversations which might frequently be heard among the neighbours, concerning the virtues of this inestimable woman, and it was not to poor Jemmy alone that the sentiments of love and respect which he had expressed for her were confined. So far from that, we may safely assure our readers that they were co-extensive with the knowledge of her name and the space filled in the parish by her reputation.

The conversation, which we have detailed, occurred some years after the dispute between O'Donovan and his creditor, Finigan. At that period, the former had been still labouring under serious embarrassments, although he had also disencumbered himself of many of those harrassing responsibilities. Had the agent been a bad or an unfeeling man, indifferent to either the struggles or prosperity of his tenant, it is very likely that O'Donovan would have been crushed by the heavy load that was upon him; and, with his hot and impetuous temper it is impossible to say, under such circumstances, into what fearful depths of crime he might have precipitated himself. As it was, however, he experienced, at the agent's hands, not only forbearance but advice and instruction. Saunderson, the steward of the latter, had, as we have said, frequent conversations with him, and the result was that he gradually imbibed correct notions of husbandry, which, when applied with unremitting care and perseverance, soon caused him to feel their beneficial advantages, in a constantly increasing product and improving soil. It is true that the efficient cause of his independence and prosperity was to be found in his own industry, and in that decent sense of self-respect, without which no man need ever expect to hold for any length of time a creditable position in life.

Review.

AN ANALYSIS OF GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE. Illustrated by a series of upwards of seven hundred examples of door-ways, windows, &c., &c.; and accompanied with remarks on the several details of an ecclesiastical edifice. By RAPHAEL and J. ARTHUR BRANDON. Two vols. London; PELHAM RICHARDSON.

THESE volumes supply a desideratum in ecclesiological science. The general principles of Church arrangement and decorations have been freely canvassed during the last ten years: the connexion between ritualism and ecclesiastical arts illustrated, and the mysteries of symbolism explored. The true principles of design have been ably set forth and vindicated by Mr. Pugin; while the chief characteristics, and prominent features of Christian architecture have been examined and illustrated by various authors. But the want of a work like that now before us, treating of the principles of construction, and formation of tracery, the theory of mouldings, and the minuter details of pointed architecture, was seriously felt, especially by architects. This deficiency has been in a great measure supplied by the work of the Messrs. Brandon. Their examples are nearly all drawn from parish churches—a very commendable practice. Before the "Revival," none but cathedral, and large conventual churches were deemed worthy of investigation; and in consequence, art suffered greatly; for in the enthusiasm for the restoration of ancient models, the features of large works were rashly seized upon, and injudiciously applied in smaller works for which they were by no means suited.

The introduction to the present work contains a rapid sketch of the progress of the various styles of pointed architecture, or rather, as the authors wish to have it, "of the prominent transition stages of the one great style," with some observations on their leading characteristics. It also treats, at some length, of a very curious practice which appears to have been more extensively adopted by the mediæval architects than is generally supposed—we mean a degree of imitativeness, joined with that freedom of invention for which the old men were so remarkable, or the engrafting, if we may so speak, of the details of one period or style on the general outlines of an older architecture. It is alluded to, with some notable examples, in the following passages :

"This is a remarkable and highly important circumstance; lying, as it does, at the very basis of authoritative rules for restoration of original edifices by ourselves. And, indeed, it forms a strongly marked exception to the usual practice; for it was a general rule with the builders of the middle ages never to fall back upon a past era of their arts, even when engaged in completing structures of a by-gone age. Influenced by a spirit, which in these times, it is scarcely possible yet to understand, their sole aim was advancement. One "master" was ever anxious to surpass another, and each sought, in any fresh design, to improve upon his own previous works. It would seem that when engaged in repairing or making additions to their churches, the style then prevailing was invariably and boldly adopted. The architects of those days trusted in the beautiful harmony which breathes throughout their great art, and which they well knew must necessarily exist the same at any period of it. But when they had to complete a design, left from the first imperfect, they appear to have been induced, in some instances, to mould their work in such manner as to maintain in the general outline some degree of uniformity throughout the whole.

"The grand and venerable Abbey-church of St. Alban presents examples, no less remarkable for diversity than excellence, of the proceedings of the "masters" of old. The nave, including triforia and clerestory, was originally Anglo-Norman—plain and massive in the extreme, yet strikingly majestic in its austere simplicity. It would appear that when, after a lapse of time, the early English Gothic was fairly established, it was determined to alter the nave to that style, and thereby improve it. The work of renovation accordingly commenced, it began at the west, and the design extended to the first four arches on the north side, and the three corresponding ones on the south. We must imagine that for some reason the works were suspended, and that an interval of several years elapsed before they were again resumed; for when once more proceeded with, the style had considerably progressed, and early English Gothic was shortly to give way to Decorative. Two more of the Anglo-Norman arches on the south side were rebuilt at this period, their general design being the same, the strings, &c., corresponding with the earlier work, while a partial difference is observable in the mouldings, and other ornamental details. Again were the works discontinued, nor was any further effort attempted, with a view to the reconstruction of the church, until the Decorated Gothic had attained to almost the very highest degree of its beauty and perfection. And here begins, correctly speaking, the work of assimilation. Since the commencement of these improvements, Gothic architecture had gradually undergone a remarkable change, so that it is very certain that had not the architect been desirous of assimilating his work to that of his predecessors, he would have adopted a design very different from that which has been carried into effect. As it is, the general character of the early English pier-arches is here preserved, though the mouldings of the arch-heads, and the capitals of the piers are pure Decorated. In the south triforium, also, the arrangement of both the arches and sub-arches corresponds with the similar members in the earlier work; shafts (though no longer detached,) are placed in the jambs; and strings are continued above and below the arcade, in which the long trails of tooth ornaments are superseded by a series of the square flower of four leaves. And again, the walls of the clerestory (quite at variance with the practice of the time), are pierced with lancet windows, in evident continuation of the original design; the proportions of these windows are precisely similar to those in the adjacent early English portion of the church, but their mouldings are beautiful, and pure Decorated. The corbel table, also, beneath the parapet, on the exterior is continued, but in the latter portion of it, the early English notch-heads are seen to have given way to a series of male and female heads (valuable specimens of the head-dresses of the period) and lions' heads—peculiarly a decorated ornament."

Westminster Abbey Church is then instanced as an example of this curious process; where in the nave and aisles the work of the fifteenth century is made to assimilate wonderfully with the general characteristics of that of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. In the piers this is particularly observable. Those of the later style are banded, contrary to the custom then prevailing, but in imitation of the earlier work; yet in those bands of the fifteenth century the idea alone is retained, the proportions and outlines are quite different from those of their prototypes. The earlier portion of the aisles is, in accordance with the prevailing custom, arcaded. When the later parts were erected, panneling had superseded arcading, still, in this instance, we find the arcading preserved, but with totally different details in capitals, bases, and mouldings. Fotheringay Church, Northamptonshire, is then given as another example, and the authors remark "that the assimilating process never extends to the mouldings."

"To however great an extent the earlier portion of an edifice may have been subsequently copied, those important members were always worked in strict conformity with the ordinary system prevalent at the times of their construction; and thus they will be found guides of the greatest possible authority, as well for detecting the application of this principle of assimilation, as for determining the date of those structures, or parts of structures, which maintain throughout an architectural consistency."

The work is arranged in two great sections: "masonry," and "wood and iron works," which are again subdivided into sub-sections, treating of "windows," "doors," "buttresses," &c., &c. In the sub-section of windows, the authors trace the gradual development of those most characteristic features, from the simple, long, narrow, and round-headed opening of the Romanesque, to the slender lancet of the first pointed; and show how, by the combination of the lancets for the admission of more light than could be obtained by them singly, the principles of tracery, which afterwards became the glorious distinction of the Decorated, or middle pointed style, were first developed; showing thereby how the beautiful in art is a thing of natural growth, and a consequent of the essential. An example singularly illustrative of this principle is given by the author, and as it affords a proof of the ingenuity of the old men in turning features which might at first sight seem blemishes into positive beauties. We feel no hesitation in giving it at length:

"At its first introduction, and throughout the continuance of the Semi-Norman period, the pointed arch was very obtuse, rarely becoming equilateral, and perhaps in no single instance acutely pointed. In the early English Gothic, on the contrary, the equilateral is the usual form of the window arch; while in some cases, and more particularly in the cathedrals and larger churches, we find the windows most acutely pointed, as at Lincoln and Southwall Minsters. The single-light early English lancet in general use during the first Gothic period was of the simplest arrangement; its very simplicity constituting its peculiar charm. In those windows the glass was generally brought within three or four inches of the outside face of the wall. In the interior, the openings were widely splayed; and, consequently, in walls of great thickness this splay caused the width of the jambs to be, in most cases, four or five times the width of the light. Now if the arch of the window had been allowed to widen inside with the jambs, besides the unsightly appearance that would be produced, it would have necessitated a much greater height in the walls of the church than was considered desirable by the early English architects; and hence arose a peculiar treatment of the interior of windows, the general arrangement of which consisted in having totally distinct arches inside and out: the outer adapting itself to the peculiar character of the window, but the inner being almost invariably a segmental pointed, or drop arch, the point of which, in many examples, was considerably below that of the window itself, as in the south aisle of St. Alban's Abbey Church. It will be observed in this mode of construction, that the head of the lancet is cut out of a mere slab, a few inches in thickness, which is carried up internally till it meets the soffit of the drop-arch. The effect also of this treatment of their lancets was to throw the light down into the church, and leave the valley of their high-pitched roofs in a state of semi-obscurity—an object they so evidently sought for in their interiors. So characteristic was this arrangement considered, and also so peculiarly effective in itself, that shortly after its introduction it was generally adopted even in windows so placed as not to require its constructive advantages; thus in gable triplets, the combined windows were very commonly finished in the interior with drop-arches. The same arrangement appears in the tower of Brockworth Church, Gloucestershire, where the interior arch, though segmental, is actually concentric with the arch of the light. This last-named circumstance is indeed of by no means rare occurrence in those positions in which the drop-arch was introduced rather as an essentially characteristic feature than a necessary constructive application. As a matter of construction, this drop-arch is by far more secure than an arch sloping so considerably as would have been requisite had the interior and exterior arches been concentric. We may here observe that this arrangement, variously modified, continue to be in use in the construction of windows throughout the Gothic style."

The opposite mode of treatment is adopted generally by our modern practitioners of the art, with most unsatisfactory results.

The construction of the tracery of windows undergoes a close investigation. The authors are of opinion that nearly all the varieties of tracery are derivable from the equilateral triangle, and its combinations. Many of the examples which they give, favour this theory; and we have found its application to many ancient windows perfectly satisfactory. In some examples, 'tis true, the existence of triangulation is scarcely perceptible at first sight, but a closer examination will in nearly all cases demonstrate an approximation to the equilateral triangle, or probably a slight and necessary derivation from it; but these exceptions will not invalidate the general principle. And when we consider the extensive influence of religious symbolism on all the æsthetical developments of the middle ages, and the importance attached, in consequence, to triplcity of arrangement in many instances, we are still more prepared to admit the high degree of probability there exists of the triangle being the basis of so important and plastic a feature of pointed architecture as tracery. The most beautiful arches, both of the first and middle pointed periods, are those described on equilateral triangles; and it was only when this form of arch was abandoned, by the substitution of the low four-centred arch, in the latter days of third pointed, that architecture began to be truly debased. A fortiori then it is highly probable that the same principle entered largely into the decorations and component parts of these arches.

A long sub-section is devoted to mouldings—one of the most characteristic features of pointed architecture, and yet one which till very recently, has been entirely overlooked. Architects very frequently made an indiscriminate use of mouldings of all periods in a building which in its great features affected but one style. Mr. Paley's "Manual of Gothic mouldings" has proved, and is likely still to prove, the most effective check to this abuse, by demonstrating that mouldings are the best aids in the discrimination of styles, and their most certain characteristics. The Messrs. Brandon have added little to Mr. Paley's theory, but the collection of examples scattered over the work is invaluable.

Doorways, buttresses, parapets, fonts, sedilia, gable-crosses, and nearly all the other details which involve the exercise of the masonic art, undergo a strict and scientific investigation.

The second section of the work opens with an interesting treatise on those most beautiful features of ancient architecture—open wooden roofs, which, since the "reformation" had been so barbarously treated. Frequently was a roof of admirable construction, and most elegant design hidden by some flat plaster ceiling. A better taste now prevails in England; and these abominations are being everywhere removed, revealing long-hidden ancient glories; while every new church of the "revival" has its bold and ornamental open roof. We are sorry we cannot point to any return to this ancient practice in Ireland, except in those churches erected after Mr. Pugin's designs. In the very few churches which have been erected after ancient models, the hypocritical plaster groining, in imitation of stone, has been adopted. There are, however, works in progress, and others contemplated, on which roofs of the olden type will be introduced. The Messrs. Brandon promise a new publication, on "open wooden roofs," to which we look forward with considerable interest. It will, doubtlessly, throw considerable light on those interesting features of ancient churches, and afford abundant examples for imitation.

Chancel, or rood screens are now being restored in many an English Catholic Church,* and in several instances where the "Establishment" exhibits better feelings than those hitherto manifested, those beautiful and symbolic adornments are introduced. Let us hear our authors on the ancient mode of treating those screens.

"The chancel-screen—a no less beautiful than necessary appendage—yet remains in many of the remote village churches in Norfolk, in almost all its original splendour. Though the carver exhausted on it the resources of his wonderful art, still was it not considered complete and worthy of its purpose, until it had been made to glow with the richest colours and gilding. To delineate the delicacy of the tracery without, at the same time, supplying the rich tints of the colour, is to deprive the design of a principal part of its beauty; the aid of polychromy, eagerly acknowledged in all parts of the Church, in the case of screens more especially was considered essential. Scriptural texts were constantly introduced in the cornice, and sometimes, as in Bishop Lydeard's, the whole of the Creed filled the casement. On the lower panels were customarily painted the holy apostles, or other saints and martyrs. But a few specimens of screen have been given, for, to do them justice, a whole work should be devoted to the subject; and we much hope that such a one will soon be undertaken—one in which shall be depicted not only the architectural beauties, but also the polychromatic effect."

So do we; and that by the Messrs. Brandon, for surely none can be more competent to the task. All the necessary furniture and decorations of a church were, in the Ages of Faith, such objects of reverential care, and subjects for the development of artistic skill, that many volumes might be compiled on the illustration of each. Roofs, chancel-screens, altars, sedilia, piscinae, fonts, tombs, crosses, stained-glass, &c. &c., exhibit such endless varieties of the most exquisite design, that they seem to promise work for future ge-

* No Rood-screen, we are sorry to say, has been set up in Ireland since the Reformation. In the new Church of St. John, Blackrock, the Rev. Dr. Ennis has erected a Rood-beam, which, in small churches, and where a screen and loft cannot be afforded, is an excellent substitute, and is supported by ancient examples. We refer with pleasure to this church as manifesting a decided struggle after ecclesiastical propriety. Its shortcomings, as might be expected in a transition state, are many; but where such good intentions are manifested criticism is disarmed. The design, we believe, originated with Dr. Ennis himself; and we entertain no doubt that had his views been seconded by intelligent professional skill, commensurate with the pious zeal of the designer, the defects would be less striking than they are. However, taking it all in all, it gives us the assurance that when ecclesiastics study church architecture (as in former times they did), we may look forward to the days when we shall emulate the taste and skill of Skillaugh, or Wykeham, or our own Cormac; but which we can never hope for, as long as our temples are raised by ignorant and unthinking men, whose only object is worldly gain. At St. Kevin's, Glendalough, a screen, with rood and loft, will be erected. This is another example of the salutary influence of the priest's being skilled in ecclesiastical art. We hope that Father Clarke's example will be generally imitated by his brothers in the holy ministry.

nerations of artists in illustrating, as well as in reviving and imitating their excellencies.

The authors' observations on the construction and framing of ancient doors, and on the application of metal work for useful and decorative purposes (they were never separated by the old artists) are worthy of the attention of modern architects. They will do well, too, to study the examples given in the illustrations, and to take the parting advice of these authors,* who all through have executed their task in the most admirable spirit, evidently influenced by a calm enthusiasm for their glorious art, and feeling their labours "sweetened and rendered dear to them by the sincerest admiration for those noble monuments of piety and skill"—"the works of their Catholic forefathers;" which even now, cruelly mutilated and dishonoured as they often remain, are still foremost among the glories of their land." Their concluding sentences are perfectly in harmony with those feelings:

"The possession of the most voluminous collection of examples will never make a church architect; something more than books is necessary. Let him who would aspire to the honourable title, go and minutely examine and study the buildings themselves; there is hardly a village church, however unpretending, but will furnish some information to the diligent inquirer; for

"Yet do the structures of our fathers' age
Shame the weak efforts of art's latest stage."

* This we are presumptuous enough to believe to be more substantial advice than that administered by his Excellency, in reply to a whining address presented by a deputation from the "Royal Institute of Irish Architects," in which he disdains "to analyse the causes which may have led to the state of things of which they naturally complain" (i. e. the preference given to Englishmen in all public works in Ireland. Don't these worthies themselves see the cause of it? If not, they are only fit to lodge in work-houses, and lunatic asylums, not build them), and "ventures to express a hope that happier days are in store for Ireland"—when, amongst other good things, the Royal Institute of the Architects of Ireland will have plenty of work in erecting poor-houses, hospitals, asylums, and jails, and in constructing sewers; and so "aid the great work of social improvement." Happy fellows! a delightful prospect you have before you, if you can take an Excellency's word for it. But—aid yourselves.

Music in our Country Chapels.

NEXT to the strictly ecclesiastical adornments of our churches, there is nothing in which we can take more interest than the music, vocal or instrumental, employed at the celebration of the holy mysteries. In cities and towns, there can be no difficulty in forming a pretty good choir—provided a gifted few have grace and enlightenment enough to discern that they can make no better use of a good voice than in singing the praises of God. An organ, too, may easily be bought by the collections and contributions of individuals who possess taste, spirit, and zeal for God's house: if we could effect it, no church throughout the land should be without that great ecclesiastical instrument; but this may not be till better times dawn on us, and the people are better skilled in musical science. However, without disparaging the kindly feelings of the people, we may say (and thousands will agree with us), that no music is often more desirable than some miserable attempts which we have had to endure in certain country chapels. Any body who has ever been present at mass in any German village will find it difficult to forget the impression made upon him by the well-regulated singing of the congregation; the people there appear to understand and appreciate the canto fermo, nor need we dwell at any length on the heart-fervour which seems to breathe in every note, when the entire assemblage intone the suppliant "Kyrie Eleison," and then peal out that triumph-song of Catholicity, "Gloria in Excelsis Deo." Would to God that we were able, and the people willing to bring about such practices in Ireland—we retract the word willing, for it is certain that no people can be more so than those of this country to give all their efforts to promote the decorum of religion. Their anxiety is manifested by the very attempts they make at sacred music, but we are constrained to acknowledge, that, however laudable the intention, the music is far from being what we would have it. Indeed we have known many a young curate, fresh from college, obliged to dispense with the vocal and instrumental accompaniments which distracted him during mass, and did not tend to elevate the souls of the congregation. Fifes, fiddles, drums, and long-winded clarionets are not the instruments appropriated to such solemn occasions. One or two good voices chanting the "Kyrie," "Gloria," "Credo," and "Agnus Dei," would do more to touch the heart than a score of ill-taught flute and fiddle-players, against whom we enter our most solemn protest: all such well-meaning people do more to distract and annoy than they are really aware of. If it were possible we could find a remedy for all this in the organ, which without the accompaniment of a voice, is so capable of raising up men's souls with its trumpet notes, or reaching the inmost recesses of the heart with its sustained mournful cadences. Now, in our judgment, where the organ cannot be procured, any instrument approaching its power ought, of necessity, be introduced, to the exclusion of fifes, fiddles, drums, and key-bugles.

We adverted to this matter some time ago, and feel overjoyed that our remarks have been kindly received. In our opinion, there can be no instrument more closely assimilating to the organ than the melodian; and as its cost is far from being considerable, we do not hesitate to urge all who take an interest in church music, to substitute it for the costlier instrument. It would be hard to find any village in Ireland where there is not some lady skilled in the piano, and as the keys of the melodian can be made like those of the former instrument, the only difficulty, and a trifling one, the pressure of the pedal with the foot, may be overcome with very moderate practice. Thus, any lady acquainted with piano music, might do much service to the decorum of the church or chapel, by devoting an hour or so to performing on the melodian, and heaven knows she could be employed in no more pious work. We have no personal interest in recommending the melodian, but are motivated solely by a desire to substitute touching and harmonious strains for the vile and ear-bursting screechings of shrill fifes and strident fiddles. That others have appreciated our remarks on this subject, is evidenced by the fact, that from Cahir-Civeen, and Coleraine, Mr. Groves, of William-street, has got orders for the melodian; and we trust, that wherever the amount can be procured, whether in parish church or conventual chapel, the instrument will be introduced by the clergy, secular and regular. Against the fife and fiddle we might write much, to show that they are not fit to be used at the celebration of mass; and we content ourselves with observing, that the melodian is the only substitute we can recommend for the organ. May it be extensively patronized by the bishops and clergy.

Recollections of Italian Vacations.

"E ricordai l'Italia: un cor gentile puo' l'Italia obliar?"—Nicolini. Giovanni di Procida atto terzo. Scena Seconda.

"And I remembered Italy: what gentle heart can Italy forget?"—Free Translation.

THE great schools of the Eternal City close for vacation about the beginning of September. Early in July they are opened for lectures only, during the hours preceding mid-day, as the torrid heats, sirocco, and malaria render it dangerous to professors, students, and every denizen of Rome to forego that most necessary luxury—a few hours' sleep in the afternoon. None but those who have sojourned in the Holy City during summer months can form an adequate notion of the listlessness and lassitude which characterize everything in and about Rome, from the middle of May—once sacred to the Bona Dea, now to Mary—till the beginning of November. Then, indeed, there is the most striking change. The Romans leave off all their "summer bravery;" and the figures which you were accustomed to meet in gay and flimsy garniture, are now scarcely recognizable in the ample mantellones, whose every drape and fold remind you of some statue with which your eyes have grown familiar. That is the season of bustle and activity. Carriage after carriage passes through the Porta del Popolo, freighted with nomades from every clime; and there is no rest for the custom-house officers and inspectors of passports. What an enviable post do not these gentlemen hold, whose duty it is to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with the ins and outs of portmanteaus, and the various faces so graphically described by the attache to an embassy!

There is a proverb, which states that, during the hot months, none but Englishmen and dogs are to be seen abroad in the streets of Italy. It looks like daring, to canvass the truth of a proverb, but we do not fear to assert, that though this one may be unquestionable with regard to dogs, 'tis far from true as regards bipeds. Dogs are abroad, no doubt—and Italian dogs, having something of the salamander in their nature, may be able to bear the forenoon heats; but as for Englishmen, we know no such ingredient in their constitution, and, consequently, take exception to the proverb.

We have said that everything in and about Rome looks peculiarly listless and lazy during the forenoon of the summer months. This listlessness—for we know no other term wherewith to express it—lasts from an hour before mid-day till about four in the afternoon; nor does this peculiar feature attach to Rome only, but to every city, town, and village throughout the whole length of the peninsula, from the upper to the toe point. Any one visiting Italy for the first time, must have experienced strange sensations when his vehicle rumbled over the silent streets of a city about mezzo-giorno. We ourselves can never forget the impressions made upon our minds a good many years ago, when fourteen youngsters, amongst whom we had the happiness to be, performed a twenty-five mile a-day march from Paris to Rome, and, passing through towns and villages about the hour of noon, were sorely puzzled to know what had become of the population. That band of neophytes, with its majority of two over "the twelve," and under the special guidance of the late Rev. Christopher Boylan, knew very little of continental manners and customs, as they jogged along, some inside and some outside two spacious vehicles, drawn by five mules, and a huge beast bearing a marked resemblance to a giraffe. That march, far more familiar to our recollection than Xerxes', was rife with incident; and, if many of those who accompanied us were not gathered to their fathers, we would not hesitate to awaken some pleasing reminiscences connected with it. But there are some of our quondam companions still surviving, who can call to mind the quaint, yet very natural observations suggested by the quiet and almost death-like appearance of the towns through which we passed at noon-tide. Shops shut—blinds closely drawn—silence most profound, and only broken by the never-ceasing flow of a marble fountain, or the sudden opening of a veranda, as some disturbed sleeper looked out—in all likelihood to curse the jingling bells of the giraffe's collar, or the sharp cracking of our vetturino's whip. But we knew not then that sleep was grateful not only at midnight, but "media die;"* and our schoolmasters, having taught us little of Roman computation, left us unconscious of the meaning of the "hora sexta"—an hour which we subsequently learned to bless, inasmuch as it was admitted to be the root and origin of the sweet siesta.

Amongst the many who pine and grow lean under the summer heats of Rome, there is no one, perhaps, more deserving of commiseration than the ecclesiastical student. The avocations of the painter and sculptor do not chain him down, or literally encage him, as do the routine and discipline of a college life the youth destined for the ministry. The former, having no restraint, can roam at large in the cool freshness of the evening, regale himself with an ice under the awning of some caffè, or betake him to one of the many villas, whose gushing fountains, shady groves, luxuriant vineyards, and winding alleys, redolent of the perfume of the lemon, orange, and myrtle, are choice restoratives after the relaxation of the day. Scenes more blest than these, fancy cannot picture, and none so meet for the artist's eye. There stroll and lounge the proud patrician, and the tradesman, each bent on enjoying "il fresco." Gay groups of the humbler classes, among whom you may note the stalwart man from Trastevere, with velvet jerkin flung over his shoulder, and the young maiden from the same region, with huge silver buckles in her shoes, and large gold bodkin in her head-gear, trip it lightly to the wiry music of the mandolin and the sound of the merry tabour. He who is so inclined may freely mingle in the sport, for in no other spot are the proprieties more rigidly observed, and amongst no other people is there less of cold, stiff, puritanical reserve. A happy man, truly, is the artist, save when folly makes him otherwise. There is not one of the fraternity who, having resided for any length of time at Rome, does not look back with regret to the hour when he turned homewards. The ecclesiastical student, without one-half the advantages enjoyed by the young painter or sculptor, looks to the crowning moment of his existence with a sorrowful apprehension, for he knows and feels that when the last sight of the wondrous dome salutes his gaze, he is leaving behind him buried youthhood, bright scenes, and imperishable glories, such as he may not find wheresoever else his lot is cast.

The diary of an artist who has studied at Rome would make a delightful volume, worth a thousand of the trashy productions annually pawned on the credulity or gullibility of the public. The mind and imagination of the artist teem with images of the beautiful and perfect; the picturesque groups which meet him in every glade of the sunny south present him with forms of loveliness which he alone can depict, chisel, or describe as they deserve: and then, the habits and antique usages of the people among whom he lives, are subjects which, in our judgment, he alone knows how to treat with the pennello or the pen. In these respects, the high calling of the artist gives him a decided advantage over the ecclesiastical student, and the opportunities which lie in the path of the former we need barely glance at. Restrained by the regulations of college life, the ecclesiastical student cannot roam at large where he pleases; bound to obey the directions of a superior, who may or may not cultivate a taste for the antique or beautiful in art or nature, he is left to his own tastes and the hasty perusal of such works as an ill-assorted library may afford. The artist, on the other hand, can leave his studio when he pleases, loiter in the galleries, lounge in the villas, muse "amid the chief relics of almighty Rome," quaff the classic goblet with the greaved herdsman, or take up his abode in the tents of the skin-clad shepherds of the Campagna; thus making himself conversant with the manners, idiom, and customs of every class. We do not, of course, mean to imply that the artist's privileges should extend to the ecclesiastical student, but merely want to show the advantages which, in particular respects, the young painter or sculptor has over him, and to express at the same time our wonder, that not a single book treating of Rome and its contorni has come from the pen of any of those from whom we have a right to expect it. In a former number of this MAGAZINE we quoted a much-admired work, wherein it clearly appears that we Irish have no students of the fine arts at Rome, though distinct mention is made of youths who journey thither from Scandinavia, and the shores of the Caspian, to worship the master-productions of Raphael, Angelo, and Phidias. Why this should be, we know not, and, in our opinion, 'tis superlative vanity to point to Hogan, and say that he is in himself a host.

These reflections have made us digress, so now let us resume our subject. At the termination of the academic season, the students of the various colleges are sent to the villas which some of them possess in the neighbourhood of Rome. Propaganda has its country-seat at Frascati, close by the grass-grown streets of old Tusculum; the English have theirs at Monte Porcio, near to the ruins of that splendid retreat wherein Lucullus revelled in sybaritic luxury; the Scotch own a pleasant mansion, in the midst of rich vineyards and olive-groves, at Marino, a few furlongs from Alba Longa, and hard by Castle Gandolfo, where Pio Nono sojourned last October, and upset an antiquated usage which condemned many of his predecessors to a state of seclusion far more rigid than that of a monastery. On a rising ground, looking down on the ruins of a house said to have belonged to lean Cassius, the accomplice of Brutus in Caesar's murder, and within ten minutes' walk of the thundering Anio and Adrian's villa, outside the city of Tivoli, stands a long, straggling building, formerly belonging to the Greek college, but now the vacation residence of the Irish ecclesiastical students. While Dr. Boylan was president of the Irish college, or, as it should be more correctly termed, boarding-house, the students had no country residence, save a very small house near the banks of the Tiber, looking over against the Mons Sacer. This cassino was not large enough to give them accommodation, and, as Dr. Boylan was a man who loved to encourage antiquarian pursuits, he freely allowed many of his alumni to go where they liked during the vacation, and make the best use of their time. 'Twas the good fortune of the writer of this paper to have been one of the lads thus happily circumstanced. Doffing the ecclesiastical costume for one which gave us freer use of our limbs, some of us proceeded to a convent of Augustinians in the neighbourhood of Marino, while others took up their abode with the students of the Scotch college. Left to ourselves, we were perfectly unconstrained, roamed where we liked, and mused where we pleased. There was not a single remnant of the olden time, from the questionable tombs of the Horatii, to the broken pillars which cumber the ground in the vicinity of Vicus Varus, with which we did not make ourselves perfectly familiar. Lake Nemi and Lake Albano were both near us, and no day passed over our heads that we did not swim in their blue waters. A donkey, carrying a brace of panniers well stored with viands, was sent before us at an early hour of the morning, and halted at the spot where we wished to dine. Often and often did we enjoy a comfortable siesta in the shade of some deep forest; and then, when the melting noontide heats had subsided, sat down with right good will and appetite to feast on the good things which our providore had prepared for us the preceding evening. Cold fowl—a macaroni pie—grapes from some neighbouring vineyard—and vino padronale in abundance, made our dinner; the song, the merry laugh, and an occasional visit from some contadino who had a good voice, or a good bagpipe, gave zest to our happiness; and when the repast was finished, we pursued our way over hill and dale, till the tolling of the Angelus bells from convents and churches summoned us to our homes to repose after the day's fatigue, and plan another excursion. The advantages derived from this rational liberty were many, and those who remember Dr. Boylan cannot cease to be grateful to him. The Irish youth had thus an opportunity of making himself well acquainted with the habits and language of the people—not to speak of the great interest of the various localities—and returned to Rome, at the beginning of November, strong in body and improved in mind. Those who had taste for antiquarian pursuits, might indulge them to their fullest extent; and we are glad to be able to assert that our companions of those days lacked neither taste nor capabilities. A different system followed Dr. Boylan's retirement, and the reverend gentleman who succeeded him as rector of the Irish College at Rome, purchased the present vacation-residence at Tivoli. The discipline observed in the house at Rome is fully carried out in the country, and, with the single exception of the schools, there is not a shade of difference between St. Agatha's and the Villa Cassiana. We forgot to say, that in the latter place there was a billiard-table, and that it afforded agreeable recreation to the students. In fact, sedentary games—backgammon and chess for example—were their only amusements in the forenoon hours, as they could not avail themselves of a miserable attempt at a ball-court. The recreations in the Villa Cassiana were not, in any way, commensurate with those which the students enjoyed in Dr. Boylan's time; and how could they, when the same privileges were not conceded them?

If we could venture to make a suggestion—and surely there is nothing derogatory to the zeal or wisdom of the actual President in it, if we be permitted to make it—we would recommend the immediate formation of a small, select library of works relating to Ireland and its antiquities, for the special study of the students during vacation. If there be a spot on the face of the globe more calculated than another to inspire one with a love of antiquarian pursuits, surely there can be none more favoured than Tivoli, where the monuments of old stare you at every winding and meet you on every hill-side! The more distinguished students* could then aid their younger friends, and encourage them in the study of ancient architecture, and promote a love—a deep, respectful love—of these relics which chronicle the rise and fall of their own country. Ah! what a pleasing task might it not be made, to translate, for example, some of these old records in St. Isidore's library, and give them to us in our guttural vernacular: we can easily fancy that some youth, skilled in the Irish tongue, might employ his leisure hours to advantage in transcribing such a work as the "Flight of the Earls," and preparing it for the press. Such a work would redound greatly to the honour of the young Irish Missionary and give him a great claim on the gratitude of his countrymen.

Turning from the Villa Cassiana to Monte Porcio, the country-seat of the English students, let us see how the months of September and October speed with them. Let us not forget that up to a late period the English college had for its president one of the most distinguished men of our day. Nicholas Wiseman is undoubtedly one of the grandest ornaments which the Catholic Church or Catholic literature of these realms can boast. There is no department of learning, sacred or profane, in which he has not been highly distinguished. Our estimate of his labours and industry has not been hastily formed, nor do we care to quarrel with him on the score of politics. We judge him according to a better standard, and in his capacity of an ecclesiastic. Profoundly versed in modern languages—the author of a work on Syriac idioms—a Doctor of theology—and, we use the word in its proper signification, as old Anthony Wood defines it, "qui est habilis ad docendum"—one qualified to teach. What is there connected with the life of an ecclesiastic, that he is not able to teach? An erudite historian—a learned canonist—a warm admirer of every thing that is exquisite in art—and an accomplished musician—we can truthfully assert, that there is not in the British islands prelate more praiseworthy, or priest more gifted. He has attained no honour that his learning and unaffected piety have not won for him, and at a period when such dignities were to be got only by a rigid personal examination, and in presence of an applauding crowd of Theologians and Philosophers. What matters it that he is not an Irishman, or that his views are not precisely ours? He is a Hierarch of our religion, and even though he were not, great acquirements like his must command admiration and respect.

With such a man presiding over them, the students of the English college could not but be happy and enlightened. 'Twas our good fortune to have been the companion of their walks during the vacation time for many a year; nor will we forget the instructions we derived from their amiable and learned moderator. Monte Porcio was ever open to the visitor who came to explore the ruins in the vicinity. Hospitality, for which we are not wont to give our neighbours credit, was never refused the wayfarer; and were we to dwell on one particular season of high-souled festivity at Monte Porcio, we need but recall that during which his Eminence Cardinal Weld was a sojourner within its precincts. But, alas! it fills us with sorrow to look back to those days. The good cardinal thought that no amount of rational relaxation should be denied the students, nor did he ever act the ascetic when amongst them. Playful as a child—suggestive as an anxious parent—listening to the student's proficiency, he felt as much gratification as though it redounded to his own personal honour, and whosoever most distinguished himself in the studies of the year was his especial favourite. In the latter respect he did nothing more than follow the example of the other members of the Sacred College. Any one who has ever had to do with that venerable body must have learnt to appreciate the cordiality of manner which distinguishes each and all of them. Accessible to every one—ever ready to listen to the complaint or remonstrance of the oppressed, there are no men more thoroughly bent on doing justice to the insulted, or remunerating honest genius, than the purpled dignitaries. Maj, with all his book-learning, is an humbler man than some school-masters we have known, and though in the true sense fully entitled to the appellation of "a proud priest," is apparently as unassuming and unassuming as though he had not rescued Tully's Respublica from ruin and oblivion. Ah! but it consoles us to record such facts as these, particularly when we remember how we saw some factious tyrants of the petits-maitres class brought to account for their haughtiness by no less a personage than a cardinal, whose condescension, affability, and love of justice, were so many rebukes to people clothed in a little brief authority.

But, as we were saying, with such a man as the rector of the English College for a guide, the students committed to his charge could not fail to derive important advantages from the villeggiatura. His acquirements, as we have already stated, were not circumscribed by theological boundaries, but comprised within their cycle an immense amount of profane history and local knowledge. In the dark labyrinths of the catacombs, he would rob the place of half its horrors, expatiating on the sufferings of the Christian, or giving pithy sketches of the great men who entombed themselves there, to commune with Christ, while pagan Rome was offering incense to her fabulous deities. Every mouldering temple, broken arch, tessellated pavement, and shattered aqueduct—so frequently met in the hills and the valleys of the Sabina—were objects of his particular study. There was not a hiatus in any inscription, from the temple of Vesta, at Tivoli, to that sacred to Fortuna, still towering in majesty above old Præneste, that he could not fill up and elucidate. Nor was this the result of a study of guide-books. His profound classical knowledge, derived from Livy, Maro, Sallustius, and Horace, so stored his mind, that he could evoke the shades of the departed, and present them to our young fancies, fighting by lake Regillus—toiling at that great tunnel called the Emissorium, through which lake Albano finds vent for its superfluous waters—crimsoning the highways with each others blood in the proscriptions of Sylla and Marius—or, in the calmer days of Augustus, sauntering by the rushing Anio, on whose banks, crowned with ivy, the bard of bards sang the charms of Lalage, and tuned a grateful strain for Macænas. Often and often have we started before the sun lit up the Sabine hills, and flung its glories upon the blue Tyrrhene sea, mounted on sure-footed roadsters—some twenty of us—oh! but we were light-hearted then! In the caffè of some hamlet perched on the summit of a rocky eminence, there was no great difficulty in procuring a collation. The church-bell summoned us to hear mass, and when that solemn half-hour had passed, we were once more on horseback to visit some ruin of the imperial times, or locality made sacred as the haunt of genius. There was, for example, that sweet spot called Grotto Ferrata, where some would have you believe that Cicero had his villa, yet now more note-worthy as containing Domenichino's frescos—remarkable, too, for these strong turrets and bastions within which that stern old man, Pope Julius II., sat in conclave with his cardinals, and marshalled the steel-clad vassals with whom he hoped to hunt the Gallic host from the land of Italy.

* 'Tis but justice to acknowledge that the Rev. A. Quinn was the most distinguished of the Irish students, during our stay at Rome; he took first premium every year, in the various classes, and made a splendid examination for the Doctors' degree. The revered gentleman is now senior curate to our amiable and reverend Dean, the Parish Priest of Westland-row.

What blissful hours have we not spent mid the ruins of Hadrian's villa, studded over with the miniatures of those fabrics which struck the emperor with astonishment in his peregrinations! The vale of Tempe, with its scanty stream; the prætorium; the temples; the mosaic floors, which were once trod by imperial feet, and even now refuse to allow vegetation in their interstices—afforded ample matter for meditation and instruction. How often did we ponder mid the marble palace of poor Queen Zenobia, who, even in adversity, could not have thought that her Palmyra would one day become the dwelling-place of the Bedouin, and the retreat of the wild beast!

Turning from the contemplation of the great ruins of the imperial times, how pleasantly have we not passed hour after hour in the deserted halls of feudal palaces, where the portraits of barons, cardinals, nuns, and statesmen look down from their frames on the visitor! Go where you will through the Papal territory in the vicinity of Rome, you are sure to see a stately palace, with its solitary pillar—the sole memorial of a race that has died out. Gibbon, in the description of the tournament in the Colosseum, makes a fine picture of that bloody scene; but if there be one incident more striking than another, 'tis that of Prince Colonna, preceded by his armorial ensign, and the legend "If I fall, you fall." Bulwer's Rienzi, too, has thrown a sort of romance over that family, and we confess that that book afforded us much gratification, as we lingered in the saloons of Marino, and Zagarolo, where, perhaps, poor Cola nursed the hope of seeing Rome restored to greatness, or the Popes restored to Rome. The last of the Colonnas saw Pius VII. drawn in triumph through the Porta del Popolo, and died before Napoleon's final banishment. The pillar has fallen, but the people have not; the condition on the legend is not verified, nor shall it be. There is a din, a spirit-voice, now pealing through the land of Italy, grander and more stirring than could have been dreamt of even by Filicaja. Petrarca, like our own Moore, sang songs of despair. Tassoni satirized the disunion of states, and the antagonism of factions. But, lo! the lion of Juda is not dead, and what Monti sung had no point till now:

"Di Giuda il Leon non anco è morto;

Ma vive e rugge e il pelo arruffa e gli occhi

Terror d' Egitto, e d' Israel conforto.

E se monta in furor, l'aste e gli stocchi,

Sa spezzar dé nemici, e par che gridi,

Son la Forza di Dio, nessun mi tocchi!"

Oh! consummation for which we sighed in youth, while yet the mists of prejudices blinded men's eyes, and left them to grope after false systems—banning the spirit of freedom, and propping up the old, rotten legitimacies of a slave-ridden world! How was it possible to expect that a temporal power like that of the Papacy should not be stained by vices in its administration, when we reflect that Austria intimidated, unless the policy dictated by despotism motivated and regulated it? Look beyond the Papal boundaries, and see the minor States deriving all their vitality from the same source; and if you would pause to contemplate any of the kingdoms fighting the fight of Austria—quenching the young spirit of liberalism in torrents of blood; curbing and chafing all the generous impulses of man's nature; turning the fairest spot on the globe's surface into a region of horror and agonies—take up the map and fix your eyes on Naples! 'Tis true that none of the Popes pursued any such brutal policy as this; but 'tis unquestionable that many of them, educated, and spending the greater part of their lives in the seclusion of monasteries, knew little of mere worldly governing, and allowed themselves to be swayed and handled by the only power that professed friendliness to them. What had they to expect from England?—Nothing. From France?—Alas! we need not answer. No wonder, then, if these Popes lent themselves to Austria, and were misguided by her Metternichs; no wonder that the various factions of Carbonari, Framasoni and such like, created perpetual alarm, and left the Peninsula at the mercy of its masters. 'Twas this accursed system that filled Spielberg with the noblest and the best; and this same infatuation reddened Cosenza with the Bandieras' blood. But the end of all is fast approaching; tyranny is in the death-struggle—the voice of the people is the voice of God—the mitred sovereign is the strength of God, as Monti calls him. He is the exponent of a grand system; reforms are progressing; the old, rotten fabrics crumble at the breath of a Pontiff; in the city and the hamlet the bugle sounds reveil and the beat of drum calls stalwart striplings to learn platoon and file exercise. Shipments of percussion muskets from France—priests and patricians contributing to the equipment of citizen-soldiers—a press unshackled by unnecessary restrictions—military pageants as numerous as processions—these are the forerunners of a great era. These are the weapons with which Pio Nono must triumph. These are the means by which he will smash the lances and swords of despots. Fenced round about with willing and loving hearts, ready to dare, ready to die, he may well afford to exclaim, "Son la forza di Dio—nessun mi tocchi!"

And all this has come to pass since the days when Gregory XVI. was Pope, and since the time when our ears were hourly frightened by rumours of revolutions and conspiracies. May the people learn to appreciate their altered position, and conspire only to love their God, their monarch, and country! At the period when we were students, we dared not whisper the word liberty, nor did it ever enter into our minds to anticipate such a state of things as has come about. Yet, in our roamings through the Sabina, 'twas easy to discover that there was an immense amount of discontent, and that the peasantry were ready to plunge into all the horrors of civil war, rather than support a system which left no place of preferment for the layman, as long as an ecclesiastic could be found to fill it. This, amongst other causes for hate of the ruling power, has been eliminated; and the last act of the reigning Pontiff, in the institution of municipalities, must reconcile all men to his wise and enlarged policy.

But we are forgetting our theme. When fully satisfied with exploring every monument that could interest us, we were sure to find refreshing cheer in some monastic refectory, and a few scudi given to the poor fathers, procured us something better than pulse and pease, such as the clerk of Copmanhurst gave to "Sir Sluggish Knight." Many a merry song trolled we, such as may not again echo in these old refectories. Now and again we had the pleasure of the company of a "podesta," who became our special favourite. His parents, not wishing to make either of the apostles jealous, had him baptized, Pietro-e-Paolo; and the Roman government, in honour of the latter, honoured him with a magisterial sword.

A comical fellow was this podesta, or village magistrate; and just as fit to hold such an office as Don Abondio was to regulate Don Rodrigo and his Bravi. Yet he was amusing, withal—a good singer—a good story-teller—and a capital fiddler. A necessary appendage on all occasions when the friars required his musical powers in processions, or in the choir: he had long secured their warmest interest, and no stranger was invited to their board who was not sure to meet Signore Pietro-e-Paolo. His jurisdiction extended into the woody region about Velletri, then infested by a gang of desperadoes not half so picturesque as the brigands who prowl at fancy-balls, or figure in a lady's scrap-book. Now it was Signore Pietro-e-Paolo's business, in virtue of his commission, to see these fellows arrested, but the considerate magistrate continually deprecated the unhappiness of his position, which he feared would compromise him in the opinion of these folk, and so far reverse their relative positions as to make him the captured instead of captor. In fact, the study of the podesta's life had been to keep out of the way of the brigands, and he would as soon have jumped headlong into the sulphur lake on the Roman side of Tivoli, as approach the lurking-places of the fellows whom he designated "gallantuomini ma un po' scalpestrati"—in other words, brave fellows, but a little wrong-headed. In fact, any allusion to the subject ruffled the temper of Signore Pietro-e-Paolo, and was met with a gentle whisper into the ear of whoever sat next him, which implied that the less said on such matters the better, as the "gallantuomini," were "gente assassinonissima"—and this, too, with a guarantee, on the part of the person who heard it, that he would never repeat abroad that the "podesta" had used such a superlative predicate. Naturally timid, and somewhat imaginative, he would much rather listen to anything else, and more than once hinted that his sleep had been disturbed by horrid dreams, such as Don Abondio dreamt the night after the Bravi had forbidden the bans of Renzo and Lucia.

A song—a solo on the fiddle—a loud evviva to the health of the students—the rosary—the seven penitential psalms—anything, but this harrowing subject of the Gasparoni's, and other notables of that class, was a relief to our friend, the magistrate; but we have gleaned from him many a strange tale, which 'tis our intent to inflict on you elsewhere.

Along with his other accomplishments, the podesta possessed no inconsiderable taste for poesy; but he chose rather to flirt with the muse of Pasquino, and pen bitter satires, than court the gentler nymph who smiles benignant on the lyrist. Yet there were moments when he sought inspiration at the last-named source; and having taken a particular fancy to the well-known air so happily associated with our own Moore, frequently sang us the following composition, which we have deemed worth remembering for the sake of the melody:*
